The Acceſſion of King HENRY V. to the Death of King HENRY VII.

PART VIII.

HENRY V. ſurnamed Of MONMOUTH, the ſecond King of ENGLAND of the Houſe of LANCASTER. A.D. 1413.

THE reader muſt now prepare himſelf for a ſcene of amazing revolutions, in which the wiſdom of Providence, and the vanity of human precautions, will be alike conſpicuous; teaching this neceſſary leſſon to the great ones of the earth, that policy founded on injury, and power ſupported by injuſtice, however they may be for a while attended with ſucceſs, will in the end prove ſhallow and precarious, and revert to the confuſion of thoſe who put their truſt in them.

Henry of Monmouth was about twenty-five years of age when he ſucceeded to the crown of England, by the conſent of the parliament, who made no difficulty of placing the royal diadem upon him, though he could not be ſuppoſed to poſſeſs a better title than his father, and though the earl of Marche, the lineal heir, was ſtill living: in which the great aſſembly of the nation ſeems to have preferred the general happineſs and welfare to any private conſideration of hereditary right; a right which we have frequently ſeen rejected, to make place for the advantage of the whole body of the people.

Nor had Henry's ſubjects any reaſon, on this occaſion, to repent their conduct, ſince their new ſovereign ſucceeded to royalty with every merit that could adorn it. He began his reign on the twentieth of March, 1413; and on the twenty-fourth of the ſame month, both houſes of parliament met, in purſuance of a ſummons under the late king, after ſeveral adjournments. The ceremony of young Henry's coronation was performed on the ninth of April following, by Arundel, archbiſhop of Canterbury, with great ſolemnity, and amidſt the unfeigned acclamations of all preſent.

The new king had no ſooner aſſumed the reins of government, than he increaſed the good opinion the people already conceived of his reign, by many acts of juſtice and popularity. His firſt ſtep was to publiſh a general amneſty or pardon for all crimes, rape and murder excepted: he diſmiſſed all the old companions of his former irregularities: he choſe a new council, compoſed of the wiſeſt and beſt men of the kingdom: he ſhewed a reſolution of reſtoring purity to the courts of juſtice, by diſplacing many judges, and others who had undeſervedly held poſts of power and profit under his father: he received all petitions, without exception of perſon, time, or place; and none departed from him without redreſs, or juſtice done them: and, as an earneſt of the favour men of integrity might expect under his rule, even the chief-juſtice Gaſcoygne, who had committed him, when prince of Wales, to priſon, and who, on that account, trembled to approach the royal preſence, was received with the utmoſt cordiality and friendſhip; and Henry, inſtead of reproaching him with his paſt conduct, applauded his ſtrict and impartial execution of the laws, and continued him in his poſt, with a ſtrong exhortation that he would perſevere in the ſame noble conduct. Farther to manifeſt to the world how ſuperior he was to all party conſiderations, he cauſed the corpſe of the unhappy Richard II. to be removed from Langley abbey, where it had been buried in an obſcure manner, to Weſtminſter, in which place it was reinterred near the remains of his queen, Anne of Luxembourg, with royal ceremony and generous donations, after the manner of thoſe times, for the honour and ſalvation of the deceaſed *.

But notwithſtanding theſe endeavours of Henry to conciliate the affections of all his ſubjects to his government and perſon, there was ſtill a party in the kingdom that could not behold with patient eyes any of the line of Lancaſter in poſſeſſion of the regal dignity. This party had abettors of very high diſtinction: Edmund, duke of York, the ſame who, in the time of king Richard the ſecond, had been created duke of Albemarle, was ſtill alive, had vaſt riches and influence, and was at this time conſtable of the Tower; not caring, however, to appear perſonally in rebellion againſt Henry, who had given ſeveral generous proofs of his friendſhip and confidence, he privately ſet to work one Wightlock to propagate a ſtory that king Richard was ſtill alive in Scotland. This fellow proved indefatigable in the buſineſs he was employed about, and papers were poſted up on the gates of Weſtminſter abbey, in ſeveral parts of London, and on the doors of ſeveral churches, in which it was affirmed, with the moſt dreadful aſſeverations, that Richard was ſtill alive. Wightlock being in a ſhort time ſeized, and committed to the Tower, the duke his patron favoured his eſcape, for which he was diſmiſſed his place as conſtable, and one of the warders was tried and executed as a traitor for having contrived the criminal's eſcape: and thus this embryo of a conſpiracy periſhed almoſt in its conception, without any cruel or rigorous examples being made, Henry treating the whole with a contempt that ſeemed ſuperior to revenge.

Matters were in this ſituation when a new parliament met, on the fifteenth day of May. It was opened by a ſpeech from the biſhop of Wincheſter (Henry Beaufort), the king's uncle, who aſſured them of Henry's zeal to promote the intereſt of church and ſtate. The commons having choſen a ſpeaker, preſented an addreſs, deſiring that the laws might be duly executed: then they petitioned his majeſty that he would provide for the defence of Ireland, Wales, the Marches of Scotland, Calais, and Guienne: they complained loudly of the clergy's exacting pecuniary fines of the people, by way of commuting for the ſins of the fleſh; and ſeveral other abuſes: all which the king promiſed to ſpeak to the biſhops to reform; and that if they neglected, he would take order to do it himſelf. Several ſtatutes were enacted for the better preſervation of the public peace, and the maintenance of the people's privileges; and one in particular for preventing frauds and falſe returns in the election of members for parliament.

While the parliament was thus providing for ſecuring civil liberty, the clergy were as induſtrious in deſtroying religious. Notwithſtanding all the ſeverities againſt the Lollards, and notwithſtanding all the power of the clergy, and their zeal to ſuppreſs them, they increaſed in ſuch a manner as not only to threaten the deſtruction of the power of the church, as exerciſed in England under the biſhop of Rome, but alſo, as the generality of theſe ſectaries were hot and ignorant, the government began to grow apprehenſive of diſagreeable conſequences to the ſtate, from their frequent and numerous meetings: this, added to the neceſſity Henry found himſelf under of keeping well with the clergy, made him reſolve to come into all their violent meaſures; and, on the twenty-firſt of Auguſt, he publiſhed a proclamation againſt the conventicles of the Lollards, forbidding ſuch on pain of impriſonment, and inhibiting all perſons from embracing their opinions, favouring their perſons, or attending their preachings, without a licence from the biſhop of the dioceſe.

The ſect was highly irritated at this proclamation, and, in the heat of their blind reſentment, went ſo far as to poſt up papers in ſeveral public places, threatening the government that they were ready to bring an hundred thouſand men into the field, againſt any who ſhould go about to perſecute thoſe who had embraced their faith. The chief of their party was ſir John Oldcaſtle †, of Cowling, in Kent, ſtyled, in right of his wife, lord Cobham: he was a man of eminent parts, courage, and experience in military affairs, which had recommended him to Henry's favour. Thomas Arundel, who was ſtill archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was extremely incenſed againſt the Lollards, thought that the ſureſt method of ſuppreſſing the ſect, was to attack their principal protector, and accordingly a proceſs was ordered in convocation to be begun againſt him as an heretic; but as Oldcaſtle was, as we have obſerved, in favour with the king, it was thought that this method might give offence, unleſs the king was made acquainted with it before hand, and his leave deſired to proſecute the heretical knight. The archbiſhop accordingly waited upon Henry, who then reſided at Kennington, to inform him of the clergy's intention; but the affection Henry had for ſir John, made him deſire to have ſome conference with him before he gave leave to the convocation to proceed further againſt him. The knight was accordingly ſent for, but Henry found him ſo firmly determined in his principles, that he gave leave for the clergy to proceed againſt him to the utmoſt extremity in their courts.

In conſequence of this licence from the king, Oldcaſtle was cited to appear before the archbiſhop on the ſecond of September; but contemning the citation, was excommunicated, and thereupon arreſted by the civil power, and brought by the lieutenant of the Tower, on the twenty-third or twenty-fifth of that month, to give an a account of his faith with regard to the ſacraments. Being preſſed too cloſe upon the points of tranſubſtantiation, the worſhip of the croſs, and the authority of the biſhop of Rome, he did not anſwer to the ſatisfaction of the archbiſhop and his three aſſiſtant ſuffragans, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and St. David's, and they agreed to pronounce ſentence upon him as an heretic convict, and to deliver him over to the ſecular arm. Forty or fifty days being generally allowed, according to the tenor of the law of England, for any perſon under eccleſiaſtical cenſures to repent and make ſatisfaction to the church, before the civil authority interpoſed with its coercive power, ſir John was recommitted to the Tower, but made his eſcape before the term was expired. He was no ſooner at liberty, than he ſent for his friends to make ready for the field, and repair to the neighbourhood of London upon the firſt notice they ſhould receive from him; and, from the concurrent teſtimony of all cotemporary writers, even Ball himſelf, the great favourer of this nobleman, it appears more than probable that the ſtate as well as the church was threatened by theſe fanatics with ſome dreadful ſtroke, if it had not been averted by the king's great vigilance.

Henry was then at Eltham, keeping his Chriſtmas holidays; but upon receiving intelligence of the intended meeting of the Lollards, he haſtened up to Weſtminſter. The condemnation of ſo great a man as ſir John Oldcaſtle gave the meaner ſort to underſtand what they were to expect, if they ſhould fall under the like cenſures; accordingly, upon the firſt ſummons from their favourite hero, they flocked from all parts of England, to the number of twenty thouſand (as Oldcaſtle's indictment ſets forth), ſcarce any knowing what they were to do, but all ready to obey his orders. The rendezvous was appointed, before day, on the ſixth of January, 1414, in St. Giles's Fields, that had hitherto been the ſcene of their devotion when driven from the churches, but now deſtined to be the field of their rebellion. Henry, apprized of their deſign, had, with all poſſible privacy, got together a good number of troops, and taken poſſeſſion of the ground ſoon after midnight. Sir John Oldcaſtle expected to be joined by great numbers of apprentices and ſervants from London, ſome ſay near fifty thouſand; but the king, the noon of that evening the inſurgents were to aſſemble, had ordered the gates of the city to be ſhut, and had poſted guards at all the avenues, to intercept all aſſiſtance that might arrive: by this means the Lollards were caught in their own ſnare, being ſeized as faſt as they came to the place of rendezvous, where they found enemies inſtead of the friends they expected, till the alarm being given, the reſt ſhifted for themſelves, and diſperſed. Sir John Acton, one John Brown, an eſquire, ſir John Beverly, a preacher, with one Richard Marle, a rich brewer, of Dunſtable, and the precentor of St. Alban's, who had headed theſe rabble, were, with ſix-and-thirty other perſons of eminence, ſeized in the fields by the ſoldiery, and ſuffered death the next day, as traitors and heretics, being firſt hanged and then burnt, in St. Giles's Fields. Cobham got off at this time, and, though a proclamation was iſſued, with the promiſe of a reward of fifteen hundred marks, for taking him, his party ſecreted him ſo well, that he was not ſeized till about four years after, when he was drawn, hanged, and burnt as he hung, the laſt puniſhment being added becauſe he had been declared an heretic: but we ſhall have occaſion to canvaſs this affair more fully in the eccleſiaſtical part of this work. We muſt now turn to foreign affairs; but it will be neceſſary to explain the ſituation of the French court and kingdom, as an introduction to that war which continued ſo long, and was productive of ſo much miſchief and calamity to both nations.

The accommodation between the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, of which we have given an account in the preceding reign, and in conſequence of which the troops of England were diſmiſſed from the ſervice of the confederated princes of France, was but ſhort-lived. The duke of Burgundy, who well knew that he had an inveterate enemy in the perſon of Lewis, the dauphin of France, reſolved to make himſelf dreaded by that prince, by kindling up anew the flames of civil commotion in that kingdom: for this purpoſe he privately dealt with the Pariſians, by whom he was adored, who ſuddenly took to arms, and aſſembling to the number of twelve thouſand men in ſupport of their favourite, they ſurrounded the Baſtile, of which they quickly made themſelves maſters, and cut off the governor's head; after which they broke into the dauphin's apartments, ſeized the duke of Barr, with the principal officers of his houſhold, many of whom they barbarouſly put to death; and forced the dauphin himſelf, with the dukes of Berry and Guienne, to wear white hoods, the badge of the faction. But their inſolence was ſoon ſuppreſſed, for the king, Charles VI. relapſing into one of his lucid intervals, the duke of Burgundy was deprived of the advantage of acting under pretext of the royal authority; and the king, with the moſt conſiderable perſons both in the court and city, reſolved to ſend deputies to the duke of Orleans and the other princes of his party, who had retired from Paris; and a conference was held at Vernueil, where the princes aſſured the king of their ſervices, and the dukes of Orleans, Berry, Bourbon, Alençon, the counts of Eu and Vendôme, haſtened to Paris, in order to deliver their ſovereign out of the hands of the Burgundian faction. The dauphin having gained over a great number of the Pariſians to his intereſt, and finding himſelf likely to be powerfully ſupported by the confederate princes, ſent private orders to his partiſans to aſſemble, ſo that he at length found himſelf at the head of thirty thouſand men: with theſe he ſcoured the ſtreets of Paris, and ſtruck ſuch terror into the oppoſite faction, that they abandoned the Louvre, Hotel de Ville, and Baſtile, without oppoſition; and the duke of Burgundy, finding himſelf unable to ſtop the progreſs of his enemies, and being, moreover, diſappointed in a deſign he had formed of carrying off the king of France to Flanders, under pretence of an hunting-match, retired himſelf precipitately into that country, leaving his party expoſed to all the rage and reſentment of their adverſaries.

The duke of Berry was again declared governor of Paris; and the court of France being thus new-modelled, appointed commiſſioners to treat of a final and laſting peace with England; and, on the fourth of July, 1413, conferences were opened at Lelinghen, in Picardy, between the French and Engliſh commiſſaries, where it was immediately agreed, that the truce, at preſent ſubſiſting, ſhould be inviolably obſerved till the month of June, in the following year.

We have already ſhewn, that Henry IV. had carefully fomented the animoſity between the two French parties, each of whom he had alternately furniſhed with aſſiſtance; and he would probably have endeavoured to avail himſelf farther of their diſſentions, had not the unſettled ſtate of his own affairs hindered him from carrying ſuch a deſign into execution. Henry V. with even more ambition than his father, did not labour under the ſame diſadvantages; he had aſcended the throne without oppoſition, he poſſeſſed the good-will and affection of his ſubjects in general, and he was too ſagacious not to perceive, and too prudent not to improve, the tempting proſpect which the diſtracted ſtate of the French monarchy preſented to his view. Nevertheleſs, that he might conceal his ambition under the ſpecious appearance of equity, he reſolved to begin by the way of treaty and negociation; and the duke of York was ſent to Paris, with a ſplendid retinue, to demand the princeſs Catherine of France, a young lady of thirteen years of age, in marriage for the king of England.

Whilſt this negociation was on foot, Henry entered into another with the duke of Brittany, who had hitherto obſerved an exact neutrality between the courts of France and England; but the Engliſh had great cauſe of diſſatisfaction with the Bretons, whoſe privateers had greatly diſtreſſed their trade, but all differences were now to be made up, and the duke, if poſſible, warmed into a ſteady ally. Accordingly, the latter having ſent two commiſſioners on his part to London, conferences were opened on the firſt of February, 1414, in which a truce was concluded between the two powers, on the following terms:

"That it ſhould continue ten years, and be exactly obſerved through all the dominions of both princes; that the duke ſhould take care to reſtrict the inhabitants of St. Malo's from all piracies and depredations: that no acts of hoſtility ſhould be committed by any of the ſubjects of the two princes: that there ſhould be a free and undiſturbed trade and traffic between both nations, with payment of the uſual cuſtoms; but yet that none of the ſubjects of king Henry, except merchants, ſhall enter into any city, towns, or forts of Brittany, without licence firſt obtained from the governors: that if, by attempts contrary to this truce, any perſon ſhould be taken priſoner, or any depredations ſhould be made, reſtitution and full ſatisfaction ſhould be given, without any fraud or delay: that though ſuch violences were acted, yet the truce ſhould not be broken by them, nor any ſuch pretences give occaſion to begin a war; but the wrongs done ſhould be repaired, and the perſons offending ſuffer deſerved puniſhment: that no man of war ſhould go out of any port in Brittany, or in any of the duke's dominions, without firſt having given good ſecurity that nothing ſhould be attempted contrary to the truce: that all prizes taken ſhould be brought into ſome port belonging to the duke, or to king Henry, unleſs, by ſtorms, or the purſuit of ſome enemy, they be forced into other harbours; and if any man of war ſet out to ſea, without having given the required ſecurity, it ſhould be forfeited to the duke: that all ſhips bringing any prizes into the allowed ports, ſhould be arreſted by deputed officers, till ſufficient enquiry be made whether the prize were lawful: that before ſuch due examination, no prizes ſhould be expoſed to ſale; and that, if the officers were negligent in making their enquiry, they ſhould be bound to ſatisfy all the damages of the injured party: that during the truce, the duke of Brittany ſhould not receive any traitors, pirates, fugitives, or exiles from England, nor afford them the leaſt entertainment or relief, but ſhould cauſe them to be apprehended and delivered up to the king of England, at his own proper expence, when he had ſent the names of them, and required it: that the duke ſhould not give reception to any of the king's enemies, armed to make war againſt him, nor ſupply them with any proviſion or aids, nor permit any of his ſubjects to go out of his dominions to their aſſiſtance, nor to do any thing for their relief: that no prizes taken from the Engliſh by the king's enemies ſhould be admitted into the duke's ports, nor ſale of the goods be made within his territories, nor the duke's ſubjects entertain or receive any who thus ſhould infeſt the Engliſh by land or by ſea; and if any were found faulty in ſo doing, they ſhould be puniſhed according to their deſert: that the ſubjects of England ſhould have free admiſſion into the ports of Brittany with any prizes which they ſhould take from the enemy; and if any of the duke's ſubjects ſhould make any falſe pretenſions to theſe prizes and goods as their own, and this was clearly proved againſt them, they ſhould for ever be excluded from all benefit of the truce*."

We have given theſe terms at length, as they ſerve to ſhew us how well, even in thoſe days, the principles of commerce and the law of nations were underſtood.

The next power with which Henry concluded a negociation, was the crown of Caſtile: the Engliſh ſtill bore in their remembrance the vaſt annoyance they had ſuffered from the ſhipping of that nation in the reign of Edward III. and it was therefore neceſſary to ſecure the friendſhip of that prince. This was the more practicable, as Henry had in his own dominions a powerful pretender to the crown of Caſtile in the perſon of the duke of York, by right of blood from his mother, the daughter of the late Peter the Cruel, and the only daughter who had left male iſſue: accordingly we find Dr. Henyngham appointed to treat with dom Juan Roderigo, the Caſtilian ambaſſador, and a truce concluded upon ſeveral excellent regulations, ſome of which are very ſingular.

It was to this effect: "That it ſhould begin on the twenty-fifth of March following, and continue till ſun-ſet of the twenty-fifth of March the next year: that it ſhould be exactly obſerved by ſea and land: that the ſubjects of both nations ſhould abſtain from all acts of war and violence: that no depredations ſhould be made by land, nor piracies by ſea, by the ſubjects of Caſtile upon thoſe of England: that the Engliſh ſhould be admitted to come and reſide in any of the dominions of the king of Caſtile, with full liberty of trade in all lawful and unprohibited goods, paying the duties to the king and the uſual cuſtoms: that if, during this truce, any thing ſhould be acted, by the ſubjects of Caſtile, to the damage of the king of England, or his ſubjects, reſtitution ſhould be made, free of all expences or charge, and the perſons offending puniſhed according to the nature of the offence: that though any ſuch acts of violence ſhould be done by the ſubjects of Caſtile, yet they ſhould not be accounted violations of the truce, nor be pretended as occaſions of beginning a war, but that full reparations be made of the injuries by the king of Caſtile, or his officers, and the offenders duly puniſhed: that if any goods or merchandize were taken from the Engliſh, they ſhould be preſently ſeized by the king of Caſtile's officers, and put into ſafe hands, to be ſecured for the owners; to whom, upon complaint and proof made, they ſhall be reſtored, and all charges of the recovery be ſatisfied out of the goods of the perſon who took them, to ſecure the truce from being broken; and to prevent all attempts againſt it by any cruizers in the ſeas, it was alſo agreed, that if any of the king of Caſtile's ſubjects ſent out ſuch ſhips, ſecurity ſhould be given that they might not be employed againſt the Engliſh, nor make depredations in the kingdom of England, duchy of Aquitaine, or any of king Henry's dominions: that the officers appointed ſhould not ſuffer ſuch ſhips to go out of port till they had given this requiſite ſecurity, that all prizes which they took ſhould be brought into the port whence the ſhip was ſent out, and into no other, unleſs they were forced by purſuit of enemies, or driven by a tempeſt, but that, as ſoon as it ceaſed, they ſhould bring the prize into the required port: that if the officers appointed by the king of Caſtile ſhould neglect to take ſufficient ſecurities of the owners of thoſe ſhips, thoſe officers ſhould repair all damages and miſchiefs of depredations made by them: and for the ſpeedier reparations of the loſſes which the ſubjects of both kingdoms had ſuſtained, it was reſolved, that the king of Caſtile ſhould ſend his embaſſadors to Fontarabia, a town in Guipuſcoa, a province in Spain, on the frontiers of Aquitaine, in the beginning of the next July, to meet thoſe ſent from England; and that they ſhould have full power to hear and decide all cauſes and controverſies relating to piracies or depredations, made at land or ſea, by the people of either nation, contrary to the truce concluded between the two crowns in the beginning of the reign of Henry, king of Caſtile, the father of the preſent king, who would give effectual orders, that what the embaſſadors determined ſhould be performed in all his dominions: but if any thing intervened, ſo that the king of Caſtile could not ſend his embaſſadors to the appointed place at the aſſigned day, yet this ſhould give no interruption to the truce: and in concluſion, Roderigo engaged, for the king his maſter, that he ſhould ſend his letters patent, ſealed with the great ſeal, in confirmation of this treaty, and of all the articles agreed in it §."

The late conſpiracy and inſurrection of the Lollards gave occaſion to a ſevere ſtatute being made againſt them in the parliament which met, on the thirtieth of April this year, at Leiceſter, by which ſtatute they were ſubjected to the forfeiture of their goods and chattels, as alſo of the lands and tenements which they enjoyed in fee ſimple, at the time of their death, in the ſame manner as if they had been attainted of felony: it was alſo enacted, that none ſhould, upon pain of life and limb, read the Scriptures in Engliſh; and that ſuch perſons ſhould have no benefit of ſanctuary *. A vaſt number afterwards ſuffered by this infamous act, which owed its riſe to the bloody zeal of the clergy, and Henry's jealouſy of the civil principles of this new ſect. This perſecution was chiefly carried on by the inſtigation of Henry Chicheley, late biſhop of St. David's, but now promoted to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury, in the room of Thomas Arundel, who died on the twentieth of February before.

While theſe matters paſſed here, the court of France continued its proſecutions againſt the Burgundian faction with unremitting ſeverity, and many of them fell by the hands of the common executioner; and the king, who at this time ſeemed to be fully reſtored to his reaſon, publiſhed ſo ſevere an ordinance againſt the duke, that the latter deſpaired of ever being able to compromiſe matters. In this deſperate ſtate of his affairs, he applied to the court of England for aſſiſtance; and Henry, following the example of his father's policy, in ſupporting the weaker ſide, reſolved to eſpouſe the duke's cauſe, as the moſt certain means to perpetuate the diſtraction of the French government. Though the dukes of Clarence, Gloceſter, and York inclined towards the Orleans faction, an offer from the duke of Burgundy to do homage to Henry completed the matter in his favour, and the lord Scroope, with four other commiſſioners, were ſent to receive that homage, and to promiſe the duke, in conſideration thereof, a conſiderable aid. Henry, however, did not reap any great fruits from this manœuvre in politics; for Charles of France unhappily relapſing into his former inſanity, the French government thought proper to agree to terms of accommodation with the duke of Burgundy, which the latter gladly received, though they were extremely hard: all of them, however, are foreign to this hiſtory, the third article only excepted, by which that prince was obliged to renounce his late alliance with the king of England.

At the very time that Henry was carrying on his negociation with the duke of Burgundy, he entered into another with the court of France, from whence the archbiſhop of Bourges, the conſtable d'Albert, and Groutier Col, one of the king's ſecretaries, were ſent to England, under pretence of ſettling the difficulties that remained unadjuſted at the late conferences at Lelinghen; but in reality to diſcover what Henry's intentions were: the king, who was not yet prepared for the great enterprize he meditated, amuſed them for ſome time with negociations, but all that was done was to prolong the late truce to the ſecond of February, 1415. Henry, to carry on his diſguiſe, ſent over a ſplendid embaſſy to France, propoſing a perpetual alliance and peace between the two kingdoms, and demanding, in return, Catherine, the French king's daughter, in marriage; two millions of crowns, as her portion; the payment of one million ſix hundred thouſand †, as the arrears of king John's ranſom; the immediate poſſeſſion and full ſovereignty of Normandy, and the other provinces which Philip Auguſtus had wreſted from the crown of England, together with the ſuperiority of Brittany and Flanders ‡.

It is evident, from the exorbitant nature of theſe demands, that Henry was fully ſenſible of the diſtreſſed condition of the French monarchy; and the terms offered by that court, though greatly inferior, ſufficiently ſhew their own conſciouſneſs of the ſame melancholy truth: they agreed to give him the princeſs in marriage, with a portion of eight hundred thouſand crowns; to inveſt him with the entire ſovereignty of Guienne, and to annex to that province the counties of Perigord, Ro-

As Henry was pretty certain that his own terms would not be granted, and was fully determined to accept of no other, he ſet about making great preparations, to be ready againſt a proper opportunity offered for carrying into execution the purpoſe which he ſeems to have formed from the firſt moment of his acceſſion to the throne, agreeable to the dying advice of his father, not to ſuffer the Engliſh to continue long in a ſtate of inactivity; and his parliament, who appear to have acted in concert with their ſovereign on this occaſion, without waiting for the event of the negociations actually on foot, came to a reſolution of addreſſing the king for a war with France; and Henry, with great ſeeming complacency, acquieſced in their deſire, upon which the houſe voted him a very large ſupply.

In this parliament the commons likewiſe petitioned the king to ſeize the church-lands, and they ſupported their petition with ſuch cogent reaſons, founded on the immoderate wealth of the clergy, that this body, foreſeeing their ruin inevitable, unleſs ſome remedy was found againſt the gathering ſtorm, met to conſult about means to avert, or at leaſt weaken it as much as poſſible; and finding the king but too much inclined to comply with the requeſt of the commons, they reſolved to give up part of their wealth, in order to ſave the remainder: they offered, as a free gift, the whole riches and revenues of one hundred and ten monaſteries, which depended upon capital abbeys in Normandy, and had been bequeathed to them when that province was united to England; and Chicheley, the new archbiſhop of Canterbury, made him a formal tender of the ſame, which the king accepted, rather than quarrel with the clergy, and theſe monaſteries were appropriated to his uſe by act of parliament: and the buſineſs of the intended war with France being again artfully brought on the carpet by Chicheley, who made an elaborate ſpeech on the occaſion, ſtuffed with fulſome compliments to the king, the minds of the commons were called off from their firſt object, and the bill againſt the clergy fell of itſelf to the ground *.

All the reſt of the year was ſpent in continual embaſſies to London and Paris; but nothing was concluded on. At length, the archbiſhop of Bourges, the biſhop of Liſieux, the count of Vendoſme, great-maſter of France, the baron of Ivri, the lord Briquemont, and Groutier Col, with other noblemen, and a train of three hundred horſe, arrived at the Engliſh court, in order to bring Henry, if poſſible, to more moderate terms. They found him buſied in his preparations to invade their country: Henry gave them audience on the ſixteenth of April, 1415, at Wincheſter, in a very ſtately manner, ſitting in his robes of gold, and attended by all the princes of the blood and the lords of his court. The archbiſhop of Bourges made a florid ſpeech, in which he endeavoured to convince Henry of the unreaſonableneſs of his demands, and to repreſent the princeſs Catherine, and her portion, as more than an equivalent for all that the Engliſh aſked. Henry, however, treated this aſſertion with great diſdain; and the biſhop of Wincheſter, by the king's command, ſummed up the whole negociations that had paſſed between England and France ſince Henry's acceſſion to the crown; he accuſed the French of double-dealing and affected dilatorineſs in all their proceedings; he reproached them with the breach of the treaty of Bretigny; and concluded with declaring, "that his maſter now appealed to the ſword."

This thunder-clap for a while left the Frenchmen aſtoned and ſpeechleſs; but at length the archbiſhop of Bourges, loſing all patience, forgot what was due to his own character, and to the majeſty of a great prince, and, with eyes ſparkling with rage, made anſwer, "that he ſaw plainly that the king, not contented with a crown unjuſtly wreſted from Richard II. by his father, wanted to uſurp that of France alſo; but that he ſhould find the enterprize more difficult than he imagined †." Henry and his court, however, made no other reply to the archbiſhop's imprudent (we wiſh truth would permit us to ſtigmatize it with the epithet of falſe) charge, than by a politic contempt.

All conferences thus breaking off, Henry redoubled his attention to warlike preparations; and having aſſembled a great armament at Southampton, he repaired thither, in order to embark on his expedition, and the beginning of Auguſt was fixed for his departure. The ardour of the nation to follow him to the field exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations, and rid him of all apprehenſions of any defect in his finances to pay his troops, which would put a ſtop to an enterprize, from whence he promiſed himſelf ſo much glory. According to ſome hiſtorians ‡, the earl of Northumberland levied forty men at arms, and one hundred and twenty archers; the earl of Weſtmoreland the ſame number; the earl of Warwick, twenty men at arms and forty archers; the earl of Suffolk, the lords Zouch, Berkeley, d'Arcy, Seymour, Roſs, and Willoughby, each of them contributed half a ſhip, twenty men at arms, and forty archers; the lord Morley brought ſix men at arms, and twenty archers; and all the other nobility in proportion; the lords Scales and Randolf offered to ſerve without pay.

The next ſtep was to provide for the government of the kingdom in the king's abſence, and for the guard of the Marches of Scotland and Wales, and Calais. The duke of Bedford, the king's brother, was made lieutenant of England; and the following counſellors were aſſigned him, viz. the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Wincheſter and Durham, the earl of Weſtmoreland, the prior of the hoſpital of St. John of Jeruſalem, the lords Grey, Ruthyn, Berkeley, Powis, and Morley: the earl of Weſtmoreland, with the lords Morley and d'Acres, were conſtituted wardens of the Scottiſh Marches, with a command of two hundred lances and four hundred archers; a hundred lances and two hundred archers were appointed for the Marches of Wales; a hundred lances and three hundred archers were aſſigned for thoſe of Calais; and as many for the ſea-ſervice: and Henry entered into indentures with his great men, for their own and their ſoldiers pay, during their ſervice, viz. every duke was to have thirteen ſhillings and four pence per day, every earl ſix ſhillings and eight pence, every baron four

Henry, by a precaution worthy a great and wiſe mind, reſolved to endear his ſway, and ſecure the peace of his government, during his abſence, by a double act of juſtice and magnanimity; this was by reſtoring the young earl of Northumberland, ſon of the Hotſpur Piercy, to his blood and fortune, which he did this year before his departure; and, although he knew that Edmund, earl of Marche, had a right in the ſucceſſion to the crown prior to his own, yet, out of his natural magnanimity, he freed him from his confinement, in which he had been kept during the whole of the preceding reign, and even treated him with ſuch humanity and benevolence as entirely gained the affection of that young nobleman, who ever after continued to ſerve him with remarkable zeal and fidelity. About the ſame time he publiſhed certain proclamations in favour of the Lollards, ſo far as to prevent vexatious and arbitrary proſecutions of thoſe unhappy people: he likewiſe gave ſecurity to all the private perſons and corporations who had advanced him money, which they did in great ſums *.

The king being ready to depart, wrote a kind of formal letter to his adverſary of France, as he terms Charles VI. and to ſhew that he breathed nothing but war, he dates it from Southampton by the ſea-ſide †. This letter was delivered to the French monarch by Cantelupe king at arms; and it is ſaid that it was upon this occaſion the dauphin of France ſent Henry the famous ton of tennis-balls in deriſion, when our Engliſh monarch made this memorable anſwer, "that he would play ſuch balls againſt Paris, as all her battlements ſhould not rebound ‡." This ſtory has been very warmly ſupported and contradicted by different hiſtorians; but it is not worth our while to enter into the merits of its authenticity.

Moſt part of the Engliſh troops were now embarked, and nothing was wanting but a favourable gale to waft Henry to the ſcene of all his future glories, which he was waiting for with impatience, when he had notice of a dangerous conſpiracy formed againſt his crown and life by thoſe whom he thought he had leaſt reaſon to ſuſpect ‖.

The perſons who were to execute this deſign were Richard, earl of Cambridge, younger brother to the duke of York, the lord Scroope of Maſham, treaſurer of England, and ſir Thomas Grey, of Hedon, in Northumberland. The earl of Cambridge had married Anne Mortimer, daughter and heireſs of Lionel, duke of Clarence, third ſon of Edward III. ſo that, in right of this lady, he was in blood nearer to the crown than Henry. This plot was, in all probability, owing rather to the ambition of the earl of Cambridge, than to any regard he had to the earl of Marche, his brother-in-law, who had no iſſue, and upon whoſe death he hoped that either himſelf or ſome of his children would ſucceed to the throne.

It appeared upon the trial, and by the confeſſion of the earl himſelf, and his accomplices ¶, that the plot was laid in this manner: that the conſpirators ſhould, while the army was embarking, make the beſt of their way, with the earl of Marche, into Wales, and there proclaim him king, in defiance of the uſurper, Henry of Lancaſter, as they termed him: that the earl of Cambridge ſhould preſent this new king with a crown, which Henry had pawned in his hands for a ſum of money, and that he ſhould be proclaimed under a banner of the Engliſh arms; at the ſame time they propoſed to raiſe an army in Scotland, under the ridiculous pretence of Richard's being ſtill alive, and that thoſe forces were to be headed by young Piercy, who continued ſtill in Scotland. It ſeems the conſpirators had received ſome encouragement to propoſe this enterprize to the earl of Marche, by his having often told Cambridge in confidence, that every time he was confeſſed, his ghoſtly father made it a point of conſcience with him that he ſhould claim his right (meaning the crown of England.) This piece of intelligence, added to their knowlege of the weakneſs of his intellects, made them imagine it no difficult matter to perſuade Mortimer to concur with them in an enterprize which promiſed to ſet a crown upon his head: accordingly, having bound him by an oath of ſecrecy, they acquainted him with the whole plot they had concerted in his favour; but fear got the better of ambition in the mind of the earl of Marche: he ſaw the precipice to which theſe pretended friends were leading him, and reſolved to provide for his own ſafety; however, not to give them any cauſe of ſuſpicion, he ſeemed highly thankful for the ſervices they intended to do him, but begged he might have a few hours to conſider of the matter; which being readily agreed to by the party, he made uſe of that interval to lay open the whole affair to Henry **.

Orders were inſtantly iſſued for ſeizing the conſpirators, and impriſoning them in the caſtle of Southampton, to the conſtable of which they confeſſed their guilt, and threw themſelves on the king's mercy. Sir Thomas Grey was tried and condemned, on this evidence, by a common jury, of which it will not be eaſy to produce a precedent in any former reign; but the earl of Cambridge and lord Scroope pleading their peerage, a commiſſion was iſſued on the fifth of Auguſt, by which Henry conſtituted his brother Thomas, duke of Clarence, "his lieutenant and vicegerent ††," for trying the two noblemen by their peers. They pleaded guilty, and the earl of Cambridge ſent a very penitent and pathetic letter to Henry, imploring his mercy and forgiveneſs; but this was a caſe in which the king could hardly ſhew his clemency, with any regard to his own ſafety, or the tranquility of the kingdom. The conſpirators had engaged in this plot againſt him without the leaſt ſhadow of provocation: and it was not improbable they might attempt the ſame again, if left at liberty ſo to do: the king was upon the eve of a great and, perhaps, tedious expedition, and it was natural to think that they would not let ſlip ſuch a favourable opportunity of carrying their ambitious ſcheme into execution; he therefore found it neceſſary, for the good of the public, to allow the law to take its natural courſe. The earl of Cambridge and ſir Thomas Grey were beheaded; but lord Scroope was hanged, drawn, and quartered as a traitor, his guilt being aggravated with the circumſtance of ingratitude to Henry, who had diſtinguiſhed him with many particular marks of favour and affection.

Thus ended a conſpiracy, which has by many of our hiſtorians been attributed to the intrigues of the French court: it is very probable that they might have been made acquainted with the deſign, and have encouraged the conſpirators; but, excluſive of their aſſiſtance, or interfering therein, the deſign ſeems ſufficiently prompted by ſelf-intereſt, eſpecially if we reflect, that if the plot had ſucceeded, and the earl of Marche had been proclaimed king of England, while a ſham Richard was trumped up in the North of England, the earl of Cambridge would have had a very fair handle to make uſe of this impoſtor's name for putting the earl of Marche to death; which done, all the right of the Mortimer family devolved upon the wife and ſon of the former. Be that as it might, this conſpiracy ſeems to have been the firſt ſpark of that flame which conſumed, in proceſs of time, the two houſes of Lancaſter and York. But to return.

This affair detaining Henry at Southampton longer than he imagined, he could not ſail till the fifteenth of Auguſt. His fleet conſiſted of fifteen hundred tranſports, in which were embarked ſix thouſand men at arms, and twenty-four thouſand archers, making in all an army of about fifty thouſand men. He was attended by the earls of Dorſet, Kent, Cornwall, Saliſbury, Huntingdon, with many other nobles. After a pleaſant paſſage, he landed, the evening of the day after that in which he left the Engliſh ſhore, at Caux, in Normandy, a ſmall port in the mouth of the river Seine, about three leagues from Harfleur. According to Elmham, he had ordered his ambaſſadors, in their return from the court of France, to examine the ſtate and ſituation of that place, under the pretence of embarking there for England, and upon their report formed his plan of operations. The lord of Ercouteville, governor of Harfleur, was at the head of a numerous garriſon, and ſeveral experienced officers, and made a gallant defence for ſome time; but the walls being beaten down by the cannon of the beſiegers, the ditch filled up, breaches made, and every thing prepared for giving a general aſſault, he thought it beſt to capitulate for the ſurrender of the place, on the twenty-ſecond of September, if not relieved before. On that day thirty perſons of the town or garriſon, ſuch as Henry ſhould chuſe, being left to his diſcretion, the reſt were allowed to march out, and go wherever they pleaſed; and the inhabitants, either by force or inclination, taking the latter party, the place was repeopled by a colony from England, and the king made his uncle, Thomas Beaufort, earl of Dorſet, governor.

If the arrival of Henry with ſo formidable an army, and ſo ſuperior to thoſe that had won the battles of Creſſy and Poictiers, alarmed all France, his taking of Harfleur, one of the ſtrongeſt places perhaps in that kingdom, did not a little increaſe this alarm; but while the progreſs of the Engliſh arms terrified the French, it rouſed them to a reſolution of exerting all their efforts to ſtop it ere too late. Orders were immediately iſſued from the court to all the French nobility, for aſſiſting the crown againſt the Engliſh invaſion: the dauphin himſelf took the field with fourteen thouſand men at arms, and was ſoon joined by the dukes of Berry, Orleans, Bourbon, Alençon, Barr, and Brabant, the conſtable d'Albret, the counts of Nevers, Vendoſme, and Richemont, and all the flower of the nobility, and upwards of forty thouſand other ſoldiers, all eager to ſignalize their loyalty to their king, and their valour againſt the invaders of their country.

Very different was the ſituation of Henry's affairs: it was now near the middle of October, and the Engliſh troops had ſuffered terribly during the ſiege by ſickneſs, no leſs than two thouſand common ſoldiers, beſides many perſons of quality, having been carried off by the bloody flux, and ſeveral others were obliged to return to England, in hopes of their recovery in their native climate. Henry was much mortified at this diſtreſs of his people, which was the more unlucky as he expected to be attacked by the French, who were now become very powerful in the field: theſe conſiderations would probably have determined Henry to have returned to England; but the Engliſh fleet, which had, during the ſiege, lain before Harfleur, had been diſperſed by ſtorms, ſo that there was not in the harbour a ſufficient number of veſſels to carry his troops back.

So ſituated, and finding it would be impracticable to winter at Harfleur, for want of proviſions and forage, he, with the advice of his council, reſolved to begin his march by land for Calais, and to paſs the Somme at the place where it was forded by his great-grand-father, Edward III. Henry was not inſenſible of the difficulties and dangers that attended ſuch a retreat by land; but, unuſed to conſult with fear, he reſolved to take this party. Accordingly, after a ſtay of about three weeks at Harfleur, leaving a garriſon of two thouſand men in the place, under the command of the earl of Dorſet and his lieutenant, ſir John Faſtolf, and ſending the ſickly part of his troops home by ſea in ſuch veſſels as yet remained unhurt by the late tempeſts, he began his march along the ſea-coaſt, to Ville d'Eu, in order to reach the place where he propoſed to croſs the Somme.

In this march, however, he met with greater difficulties than he had even formed to himſelf: he found all the bridges over the Somme broke down, and the ford of Blanquetac, where Edward III. had formerly paſſed that river, two days before the battle of Creſſy, was now rendered impaſſable by a great quantity of ſharp ſtakes drove into the bed of the water, and the oppoſite bank ſtrongly guarded by numerous detachments of the enemy. Upon this he found himſelf obliged to alter his courſe; and marching higher up the river, beyond Amiens and Corbie, he at laſt effected a paſſage near St. Quintin, and directed his route towards Blaguy; but he ſoon perceived that he had only eſcaped one danger to fall into another, for he ſaw the whole French army, amounting to upwards of one hundred thouſand men, drawn up to oppoſe his farther progreſs. In this diſtreſs he ſent a meſſage to the conſtable d'Albret, offering to reſtore Harfleur, to repair all damages he had done to the French, and even to bind himſelf by an oath, that he would never again invade France, provided they would allow him to continue his march to Calais without moleſtation.

moleſtation. The conſtable was for accepting this offer, alleging, that the French government could not expect greater advantages from the moſt ſucceſsful battle, than what were now propoſed to them by the Engliſh monarch; but the young French generals, at the head of whom were the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, were deaf to all conſiderations but that of fighting the Engliſh; they even refuſed to conſent to wait for a large reinforcement, which were marching from all quarters, particularly from Brittany, to join their army, and all Henry's propoſals were rejected with diſdain; nay, they even added many acts of boyiſh inſolence to their raſh ſecurity, for, after having in vain endeavoured to provoke Henry, by repeated meſſages, to give them battle, they were inſolent enough to propoſe the queſtion to him, by a herald, how much he would give for his ranſom?

Henry bore all theſe inſults with a patient yet noble diſdain; in return to their meſſage, deſiring him to fix the place and time of battle, he replied, "that, weakened and exhauſted as his army now was, he would not ſeek an engagement; but, as he was reſolved to purſue his route to Calais, they might attack him when and where they ſhould think proper." On receiving this anſwer, the French took poſt between Rouſſeauville and a village called Agincourt. Both armies ſtood in order of battle from the twentieth to the twenty fifth of October; at length the French ſent him word, that they would give him battle on the laſt-mentioned day. Finding it impoſſible to avoid an action, he accepted the challenge, and preſented the herald who brought it, with a rich robe and two hundred crowns. During the three days which intervened between the challenge and the battle, Henry employed every means which prudence could ſuggeſt, in order to prepare his men for the approaching combat, by recalling to their remembrance the glorious atchievements of their forefathers, in the days of Creſſy and Poictiers, againſt an infinite ſuperiority of their enemies: in a word, by his example and his harangues he inſpired his ſoldiers with ſo much valour, that they ſeemed to have loſt all ſenſe of diſtinction of numbers, and to wiſh for nothing ſo much as to ſignalize themſelves in the preſence of their beloved and heroic prince.

Far different from the prudent conduct of Henry was the arrogant behaviour of the French generals. Puffed up with their ſuperiority of numbers, they looked upon the Engliſh army as already in their diſpoſal, and were ſo fooliſhly confident of victory as to paſs the evening preceding the battle in caſting dice for the imaginary ranſoms of their illuſtrious priſoners, and the ſpoils of the Engliſh camp; and, to complete the meaſure of their vanity, they ſent orders to many of the adjacent villages to prepare lodgings for thoſe ſtrangers, and to provide for the celebration of a ſignal victory.

On the twenty-fifth of October, the day appointed for the battle, the two armies were marſhalled as ſoon as it was light; but here the conſtable d'Albret is repreſented as having made an egregious blunder in the diſpoſition of his army: he drew it up on a narrow piece of ground, flanked by a rivulet and a thick wood, and in ſuch a manner that he could not extend his front line but a very little beyond that of the Engliſh; thus his ſuperior numbers, inſtead of being of any real ſervice, would only prove a burthen and encumbrance: but then he had two other lines, each of which formed an army more than double the number of the Engliſh. The firſt line was compoſed, beſides other troops, of eight thouſand gentlemen, commanded by the conſtable, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendoſme, and Richemont, and the famous marſhal Boucicaut, David Rambure great-maſter of the croſs-bows, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The ſecond line was led by the duke of Alençon, aſſiſted by the duke of Barr, the counts of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, Rouſſi, and Grand Pré. The third body was under the command of the counts of Marle, Dampmartin, Faquenberg, and the ſieur de Lannoy.

While the French officers were employed in drawing up their troops, Henry detached four hundred lances, to take poſt in a wood upon the right; and a party of two hundred and fifty archers, to lay in ambuſh on the left, in a low meadow covered with buſhes. The files of the French were thirty-one deep, whereas the Engliſh were not above four; Henry having been obliged, in order to extend his front equal to that of the enemy, to form his little army into one front, though conſiſting, indeed, of three lines, one behind the other, the extremity of which was flanked by horſe, in the manner of wings. The wing commanded by the duke of York, with the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope, was poſted to the right of the main body, and advanced ſomewhat before it: the centre was commanded by Henry in perſon, attended by his brother Humphrey, duke of Glocester; John, lord Mowbray, earl-marſhal; Richard de Vere, earl of Oxford; and Michael de la Pole, the young earl of Suffolk. The rear, or third line, conſiſting of archers and ſuch as were armed with ſpears, halberts, and bills, was led by Thomas Beaufort, earl of Dorſet. The king dreſſed himſelf, on this occaſion, with all the magnificence of a warrior, and appeared at the head of his diviſion mounted on a ſtately white ſteed, in ſhining armour, with a golden crown (made after the imperial faſhion) on his helmet by way of creſt, while four royal banners waved around him *. He was followed by a great number of led horſes in rich capariſons, and attended by the chief officers of his court. Sir Thomas Erpyngham, an old and experienced general, acted that day, by Henry's orders, as field marſhal; and le Fevre tells us, that the diſpoſition of the Engliſh army was planned by him.

We are told by father Daniel †, that before the battle began, king Henry ſent to make the French generals a ſecond offer of accommodation; when the terms they inſiſted upon were, that Henry ſhould renounce all pretenſions to the crown of France, and reſtore Harfleur: Henry would have agreed to this propoſal, on condition that Guienne and its appurtenances, together with the earldom of Ponthieu, ſhould be reſtored to him; and that the princeſs Catherine ſhould be given him in marriage, with eight hundred thouſand crowns for her fortune.

* Theſe were, firſt the ſtandard of the Trinity: the ſecond that of St. George: the third that of St. Edward: and on the fourth were diſplayed the arms of England.

† Hiſt. de France, tom. v. p. 542.

Henry

Henry, conſidering that the enemy was more powerful in horſe, and that his foot, in which lay the chief ſtrength of his army, would be expoſed to the danger of being broken by the fury of the firſt charge, commanded the archers (a battalion of whom was placed in the wing under the command of the duke of York) to fix into the ground piles, or ſtakes, pointed with iron at both ends, and ſix or ſeven feet long, in their front and on their flanks or intervals between the horſe and foot; within theſe palliſades, or piquets, his archers might retire, as within a little fortification, and from thence ſecurely annoy the enemy, as theſe latter advanced.

Thus, differently arranged, the two armies ſtood facing one another a great part of the day, the Engliſh not caring to advance, leſt they ſhould loſe ſomething of the advantage they had in the ground; nor the French, for fear of being more ſtraitened and crowded together than they were already. But as all delays were fatal to the former, who could not, in their circumſtances, find means of ſubſiſtence, Henry at length advanced, at the head of his main diviſion ‡, the two wings on each ſide moving at the ſame time (ſo as to preſerve one wide-extended front), till he came within twenty paces of the village of Agincourt, when the French horſe moved forwards to attack the Engliſh archers: upon this the Engliſh made an halt, and the foremoſt ranks fixed their ſtakes *, interweaving and bending them a little towards the enemy, and then retreating behind them, the bow-men began to let fly upon the enemy a ſhower of arrows, near four feet long, which being ſhot by men dexterous at that buſineſs, did incredible execution among the French, whoſe ranks were ſo cloſe that they had hardly room to move; however, being pretty well thinned by the ſlaughter made amongſt them, they advanced in a briſk pace to attack the archers and force their palliſades; mean while the two hundred bowmen, concealed in the meadow, iſſuing forth from their ambuſh, charged the French in flank with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that they were obliged to give way; and the Engliſh archers, ſeeing their confuſion, threw away their bows, and fell upon their enemies ſword in hand.

The conſtable of France, perceiving the diſtreſs of his advanced party, moved forward to its aſſiſtance, but under terrible diſadvantages; for the ſoil being wet and miry, and both horſe and foot clad in a cumberſome lobſter-like armour, and too cloſely wedged together, both men and beaſts ſunk up to the mid-leg in the ground, and continuing ſtill to preſs upon each other, preſented a defenceleſs body to the Engliſh archers, who made ſo good uſe of their miſſiles, that the whole of the firſt line was thrown into irretrievable diſorder: in ſhort, the buſineſs of our archers was that of executioners rather than of ſoldiers; for, ruſhing in amongſt the diſordered foe with their battle-axes and daggers, the field was quickly ſtrewed with the killed, wounded, diſmounted, and overthrown; and the conſtable, with a great number of the principal officers of the firſt line, being left dead upon the ſpot, the total rout of that corps was completed.

The ſecond line of the French, under the duke of Alençon, ſtood firm in an adjoining field, and were eager to engage, hoping by their valour to repair the diſgrace of their countrymen. Henry did not let them long expect him: he had all along kept cloſe to his firſt line, moving forward as they advanced, in order to ſuccour them upon occaſion; but that body, having cleared itſelf from the enemy without his aſſiſtance, now opened to the right and left, in order to give paſſage to the king at the head of his ſecond line, and to fall into the rear themſelves, there to rally.

Alençon expected him with a gallant intrepidity; but, willing to take every advantage that conteſts of this kind allow, he gave orders to eighteen French knights to keep a ſtrict eye upon the king of England, and to uſe all their efforts to ſlay or take him priſoner. This precaution had like to have proved fatal to England; but Henry's genius ruled that day ſuperior: animated with the ſucceſs of his firſt line, and burning with ardour to ſignalize himſelf by acts above the common level, as ſoon as he came within a proper diſtance of the French line, he alighted from his horſe, and advancing at the head of his diviſion with an heroic confidence that ſeemed to beſpeak victory, he charged the enemy with a valour equal to that of the moſt renowned heroes in hiſtory; when the duke of Alençon, with a ſpirit worthy his high blood and rank, ſeemed to take courage from the noble adverſary he had to encounter, and received the attack of the Engliſh with a firmneſs which deſerved a better fate: while Henry, however, was expoſing his perſon like the meaneſt ſoldier, fighting on foot at the head of his men, the French knights, who had never loſt ſight of him, cut a paſſage with their ſwords to the place where he fought; and ruſhing upon him all at once, would probably have made themſelves maſters of his life and perſon, had it not been for the bravery of David Gam, a Welſh captain, and two other officers of the ſame nation, who, ſeeing the peril that threatened their ſovereign, flew to his aſſiſtance, and joining their arms to his, the eighteen aſſailants were ſtretched breathleſs on the field; but Gam and his two gallant comrades were likewiſe mortally wounded. Henry, recovering himſelf from the confuſion this unexpected attack had thrown him into, beheld his loyal defenders ſtretched at his feet in the agonies of death. This was no time for unavailing expreſſions of pity; but, to demonſtrate his gratitude, he knighted all three as they lay upon the field. This noble tribute paid, he darted into the hotteſt of the battle, to revenge the late attempt of the foe; and, forgetful of the danger he had lately been in, his ardour carried him on with ſuch impetuoſity, that he was again in the moſt imminent jeopardy. His brother Gloceſter, who had fought by his ſide, was ſtruck to the ground; the enemy preſſed on in crowds, to avail themſelves of this incident; Henry ſaw himſelf almoſt alone in the midſt of an hoſt of foes; but, wholly unappalled, he beſtrode the body of his brother, covering him with his ſhield, and defending him with his ſword. In this ſituation he received ſuch a blow with a battle axe on his helmet that made him ſtagger and fall on his knees: at that very inſtant fate directed the duke of York, with a ſtout body of the Engliſh, to the ſpot; upon whoſe appearance the enemy ſomewhat giving way, Henry and his brother had both time to recover themſelves; and being ſoon after joined by another reinforcement, they fell upon the French in their turn with ſuch fury, that they were no longer able to ſtand the ſhock of the Engliſh, now doubly enraged by the thoughts of their ſovereign's danger.

To his Grace Duke of This Plate is most

The duke of Alençon, ſeeing the defeat of his diviſion, which was the ſecond, and fearing the third would have no better ſucceſs, reſolved to make one effort, in order to reſtore the battle, or ſpare himſelf the mortification of ſurviving the diſgrace of his country: he put himſelf at the head of ſome choſen volunteers, and, cutting his way to the ſpot where Henry fought, he ruſhed upon the Engliſh monarch, killed the duke of York by his ſide, and cleft the crown on Henry's helmet with the firſt ſtroke of his ſword; the latter was not ſlow in returning the ſalutation, and, calling all his ſtrength to his aid, he diſcharged ſuch a blow at Alençon with his faulchion as brought him to the ground, and with his own hand ſlew two of his followers, who endeavoured to cover their maſter's body. At length the duke called out that he was Alençon, and demanded quarter of the king, which Henry, admiring his courage, was ready to grant him, and had even ſtretched forth his hand to lift him from the earth; but the Engliſh ſoldiers, who now ſurrounded their king, were ſo exaſperated at the Frenchman's attempt, that they diſpatched him with their ſwords and ſpears before the king had time to reſtrain their brutal loyalty. The death of this general was attended with the total defeat of the line which he commanded.

The third line of the French, being ſtill freſh and in good order, might have renewed the battle; but their hearts failing at the ſight of the paſt and preſent ſlaughter, and obſerving that Henry had detached a body of Engliſh horſe to charge them in the rear, while he advanced with a body of freſh troops to attack them in front, they retired from the field, without ſtriking a blow.

In this battle, which was gained by the Engliſh with the loſs only of the duke of York, the earl of Suffolk, and about a thouſand men on their ſide, there were about ten thouſand French ſlain in the field, among whom were the dukes of Brabant, Bar, and Alençon, Charles d'Albret, conſtable of France, and near eight thouſand gentlemen; of priſoners there were taken fourteen thouſand, and among theſe the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu and Vendoſme, the marſhal Boucicaut, and Arthur, brother to the duke of Brittany, with many other noblemen and gentlemen of diſtinction.

Hardly had Henry gained this ſignal victory, when he thought himſelf in danger of ſeeing it wreſted from him. The troops of the French vanguard, or firſt line, that had been routed in the beginning of the battle, had rallied afterwards, and, being joined by others, drew up at ſome diſtance from the field, and appeared on an eminence like a new army diſpoſed to try the fate of another engagement: there happened at the ſame time an alarm, that another party of the enemy were in his rear, and had already plundered his camp. Theſe were only a company of runaways, headed by Robert de Bournonville, who, retiring early out of the fight, and knowing the Engliſh camp was but weakly guarded, had fallen upon and pillaged it, while the two ſecond lines of the Engliſh and French were engaged. Before the truth of this affair could be rightly underſtood, the Engliſh, ſeeing the number of their priſoners exceeded that of their own forces, began to put ſome of them to death, in order to be diſencumbered and at liberty for a renewal of the fight, which they now expected; but they were ſtopped in the midſt of this bloody, though perhaps neceſſary, precaution by Henry's orders, who ſent a herald to the body that appeared on the eminence to acquaint them, that, ſhould they remain in that poſture, or advance, or not diſperſe, he would put every priſoner he had in his power to the ſword without mercy, and then march againſt themſelves, who muſt expect the like treatment from him, if he overcame. Intimidated at this declaration, they inſtantly diſperſed, and left him complete maſter of the field. He then marched towards the camp, in order to ſuccour his people there; and, upon his approach, Bournonville with his party took to flight.

Nothing now remaining to oppoſe his victorious arms, Henry's firſt care was to offer his humble and grateful acknowlegements to Heaven for ſo ſignal and unexpected a victory, and public thankſgivings were accordingly ordered throughout his army. After this juſt and decent tribute, he ſent for the French herald, named Montjoy (who was, with four more, come, in his maſter's name, to aſk permiſſion to bury the dead), and formally demanded of him, to whom he thought the victory belonged? the other replying, "to the Engliſh," the king next aſked him the name of a neighbouring caſtle, to which he pointed with his ſword, and being told it was called the caſtle of Agincourt, "henceforward then (ſaid he), this action ſhall be known by the name of the Battle of Agincourt."

Notwithſtanding this glorious victory, Henry, being in an enemy's country, ordered his ſoldiers to deſtroy the greateſt part of the plunder, and to reſume their march towards Calais the very next day. According to Monſtrelet, the marſhal de Louvigny, at the head of ſix hundred men at arms, and the duke of Brittany, with forces almoſt equal to thoſe of the Engliſh, were come very near the field of battle, when they received the news of the defeat of the French: if the latter, adds my author, had led on his freſh troops againſt the wearied and wounded Engliſh, he might probably have recovered the victory; but he retired immediately into Brittany, where he remained neuter from that day. However this might be, it is certain that Henry brought his army to Calais by ſlow marches, without meeting with any obſtructions on his way. Having ſtaid about three weeks here, to recruit his troops, he embarked with them for England, on the ſixteenth of November, and, after an eaſy paſſage, landed the ſame evening at Dover, from whence he ſet out in a day or two for London, where he was received by the citizens with all honours due to the glory and ſucceſs of his military atchievements.

After taking ſome repoſe from his late fatigues, Henry ſet himſelf to cultivate a good intelligence with foreign princes, in order that he might find no diverſion for his arms ſo long as he continued the war with France. With this view he ſent ambaſſadors baſſadors to adjuſt ſome differences that had ariſen, in point of trade, with the crown of Norway and the Hanſe Towns: he alſo concluded a treaty with the king of Arragon, and even made ſome propoſals of marriage between himſelf and that prince's daughter; and ſent to require of the king of Caſtile, that, in conſideration of the nearneſs of blood between them, he ſhould renounce any alliance with the court of France, that might be prejudicial to the intereſts of England, or contrary to the treaties ſubſiſting between the two nations.

The year 1416 opened in England by a parliament, which met a Weſtminſter on the ſixteenth of March, and voted the king a plentiful ſupply, with many expreſſions of gratitude for the hazards he had run in defence of the rights of the kingdom, in his laſt glorious campaign.

The emperor Sigiſmund had been for ſome time at the court of France, and had drawn up a plan of a truce, which he intended to communicate to Henry without loſs of time. He accordingly came to Calais, where he was magnificently entertained by the earl of Warwick, the governor; and having received ſafe-conducts for himſelf and all his retinue*, he arrived in England in the beginning of April; and on the twenty-third of that month, being the feaſt of St. George, he was inſtalled a knight of the Garter. His principal buſineſs was to ſettle a peace between France and England: William of Bavaria, earl of Holland and Zealand, who came over at the ſame time, and for the ſame purpoſe, joined his endeavours; but their negociations came to nothing, either by the inſincerity of the French in their manner of treating, or becauſe the terms inſiſted on by the Engliſh were too unreaſonable for the French princes, who were priſoners, and who were parties in the negociation, to anſwer for their performance. What ſeems to countenance the charge of inſincerity on the part of the French, was the preparations then making in France for invading England, and the actual blocking up Harfleur by a fleet of nine great carracks and a number of other veſſels, in hopes of ſtarving the garriſon into a ſurrender; but that fleet being beaten and ſeveral of the ſhips ſunk and taken, the place was relieved in the beginning of Auguſt, and ſupplied with all neceſſaries.

Sigiſmund ſeems to have been well ſatisfied with Henry's conduct in this negociation; for he thought proper, on this occaſion, to enter into an alliance with the Engliſh monarch, and both powers mutually agreed "to ſupport each other againſt all others, the church and pope of Rome excepted." They likewiſe agreed, that neither of them ſhould enter into any meaſures prejudicial to the honour or intereſt of the other: that their ſubjects ſhould reciprocally enjoy a free and undiſturbed trade. It was farther agreed, that the king of England might, by force of arms, endeavour the recovery of his rights, and the emperor do the ſame, againſt France, without the one contracting power obſtructing the progreſs of the other. Laſtly, that they ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other, and mutually guarantee their acquiſitions in caſe of a peace with France. This convention was ſigned at Canterbury, on the fifteenth of Auguſt this year†; and the emperor, in a few days after, took his leave, and paſſed over to France, in his way to Germany. But before we take our leave of this prince, we cannot forbear taking notice of the very extraordinary manner in which he was received upon his firſt coming over, and which we find thus related by the author who writes under the name of Titus Livius, by Walſingham, Goodwin, and other of our Engliſh hiſtorians.

While Sigiſmund was in France, he had been admitted to be preſent at a ſeſſion of the parliament of Paris, in which, from a notion, perhaps, that emperors enjoy a power paramount to that of kings, he had exerciſed an act of ſovereign juriſdiction. This coming to the ears of Henry and his nobility, they reſolved to inform his imperial majeſty, that the king and people of England knew no ſuperior but God. The duke of Gloceſter and other Engliſh noblemen were ordered by Henry to receive the emperor at his landing. He was brought over in a magnificent fleet of Engliſh ſhips, and approaching near the ſhore, he found the duke and his retinue firſt drawn up upon the ſtrand, and then advancing towards the boat wherein he was, and which they ſtopped: this extraordinary proceeding was followed by a declaration from the duke of Clarence, in the name of the king and people of England, "That if his imperial majeſty was to land as a friend, an ally, and a mediator of peace, he ſhould meet with all the reſpect due to his high dignity; but that the crown and nation of England being free and independent, they were ready to oppoſe his landing if he claimed any power as a ſovereign paramount." The emperor having, in reply, formally declared that he came with no ſuch intent, but only as a friend, ally, and mediator of peace, he was received on ſhore with the moſt profound demonſtrations of regard; and, after being highly entertained on the road, was met by Henry himſelf at Blackeath, and conducted in great pomp to London.

While theſe matters were tranſacting in England, the ſpirit of giddineſs and inconſtancy, which had ſeized the French nation as well as their king, did what the battle of Agincourt would never have effected alone. Two dauphins were already dead, and the third, who was afterwards Charles VII. and at that time only ſixteen years of age, endeavoured to ſave the remains of this great wreck. Queen Iſabella, of Bavaria, his mother, had extorted letters patent from her huſband, by which ſhe was entruſted with the reins of government. She was a covetous woman, and greatly addicted to gallantry, and was not a little ſuſpected of carrying on a criminal correſpondence with the lord of Bois Bourdon, a young and handſome nobleman of the court. The treaſure of which ſhe had plundered the kingdom, and her huſband, ſhe partly beſtowed on this favourite, and carefully depoſited the reſt in ſeveral monaſteries. The dauphin and the Armagnac faction, the count of which name had been lately made conſtable of France, upon the death of Albret, having diſcovered this hoard, had made uſe of it, for the preſſing wants of the public. To this affront, which ſhe received from her ſon, the king added another of a more ſenſible nature: one evening, as he was going to pay a viſit to the queen in her own apartments he met the lord of Bois Bourdon coming out; he inſtantly ordered him to be apprehended and ſent to the Chatelet, where he was put to the torture, and confeſſed his having, for ſome time, maintained a criminal intimacy with the queen, together with many other things laid to his charge; upon which he was ordered to be ſewed up in a ſack, and thrown into the river Seine. The queen was directly ſent priſoner to Blois, and from thence to Tours, without being ſuffered to ſpeak with the king. It was this accident, and not the battle of Agincourt, that placed the crown of France on our Henry's head. The queen, in this diſtreſs, implored the aſſiſtance of the duke of Burgundy, who gladly embraced this opportunity of eſtabliſhing his own authority on theſe new diſtractions of his country.

Accordingly he raiſed a ſtrong army; and, having entered France, he ſoon reduced Amiens, Abbeville, Dourlens, Mountrueil, and other towns in Picardy: Senlis, Rheims, Chalons, Troyes, and Auxerre declared themſelves for his party. He made himſelf maſter of Beaumont, Pontoiſe, Vernon, and Meulant, towns in the neighbourhood of Paris; and, advancing weſtward, ſubdued Eſtampes, Chartres, and other fortreſſes; and at laſt was able to deliver the queen from her confinement, who repaired to Troye, and from thence publiſhed declarations againſt the Orleans and Armagnac factions, who, as ſhe alleged, detained her huſband in confinement. In the mean time the duke of Burgundy was not wanting in every meaſure that policy, or the preſent ſituation of his affairs, could dictate. He ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, in the month of September this year; between whom it was agreed, that the king and he ſhould meet at Calais, and the interview was fixed for the beginning of October: but this negociation was carried on ſo ſecretly, that the French court of thoſe days was intirely ignorant of its terms, which did not appear till a long time after, that the public records printed in England firſt diſcovered the ſecret.

On the day appointed this interview was held; and the duke then ſigned and ſealed the following articles, which we ſhall give exactly as they are to be found in the ninth volume of the Collection of Public Acts.

"The king having acquainted the duke of Burgundy with his juſt claim to the crown of France, and his adverſary's refuſal to give him ſatisfaction, told him, that, by the help of God and St. George, he was reſolved to obtain it by force of arms. Upon this declaration, the duke perceiving the juſtice of the king's title, and conſidering the great victories heaven had bleſſed him with, promiſes to ſend him his letters patent, containing what follows:

"That though, heretofore, for want of information, he had eſpouſed the contrary party, believing it juſt; now that he is better informed, he promiſes firmly to adhere to the king of England, and his heirs and ſucceſſors, as to thoſe who are, and ever will be, the true and lawful kings of France, as much as if they were in actual poſſeſſion of the crown.

"Though for the preſent the king has not deſired the duke's homage, yet, as the duke owns it to be due, he promiſes, that as ſoon as the king of England ſhall be poſſeſſed of a conſiderable part of the realm of France, to pay him liege-homage, and ſwear fealty to him, as every vaſſal of the crown of France ought to do to the king of France his ſovereign.

"Item, The duke of Burgundy promiſes to endeavour, by all known and unknown ways, to place the king of England on the throne of France.

"Item, Whilſt the king ſhall be employed in purſuing his rights, the duke of Burgundy will make war with all his forces upon the king's enemies in France, namely, A. B. C. D. and upon all their dominions and adherents, refuſing obedience to the king of England.

"Item, In all the alliances and letters patent made, or to be made, between the king and the duke, wherein the duke ſhould except, or have excepted the king's adverſary, or the ſon of his adverſary, it is not his intention to do any thing contrary to what he promiſes by theſe preſents, which he is to give the king, but will punctually perform it.

"That if, through diſſimulation, the duke excepted the king's adverſary, or the dauphin his ſon, for a greater good, and for the better accompliſhing the intended project, his will and meaning is, that all ſuch exceptions are void, and of no effect.

"And that all may know this proceeds from his own free conſent, he will promiſe and ſwear by his faith and honour, to obſerve it without fraud or deceit. He will write all the articles with his own hand, ſign them, and ſet his uſual ſeal to them."

This treaty was the ſole cauſe of the great revolution which happened in France; and it muſt be confeſſed, that the duke acted a deteſtable part, and ſuch as cannot be approved by any honeſt man.

At the ſame time the duke made a treaty of a more public nature with the emperor, who was then at Calais (but entirely ignorant of what had paſſed between Henry and the duke), by which the former agreed to pay the emperor homage for the counties of Burgundy and Aloſt. This ſerved as a pretext to cover the true reaſon of the duke's viſit to Calais; and to complete the ſcene of double-dealing, Henry, feigning to let himſelf be perſuaded by the inſtance of the emperor Sigiſmund (who, on this occaſion acted the part of a great prince and a good Chriſtian, by his unwearied endeavours to reſtore peace and public tranquility), conſented to a truce with France, which was to commence on the ninth of October, and hold to the ſecond of February following: and then paſſed over to England, where a parliament was held, on the nineteenth of October, and the houſe was acquainted by the chancellor, that the king had found all his pacific inclinations fruſtrated by the obſtinacy of an unjuſt enemy, and that the laſt appeal muſt be the ſword; and concluded with deſiring their advice and aſſiſtance. In conſequence of which, they granted a handſome ſubſidy.

In this parliament the king created Thomas Beaufort, the earl of Dorſet who was governor of Harfleur, duke of Exeter, with the uſual penſion of one thouſand pounds per annum.

Henry

Henry employed all the remainder of this year, and great part of 1417, in making prodigious preparations for a ſecond invaſion of France, to which he was not a little excited by his knowlege of the diſtracted condition of affairs in that ſtate, which prevented it from exerting any efforts of conſequence for its own defence; for by this time the party of the duke of Burgundy and the queen carried every thing before them, and had found means to raiſe an inſurrection in Paris, which was always attached to their intereſt. L'Iſle Adam, one of the duke's captains, entered the city in the night, and put himſelf at the head of the inſurgents, who ſoon encreaſed to ſuch a number, that they bore down all oppoſition: the king himſelf was ſeized; the dauphin eſcaped with great difficulty; the chief partizans of the Armagnac faction were put to the ſword; that nobleman himſelf, and ſeveral of his friends, were thrown into priſon; murders were daily committed from private feuds, under pretence of public differences; and the enraged and deſperate populace, not chuſing to wait for the ſlow deciſion of law, burſt open the priſons and butchered the count of Armagnac and all the other noblemen who had been there confined.

While France was thus diſtracted with civil commotions, Henry, having rendezvouſed his army at Southampton, which, according to Goodwin, amounted to twenty-five thouſand ſix hundred and twenty-eight fighting men, beſides a thouſand pioneers, and having appointed the duke of Bedford his lieutenant of England, he embarked at Portſmouth, on the twenty third of July, 1417, with all his troops on board a fleet of fifteen hundred ſail, and landed, on the firſt of Auguſt, at Beville, in Normandy, in ſight of a great body of French troops, who were drawn up on the ſhore to oppoſe him. Upon his arrival he beſieged the caſtle of Tongre, which ſurrendered on the ninth of Auguſt; and its fate was ſoon followed by that of Dambieres, a ſtrong fortreſs, which capitulated to the earl of Saliſbury. Thoſe two important places being thus reduced, Henry next proceeded to lay ſiege to the city of Caen, the capital of Lower Normandy, which he inveſted on each ſide, and puſhed his operations ſo vigorouſly, that the garriſon, though numerous and provided with every thing ſuitable for a longer defence, thought proper to capitulate on the twentieth of September; when Henry, with a bloody policy, which we ſhall not attempt to defend, finding the place very populous, and fearing to be encumbered with priſoners, ordered a great number of the inhabitants to be put to the ſword in cool blood. He then appointed ſir Gilbert Umfreville governor of the place, and continuing the progreſs of his arms, made himſelf maſter of Bayeux, Liſieux, Courci, Argenton, the large city of Sees, the ſtrong caſtle and town of Alençon, with the towns and caſtles of Boumolegas, de Rugles, and Vernueil. All this time the court of France continued in the greateſt perplexity: the duke of Burgundy, at the gates of Paris, hindered the government from taking any ſteps for the defence of Normandy, which gave Henry ſuch deciſive advantages, that, before the end of the year, he brought the town and caſtle of Falaiſe, eſteemed one of the ſtrongeſt places in France, to ſurrender, though not till after an obſtinate defence: the town capitulated on the twentieth of December, but the caſtle was not yielded up till the beginning of the February following.

Mean time the king of France, the conſtable, and the dauphin, who were ſhut up in Paris, thought their only refuge was to renew the negociations with Henry. To that end they demanded a conference between ambaſſadors of the two crowns, to conſult about means to conclude a peace. Plenipotentiaries were accordingly nominated, who met at Bernonville, in Normandy, in the latter end of November, where the loweſt terms that Henry would condeſcend to accept were, "an acknowlegement of his right to the crown of France, which, however, he would allow Charles to enjoy for life, in caſe the following demands were granted, viz. the giving him in marriage the princeſs Catherine; the being declared regent of the realm during Charles's illneſs; and a ſolemn oath to be taken by the eſtates, and by all magiſtrates and officers, to obey him in this capacity, and maintain his ſucceſſion after the deceaſe of king Charles*." A compliance with theſe demands would have diveſted the Armagnac party immediately of all the power they had in the court of France; and they were, indeed, ſo exorbitant, that Henry could hardly have made them in any other juncture; it is no wonder, therefore, they were rejected; and the king of England did nothing in the way of treaty for the ſervice of his affairs, beſides concluding a truce with the duke of Brittany, and another with Yolante, or Violante, queen of Sicily, and her eldeſt ſon, Lewis, for the county of Maine and the duchy of Anjou.

The winter proved very ſharp, and Henry ſtaid at Falaiſe till he had taken poſſeſſion of the caſtle, which, purſuant to the capitulation, was delivered to him on the ſixteenth of February, 1418; and then he ſent detachments of his army, under the dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, to reduce the other places which as yet held out in Lower Normandy. The firſt of thoſe generals took Courtonne, Cambreys, Tibouville, Harcourt, and Bec Halouin, as the latter did Vere, Hambie, Tournay, St. Lo, Homouil, Carentan, Pont Douve, St. Sauveur le Vicomte, Briquebec, Nehou, and at length the important fortreſs of Cherbourg, which, in hopes of ſuccours, held out ſeveral months, but was at length forced to ſurrender in Auguſt, to avoid a more diſmal fate by famine. The earls of Huntingdon and Warwick, who had been likewiſe ſent, at the head of a third diviſion, to reduce other places, made themſelves maſters of Coutances and Damfront; while Henry himſelf made preparations for the ſiege of Rouen, having ſent for a reinforcement of fifteen thouſand freſh men from England. He reduced Ivri and Evreux in May, and then marched, in the beginning of the next month, to Louvieres, which he took in a fortnight after he inveſted it. He next led his victorious troops againſt Pont de l'Arche, which being a place of greater conſequence, as commanding a paſſage over the Seine, this ſiege was a more difficult enterprize; but finding means to paſs part of his forces over to the north ſide of the river, he obliged the garriſon to capitulate for a ſurrender, if not relieved within a fortnight. The way being thus opened to Rouen, the capital of Upper Normandy, and the taking of which was to put Henry into poſſeſſion of the whole of this province, he ſat down before it on the twenty-ninth of July, and preſently made himſelf maſter of the abbey and fort of St. Catherine, in the ſuburbs; but as the place was perfectly well ſupplied with four thouſand fighting men, beſides fifteen thouſand inhabitants, all trained to war, Henry in vain exerted all his efforts to take it by force, and he was obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade, in hopes of ſtarving the garriſon into a ſurrender.

It was during Henry's lying before this place, that the duke of Burgundy and the queen became poſſeſſed of Paris, and the perſon of the ſenſeleſs king, in the manner we have already related; while the dauphin, who had made his eſcape from the general carnage which enſued, retired behind the Loire, and, aſſuming the title of Regent, threatened all who ſhould obey the duke of Burgundy; while that prince, acting in concert with the queen, and having the king in his power, iſſued, in his name, ſuch orders as they thought moſt conducive to their own intereſts.

Such was the deſperate ſtate of affairs in France, when the cardinal d'Urſini, who had been ſent by Martin V. lately elected pope by the council of Conſtance, to France, to try to appeaſe the troubles of that kingdom, and unite the two factions, arrived in Henry's camp, in order to purſue the ſame ſalutary work, and endeavour to perſuade the king of England to moderate his terms, and agree to an equitable peace; but Henry's anſwer plainly ſhewed that he was fully determined to avail himſelf to the utmoſt of the diſtreſſes of his competitor; upon which the cardinal deſiſted from his mediation. Notwithſtanding this declaration, Henry ſtill continued his negociations with the heads of both the French factions. To the dauphin he offered, that, on condition all the territories ceded to Edward III. by the treaty of Bretigny ſhould be given up to him, with all thoſe places in Normandy which he had not yet reduced, together with Guienne and the Marches of Calais; and that the count of Armagnac (ſon of him who had been murdered by the populace), and the lord d'Albret, would ſubmit to his allegiance; and that the places ſo ceded might by him be held in full reſort, and in full ſovereignty; that then he (Henry), would march with his whole force, to deliver the king, the queen, and the princeſs Catherine out of the duke of Burgundy's hands: but that afterwards the dauphin ſhould aſſiſt him in conquering Flanders from the duke of Burgundy, which was likewiſe to be given to the king of England in full ſovereignty."

To the dauphin's immortal honour, he rejected theſe propoſals, nobly declaring, that he never would gratify his private revenge at the expence of his country's diſhonour, by aggrandizing the power of her moſt formidable enemy; and accordingly this treaty dropped to the ground.

During the dependence of this negociation, which was held at Alençon in the month of November, the king of France, by Henry's own invitation to the duke of Burgundy, had nominated the biſhop of Beauvais, Morvilliers, firſt preſident of his parliament, and others, as his commiſſioners for opening another congreſs at Pont de l'Arch, under the mediation of the cardinal d'Urſini; the negociations were opened on the twenty-ſecond of December; but were interrupted almoſt as ſoon as begun, by a frivolous punctilio. The plenipotentiaries of Charles (or rather of the duke of Burgundy, who managed all things) demanded that the writings ſhould be engroſſed in the French language, and the Engliſh refuſed to comply with the propoſal: in vain did the legate recommend a medium, and adviſe that there ſhould be two copies written, one in French, and the other in Latin; an expedient to which Henry conſented: the duke of Burgundy was inflexible, and the end of the congreſs was fruſtrated. Nevertheleſs, it did not fail to alarm the dauphin, who, being ignorant of the particulars of the tranſactions, apprehended a peace between Henry and the duke of Burgundy, which could not but be to his prejudice; he therefore ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, deſiring him to appoint a place for renewing the negociation begun at Alençon; and the king of England, finding his account in blowing the coals of diſſention, agreed to a perſonal conference with the dauphin, on the twenty-ſixth of March following at Louviers. Henry came in time to the place of meeting, but the dauphin not keeping his word, it was ſo highly reſented, that a ſtop was put to any farther treaty.

We are now come to the cloſe of the year 1418, diſtinguiſhed by bloodſhed, conqueſt, calamity, and civil war. But before we enter upon that in which Henry, by unforeſeen accidents, acquired more than he had by his moſt ſhining conqueſts, it will be neceſſary to take a view of what paſſed in England while its monarch was thus engaged on the continent.

Sir John Oldcaſtle, ever ſince the defeat of his conſpiracy, already mentioned, had lurked from place to place, but chiefly on the borders of Wales; at laſt John Grey, lord Powis, hearing where the knight was, got together five or ſix thouſand men, and took him, after a deſperate reſiſtance: Oldcaſtle was immediately brought to London, to the great joy of the clergy, who bore him an implacable hatred. No ſooner had they got him in their power, than they were determined to ſacrifice him for a terror to the reſt of the Lollards, whom they had never ceaſed perſecuting ſince Henry's acceſſion to the throne; and, notwithſtanding the birth and great military merit of Cobham, he was ſentenced to be hung up by the middle with a chain, and burnt alive thus hanging; a fate which he ſuffered with great intrepidity. He was the firſt nobleman who ſuffered on account of religion. This execution was followed by ſeveral others of a like inhuman nature, and the whole nation was filled with ſcenes of perſecution againſt the poor Lollards, whoſe utter extirpation ſeemed to be the darling purpoſe of the ſouls of the clergy.

The Scots, taking advantage of the abſence of the king, and of the diſturbances theſe perſecutions raiſed in the kingdom, entered it with two armies, one of which, under the duke of Albany, laid ſiege to Berwick, as the other, under the earl of Douglas, did to Roxburgh. But the duke of Bedford, who had been left regent in Henry's abſence, took ſuch prompt and effectual meaſures for oppoſing the invaders, that they were forced to retire with the utmoſt precipitation; the earl of Northumberland purſuing thoſe who had laid ſiege to

* Rymer, vol. ix. p. 636, 628.

Berwick ſeveral days marches into their own country; ſir Robert Umfreville, warden of the eaſtern borders, doing the ſame by the army before Roxburgh: and for two years ſucceſſively the Engliſh continued to make the ſevereſt repriſals on their country, waſting it with fire and ſword for a great extent.

From Stowe, Walſingham, and Speed we learn, that, in this year, Joan of Brittany, widow of king Henry IV. and mother-in-law of the reigning king, was detected in conſpiring with her confeſſor againſt the king: ſome add, ſhe was condemned to a ten years impriſonment, and that her confeſſor was killed by the chaplain of the Tower, in a diſpute upon that occaſion. This is all we can ſay concerning that accuſation, of which hiſtorians ſpeak very confuſedly. Let us now return to Normandy, where we left Henry before Rouen.

The various political meaſures in which he was engaged, did not at all affect his warlike operations: the ſiege of that capital had now laſted upwards of ſix months; and the beſieged, after having made a noble defence, were reduced to the utmoſt extremity, having eaten up all their horſes and domeſtic animals, including even rats, mice, and other vermin; the duke of Burgundy had amuſed the inhabitants, from time to time, with falſe hopes of relief; they had already ſeen above fifty thouſand of their comrades periſh amongſt them, partly by famine, and partly by the chance of war, during the ſiege; and now, finding it impoſſible to hold out any longer and live, they treated, on the thirteenth of January, 1419, for a ſurrender. Henry, commiſerating their hapleſs caſe, and reverencing valour and fidelity though in an enemy, granted them terms as favourable as they could expect in their ſituation, and after ſo obſtinate a reſiſtance; ſome few of the inhabitants were left to his mercy; but the reſt, on paying a fine of three hundred thouſand crowns, were pardoned and exempted from plunder and confiſcation of their effects. The place was delivered up to the Engliſh on the nineteenth of January, and Henry's entrance into it was extremely magnificent. The ſurrender of Rouen was followed by that of Caudebec, Gaillon, la Roche d'Andilly, Mante, Ponte Audemer, Goulet, Honfleur, l'Iſlebonne, Feſchamp, Montevilliers, Dieppe, Neufchatel, Eu, Gournay, and all the other ſtrong fortreſſes in Upper Normandy; ſo great and univerſal was the terror with which all that province was ſtruck by the reduction of its capital.

Henry now appeared publicly with all the diſtinctions of a duke of Normandy; and he ſettled ſuch excellent regulations, not only in Rouen, but over all the duchy, that in a very ſhort time the city, which had been reduced almoſt to deſolation, recovered its former luſtre; and the country grew rich, ſatisfied with the change of government, and full of thoſe ſentiments of reſpect, admiration, and affection to Henry, which a ſenſe of the benefits they received from him, naturally inſpired: and thus did all Normandy, a few caſtles excepted, fall again under the dominion of the kings of England, two hundred and fifteen years after it had been taken from them by Philip Auguſtus, in the reign of John Lackland. After the ſurrender of Rouen, Henry ſent part of his army into Picardy, under the command of the duke of Exeter, who became maſter of Montrueil, and other ſtrong places there. We muſt not forget to mention with honour ſome of the moſt eminent perſons who died in the Engliſh army during the ſiege of Rouen: theſe were Henry Beaufort, earl of Somerſet; Edmund Beaufort, earl of Montague; ſir Gilbert Talbot, ſir John Blunt, the prior of Kylmainham, in Ireland, and the lord of Caſtylogne, in Gaſcony*.

Henry ſtill continued his negociations with both the parties in France; with the queen and the duke of Burgundy on one hand, who, being in poſſeſſion of the king's perſon, enjoyed the appearance of legal authority; and with the dauphin on the other, who, as he was the undoubted heir of the crown, was ſtrongly ſupported by all thoſe who wiſhed well to the intereſt of their country. Theſe two factions likewiſe were perpetually engaged in mutual negociations with each other, and the terms offered by all parties were conſtantly ſhifting, according to the different merits of the war, and the greater or leſs prevalence of the intrigues of the cabinet: but we ſhall paſs over the ineffectual congreſſes, inſincere profeſſions, and unfulfilled promiſes on all ſides, as having nothing in them material to our hiſtory. It is ſufficient to ſay, that at length a meeting was propoſed to be held between the two kings of England and France, at Meulan. Henry, upon this, removed with his court to Mante; and the dauphin left nothing unattempted to prevent the interview, but in vain, for it was held on the thirtieth of May, 1419, at the place appointed; but the queen of France attended for her huſband, who had fallen ill on his journey.

The firſt day the queen of France brought with her the princeſs Catherine, her daughter, now in all the bloom of youth and beauty, and Henry was ſo ſtruck with her appearance, that he could not conceal the emotions of his heart. The artful queen beheld the effects of her daughter's charms with a ſecret pleaſure, and thought to inflame the deſires of Henry by not letting the princeſs appear any more: but the warrior-lover ſoon perceived her deſign, and that the young lady had been introduced only as a decoy to enſnare him; therefore, to cut ſhort all their expectations on that head, he told the duke of Burgundy, that he was determined not to lay down his arms till he had the king and princeſs in his power, and had expelled that man the kingdom who ſhould dare to oppoſe it: a declaration more reconcileable to the extravagance of an enamorato in romance, than a great and wiſe king, ſuch as Henry V. ſhewed himſelf to be. At this firſt meeting nothing was concluded on beſides a truce for eight days, during which time the conferences were to be managed by commiſſioners.

Theſe accordingly met on the ſecond of June, and proceeded upon the buſineſs committed to their diſcuſſion. The particulars of the propoſitions made on each ſide, are thus handed down to us by Goodwin, a careful and accurate hiſtorian.

In this conference (ſays he) the king of England declared, "That he deſired a firm peace and alliance with the king of France, if the following conditions might be granted, viz. That all the dominions which had been ceded to Edward III. by the great peace of Bretigny, ſhould be delivered to him and his heirs: that the whole duchy of Normandy, with all the other places he had conquered in France, ſhould be confirmed to him, with an abſolute independent ſovereignty over them: that the king of France, by a writing, ſhould renounce all future right to thoſe dominions, and transfer it entirely to him: that, ſince ſome of the demanded towns and territories were in the hands of the enemy, therefore, as by war and conqueſt he ſhould gain them, ſo they ſhould remain in his poſſeſſion."

in

The demands made by the French were:

"That the king of England, for himſelf, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, ſhould renounce all right and claim which he or his predeceſſors had to the crown of France.

To which he conſented, excepting only thoſe dominions which were due to him by the peace concluded at Bretigny, and all other places which ought and ſhould be delivered to him by the preſent treaty.

"That the king of England ſhould diſclaim all right and title to the duchies of Touraine, Anjou, and Brittany, and to the counties of Picardy and Maine.

This the king wholly rejected.

"That he ſhould ſwear, for himſelf and ſucceſſors, that he would never expect nor accept of any devolution of right to the crown of France, or any of its dominions, to be made to him by any perſon; but that he ſhould renounce all ſuch title as might, for the future, be transferred to him, thoſe places which might be given in this treaty only excepted.

To which article anſwer was made, that the king was well ſatisfied with it, upon condition that the French king would, on his part, do the ſame.

"That all theſe acts of the king ſhould be promiſed, ſworn, ratified, and confirmed by the king's brothers, and the three ſtates of the kingdom.

But this the king utterly refuſed.

They made alſo this propoſal, "That their king ſhould give an equivalent, on the frontiers of Aquitaine, for the county of Ponthieu, and other places, which the king of England claimed by Monſtrueil.

But this likewiſe being diſapproved:

"They demanded, that as the king by this preſent treaty, was to have the duchy of Normandy, in which ſome towns were yet unſubdued by him, ſo he ſhould reſign to the French king all the conqueſts he had made out of that duchy; and that all perſons, eccleſiaſtical and civil, ſhould enjoy peaceably their living and eſtates, and the univerſities of France have the ſame privileges which they had before the war.

This the king freely granted, only with an excluſion of the Scots, and thoſe who were rebels.

The French farther aſked, "That the king would repay ſix hundred thouſand crowns in gold, which were given Richard II. in part of the Engliſh hundred thouſand, the dowry promiſed with the princeſs Iſabella, and all her jewels and furniture, which amounted to the value of four hundred thouſand crowns, which Richard II. for himſelf and heirs, had promiſed ſhould be reſtored, if his queen ſurvived him; and John, duke of Lancaſter, Edmund, duke of York, Thomas, duke of Gloceſter, and many others, were ſureties for the performance.

To which the king anſwered, that though this payment could not in juſtice be expected from him, yet it ſhould be compenſated by a ſum equal to it, viz. that which was due for the ranſom of king John of France: that as for the jewels and goods of the princeſs Iſabella, he admired to hear them prized at the rate of four hundred thouſand crowns, when it was well known they did not amount to a fourth part of that value.

When the French, to conclude all, required "That theſe articles might be drawn up in ſuch words as their king and his council ſhould adviſe.

The anſwer was, that he who had a right to aſk it, ſhould come and make the demand, and all reaſonable ſatisfaction ſhould be given him.

The French excepted againſt theſe anſwers to their demands, as expreſſed in too general terms, and having an obſcure and uncertain meaning.

The Engliſh offered to remove all ſuch ambiguities, and to give as plain and punctual a declaration of their ſenſe as the French, with any reaſon, could deſire.

But the French would not enter on ſuch a debate, and refuſed to treat upon any other condition than that of the king of England's giving a direct and poſitive anſwer in conceſſion to their articles.

It is eaſy to perceive, by the nature of theſe demands, that the difficulties on either ſide were not conſiderable enough to prevent the concluſion of a peace, had both parties been equally willing; but it is plain Henry had formed a reſolution to be all or nothing; and this will appear ſtill more evident from the minutes of a very ſerious debate, which was held in Henry's council, concerning the manner of proceeding, the particulars of which have been tranſmitted to us by the laſt-quoted author, and will be ſeen by the reader at large in the note *; as alſo by Henry's anſwer, when preſſed to come to his loweſt demand, which was, "That he would

* It was alſo debated, by the king's council, in what manner the treaty, at the interview, ſhould be managed: whether the firſt demand ſhould be made in general of the crown of France, and be inſiſted on till the French were brought to make ſuch offers as might ſatisfy the king; or whether they ſhould preſently fall to particular and lower demands, as had been practiſed in other treaties: and it was determined to proceed in the way of a general demand, as Edward III. had done, becauſe it was undoubtedly juſt; and they might afterwards moderate it, in reverence and condeſcenſion to the authority of the pope. It was alſo diſputed, whether, if the demand of the crown ſhould be refuſed, the king of France could transfer to the king of England any part of the dominions belonging to that crown; and it was judged, that he could not, becauſe, as ſuch a diſmembering of the kingdom was prohibited by the fundamental laws of the government, ſo he was ſworn to the contrary: to which were added two reaſons more, viz. that his diſtempered mind would make the act invalid; and that the greateſt part of his nobles acknowleged no ſubjection to him. There was another doubt raiſed, whether a right of dominion could be conferred on the king of England over thoſe ſubjects of France, who were not called to give their conſent it; which was reſolved in the negative, upon this general reaſon, that acts adjudged againſt perſons abſent, did not oblige them. It was debated too, whether the king of France could abdicate his power of doing juſtice, in caſes of appeal to him; and it was determined, that he could not; becauſe an appeal being the laſt refuge of the oppreſſed for a remedy of their wrongs, it was contrary to the law of nature to deprive them of it. That which admitted another debate was, whether, when the general demand was made of the crown of France, the king ſhould communicate to the cardinals des Urſins and St. Mark, the particular demands to which he meant to condeſcend; and it was adviſed, that ſince one of the cardinals embraced the French king's intereſt, it ſhould not be done till that king, by the mediation of the cardinals, had made ſome conſiderable offers. make make no peace, unleſs the ſovereignty of the places ceded by the treaty of Bretigny, and of Normandy likewiſe, was yielded to him by the crown of France (a conceſſion which his own council had declared a king of France could not make); and, laſtly, that the princeſs Catherine ſhould be given him in marriage." To this the queen and miniſters of ſtate objected, that it was not in their power to perform the treaty of Bretigny, becauſe many of the cities mentioned in it, being poſſeſſed by the dauphin, were not at their diſpoſal. Upon this anſwer Henry broke up the conferences, declaring that he would never ſheathe ſword till he had brought his enemies to accept his terms.

On this occaſion Henry ſeems to have outwitted himſelf by his exorbitant demands; and, by graſping at too much, to have endangered his loſing all, by puſhing the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy into one another's arms. The event appears to warrant the truth of this conjecture; for all France was alarmed at this interview at Meulant, becauſe every one foreſaw that no peace could be made at ſuch a juncture, but what muſt prove of infinite prejudice to their country. Several of the principal nobility, therefore, inſtantly laboured to procure a recociliation between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy, or at leaſt a ſuſpenſion of animoſity; and the young prince himſelf was ſo alarmed at the near proſpect of a peace ſo diſadvantageous to France, and prejudicial to his own intereſt, that he yielded to the remonſtrances of the nobles, and conſented to a reconciliation with the duke of Burgundy, as the only expedient that could prevent the calamity with which his country was threatened. The duke, on his ſide, having read all Henry's ſecret purpoſes in the manner of his proceeding, joined iſſue in this deſirable end, and ſeveral private conferences were held between commiſſioners on both ſides, which at length ended in a mutual agreement for a coalition. Henry ſeems to have diſcovered ſomething of what was tranſacting, by the haſty manner in which he broke up the conference at Meulant; and, indeed, the treaty was ſo far advanced between the duke of Burgundy and the dauphin, that they had an interview at Pouilli, a fort about a league from Meulant, the eleventh of July, where all differences were made up between them with the moſt ſincere marks of a cordial reconciliation; and they both ſigned an agreement, by which they engaged from henceforth to act vigorouſly againſt the Engliſh and all the enemies of France.

Thus did Henry, by his unaccountable obſtinacy, effect what he had the greateſt cauſe to dread, an union among his enemies: nevertheleſs, this apparent union, which ſeemed ſo prejudicial to his intereſt, was the very circumſtance that contributed moſt to his ſucceſs, and produced the moſt fatal effects to France, whoſe ſafety it was intended to have provided for. Henry, finding himſelf thus baffled, reſolved to redouble his vigour, and in a ſhort time found means to make himſelf maſter of Pontoiſe, a fortified town which lay within a few leagues only of Paris, whoſe inhabitants were now thrown into inexpreſſible conſternation, which was ſtill farther increaſed when the duke of Clarence, with the vanguard of the Engliſh army ſat down before their very gates. However, the duke of Burgundy, being apprized of the danger of the capital, found means to throw in ſo ſtrong a reinforcement, as to render the attacking that city an almoſt deſperate undertaking, and to oblige Henry to recal the duke of Clarence, and make diſpoſitions for reducing other places which lay on his back, in which he ſucceeded with amazing rapidity and ſucceſs. By the ſurrender of Giſors and Meulant he found himſelf maſter of both the French and Norman Vexin; and the taking of Chateau Galliard and la Roche Guion, which happened ſomewhat later in the year, completed the conqueſt of Normandy. Proceeding ſtill to farther enterprizes, he reduced the caſtles of Montjoy and St. Germain en Laye. Upon this the duke of Burgundy, to gain time, ſent ambaſſadors to renew the negociations for peace; but Henry advancing to his former demands the ceſſion of Ponthoiſe, and the country adjoining, the treaty came to nothing.

But an unexpected event, which now happened, did that in an inſtant for Henry, which would have required an age to have effected by arms. The reconciliation between the dauphin and the duke of Burgundy was far from being ſincere, at leaſt on the part of the former, who could not be prevailed on by any intreaties to come to court, while the duke held the reins of power there, and even formed the cruel deſign of having him aſſaſſinated. This black project was to have been executed at Pouilli, but the duke having a great force with him, it was thought neceſſary to defer the attempt till a more convenient opportunity ſhould offer. The dauphin having raiſed an army of twenty thouſand men, advanced with it near Montereau ſur Yonne, and ſent Tanneguy de Chatel to deſire a conference with the duke, upon the bridge between the town and the caſtle, in order to concert meaſures for the campaign againſt the Engliſh, and to ſettle ſome other matters of conſequence *. The duke of Burgundy's diſtruſt had, however, well nigh defeated the ſcheme; but the duke's evil genius, and the ſuggeſtions of his miſtreſs, Give, who privately correſponded with the dauphin, overcame all the reaſonable apprehenſions he entertained of putting himſelf in the power of a party, who had been his implacable enemies ever ſince the aſſaſſination of the duke of Orleans by his orders: he ſhut his eyes to danger, and ruſhed upon his fate, though not without taking all the expedients for ſecurity that could be deviſed.

On the day appointed for the interview, which was the thirtieth of September, the two princes repaired to Montereau; the duke took up his quarters in the caſtle, and the dauphin in the lower town, which was ſeparated from the caſtle by the river Yonne: two rails were fixed upon the bridge which lay between them, and was to be the place of meeting; the gates on each ſide were to be guarded, the one by the officers of the dauphin, and the other by thoſe of the duke; the princes were to meet in the middle of the bridge, attended each by ten perſons; and, with all theſe ſymptoms of jealouſy and diſtruſt, to confirm and eſtabliſh a mutual friendſhip.

But vain are all the precautions of human prudence, where laws have no place, and where all the principles of honour are abandoned. The aſ-ſaſſination committed by the duke of Burgundy, and, what was ſtill more, his open avowal of the deed, and defence of the practice, tended to deſtroy all the ties of civil ſociety; and even thoſe who abhorred the example, might yet think it reaſonable to make the author feel the natural conſequences of his own doctrine. Tanneguy de Chatel, and others of the dauphin's attendants, were zealous friends of the houſe of Orleans, and gladly lent their aid to revenge the murder of the late duke by the death of the aſſaſſin. Burgundy began to have ſome bodings of the event, when he found the barriers ſhut and locked after him as he paſſed through them; and he was no ſooner come into the preſence of the dauphin, than, upon a concerted ſignal Tanneguy de Chatel firſt gave him a mortal wound in the face with his battle-axe, and the other attendants of the dauphin ſoon ſheathed their ſwords in the bodies of the unfortunate duke and his ten followers.

Thus was the murder of the duke of Orleans revenged by another murder, which was ſo much the more deteſtable as being accompanied by violation of public faith: but one would be tempted to believe that this murder was not premeditated, ſo very badly had the authors taken their meaſures for ſupporting the conſequences. Philip the Good, the new duke of Burgundy, who ſucceeded his father, became of courſe an enemy to the dauphin, through duty as well as politics. The queen, his mother, whom he had incenſed, became as implacable as a ſtep-mother; while the king of England, taking advantage of theſe horrid circumſtances, proclaimed aloud that God led him by the hand to puniſh the iniquitous French †. The queen, and all the great men about court, ſent to the duke of Burgundy, offering to join with him to revenge his father's murder, and a treaty was ſigned, on the ſeventeenth of October, at Arras for that purpoſe. The city of Paris ſent deputies to deſire of Henry a truce for the neighbourhood of that place till the twelfth of December, which was granted. And now the queen and the new duke of Burgundy, Philip, made overtures to Henry for a final peace, which proved more fatal to France than all the preceding wars had done; for they engaged that Henry ſhould marry Catherine of France; that he ſhould be declared regent of that kingdom, and govern the realm ſo long as Charles VI. lived, only permitting him and his queen to enjoy their royal dignity for life; and that, after the deceaſe of Charles, the crown ſhould deſcend to Henry and his heirs for ever; and that all the eſtates of the realm, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, the commons, cities, and corporations, ſhould be ſworn to maintain his regency and ſucceſſion." Theſe offers produced a general truce till Chriſtmas-eve, and confirmed afterwards till its expiration ſhould be declared ‡. Henry then acceded to a league between the king and queen of France and the duke of Burgundy, for revenging the late duke's death on the dauphin and his accomplices. Theſe conventions ſerved for the foundation of a perpetual peace between France and England; and a perſonal treaty was appointed between the two kings, to be held at Troye, on the twenty-firſt day of May the enſuing year.

We muſt make uſe of this interval of negociating, to attend to the affairs of England.

On the ſixteenth day of October, a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, who granted the king one fifteenth and one tenth, and one half part of both. The chief public tranſaction of this parliament was, their paſſing an act for the conſumption of home-manufactures, by providing, that all the Engliſh troops in France ſhould be clothed and furniſhed with Engliſh commodities, manufactured in England.

In order to complete that extraordinary treaty, which was to transfer the crown of France to a ſtranger, Henry, attended by the dukes of Clarence and Gloceſter, repaired to Troye in the beginning of May, 1420. As king Charles was not fit to appear in public, the queen and the duke of Burgundy were empowered to ſwear to the peace in his name. The princeſs Catherine was alſo brought thither by her mother, and received from Henry a preſent of a ring of great value. Every thing being now ready, on the twenty-firſt of May the treaty was ſigned and ſworn, with the uſual formalities; and the ſame day Henry was affianced to the princeſs Catherine, but the marriage was not conſummated till near a month after. The ſubſtance of this famous treaty was as follows.

Treaty of Troye.

Whereas a final agreement and perpetual peace has been made and ſworn, in the city of Troye, by us, Charles king of France, and our dearly and moſt beloved ſon Henry, king of England, conſtituted heir and regent of the crown of France, both by his marriage with the princeſs Catherine, our daughter, and by virtue of the articles of a treaty agreed on by both of us, for the good and benefit of us and our ſubjects, and for the ſafety of this nation, this is to declare, that all our ſubjects, and thoſe of our before-mentioned ſon may converſe and traffic together, as well in this country, as beyond the ſeas.

It is alſo agreed, that our ſon, king Henry, ſhall, from this time, honour us as his father, and our conſort, the queen, as his mother; and that, during our life, he ſhall not diſturb us in the quiet poſſeſſion of our kingdom, in the ſame manner as we now enjoy it, with the royal dignity, and all the revenues, fruits, and profits of it; and that our royal conſort may, while ſhe lives, without any hindrance, take the ſtate and dignity of queen, according to the cuſtom of the kingdom, and poſſeſs ſuch part of the revenues and profits of the crown as are ſuitable to her quality.

That the princeſs Catherine, our daughter, ſhall have ſuch a dowry aſſigned to her in England, as the queens of that nation, in times paſt, uſually had, that is, the yearly revenue of forty thouſand crowns, two of which are to amount to the value of an Engliſh noble.

That our ſon Henry, by all ways and means that he can uſe, without violating the oath he has taken to obſerve the laws, cuſtoms, and rights of his kingdom of England, ſhall endeavour and make ſuch proviſion, that the princeſs Catherine, our daughter, may be aſſured of her enjoying, from the time of his death, the ſaid yearly revenue of forty thouſand crowns in England.

That if the princeſs Catherine ſurvive king Henry our ſon, ſhe ſhall have paid to her yearly, out of France, from the time of his death, a dowry of forty thouſand livres, to be raiſed from the lands and principalities which the queen dowager Blanche, wife of Philip of Valois, king of France, our great-grand-father, held as her dowry.

That, after her death, for all times to come, the crown of France, with all the rights and dominions which appertain thereto, ſhall remain to the king of England and his heirs for ever.

That whereas we are indiſpoſed and incapable to reign, the whole power and exerciſe of the power of France, ſhall, even during our life, be devolved on our ſon king Henry, in conjunction with the council of the ſtates of the kingdom, ſo as our ſon king Henry ſhall endeavour, to the utmoſt of his power, to govern zealouſly, induſtriouſly, and loyally, for the honour of God, of us, and our royal conſort, and for the good of the kingdom, which he ſhall defend, preſerve in peace, and manage all affairs according to the rules of juſtice and equity, with the counſel and aſſiſtance of the great lords, barons, and nobles of the kingdom.

It is alſo agreed, that our ſon, king Henry, ſhall ſo make uſe of his power, that the parliament of France, in all and every place ſubject to us, be preſerved and maintained, both now and for the future, in all their entire authority and ſovereignty.

That our ſon Henry, with all his power, ſhall preſerve and maintain all and every noble, peer, city, town, community, and every particular private perſon now ſubject to us, or who ſhall be ſo, in their rights, privileges, dignities, liberties, and freedoms, belonging to them in all places of our dominions, or which ſhall be reduced to our obedience.

That our ſon, king Henry, ſhall diligently, loyally, and with all his power, endeavour that juſtice be adminiſtered in his kingdom of France, according to the ancient laws, rights, and cuſtoms of it, without partiality to any perſon; and ſhall uphold all the ſubjects of it in tranquility and peace; and, to his utmoſt ability, defend it from all violence and oppreſſions.

That our ſon, king Henry, ſhall, with all his ability, take care and provide that the offices of juſtice in parliament, of bailiwics, ſeneſchalſhips, and provoſts, and other places of truſt in the government, ſhall be conferred on perſons qualified, uſeful, and fit for the good, juſt, peaceable, and quiet adminiſtration of affairs in the kingdom committed to them; and that they ſhall be ſuch as the laws do authorize and appoint to be in thoſe offices; and ſuch as ought to be employed, to be ſerviceable for our good, and the proſperity of the nation.

That our ſon, king Henry, ſhall make uſe of all the power of his arms to reduce to our obedience all the towns, cities, caſtles, countries, and perſons, which are yet in rebellion againſt us, ſiding with that party which is commonly called the party of the dauphin and of Armagnac.

That, to make the government more eaſy, free, and ſafe to our ſon, king Henry, the great lords, barons, nobles, the eſtates of the kingdom both ſpiritual and temporal, the cities, the conſiderable communities, and citizens and burghers of the towns now under our obedience, ſhall take the following oaths: 1. That all things, tending to the preſervation of the government, they will humbly and obediently obey the commands of king Henry, as having the full power and authority to reign. 2. That they will, in their own particular, punctually obſerve whatever has been agreed between us, our royal conſort, our council, and king Henry, or what ſhall hereafter be agreed; and will uſe all their power and care to ſee it obſerved by others. 3. That, from the time of our death, and ever after it, they will be faithful ſubjects to our ſon, king Henry, and his heirs; and will, without any contradiction, oppoſition, or difficulty, receive him for their ſovereign lord, their liege and true king of France, and obey him as ſuch; and that they will not be obedient to any other, as king or regent of France, our own perſon excepted. 4. That they ſhall not engage in any deſign or attempt to cauſe him to loſe life or limb, to be taken priſoner, or to ſuffer damage or diminution in perſon, eſtate, honour, or goods; but that, if they know of any conſpiracy againſt him, they will do all they can to prevent it, and diſcover it to him the firſt opportunity, by a meſſenger or letter.

It is alſo agreed, that all the conqueſts which our ſon, king Henry, ſhall make out of the duchy of Normandy, in the kingdom, ſhall appertain to us; and that he ſhall employ all his power that all eſtates and principalities, found in thoſe new conqueſts to belong to any who are now good ſubjects, and will ſwear to obſerve our preſent agreement, ſhall be reſtored to their true proprietors.

That all beneficed eccleſiaſtics in the ſaid duchy of Normandy, or in other places of France, ſubject to us, or our ſon, king Henry, or favouring the party of our beloved ſon the duke of Burgundy, who will ſwear to obſerve the preſent agreement, ſhall peaceably enjoy their benefices.

That in like manner, all who are the ſubjects of our ſon, king Henry, and who ſhall ſwear to obſerve the preſent agreement, ſhall peaceably enjoy their eccleſiaſtical benefices and preferment in all places of our dominions.

That all churches, univerſities, and eccleſiaſtical colleges, being in places ſubject to us, or which ſhall be ſo, or in the duchy of Normandy, or in any places of the kingdom of France, which are ſubject to our ſon, king Henry, ſhall enjoy their rights, poſſeſſions, rents, prerogatives, liberties, franchiſes, and honours; with a reſerve to the rights of the crown and of any others.

That when our ſon, king Henry, ſhall come to the crown of France, the duchy of Normandy, and all other places conquered by him in France, ſhall be under the juriſdiction, obedience, and monarchy of the ſaid crown.

That our ſon, king Henry, with all his power, ſhall procure, that all perſons obedient to us, and favouring the Burgundian party, who have principalities, lands, revenues, and poſſeſſions in the duchy of Normandy, or other parts of France conquered by his arms, which have been given by him to them, ſhall, without any diminution of the crown of France, have compenſation made to them by us, out of the lands conquered from thoſe who are in rebellion: and if in our life this compenſation be not made, our ſon, king Henry, ſhall make it when he comes to the crown of France; but if thoſe principalities, lands, rents, or poſſeſſions were not given by him, they ſhall, without any delay, be reſtored to the proprietors.

It is alſo agreed, during our life, that whereas in all places ſubject to us, or which ſhall be ſo, the writs of common juſtice, the gifts of lands and benefices, benefices, the grants of pardons and privileges, are not valid, unleſs they be iſſued out under our name and ſeal; yet, ſince ſome caſes and occaſions may occur, to make it neceſſary or convenient for our ſon, king Henry, to do this, it ſhall be lawful for him to do ſo in our name, and his own as regent.

That, during our life, king Henry ſhall not aſſume the title of king of France.

That as long as we live, we will always give to our ſon, king Henry, the title of our moſt dear ſon, king of England, and heir of France; and in Latin we will ſtile him, "Noſter præchariſſimus filius Henricus, rex Angliæ, heres Franciæ."

It is alſo agreed, that our ſon, king Henry, ſhall not lay any taxes on our ſubjects but ſuch as are reaſonable and neceſſary, and to be employed for the public; nor ſhall he raiſe them by any other means than ſuch as are agreeable to the laws and cuſtom of the kingdom.

That, to preſerve peace and concord between England and France, and to prevent any cauſes of difference for the future, our ſon, king Henry, ſhall take effectual care that, by the advice and conſent of the three eſtates of both kindoms, it be ordained, that whenever our ſon, king Henry, or any of his heirs, ſhall come to wear the crown of France, the two kingdoms ſhall be for ever united under one king, that is, under king Henry, as long as he lives, and, after his death, under his heirs in a continued ſucceſſion, and ſhall not, at the ſame time, be governed by two kings; and yet the rights, liberties, cuſtoms, uſages, and laws of each kingdom, ſhall be kept diſtinct and inviolable, without ſubjecting one to the other.

That, from this preſent moment, all hatred, animoſities, diviſions, and wars ſhall ceaſe between the two nations, and the people be fixed in this ſettled concert, mutually united in affections, counſels, joint-aſſiſtance, and defence againſt all enemies; and ſhall converſe and traffic with one another, paying the uſual cuſtoms in both kingdoms.

That all our confederates and allies, as alſo thoſe of king Henry, who, in eight months after the publiſhing of this treaty of peace, ſhall declare their deſire to be compromiſed in it, may be taken into it; reſerving only to the two kingdoms, to us with our ſubjects, and to king Henry with his, all rights, actions, and remedies, in reſpect to thoſe allies or confederates.

That our ſon, king Henry, with the advice of our moſt dear ſon, Philip, duke of Burgundy, and of other nobles of the kingdom, who may meet to conſult about this affair, ſhall make an honourable proviſion for the maintenance of our perſon, ſuitable to our royal ſtate and dignity; and that they ſhall ſo order things as that none, whether nobles or others, ſhall be admitted into our ſervice, or to any offices about our perſon, nor be entertained as our domeſtics, but thoſe who are natives of France, or where the people ſpeak the French language; and alſo, that due choice ſhould be made of ſuch perſons who are wiſe, loyal, and well qualified for our ſervice.

It is alſo agreed, that we will have our reſidence in ſuch places as are conſiderable, within our dominions, and not be confined to a mean and obſcure retreat.

That, conſidering the horrid and enormous crimes perpetrated in this kingdom of France, by Charles, who calls himſelf the dauphin de Viennois, neither we, nor our ſon, king Henry, nor our deareſt ſon Philip, duke of Burgundy, will make any treaty of peace or concord with him, nor ſo much as enter into a treaty, without the advice and conſent of all three, and of the three eſtates of both kingdoms.

It is alſo agreed, that, beſides our letters patent concerning theſe particulars, agreed and ſealed with our great-ſeal, we will alſo give to our ſon Henry letters patent, confirmed and ſigned by our royal conſort, by our ſon the duke of Burgundy, and other princes of the blood, by other great lords, barons, cities, and towns under our obedience, as king Henry ſhall require.

That our ſon, king Henry, beſides his letters patent ſealed with his great-ſeal, ſhall alſo give to us others, as we ſhall be pleaſed to require, confirmed by his brothers and the reſt of the royal family, and by the great lords, barons, and cities of his dominions.

Now, to perform all and every one of theſe agreed articles, we, Charles, king of France, for ourſelf and our heirs, have, without fraud or diſſimulation, promiſed, and do promiſe, have ſworn and ſwear, in the word of a king, upon the Holy Evangeliſts, touched by us, that we will obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved, both by ourſelf and ſubjects, all theſe articles; and that neither we, nor our heirs, will ever act contrary to any of them, neither judicially nor extra-judicially, neither directly or indirectly; and that this may be firmly eſtabliſhed for ever, we have cauſed our ſeal to be ſet to theſe preſent letters.

Given at Troye, May 21, 1420, in the five-and-fortieth year of our reign.

Three weeks after this treaty was concluded, it was approved of, and ratified by the parliament of Paris; and the citizens of that capital took an oath to obſerve it. In all public deeds Henry held the title of Regent and Heir to the crown of France: his court and equipage at Troye were extremely magnificent; his guards amounted to above ſixteen hundred, richly dreſſed and completely armed: and the duke of Burgundy, in honour of the king of France, fell little ſhort of Henry's ſplendor.

On the thirtieth of May, Henry's marriage with the princeſs Catherine was ſolemnized in St. John's church, in Troye, by the archbiſhop of Sens. This lady was the greateſt fortune and the fineſt woman of her time; but Henry ſuffered not his intereſt to give way to amorous dalliance: he was ſenſible that he owed all the important advantages he had gained, to the feuds and animoſities which now prevailed in the courts of France and Burgundy; and that he ſhould be in danger of loſing them the moment the French nobility recovered the uſe of reaſon and reflection; and that thoſe houſes who had been excluded the ſucceſſion in favour of a ſtranger, would not fail to unite together againſt him, as ſoon as the miſt of paſſion ſhould be cleared up; he therefore wiſely reſolved to give them no time for repentance.

All this time the dauphin behaved with ſurprizing ſpirit and intrepidity. He had diſpatched the count of Vendoſme to ſolicit a ſupply of men from the Scots, whoſe king ſtill remained a priſoner in England. Theſe people, wiſely conſidering, that if Henry became abſolute maſter of France, France, they themſelves muſt next fall victims to his ambition, reſolved to aſſiſt the dauphin; and a ſupply of ſeven thouſand men were ſent over to him, under the command of John, earl of Buchan.

The dauphin had, in the ſpace of a few months, taken the towns of Pont de l'Eſprit and Niſmes, in Languedoc; and had thrown ſtrong garriſons into Melun, Montereau, Montargis, Meaux, and Compeigne; and had ordered a general rendezvous of all his forces to be held at Bourges, in Berry. Henry had advice of all theſe proceedings; and, having paid the tribute due to decency and conjugal affection, he tore himſelf from the arms of his beloved conſort, and reſerved all his attention to the operations of the campaign. The firſt place he reduced was Sens, which ſubmitted after a faint oppoſition: with the ſame eaſe he reduced Montereau, and recovered ſeveral other towns from the dauphin. He next reſolved upon the ſiege of Melun, an enterprize attended with no ſmall difficulty, great part of the city itſelf being encompaſſed by the river Seine, and the whole defended by a ſtrong wall, flanked with towers and bulwarks: the place was commanded by de Barbaſon, one of the beſt officers in France, who made an admirable defence, from the twelfth of July, when Henry ſat down before it, till the eighteenth of November, when it was forced by famine to ſurrender, on condition that none of the garriſon or inhabitants ſhould be put to death, except ſuch as were concerned in the murder of the late duke of Burgundy: theſe laſt were to be tried, and ſuffer the puniſhment due to their crime; the reſt were to be impriſoned at Henry's diſcretion, till they ſhould give ſufficient ſecurity for their not bearing arms againſt him for the future. The governor, Barbaſon, was condemned, as one of the aſſaſſins of the duke, by the parliament of Paris, to which venerable tribunal Philip, duke of Burgundy, applied as ſoon as Melun was yielded, for juſtice on his father's murderers; but Henry, having fought with Barbaſon hand to hand in a mine, in the courſe of the ſiege, ſaved his life out of a point of honour received in thoſe days, and he was detained priſoner above twenty years, till the French recovered Chateau Gaillard.

After the ſurrender of Melun the two courts returned to Paris, where Henry made a magnificent entry on the firſt Sunday in Advent. Here he governed without controul, while Charles VI. continued ſhut up, with a few domeſtics, in the Hotel de St. Paul, at which place Philip, duke of Burgundy, appeared in the preſence of both kings, and of the few remaining nobility of the kingdom there aſſembled, and ſolemnly demanded juſtice for the murder of his father. Upon this the parliament ſummoned the dauphin to appear at the Marble Table *, and anſwer the charge preferred againſt him; but not appearing, he was condemned for contumacy. That prince, finding all ſorts of means were uſed to deprive him of the crown, appealed to God and his ſword, from all that was or might be tranſacted againſt him, in the name of the king his father; and continued ſtill to aſſume the title of Regent. As ſuch, he removed the parliament and univerſity of Paris to Poictiers, where ſome of the members of thoſe two bodies repaired. Thus were ſeen at the ſame time in France, two kings, two queens, two regents, all the officers of the crown double, ſeven or eight marſhals of France on each ſide, two parliaments, and two univerſities of Paris. Towards the latter end of this year, the ſtates of France were aſſembled, and granted Henry a large ſupply, without any debate. Let us now take a view of affairs in England during this year.

The death of Lewis II. king of Naples, which happened two years before, had given birth to a negociation which ſeemed to be big with great conſequences to this kingdom; for, on his deceaſe, a diſpute happened between his ſon Lewis, duke of Anjou, and Joan, ſiſter of Ladiſlaus, formerly king of Naples, about the ſucceſſion to that crown. The claim of the princeſs was at firſt favoured by pope Martin V. who was the ſuperior lord of that kingdom, Naples being a fief of the holy ſee; but the queen refuſing to engage ſo deeply as he wanted her in his quarrel, the pontiff, and her own general, Forza, diveſted her of her crown, and invited the young duke of Anjou into Italy, and actually declared him king of Naples. The queen, finding herſelf thus abandoned, firſt ſtrove to make up matters with the pope, and applied to the duke of Bedford, the regent of England, for his aſſiſtance: and one de Piſis coming over this year as her envoy, preſented to the duke his credential letters, who received his propoſals with great caution, but without rejecting them. They were, that the queen of Naples ſhould adopt him as her heir and ſucceſſor, provided he would march to her aſſiſtance with all his forces. Hereupon the duke ordered one Phiton to go to Naples, and enquire more minutely into the terms of the adoption; and, after ſeveral conferences, the following articles were ſecretly agreed upon by both parties.

"That nothing ſhould be firm and ratified, which the pope did not approve.

"That it being probable that the French, obſerving the queen's deſign of introducing their enemies into her kingdom, would join with her rebellious ſubjects and, raiſe war againſt her, it was neceſſary, to enable her for a defence, that the duke ſhould remit to Naples fifty thouſand ducats, which ſhould be ſecured in the hands of the bankers till the forts and cities of Blanduſium and Regium were delivered to him; and that he ſhould be obliged to come, eight days afterwards, into the kingdom of Naples.

"That, with the pope's conſent and approbation, the queen ſhould adopt him her ſon and heir, and to have the right of ſucceſſion not only to the aforeſaid kingdoms, but to the county of Provence, and any other territories which belonged to her.

"That ſhe ſhould create him duke of Calabria, and deliver to him all the caſtles and towns which were in her power.

"That he ſhould be obliged to ſerve the queen in perſon, with one thouſand men at arms and two thouſand archers, at his own charge for ſix months, and after that time at the queen's.

"That he ſhould not, farther than it pleaſed the queen, intermeddle in the government, the dukedom of Calabria only excepted, which he might rule with full authority.

* This is a large table, which was uſed, in the time of St. Lewis, for receiving the fines paid for vaſſalage, at the tower of the Louvre, and which ever after, remained as a kind of mark of juriſdiction. Volt. Gen. Hiſt. vol. viii. p. 13.

"That

"That in all councils and aſſemblies, reſpect ſhould be paid to him as the queen's ſon.

"That all the riches he gained from the enemy ſhould be to him and his heirs.

"That he ſhould promiſe and ſwear to defend and maintain all principalities, cities, benefices, and offices conferred by the queen on any perſon.

"That, by theſe articles, no power was granted to one party over the perſon and eſtate of the other.

"And laſtly, That, after the duke's arrival at Naples, the queen ſhould cauſe her arms to be quartered with his, as her true and lawful ſon."

Theſe articles ſufficiently ſhew the duke of Bedford's reputation upon the continent. But, flattering as they were to his ambition, the ſtate of Henry's affairs, and the duke's own employments both in England and France, did not ſuffer him immediately to embrace them; the queen therefore, while the duke took time to deliberate, found herſelf beſieged in Naples by the Anjovin party, and ſhe was obliged to have recourſe to Alphonſo, king of Arragon: that prince, embracing the proffers which had been made to the duke of Bedford, immediately marched to her aſſiſtance, and raiſed the ſiege.

The negociation between the queen of Naples and the duke of Bedford thus failing, Henry, who tenderly loved all his brothers, made ſeveral other attempts to raiſe that duke's fortune; firſt by propoſing a match between him and the heireſs of Nuremberg, and afterwards with the daughter of the duke of Lorraine, both which propoſals came to nothing, and the duke remained unmarried till his brother's death. But to return.

Henry's coffers being almoſt exhauſted, he found it abſolutely neceſſary to make a voyage to England, to procure a freſh ſupply, that granted by the French ſtates not being nearly adequate to his neceſſities; he therefore proceeded to ſettle the government of France in his abſence. He appointed ſir Gilbert Umfreville to be governor of Melun, in the room of the earl of Huntingdon, who was made governor of the caſtle of Vincennes; the duke of Exeter was appointed a kind of guardian to the perſon of the king of France, and governor of Paris; and the command in Normandy was given to his brother, the duke of Clarence; and Thomas Montacute, earl of Saliſbury, was appointed his deputy in that province.

Having ſettled theſe matters, he ſet out for England, in the beginning of January, 1421, taking his young queen with him; and on the ſixteenth of that month, while he was at Rouen, in his way to England, he, as duke of Guienne, received the homage of the d'Albret family, they renouncing the benefit of appeal which their grand-father, Charles d'Albret, had formerly put in before the peers of France, againſt the Black Prince, while governor of Aquitaine: the example of the d'Albrets was followed by the Armagnac family; and all of them were put in poſſeſſion of their eſtates, which had been confiſcated to the king of England.

On the twenty-eighth of January Henry croſſed the ſea from Calais to Dover, from whence he proceeded to London, into which he and his queen made a moſt magnificent entry: the coronation of the latter was performed, on Sunday the twenty-third of February, at Weſtminſter; and, when this ſolemnity was over, the king made a progreſs into Wales, and into the North of England as far as York, not only to ſhew the queen the country, but to ſee how juſtice was adminiſtered, and returned to his capital in the latter end of April. On the ſecond of May he convened a parliament at Weſtminſter, in which the peace of Troye was approved and confirmed by the three eſtates of the realm; at the ſame time they voted him a large ſubſidy for the proſecution of the war, though they alſo preſented an addreſs, in which they obſerved, that the conqueſt of France would probably be the ruin of England, which would be in danger of becoming a province of the former kingdom. In anſwer to this addreſs, he aſſured them, that he would never ſuffer any of his conqueſts to prove detrimental to his natural ſubjects.

But while matters were going on ſucceſsfully in England, Henry's affairs in France took an unſucceſsful turn, which obliged him to go abroad ſooner than he propoſed. Great numbers of the Norman and Anjovin noblemen had joined the dauphin, whoſe troops had ſeized Villeneuve le Roy, and daily cut off the proviſions that were conveying to Paris. The inhabitants thereupon began to murmur and throw out ſeveral diſreſpectful expreſſions on the Engliſh: the marſhal de l'Iſle Adam, who had for ſome time been greatly diſcontented at the growing power of the latter at court, ſeemed rather to encourage theſe murmurs of the populace; upon which the duke of Exeter gave orders for arreſting him: as the marſhal was extremely popular, upwards of a thouſand of the Pariſians took to their arms, and oppoſed the carrying him to priſon; but the duke of Exeter, putting himſelf at the head of a choſen body of Engliſh archers, the mob preſently diſperſed, and he lodged his priſoner ſafely in the Baſtile, where he remained in confinement all the reſt of this reign. This diſturbance was followed by an unlucky event in another part of the kingdom, which gave Henry no ſmall uneaſineſs, and quickened his return to the continent.

The dauphin had, during the ſiege of Melun, reduced Languedoc to his obedience; and being maſter of all the French territories beyond the Loire, had advanced as far as Tours, at the head of a numerous army. Thomas, duke of Clarence, who had been left with the command of the Engliſh troops, made ſeveral irruptions into Anjou, to harraſs the dauphin's party. At length, he penetrated as far as the village of Baugé, where hearing that the earl of Buchan, with five thouſand Scots, and a body of French detached from the dauphin's army, under la Fayette, a marſhal of that prince's creation, were on the march to attack him, he reſolved to anticipate their deſign; but as his troops were diſperſed about the country, intent on plunder, and his archers were at ſome diſtance, the earl of Huntingdon preſſed him to wait their coming up; but the duke's heat, pride, and obſtinacy would not let him hearken to this prudent advice: ſo taking with him the few noblemen, officers, and men at arms that were about him, he marched through a narrow paſs over a brook near the caſtle of Baugé, to meet the enemy; but having made his onſet too raſhly, and purſuing without any order a ſmall party of horſe which he had broken at the firſt charge, he on a ſudden found himſelf ſurrounded by a ſtrong body of Scots, under one Swinton, who had lain in ambuſh behind an hill to take advantage of the impetuoſity of the Engliſh. The duke of Clarence being ſingled out by the Scottiſh knight, was firſt wounded in the face, and afterwards ran through the body; moſt of the gentlemen that followed him were alſo ſlain, as were ſir Gilbert Umfreville, the earl of Kent, and the lords Grey and Roſs: the earls of Somerſet, Huntingdon, and Strafford, the lord Fitz Walter, and others, were taken priſoners, and the allies loſt upwards of eleven hundred men. The earl of Saliſbury, coming up with a freſh body of Engliſh, offered to renew the battle, which was declined by the earl of Buchan. This action happened on the twenty-ſecond of March, 1421.

Upon this defeat of the Engliſh by the Scots, the dauphin, in order to engage that people more firmly in his intereſt, and reward the bravery and conduct of Buchan, created that nobleman conſtable of France, who thought to improve his victory by the taking of Alençon; but was obliged, by the earl of Saliſbury, to raiſe the ſiege of that place, and retire with his forces.

Henry no ſooner heard of the fate of his brother Clarence, and the defeat of his troops, than he inſtantly prepared for another voyage to France, and croſſed the ſea, on the tenth of June, from Dover to Calais. According to Monſtrelet, he carried over with him an army of four thouſand men at arms and twenty-four thouſand archers. He left his brother, the duke of Bedford, regent of England in his abſence. On his arrival at Calais, he heard that the duke of Exeter was almoſt blocked up by the dauphin's troops in Paris; upon which he ſent a conſiderable detachment before him to the duke's relief; and another, under the duke of Gloceſter, to recover certain places in Picardy, of which the dauphin had lately made himſelf maſter. Then marching in perſon with the reſt of his army, he came to Bois de Vincennes, from whence he afterwards went and joined his father-in-law in Paris. When he had diſpatched his affairs there, he proceeded to join the reſt of his forces in Normandy, and led them to the relief of Chartres, which had been for ſome time beſieged by the dauphin, who, knowing himſelf unable to make head againſt ſuch a numerous army, retired beyond the Loire, the Engliſh purſuing him to the very gates of Orleans. Henry then inveſting Dreux, a ſtrong place on the borders of Normandy, took it, on the twentieth of Auguſt, by capitulation; and ſoon after reduced Tilliers, Nogent, Gallardan, with other caſtles in the neighbourhood. Upon advice that the dauphin lay, with a great army, on the banks of the Loire, preparing for a general engagement, he marched to Baugenci, and, taking the place, waited there a fortnight, in hopes of that prince offering him battle; but the enemy diſperſing, he turned off to Villeneuve ſur Yonne, which had been lately taken by the dauphin; and having recovered that place, he ſat down, on the ſixth of October, before Meaux, a ſtrong town ſituated on the Marne. This ſiege he undertook at the deſire of the Pariſians, who were greatly harraſſed by the garriſon of that place. Whilſt the king was employed in this operation, he received the agreeable news of his queen's being ſafely delivered of a prince, on the ſixth of December, at Windſor, who was named Henry, and was afterwards the unfortunate Henry VI.

Before we conclude the tranſactions of the year 1421, it will be proper to take ſome notice of the affairs of Scotland, which we have forbore introducing ſooner that we might not break the thread of the hiſtory.

The check which his brother Clarence had met with from the Scottiſh auxiliaries in the ſervice of France, had given Henry no little uneaſineſs, and he uſed all his endeavours to perſuade his priſoner, James, king of Scotland, to recal the troops which had been ſent over to France, under the command of the earl of Buchan; and that prince, in conſequence of ſome private ſtipulations with the king of England, laid his commands upon his ſubjects to quit the ſervice of the dauphin; but the earl returned for anſwer, that they did not think themſelves bound by any tie to obey the orders of their king, while he remained in the hands of his adverſary, and might be ſuppoſed to act from compulſion. This order of James, however, furniſhed Henry with a pretext for treating as rebels all the Scots that were taken in the ſervice of the dauphin. By this time the duke of Albany was dead, and was ſucceeded in the regency of Scotland by his ſon Murdoch, earl of Fife, who had been lately releaſed from his captivity in England. It was ſince his acceſſion to the miniſtry that the auxiliaries had been ſent to France, and therefore he became diſagreeable to the king of England; who, in order to encourage a party that ſhould counterbalance his intereſt in Scotland, permitted James to reviſit his own country, on his giving ſecurity for his return, and aſſuring Henry he would do his endeavours to diſſolve the alliance between Scotland and the dauphin.

The ſiege of Meaux proved a work of great difficulty: it was ſtrongly fortified by art and nature, and provided with a numerous garriſon, commanded by the baſtard of Vaurus, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity and rancour againſt the Burgundians. This place, as we have already obſerved, was inveſted by Henry on the ſixth day of October, 1421; it continued to make an obſtinate defence all the winter, and the Engliſh had loſt a great number of men by the inclemency of the weather and fatigue, as well as by the valour of the beſieged. The town was divided into two parts, called the City and the Marché, or Market-place; the firſt of which was taken by ſtorm in the winter, but the other was defended with infinite reſolution. The lord Cornwall's ſon, a youth of great expectation, and the earl of Dorſet, both loſt their lives at this remarkable ſiege, beſides a great number of other gallant officers, in two ſucceſſive aſſaults, both of which miſcarried in ſpite of all Henry's conduct and intrepidity. At length the garriſon, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, after a defence of ſeven months, demanded a capitulation on the ſecond of May, 1422, which Henry granted on the following terms: "That all the inhabitants and ſoldiers ſhould have their lives, but nothing elſe, ſaved: that the Engliſh, Welſh, Iriſh, and Scots, bearing arms in the place, ſhould be entirely in the king's mercy, together with the baſtard of Vaurus and three other officers of the garriſon: and that the place, with all the neighbouring forts, ſhould be ſurrendered by the eleventh of May." The beſieged were obliged to ſubmit to theſe terms. After Henry had taken poſſeſſion of the town, he commanded theſe officers to be inſtantly beheaded; and likewiſe put to death, without mercy, all the Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh, who were found among the defendants, with all thoſe who had been concerned concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. As for the governor, Vaurus, he underwent an exemplary fate: the bravery of this officer could be exceeded by nothing but his cruelty; he was wont to hang, without diſtinction of age or quality, all the Engliſh and Burgundians that fell into his hands: Henry, highly incenſed at ſuch a barbarous and ſhocking practice, cauſed him to be hanged on the ſame tree which he had made the inſtrument of his inhuman executions, and which from thence was diſtinguiſhed by his name.

The reduction of Meaux was ſoon followed by that of Compeigne, Gamaches, and St. Valery, and Henry ſaw himſelf maſter of all France on this ſide the Loire, except Anjou and Maine, and the caſtles of Guiſe and Crotoy, in Picardy. To add to his ſatisfaction, ſoon after the ſurrender of Meaux, his queen arrived from England, attended by the duke of Bedford, who had left the regency to the duke of Gloceſter, his brother, lately ſent over thither by Henry, on ſome private buſineſs. The two courts joining at Bois de Vincennes, went from thence ſoon after, to keep the Whitſun-holidays at Paris, which they did with great ſplendor.

But the moment was faſt approaching, in which Henry, who ſeemed now to have almoſt attained the ſummit of human grandeur, was to find his courſe ſtopped ſhort by the hand of nature, and all his mighty projects made to bow before an univerſal conqueror. Whilſt he was preparing to renew the campaign, interrupted by the queen's arrival, news came that the dauphin had taken la Charité, which opened him a paſſage over the Loire, and was thereby enabled, without oppoſition, to form the ſiege of Coſne, which being ill provided for a defence, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, by the duke of Burgundy.

Henry received the account of thoſe ſucceſſes with ſenſible chagrin, and put himſelf immediately at the head of the army, in hopes that he ſhould be able to force the dauphin to fight, who had hitherto carefully avoided a deciſive engagement, and, by his cautious yet active conduct, had given Henry no little diſquiet: but, whilſt this latter was pleaſing himſelf with the hopes of a victory that would render him abſolute maſter of all France, he was ſeized at Senlis with a violent illneſs, which obliged him to travel in a litter; and finding himſelf grow worſe at Corbeil, the conduct of the enterprize was given to the duke of Bedford, with the earl of Warwick as his aſſiſtant, whilſt Henry returned to Bois de Vincennes.

The duke of Burgundy was then at Vezelay, waiting to be joined by the Engliſh, which being effected, his army greatly out-numbered that of the dauphin. This determined the latter to abandon his enterprize upon Coſne, and even to quit the banks of the Loire, which he had once reſolved to defend, and to retreat to Bourges, to avoid the hazard of a battle. Thus the duke of Burgundy and the Engliſh, when in high expectation of effectually terminating the war, found themſelves baffled by the prudent precaution of the dauphin, and obliged to retire towards Troye.

In their march thither the duke of Bedford received the melancholy news that Henry's diſorder, which was a pleuritic fever, was increaſed ſo much as to leave very little hopes of recovery. The duke upon this ſet out, accompanied by the earl of Warwick, for Vincennes, and arrived juſt in time to receive the great Henry's dying commands, who, finding himſelf near his end, and being acquainted with his brother's arrival, ordered that he, with the earl of Warwick, the duke of Exeter, and all the Engliſh nobility who happened to be near him, might be brought into his bed-chamber, to give them his laſt inſtructions: the ſubſtance of his ſpeech on this occaſion, as we find in ſeveral hiſtorians, was as follows:

He began with obſerving, "that though his life had been ſhort it had been replete with glory, and employed in endeavours to promote the happineſs of his people: that though his pretenſions to France had occaſioned much bloodſhed, yet that calamity ought not to be charged to his account, the guilt reſting with thoſe who, by their obſtinacy and injuſtice, had forced him to have recourſe to arms, by refuſing to accept of a reaſonable peace. The approach of death, he ſaid, would have been beheld by him without concern, were not his laſt moments ſomewhat imbittered by the reflection of the doubtful event of the war he was engaged in, and the infancy of his ſon, which rendered him incapable of finiſhing a work ſo happily begun; he therefore beſought the duke of Bedford and the reſt of the nobles, who knelt in ſilent grief around him, that they would unite ſtrictly in the ſervice of their infant king, and take every poſſible care of his education. He added, as his laſt advice, that they ſhould never make peace with the dauphin without having it as a preliminary, that the duchy of Normandy ſhould be for ever annexed to the crown of England: and eſpecially recommended to them, always to keep well with the duke of Burgundy; and not to releaſe the duke of Orleans, the count d'Eu, the lord de Gaucourt, and the ſieur Guichard de Siſay (who had been taken priſoners at the battle of Agincourt), till his ſon was of age. Laſtly, he expreſſed a deſire that the duke of Bedford might aſſume the adminiſtration of France, and that the duke of Gloceſter might act as regent during his ſon's minority, the care of whoſe education he committed to the earl of Warwick."

Having thus delivered his ſentiments concerning the management of public affairs, and received the ſolemn aſſurances of the nobles preſent, that they would faithfully obey theſe his dying injunctions, he ordered his confeſſor to attend, and received the final preparations for his approaching diſſolution, in which devout exerciſe he ſoon after gave up the ghoſt, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, after reigning nine years, five months, and eleven days.

Immediately upon Henry's death, the duke of Burgundy came to Vincennes, and had a conference with the duke of Bedford and the Engliſh council, and they altogether ſet out for Paris, to which place the royal body was conveyed by torch-light. The funeral was afterwards performed with great magnificence, the particulars of which are thus given us by Goodwin, in his hiſtory of that great prince, concerning whom even the moſt trivial circumſtances are intereſting:

The body was placed in a rich chariot; on a bed, in the ſame chariot, was laid the figure of the king, with a crown of gold on his head, a ſceptre in his right hand, and in his left a globe, both of the ſame metal. The covering of the bed was a vermilion ſilk, embroidered with gold: over the chariot being ſingled out by the Scottiſh knight, was firſt wounded in the face, and afterwards ran through the body; moſt of the gentlemen that followed him were alſo ſlain, as were ſir Gilbert Umfreville, the earl of Kent, and the lords Grey and Roſs: the earls of Somerſet, Huntingdon, and Strafford, the lord Fitz Walter, and others, were taken priſoners, and the allies loſt upwards of eleven hundred men. The earl of Saliſbury, coming up with a freſh body of Engliſh, offered to renew the battle, which was declined by the earl of Buchan. This action happened on the twenty-ſecond of March, 1421.

Upon this defeat of the Engliſh by the Scots, the dauphin, in order to engage that people more firmly in his intereſt, and reward the bravery and conduct of Buchan, created that nobleman conſtable of France, who thought to improve his victory by the taking of Alençon; but was obliged, by the earl of Saliſbury, to raiſe the ſiege of that place, and retire with his forces.

Henry no ſooner heard of the fate of his brother Clarence, and the defeat of his troops, than he inſtantly prepared for another voyage to France, and croſſed the ſea, on the tenth of June, from Dover to Calais. According to Monſtrelet, he carried over with him an army of four thouſand men at arms and twenty-four thouſand archers. He left his brother, the duke of Bedford, regent of England in his abſence. On his arrival at Calais, he heard that the duke of Exeter was almoſt blocked up by the dauphin's troops in Paris; upon which he ſent a conſiderable detachment before him to the duke's relief; and another, under the duke of Gloceſter, to recover certain places in Picardy, of which the dauphin had lately made himſelf maſter. Then marching in perſon with the reſt of his army, he came to Bois de Vincennes, from whence he afterwards went and joined his father-in-law in Paris. When he had diſpatched his affairs there, he proceeded to join the reſt of his forces in Normandy, and led them to the relief of Chartres, which had been for ſome time beſieged by the dauphin, who, knowing himſelf unable to make head againſt ſuch a numerous army, retired beyond the Loire, the Engliſh purſuing him to the very gates of Orleans. Henry then inveſting Dreux, a ſtrong place on the borders of Normandy, took it, on the twentieth of Auguſt, by capitulation; and ſoon after reduced Tilliers, Nogent, Gallardan, with other caſtles in the neighbourhood. Upon advice that the dauphin lay, with a great army, on the banks of the Loire, preparing for a general engagement, he marched to Baugenci, and, taking the place, waited there a fortnight, in hopes of that prince offering him battle; but the enemy diſperſing, he turned off to Villeneuve ſur Yonne, which had been lately taken by the dauphin; and having recovered that place, he ſat down, on the ſixth of October, before Meaux, a ſtrong town ſituated on the Marne. This ſiege he undertook at the deſire of the Pariſians, who were greatly harraſſed by the garriſon of that place. Whilſt the king was employed in this operation, he received the agreeable news of his queen's being ſafely delivered of a prince, on the ſixth of December, at Windſor, who was named Henry, and was afterwards the unfortunate Henry VI.

Before we conclude the tranſactions of the year 1421, it will be proper to take ſome notice of the affairs of Scotland, which we have forbore introducing ſooner that we might not break the thread of the hiſtory.

The check which his brother Clarence had met with from the Scottiſh auxiliaries in the ſervice of France, had given Henry no little uneaſineſs, and he uſed all his endeavours to perſuade his priſoner, James, king of Scotland, to recal the troops which had been ſent over to France, under the command of the earl of Buchan; and that prince, in conſequence of ſome private ſtipulations with the king of England, laid his commands upon his ſubjects to quit the ſervice of the dauphin; but the earl returned for anſwer, that they did not think themſelves bound by any tie to obey the orders of their king, while he remained in the hands of his adverſary, and might be ſuppoſed to act from compulſion. This order of James, however, furniſhed Henry with a pretext for treating as rebels all the Scots that were taken in the ſervice of the dauphin. By this time the duke of Albany was dead, and was ſucceeded in the regency of Scotland by his ſon Murdoch, earl of Fife, who had been lately releaſed from his captivity in England. It was ſince his acceſſion to the miniſtry that the auxiliaries had been ſent to France, and therefore he became diſagreeable to the king of England; who, in order to encourage a party that ſhould counterbalance his intereſt in Scotland, permitted James to reviſit his own country, on his giving ſecurity for his return, and aſſuring Henry he would do his endeavours to diſſolve the alliance between Scotland and the dauphin.

The ſiege of Meaux proved a work of great difficulty: it was ſtrongly fortified by art and nature, and provided with a numerous garriſon, commanded by the baſtard of Vaurus, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his activity and rancour againſt the Burgundians. This place, as we have already obſerved, was inveſted by Henry on the ſixth day of October, 1421; it continued to make an obſtinate defence all the winter, and the Engliſh had loſt a great number of men by the inclemency of the weather and fatigue, as well as by the valour of the beſieged. The town was divided into two parts, called the City and the Marché, or Market-place; the firſt of which was taken by ſtorm in the winter, but the other was defended with infinite reſolution. The lord Cornwall's ſon, a youth of great expectation, and the earl of Dorſet, both loſt their lives at this remarkable ſiege, beſides a great number of other gallant officers, in two ſucceſſive aſſaults, both of which miſcarried in ſpite of all Henry's conduct and intrepidity. At length the garriſon, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity, after a defence of ſeven months, demanded a capitulation on the ſecond of May, 1422, which Henry granted on the following terms: "That all the inhabitants and ſoldiers ſhould have their lives, but nothing elſe, ſaved: that the Engliſh, Welſh, Iriſh, and Scots, bearing arms in the place, ſhould be entirely in the king's mercy, together with the baſtard of Vaurus and three other officers of the garriſon: and that the place, with all the neighbouring forts, ſhould be ſurrendered by the eleventh of May." The beſieged were obliged to ſubmit to theſe terms. After Henry had taken poſſeſſion of the town, he commanded theſe officers to be inſtantly beheaded; and likewiſe put to death, without mercy, all the Engliſh, Scots, and Iriſh, who were found among the defendants, with all thoſe who had been concerned concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. As for the governor, Vaurus, he underwent an exemplary fate: the bravery of this officer could be exceeded by nothing but his cruelty; he was wont to hang, without diſtinction of age or quality, all the Engliſh and Burgundians that fell into his hands: Henry, highly incenſed at ſuch a barbarous and ſhocking practice, cauſed him to be hanged on the ſame tree which he had made the inſtrument of his inhuman executions, and which from thence was diſtinguiſhed by his name.

The reduction of Meaux was ſoon followed by that of Compeigne, Gamaches, and St. Valery, and Henry ſaw himſelf maſter of all France on this ſide the Loire, except Anjou and Maine, and the caſtles of Guiſe and Crotoy, in Picardy. To add to his ſatisfaction, ſoon after the ſurrender of Meaux, his queen arrived from England, attended by the duke of Bedford, who had left the regency to the duke of Gloceſter, his brother, lately ſent over thither by Henry, on ſome private buſineſs. The two courts joining at Bois de Vincennes, went from thence ſoon after, to keep the Whitſun-holidays at Paris, which they did with great ſplendor.

But the moment was faſt approaching, in which Henry, who ſeemed now to have almoſt attained the ſummit of human grandeur, was to find his courſe ſtopped ſhort by the hand of nature, and all his mighty projects made to bow before an univerſal conqueror. Whilſt he was preparing to renew the campaign, interrupted by the queen's arrival, news came that the dauphin had taken la Charité, which opened him a paſſage over the Loire, and was thereby enabled, without oppoſition, to form the ſiege of Coſne, which being ill provided for a defence, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, by the duke of Burgundy.

Henry received the account of thoſe ſucceſſes with ſenſible chagrin, and put himſelf immediately at the head of the army, in hopes that he ſhould be able to force the dauphin to fight, who had hitherto carefully avoided a deciſive engagement, and, by his cautious yet active conduct, had given Henry no little diſquiet: but, whilſt this latter was pleaſing himſelf with the hopes of a victory that would render him abſolute maſter of all France, he was ſeized at Senlis with a violent illneſs, which obliged him to travel in a litter; and finding himſelf grow worſe at Corbeil, the conduct of the enterprize was given to the duke of Bedford, with the earl of Warwick as his aſſiſtant, whilſt Henry returned to Bois de Vincennes.

The duke of Burgundy was then at Vezelay, waiting to be joined by the Engliſh, which being effected, his army greatly out-numbered that of the dauphin. This determined the latter to abandon his enterprize upon Coſne, and even to quit the banks of the Loire, which he had once reſolved to defend, and to retreat to Bourges, to avoid the hazard of a battle. Thus the duke of Burgundy and the Engliſh, when in high expectation of effectually terminating the war, found themſelves baffled by the prudent precaution of the dauphin, and obliged to retire towards Troye.

In their march thither the duke of Bedford received the melancholy news that Henry's diſorder, which was a pleuritic fever, was increaſed ſo much as to leave very little hopes of recovery. The duke upon this ſet out, accompanied by the earl of Warwick, for Vincennes, and arrived juſt in time to receive the great Henry's dying commands, who, finding himſelf near his end, and being acquainted with his brother's arrival, ordered that he, with the earl of Warwick, the duke of Exeter, and all the Engliſh nobility who happened to be near him, might be brought into his bed-chamber, to give them his laſt inſtructions: the ſubſtance of his ſpeech on this occaſion, as we find in ſeveral hiſtorians, was as follows:

He began with obſerving, "that though his life had been ſhort it had been replete with glory, and employed in endeavours to promote the happineſs of his people: that though his pretenſions to France had occaſioned much bloodſhed, yet that calamity ought not to be charged to his account, the guilt reſting with thoſe who, by their obſtinacy and injuſtice, had forced him to have recourſe to arms, by refuſing to accept of a reaſonable peace. The approach of death, he ſaid, would have been beheld by him without concern, were not his laſt moments ſomewhat imbittered by the reflection of the doubtful event of the war he was engaged in, and the infancy of his ſon, which rendered him incapable of finiſhing a work ſo happily begun; he therefore beſought the duke of Bedford and the reſt of the nobles, who knelt in ſilent grief around him, that they would unite ſtrictly in the ſervice of their infant king, and take every poſſible care of his education. He added, as his laſt advice, that they ſhould never make peace with the dauphin without having it as a preliminary, that the duchy of Normandy ſhould be for ever annexed to the crown of England: and eſpecially recommended to them, always to keep well with the duke of Burgundy; and not to releaſe the duke of Orleans, the count d'Eu, the lord de Gaucourt, and the ſieur Guichard de Siſay (who had been taken priſoners at the battle of Agincourt), till his ſon was of age. Laſtly, he expreſſed a deſire that the duke of Bedford might aſſume the adminiſtration of France, and that the duke of Gloceſter might act as regent during his ſon's minority, the care of whoſe education he committed to the earl of Warwick."

Having thus delivered his ſentiments concerning the management of public affairs, and received the ſolemn aſſurances of the nobles preſent, that they would faithfully obey theſe his dying injunctions, he ordered his confeſſor to attend, and received the final preparations for his approaching diſſolution, in which devout exerciſe he ſoon after gave up the ghoſt, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, after reigning nine years, five months, and eleven days.

Immediately upon Henry's death, the duke of Burgundy came to Vincennes, and had a conference with the duke of Bedford and the Engliſh council, and they altogether ſet out for Paris, to which place the royal body was conveyed by torch-light. The funeral was afterwards performed with great magnificence, the particulars of which are thus given us by Goodwin, in his hiſtory of that great prince, concerning whom even the moſt trivial circumſtances are intereſting:

The body was placed in a rich chariot; on a bed, in the ſame chariot, was laid the figure of the king, with a crown of gold on his head, a ſceptre in his right hand, and in his left a globe, both of the ſame metal. The covering of the bed was a vermilion ſilk, embroidered with gold: over the chariot was a rich ſilk canopy. Thus, with great pomp the funeral proceſſion moved frnm Rouen to Abbeville. The chariot was drawn by ſix horſes, in rich harneſs, each of them having a banner or ſtreamer fixed to the harneſs; the firſt bearing the arms of St. George; the ſecond, thoſe of Normandy; the third, of king Arthur; the fourth, thoſe of St. Edward; the fifth, the arms of France; the ſixth, thoſe of England and France quarterly. James, king of Scotland, followed the chariot, as principal mourner, attended by the duke of Exeter, the earls of Warwick, Marche, Stafford, and Mortaigne, the lords Fitz Hugh, Hungerford, ſir Robert Robeſart, lord Bouchier, ſir John Cornwall, lord Fanhope, and the lord Cornwall. The banners of the ſaints were borne by the lords Lovel, Audley, Morley, and Zouch: the baron of Dudley bore the ſtandard, and the earl of Longueville the banner. The hatchments were carried by twelve captains, and around the chariot rode four hundred men at arms, all in black armour, their horſes barbed black, and their lances borne with their points downwards. A great company cloathed in white, bearing lighted torches, alſo encompaſſed the chariot. The officers and ſervants of the royal houſhold followed, cloathed in black; and after them the royal family, in mourning: the queen, with a great retinue, followed, at a league's diſtance. The body was ſet in the church of St. Ofiran, at Abbeville, where, as well as in all other places to which it came, maſſes were ſaid, without interruption, from the firſt dawn of the morning till midnight. From Abbeville the proceſſion came to Calais, where croſſing to Dover, it continued with the ſame pomp to London. When the body approached that city, it was met by fifteen biſhops in their pontificals, and a number of abbots in their mitres and veſtments, with a great number of prieſts, citizens, and people; the prieſts performing all the way through the ſtreets the funeral devotions, till they arrived at Weſtminſter abbey, where the royal corpſe was interred at the feet of Edward the Confeſſor, in a little chapel, afterwards enlarged and beautified with two iron gates by king Henry VII. On his tomb of grey marble, erected by his queen, was placed a royal image, of ſilver gilt, which remained there till about the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII. when the head, which was of maſſy ſilver, was broken off, and conveyed away with the plates of ſilver that covered the trunk, which now only remains of heart of oak.

Henry is repreſented to us as of a ſtature ſomewhat above the middle ſize; he had a beautiful countenance, a long neck, a thin and ſlender body, fine and elegant limbs, and was poſſeſſed of a ſurprizing degree of ſtrength and agility. He excelled all his cotemporaries in perſonal courage and military proweſs: he was hardy, patient, laborious, and more capable of enduring the extremes of cold, hunger, and fatigue, than almoſt any ſoldier in his army. He was in his manners affable, polite, generous, and magnificent: he had an excellent underſtanding, with a clear head and ſound judgment, and admirable talents for the cabinet and field. But the glare of his ſucceſſes, or the luſtre of his great qualities, will not be found ſufficient to conceal the defects in his character; nor can we, without ſhuddering, hear him appeal with his dying breath to the awful tribunal of Heaven, in defence of his public conduct: had he any juſt pretenſions to the crown of France, in the purſuit of which he ſacrificed ſo many thouſand innocent lives, while Peace and Juſtice were his words of battle? how then could he preſume to remove the guilt of all this bloodſhed from his own door, to lay it at that of a people, whom he had ſo unjuſtly invaded, and ſo cruelly oppreſſed? Truth obliges us to confeſs, that Henry, during his life-time, ſhewed that he could not diſtinguiſh between the art of war and the trade of death, nor knew to join the feeling to the manly heart; and in the hour of his exit, he was a ſtriking example how eaſily conſcience is brought over to eſpouſe the cauſe of any ruling paſſion; for, as we cannot ſuſpect him of any diſſimulation at ſuch a juncture, we muſt ſuppoſe that he died in full conviction of having acted according to the dictates of equity; though impartial poſterity will count him among the number of thoſe warriors, whoſe ambition has ſpread ruin and devaſtation through the earth; and who ſacrifice the character of humanity to acquire that of the hero.

It now remains to mention the wife and iſſue of this great king. He was married, as we have already ſeen, to Catherine of Valois, daughter to Charles VI. king of France: ſhe was born in the year 1400, ſo that Henry left her a young widow, of immenſe fortune, the higheſt qualities, and moſt tempting beauty. After Henry's death ſhe fell in love with and married a Welſh knight, named Owen Tudor, ſaid to be ſprung from the ancient princes of that country: ſhe bore him two ſons, Edmund and Jaſper, of whom the elder was created earl of Richmond, and the ſecond earl of Pembroke. The family of Tudor, which was firſt raiſed to diſtinction by this alliance, afterwards aſcended the throne of England.

The only iſſue of Henry by this queen was Henry of Windſor, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, to whoſe reign we ſhall next proceed.

Remarkable Occurrences.

On the day of his coronation, there happened a tempeſt of wind, ſnow, and hail; the ſnow was moſt taken notice of becauſe it was moſt prevalent; on which the people made ſuperſtitious obſervations: ſome thought it preſaged, that the new king would be cold and negligent in the adminiſtration of the government, or wrong and oppreſs them; others took it for a good omen, that, having diſpelled thoſe clouds of vice which had darkened the nation, brightneſs and ſerenity would ſucceed the ſtorm.

In the third year of his reign, the church ſervice was changed throughout England, from the uſe of St. Paul to the uſe of Sarum. On Candlemas-day ſeven dolphins were diſcovered playing on the river Thames, and four of them were taken.

The firſt commiſſion of array, which occurs in the Engliſh hiſtory, was iſſued in the courſe of this reign. The military part of the feudal ſyſtem was now entirely aboliſhed; and could no longer ſerve for the defence or ſecurity of the kingdom. For this reaſon, when Henry went to France in 1415, he empowered certain commiſſioners to take a review of all the free-men in each county able to bear arms, to form them into companies, and to keep them in a conſtant readineſs to oppoſe any attempts that might be made by the enemy.

HENRY VI.

It was alſo this king that firſt inſtituted the office of Garter King at Arms, and made ſeveral regulations concerning that moſt noble order, which the curious reader may ſee in Aſhmole's Inſtitutions, &c. p. 252, &c. He alſo appointed a new herald, by the title of Agincourt King at Arms.

King Henry, among other works of charity and magnificence, rebuilt the royal palace of Shene, now called Richmond; and the caſtle of Kenelworth.

HENRY VI. ſurnamed Of WINDSOR*. The third King of ENGLAND of the LANCASTRIAN Family. A. D. 1422.

BEFORE we enter upon the tranſactions of this reign, ſo very different from the laſt, we ſhall introduce our readers to an acquaintance with the great perſonages, eſpecially thoſe of the royal blood, who are to make the principal figures therein, and the knowlege of whoſe hiſtories and characters will ſerve as a clue to guide us through the ſcenes we are now to tread.

It may be remembered, that, beſides Henry V. the fourth Henry left three other ſons; Thomas, duke of Clarence; John, duke of Bedford; and Humphrey, duke of Gloceſter. We have already mentioned the death of the firſt of theſe, which happened without his leaving any lawful male iſſue. The next of the ſurviving brothers, and the third ſon of Henry IV. was John, duke of Bedford, who, though not poſſeſſed of thoſe ſhining talents which diſtinguiſhed Henry V. was yet formed with virtues more capable of making a people happy. He had given the moſt indiſputable proofs of his great abilities for government, by his conduct while regent of England during his royal brother's abſence on the continent; for under his adminiſtration the nation enjoyed plenty and tranquility at home, her commerce flouriſhed, her agriculture was improved, and the public monies were ſtrictly and beneficially employed. Theſe qualities placed him high in the eſteem of his elder brother, who, as we have elſewhere obſerved, ſought all opportunities of raiſing his fortune.

Humphrey, duke of Gloceſter, the younger brother of Henry V. was alſo one of the moſt accompliſhed princes of his age; the chief failing with which he is juſtly chargeable, was his ſuffering an impetuoſity of temper ſometimes to get ſo much the better of his prudence as to hurry him into acts or expreſſions that laid him too open to the malice or ill-will of his enemies; but his ſincerity and freedom deſervedly made him dear to every honeſt and noble mind, and he poſſeſſed no inconſiderable ſhare of his royal brother's affection and eſteem, who in his knowlege of mankind yielded to none of the age he lived in.

We ſhall now proceed to give an account of the other more remote branches of the royal family. Of theſe, the firſt in years and dignity was Henry Beaufort, cardinal of St. Euſebius and biſhop of Wincheſter. He was ſon to John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, by that nobleman's ſecond marriage with Catherine Swinford, and conſequently uncle to Henry V. He was a man of profound ſenſe and great eloquence, as may be gathered from his ſpeeches at the opening of many ſeſſions of parliament, which are ſtill extant upon the rolls: but the chief power of this prelate undoubtedly lay in the vaſt riches he had amaſſed; for, as he had more ready money than any other ſubject in England, he claimed a kind of merit in ſupplying the neceſſities of the crown, though at an extravagant intereſt †. But his avarice was even exceeded by his ambition; and he was alike impatient either of a ſuperior or an equal. The great countenance which had for ſome time been ſhewn to the church, and his own near relation to the crown, gave him many extraordinary advantages; ſo that, upon the whole, he was eſteemed one of the chief perſons in the kingdom.

Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, third ſon of John of Ghent, by his ſecond marriage, was a prince well verſed in buſineſs, and had filled ſeveral principal poſts both in the ſtate and army, with reputation to himſelf and advantage to his country. In the fifth year of Henry IV. he had been made lord high-admiral of England; after that, governor of Calais, lord-chamberlain, and then created earl of Dorſet and knight of the Garter. By Henry V. he was advanced to the dignity of a duke; and that monarch honoured him with a farther mark of his eſteem, by making him governor of Harfleur, and earl of Harcourt in Normandy. The poſt he enjoyed in the beginning of the reign we are entering upon, was that of governor to the king, and commander in chief of the Engliſh forces in France: nay, if we may believe ſome authors, Henry V. had ſo great an opinion of him, that he appointed him, and not the duke of Gloceſter (as Elmham has it), by his dying words to be protector of England.

Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, was by Henry V. deſigned tutor to his infant ſon, under the duke of Exeter. This nobleman was not only the moſt accompliſhed ſoldier, but generally allowed to be the fineſt gentleman of his time. He had been employed at moſt courts in Europe, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his addreſs and politeneſs ‡. He was, indeed, univerſally beloved and eſteemed by all who knew him, either abroad or at home; and the great eſtate which he poſſeſſed, the number of his relations, all of whom were perſons of conſiderable conſequence, joined to the ſtrength of his alliances, gave him a greater national intereſt in the country of England than, perhaps, any other ſubject, not immediately of the royal blood, then enjoyed.

---

* From the place of his birth. It is reported by moſt of our hiſtorians, that Henry, who was in France when this prince was born, on enquiring where his queen was delivered, was anſwered at Windſor; upon which, in a kind of propetic deſpondency, he ſaid to the lord Fitz Hugh, his chamberlain, "I Henry of Monmouth ſhall ſhort time reign, and much get; Henry of Windſor ſhall long time reign, and all loſe: but God's will be done." However, this ſaying ſeems to have been more political than predictive; for it was no hard matter for Henry, at that time, to conceive that he could not hope, in the common courſe of things, to eſtabliſh the crown of France in his own family.

† In the year 1416, he lent his nephew, Henry V. no leſs than four hundred thouſand marks on his crown and other regalia. Rymer, vol. ix. p. 405, 416.

The other perſonages of note, though inferior to theſe, who compoſed the young king's court, were Richard, duke of York, ſon of Richard, earl of Cambridge, who was beheaded at Southampton, and grand-ſon of Edmund of Langley, duke of York, a prince who afterwards claimed the crown as heir of Mortimer: Humphrey, earl of Strafford, ſon of Anne of Gloceſter, daughter to the unfortunate duke whom Richard II. cauſed to be murdered at Calais: Henry, viſcount Bouchier, afterwards created earl of Eſſex, uterine brother to the earl of Strafford, and married to Iſabel, the duke of York's ſiſter: Ralph Neville, earl of Weſtmoreland, allied to the royal family by his marriage with Jane Beaufort, ſiſter to the duke of Exeter and the biſhop of Wincheſter: Thomas Courtenay, earl of Devonſhire, married to the ſiſter of the earl of Somerſet: Henry, lord Talbot, who had eſpouſed the ſiſter of the earl of Eſſex: Henry Holland, earl of Huntingdon, deſcended from an uterine ſiſter of Richard II. Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland: and John Fitz Alan, earl of Arundel.

Having thus prepared the way to a clearer underſtanding of the enſuing ſcene of action, by this ſhort account of the principal perſons concerned in public affairs, we ſhall now continue our hiſtory.

It would ſeem that the death of Henry V. was concealed for ſome time; at leaſt the news of it arrived ſo ſlow in England, that no ſtep was taken towards recognizing the rights of his infant ſon till a month after his deceaſe; for we find by the public records, that it was not till the twenty-ninth of September that the duke of Gloceſter, at that time regent of the realm in the abſence of the duke of Bedford, in conſequence of the news of king Henry's death, iſſued writs in the new king's name for a parliament to meet on the twenty-ninth of November following. Two days after, viz. the firſt of October, 1422, young Henry being carried to London, was proclaimed there, not being full nine months old when he aſcended the throne.

The parliament meeting according to appointment, made ſeveral regulations for the better exerciſe of the government. Thomas Langley, biſhop of Durham, was appointed chancellor of England; William Rendroſſe lord high-treaſurer; and John Stafford keeper of the privy-ſeal. It appears, however, that Henry's dying requeſt was not very ſtrictly attended to, for, notwithſtanding his verbal declaration, appointing Humphrey, duke of Gloceſter, regent of England during the young king's minority, the two houſes thought fit to confer that important poſt on the elder brother, John, duke of Bedford; but, at the ſame time, the duke of Gloceſter was fixed upon to ſupply that high office in his abſence, and allowed to aſſume the ſame title. Not approving the title of Regent, Tutor, Guardian, or any other which imported power in a high degree, leſt it might be abuſed, they choſe that of Protector and Defender of the Realm and Church of England, and chief Counſellor of the King; at the ſame time aſſigning a ſalary of eight thouſand marks per annum for the ſupport of this dignity. The duke of Bedford being then beyond the ſeas, the ſaid title and ſalary were conferred on the duke of Gloceſter, to be by him had and received in abſence only of the aforeſaid duke: at the ſame time Gloceſter was conſtituted lord-chamberlain and high-conſtable of England.

To guard againſt any encroachment, under colour of a title which, if it conveyed no authority, was, however, very pompous and high-ſounding, they appointed a council, by whoſe advice all the affairs of the kingdom were to be adminiſtered, the protector having no prerogative in reſpect of its reſolutions, but that of a double voice in caſe of an equality. This important point being eſtabliſhed, they made ſome other regulations touching ſheriffs, bailiffs, and juſtices of the peace; and having continued the tonnage and poundage, with the ſubſidy on wool, for two years longer, they broke up, on the eighteenth of December. Before they roſe, however, they appointed governors to take care of the king's perſon and education: theſe were Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and his brother Henry, biſhop of Wincheſter and cardinal, the king's great-uncles.

While theſe matters were under conſideration, advice came of ſome commotions in Wales and the neighbouring counties, raiſed probably by the Mortimer intereſt in that part of the country. Theſe diſturbances appear to have been ſomewhat ſerious, ſince we find commiſſioners appointed to enquire into, and ſuppreſs them. In all probability this writ had the deſired effect, as we hear of no conſequences that attended theſe inſurrections *.

Thus was the infant ſon of Henry V. placed in quiet poſſeſſion of the throne after his father, notwithſtanding there was a perſon then living in the kingdom (Richard, duke of York, ſon of the late earl of Cambridge), who, as undoubted heir to the families both of York and Mortimer, was certainly the neareſt in blood from Edward III. to the crown of England. But it is now time to turn our eyes towards France, and ſee what was tranſacted there in conſequence of the death of its conqueror.

Charles VI. ſurvived his ſon-in-law but fifty-five days, dying at Paris on the twenty-firſt of October, 1422, and his death occaſioned a total revolution in the affairs of that kingdom. Many of the French nobility, who had conſidered themſelves as obliged in duty to obey the king, without enquiring ſtrictly whether his commands were conducive to the intereſts of their country, now looked upon themſelves as under the ſame obligation to the dauphin, notwithſtanding the treaty of Troye, which they conſidered as extorted from their late weak ſovereign by force and fraud.

‡ While this nobleman was governor of Calais, he entertained the emperor Sigiſmund, in his way to England, with ſo much civility and gallantry, that his imperial majeſty, on his arrival here told king Henry V. that no Chriſtian king could boaſt of a knight equal to him for wiſdom, good-breeding, and courage; and that if all courteſy was loſt, it might be found in the earl of Warwick; who from thence was afterwards called the Father of Courteſy. Dugdale's Warwickſh. p. 327.

The

The dauphin, though his intereſt was lower than ever, was yet maſter of the counties of Berry, Bourbon, Languedoc, Lyonnois, Forrez, Auvergne, a great part of Xaintonge, Poictou, with the earldoms of Comminges and Armagnac, bordering on the Pyrenees. He was extremely well ſerved both by his officers and miniſters, and his acceſſion to the crown could not fail of having a great effect in his favour.

The duke of Bedford was too ſagacious not to foreſee the conſequences that muſt naturally reſult from ſuch a change in the face of affairs, and therefore, the inſtant Charles VI. expired, he proclaimed Henry VI. king of France, and, agreeable to the will of his late brother, aſſumed to himſelf the title of regent of that kingdom; he alſo cauſed a new great-ſeal to be made, with the arms of France and England impaled, and on the other ſide the effigies of the young king, holding a ſceptre in each hand. He next aſſembled at Paris all the great men attached to the Engliſh intereſt, and, in a ſet ſpeech, exhorted them to acknowlege young Henry for their ſovereign. This they immediately complied with, ſwearing allegiance to Henry as king of France, and doing homage to him, in the perſon of the regent, for the lands they held of that crown; and the ſame ſecurity was afterwards exacted from all the towns that were under the dominion of the Engliſh: at the ſame time the city of Paris ſent deputies to London, to perform the ſame ceremony to the infant king in perſon, and congratulate him on his acceſſion to the crowns of the two kingdoms. Theſe deputies were ordered to take the Low Countries in their route, and exhort the duke of Burgundy to adhere ſteadily to his alliance †.

We have already taken notice of the places yet in the poſſeſſion of the dauphin; on the other hand, Henry was in poſſeſſion of Normandy and Guienne, Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, the Iſle of France, and the city of Paris, beſides the two Burgundys, Flanders, and Artois, which belonged to the duke of Burgundy, his vaſſal and ally. The duke of Bedford, who was his regent in France, and, as we have already obſerved, one of the moſt accompliſhed princes in Europe, whether conſidered as a ſoldier or a ſtateſman, was aſſiſted by officers alike diſtinguiſhed for their perſonal courage and military talents; the chief of theſe were the duke of Somerſet, the earls of Saliſbury, Warwick, and Arundel, ſir John Faſtolf, and ſir John Talbot. Hence it appears that the war might have been carried on in all the provinces of France, except Brittany, whoſe duke, John V. had hitherto obſerved a ſtrict neutrality, which had greatly enriched his dominions, both in wealth and people. The duke of Bedford, ſenſible how neceſſary it was for him to ſtrengthen his political intereſts by more numerous attachments, gave in charge to the miniſters who were to call upon the duke of Burgundy, to uſe all their endeavours to obtain of the count of Richemont, brother to John, that he would uſe his intereſt with that prince to bring him over to the party of England. The count, who was under the ſtrongeſt obligations to the Engliſh court ‡, applied himſelf ſo ſtrenuouſly to comply with the regent's deſire, that he at length prevailed with his brother to enter into meaſures with the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy; and a meeting of theſe four princes was appointed to be held at Amiens the beginning of the next year, which accordingly took place, and a treaty of alliance was concluded between them againſt the new king of France, to which the prince of Orange and the duke of Savoy were invited to accede *.

Whilſt the duke of Bedford was thus taking every neceſſary precaution to ſerve the intereſts of the king his nephew, the dauphin was no leſs intent to his. He was at Eſpalay, a houſe belonging to the biſhop of Puy, when he heard of his father's death; upon which he immediately cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of France, and repaired to Poictiers, where he was crowned with all the pomp and ſolemnity which the ſituation of his affairs would permit, the wayward ſtate of which had no other impreſſion on the young king, but to make him redouble his efforts in regaining his right; and though the ſeaſon of the year was ſo far advanced, he found means to make himſelf maſter of Meulant, on the Seine, which ſurrendered to him on the fourth day of January, 1423.

As this place lay in the neighbourhood of Paris, the regent looked upon the reduction of it under his eye, as an inſult offered to his arms, and therefore reſolved to retake it at any hazard: accordingly, about the beginning of February, he in perſon formed the ſiege of it, accompanied by the earls of Saliſbury and Suffolk, the lords Scales and Poynings, ſir John Faſtolf, and others of his beſt officers. As a number of other fortreſſes in thoſe parts, which were filled with Charles's troops, muſt be obliged to ſurrender as ſoon as Meulant ſhould be retaken, that prince determined to ſpare nothing to maintain poſſeſſion of it: he therefore ordered the count d'Aumale, and Stuart of Aubigny, general of the Scottiſh auxiliaries in the room of the earl of Buchan, then in Scotland, to march to its relief; but whether theſe officers could not agree about the chief command, or thought the attack impracticable, when they were advanced within a few miles of the place, they ſuddenly turned ſhort, and marched off, Aumale towards Anjou and Maine, where he commanded for Charles, and the Scots towards their former quarters. This retreat exaſperated the garriſon ſo much, that Graville, who commanded the place for Charles, ordered the French ſtandards to be torn from the battlements and thrown into the ditch, and inſtantly delivered up the place ‖, the ſurrender of which was followed by that of the fortreſſes of Marcouſſi, Montleri, la Ferté, Milan, Compeigne, and others of leſſer note.

This place capitulated on the ſecond of March, and ſoon after the regent repaired to Amiens, where, on the eighth of April, he concluded the treaty of alliance and confederacy already ſpoken of; and this alliance was cemented by a marriage between Bedford and Anne, ſiſter of the duke of Burgundy. The former conſummated his marriage at Troye, and, in his way to Paris with his conſort, took Pont ſur Seine by aſſault. In the mean time John Montacute, earl of Saliſbury, being appointed governor of Champagne and Brie, inveſted the ſtrong caſtle of Montaigne, and, leaving the earl of Suffolk to command the blockade of that fortreſs, undertook in perſon the ſiege of Vertus, Seſanne, and Epernay, all which he reduced with very little trouble.

The blockade of Montaigne ſtill continuing, and the French king underſtanding that the earl of Suffolk had but a few troops under his command, ordered Tanneguy de Chatel to attempt to raiſe the blockade; but this deſign was defeated by the vigilance of the earl of Saliſbury, who obliged the French general to retire behind Maçon, a town in Burgundy, which Charles's troops had ſurprized; and then the earl of Saliſbury, thinking the blockade of Mortaigne ſecure, turned ſhort, and ſurprized Crevante, a ſtrong place on the river Yonne, four leagues from Auxerre. Stuart of Aubigny, at the head of a body of Scots, and the count of Ventadour, with a conſiderable body of French troops in the intereſt of Charles, were ſent by that prince with orders to raiſe the ſiege of Crevante, or, if the place was taken before their arrival, to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to recover it out of the hands of the allies. They punctually followed their orders, by inveſting the place a few days after it had ſurrendered to the Engliſh; and there being but a ſcarcity of proviſions, it was ſoon reduced to great extremity.

The dukes of Burgundy and Bedford hearing of the diſtreſs of the beſieged, ſent a ſtrong reinforcement to the earl of Saliſbury, under the command of Toulangeon, marſhal of Burgundy, with orders at all events to relieve the place. Toulangeon found means to force the enemy to a battle, which was fought with great obſtinacy by both ſides; but victory declared for the Engliſh, who routed the French, with the loſs of twelve hundred of their own people, and near three thouſand Scots ſlain in the field, beſides priſoners, among which were the Scottiſh general and the count of Ventadour. In conſequence of this victory, Mortaigne was immediately ſurrendered to Suffolk; Coucy, and other places about Maçon, ſubmitted ſoon after; and, towards the end of the year, Crotoy and Guiſe, the only ſtrong holds that remained to Charles in Picardy, capitulated for a ſurrender, if not relieved before the month of March following, when they were accordingly delivered.

Theſe military atchievements were greater than could be reaſonably expected, after two ſuch blows as the Engliſh intereſt had received in France, by the deaths of Henry V. and Charles VI. but the duke of Bedford well foreſaw, that, without the utmoſt circumſpection, they muſt be but tranſitory; the French in general were untractable under their new government; a young prince, expelled his native throne by the rebellion of his own ſubjects, and by the arms of ſtrangers, could not fail to excite the compaſſion of all his people whoſe hearts were unbiaſſed by faction; and the preſent ſituation of France naturally engaged the attention even of the meaneſt perſons, and became a common topic of converſation: add to this, that he found the earl of Richemont to be a froward, haughty, and troubleſome ally, and withal of a brave, intriguing, and intrepid diſpoſition: again, it was far from being improbable, notwithſtanding the late advantages gained by the Engliſh, that the war might take an untoward turn for them, ſhould the Scottiſh regency continue to ſupply the French king with troops: he reflected upon the ill ſucceſs which had attended the detaining the king of Scotland a priſoner in the Engliſh court, which had been done from a ſuppoſition that the Scots would be deterred from joining the French in a war againſt England, as long as their king was a priſoner there; but the late hearty aſſiſtance they had given Charles proved this to be a miſtaken notion. The Scottiſh nobility had always been deſirous of getting their king home; but the duke of Albany, late regent, had found means to elude all their efforts for that purpoſe: Murdoch, earl of Fife, had ſucceeded his father in that poſt; and finding the people in general refractory under his government, he reſolved to diveſt himſelf of ſo ungrateful an office, and accordingly, concurring with the deſires of the great men, he ſent ambaſſadors to England, in July this year, to treat for the king's liberty. This perfectly well correſponded with a project the duke of Bedford had formed; who being made acquainted with this application, gave it as his poſitive advice, that the wiſeſt method of the Engliſh court would be to conſent to the releaſe of king James upon reaſonable terms, ſince they already experienced how little the Scottiſh regency was affected to their cauſe; and that much might be expected from James's friendſhip, when laid under this obligation for his crown and liberty.

The council in England concurred with the duke in his reaſons, and commiſſioners were appointed to manage the conferences for the releaſe of the Scottiſh king: thoſe on the ſide of the Engliſh were, Thomas, biſhop of Durham, chancellor of England: Philip, biſhop of Worceſter; Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland; and Mr. John Wadeham: thoſe for Scotland were, William, biſhop of Glaſgow; George, earl of Marche; James Douglas of Balgeny, his brother; Patrick, abbot of Cambuſkenneth; John, abbot of Balmerino; ſir Patrick Dunbar, of Bole; ſir Robert Lauder, of Eddrington; Mr. George Borthwick, archdeacon of Glaſgow; and Patrick Houſton, canon of Glaſgow *,

The conferences were opened at the city of York in the beginning of September; but it was the tenth of February, 1424, before all matters were ſettled, and then they came to the following agreement.

"I. That the king of Scotland, and his heirs, as an equivalent for his entertainment while in England, ſhould pay to the king of England, and his heirs, at London, in the church of St. Paul, by equal proportions, the ſum of forty thouſand pounds.

"II. That the firſt payment, amounting to the ſum of ten thouſand marks, ſhould be made ſix months after the king of Scotland's entering his own kingdom: that the like ſum ſhould be paid the next year, and ſo on during the ſpace of ſix years, when the ſum would be cleared, unleſs after payment of forty thouſand marks, the laſt payment of ten thouſand ſhould be remitted at the entreaty of the moſt illuſtrious Thomas, duke of Exeter.

"III. That

" III. That the king of Scotland, before entering his own kingdom, ſhould give ſufficient hoſtages for performance on his part. But, in regard that the Scots plenipotentiaries had no inſtructions concerning hoſtages, it was agreed,

" IV. That the king of Scotland ſhould be at Branſpath, or Durham, by the firſt of March next, where he ſhould be attended by the nobles of his blood, and other ſubjects, in order to fix the number and quality of the hoſtages.

" V. That, to cement and perpetuate the amity of the two kingdoms, the governor of Scotland ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to London with power to conclude a contract of marriage between the king of Scotland and ſome lady of the firſt quality in England.

In purſuance of the laſt article, other two perſons were added to the Scottiſh commiſſioners, and all together proceeded in a body to London, where they gave ſecurity upon the four principal boroughs in Scotland, viz. Edinburgh, Perth, Dundee, and Aberdeen, for the payment of the forty thouſand pounds, and ſtipulated the hoſtages, the number of which were twelve, all of the nobleſt blood in Scotland, their names as follow: David, eldeſt ſon and heir of the earl of Athol; Thomas, earl of Murray; Alexander, earl of Crauford; Duncan Campel, lord of Argyll; William Douglas, ſon and heir of the lord of Dalkeith; Gilbert, ſon and heir of William Hay, conſtable of Scotland; Robert Keith, marſhal of Scotland; Robert Erſkine, lord of Erſkine; Walter, lord Dirleton; Thomas Boyd, lord of Kilmarnock; Patrick Dunbar, lord of Carnoch; Alexander, lord of Gordon †.

Beſides theſe hoſtages, who were actually delivered up to the Engliſh, the following were appointed to ſupply their places, in caſe the former ſhould fail by death or otherwiſe: William, lord of Abernethy; Hugh Fraſer, lord of Lovat; James Dunbar, lord of Frendraught; Andrew Gray, lord of Fowlis; Robert Livingſton, lord of Livingſton; John Lindſay; Robert de Lyle; James, lord of Calder; James Hamilton, lord of Cadrow; William, lord of Ruthven; William Oliphant, lord of Aberdalgy; Robert, ſon and heir of Robert de Maitland; David Menzies; David Ogilvie; Patric, ſon and heir of lord John Lyon.

At the ſame time it was determined, that the king of Scotland ſhould marry Jane Beaufort, daughter to the earl of Somerſet (who was a ſon, by the ſecond marriage, of John of Ghent), and niece to the duke of Exeter and the biſhop of Wincheſter. This match was procured by that prelate, in order to ſtrengthen and ſupport his family by an alliance with Scotland; and the Engliſh council agreed to abate ten thouſand marks of the ranſom-money, by way of equivalent for the lady's portion. Then the commiſſioners of both nations ſigned a truce for ſeven years, namely to the firſt of May, 1431, by which James engaged to recal his troops from the French ſervice by the month of June following, though he could not promiſe they would obey his orders. Thus James, after a captivity of ſeventeen years, was reſtored to his kingdom ‡. This treaty was confirmed by the parliament, which met on the twentieth of October; and having ſat to the ſeventeenth of December, was adjourned to the fourteenth of January.

In this parliament a new council was appointed for the government of the realm, by the arts and intrigues of the biſhop of Wincheſter, who, having had ſome diſpute with the duke of Glocester, raiſed an oppoſition in parliament, with a view to reſtrain the power of the protector by extending that of the council, which was accordingly enlarged.

Whilſt the king of Scotland's liberty was negociating in England, the war was continued in France with various ſucceſs. In the beginning of the year 1424, Charles received a reinforcement of one thouſand men at arms, and five hundred lances, from Philip Maria Viſconti, duke of Milan; and theſe troops invading the Bajolois, not only ſaved the town of Bouſſiere from falling into the hands of Toulangeon, marſhal of Burgundy, but alſo attacked that general, who was taken priſoner with ſeven hundred men; but he was immediately exchanged for Stuart, the Scottiſh general, who had been taken at the battle of Crevante. Beaumont upon the Oyſe, in the Iſle of France, was alſo ſeized by a party of French royaliſts; but, on the other hand, the Engliſh and Burgundians ſurprized Gallion upon the Seine, and la Charité upon the Loire, the taking of which had, during the war, given Charles ſo many advantages. Several other actions of leſſer note paſſed between the two parties; but the duke of Bedford could not, without great chagrin, behold his plan of clearing all the provinces north of the Loire of Charles's troops, attended with greater difficulties than he imagined; for he had no ſooner ſubdued a place by force, than the enemy retook it by ſurprize, ſo that his taſk appeared to be equally laborious and ineffectual.

The French king was not a little indebted for the ſucceſs of his arms to the bravery and conduct of his Scottiſh auxiliaries, of which he had at this time no leſs than fifteen thouſand in his ſervice: Charles looked upon them as his deliverers, nay as his guardians; he diſtinguiſhed their officers by very particular marks of favour; the earl of Buchan he had already made conſtable of France, and he now created general Stuart, baron of Aubigny and count (or earl) of Evreux; and on the earl of Douglas, who had lately come over from Scotland with a freſh reinforcement of troops, and who was eſteemed the moſt accompliſhed general of his time, he conferred the dignity of duke, by the title of duke of Terouranne: and ſo great was his opinion of the fidelity of the Scots, that he choſe a company of them for the guard of his own perſon, which ſtill ſubſiſts in name, and was actually exiſting till the time of James I. of England.

In the monrh of June the regent duke received advice that one of Charles's partizans had reduced Ivri, on the frontiers of Picardy; and as this was a place of great conſequence, he was determined at any rate to regain it, while Charles was equally as determined to preſerve it, that he might ſtill continue the war to the north of the Loire. The regent marched thither in July, and made his diſpoſitions ſo well, that the governor of the place agreed to ſurrender it, if not relieved by the fifteenth of Auguſt. Charles, apprized of this agreement, ordered the flower of his troops to aſſemble, determined to ſuccour the place, though at the hazard of a battle. His forces rendezvouſed in le Maine, and, upon a muſter, were found to amount to twenty thouſand men, compoſed of French, Scots, and Italians. The command of this army belonged to the earl of Buchan, as conſtable of France; but he being willing to reſign that honour to his father-in-law, the earl of Douglas (duke of Terouranne) Charles ſent that nobleman a patent, conſtituting him his lieutenant-general of the whole kingdom, otherwiſe the conſtable could not have been under his command. Douglas ordered the army to advance towards Chartres; but when they came within ſix leagues of Ivri, they heard that the place was ſurrendered, upon which the conſtable went to reconnoitre the Engliſh camp, which he found too ſtrongly fortified to be attacked without evident diſadvantage, and therefore the army was ordered to wheel round, and coming to Vernueil, a town belonging to the duke of Alençon, but then in the hands of the Engliſh faction, the place was ſummoned to ſurrender. On this occaſion the French made uſe of an artifice, that had the deſired effect; the meſſengers ſent to the garriſon had orders to tell them, that the conſtable and the earl were juſt come from gaining a complete victory over the regent duke, whoſe army they had cut in pieces, and that himſelf had with great difficulty eſcaped out of the field with a few followers only: this tale gained ſuch belief, that the place immediately ſurrendered, and Douglas filled it with a garriſon of French loyaliſts.

Upon the firſt news of the march of the French army, the regent ſent to the earl of Saliſbury for a reinforcement, and that nobleman joined him on the fourteenth of Auguſt, with a thouſand horſe and two thouſand archers, which made the Engliſh army about fifteen thouſand effective men: thus ſtrengthened, the duke of Bedford advanced towards Vernueil, in order to force the enemy to an engagement.

When he arrived within a league of their camp, he ſent a herald to offer Douglas battle, which the latter did not ſeem to decline, but without moving from his ſituation. This was ſome diſappointment to the duke of Bedford, who had founded his principal hopes in the impetuoſity of the French: but it was not long before thoſe hopes were amply ſatisfied. The regent had pitched upon an advantageous ſpot for the field of battle, flanked by a hill, on which he poſted a body of two thouſand archers, and furniſhed his other ſoldiers with ſharp ſtakes, like thoſe that were uſed by the army of Henry V. at Agincourt, to oppoſe the onſet of the French cavalry. Douglas, having ſurveyed the ſituation of the Engliſh camp, inſiſted that it would be the intereſt of the French to ſtand on the defenſive, and not begin the charge, as the enemy had choſen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without manifeſt diſadvantage. This prudent advice, which was ſeconded by the conſtable and all the officers of experience, appeared to Aymer, viſcount of Narbonne, an headſtrong and imprudent man, as the effect of fear or cowardice; nor did he ſpare to upbraid the commanders, in expreſs terms, with diſhonouring by their tameneſs the arms of France. Vain of ſuperior numbers, he indulged that failing of headſtrong impetuoſity which has ſo often proved fatal to his nation: he was joined by all the young nobility, who were eager to ſignalize themſelves; no reaſons could be heard, no remonſtrances were attended to: at length Narbonne, ſnatching up one of the ſtandards of the diviſion, exclaimed, "Let all who love their ſovereign, follow me!" and ruſhing out of the line, he advanced at the head of all thoſe under his command to begin the charge. Douglas and the conſtable, finding their advice neglected, and their authority deſpiſed, had now no other concern but how to periſh as honeſt men and brave ſoldiers, as they foreſaw inevitable deſtruction muſt be the conſequence of this headlong raſhneſs in their troops *.

The Engliſh were that day commanded by the duke of Bedford in the rear, with the earls of Saliſbury and Suffolk on the wings; the regent had ordered all his horſe to diſmount, and placed between the main body and camp, which was the rear, forming round them a kind of barricade with the carriages of the army: in this poſition he waited the attack of the French. Before theſe latter came in ſight of the Engliſh, their breath and ſpirits were almoſt exhauſted; their generals in vain made an attempt to form them into ſome kind of order, they ſtill refuſed to liſten to any advice, and the French and Scots ſeemed to vie with each other in ruſhing forward to their own deſtruction.

Notwithſtanding this diſorder, their attack was ſo furious that a body of their horſe on the right wing broke the oppoſite wing of the Engliſh, and advanced as far as the barricade which ſurrounded the horſes, behind which was placed a body of archers, which received them with ſo terrible a diſcharge, as obliged them to wheel round and give back; while thoſe that were poſted upon the hill ſo overwhelmed the Italians, who were marching up in another line, that they betook themſelves to flight in the very beginning of the battle, leaving the Scots and French to ſtand the whole brunt of the fight. This gave the body of reſerve an opportunity of forming themſelves, and advancing to the ſupport of the main battle, where the fight had continued with great obſtinacy for three hours, without either ſide being able to challenge the advantage; but this ſeaſonable reinforcement fixed victory entirely on the ſide of the Engliſh: the French horſe, as uſual, were driven back by the arrows of the Engliſh bow-men upon their own foot, and a dreadful ſcene of ſlaughter enſued.

Douglas and the conſtable, ſeeing their defeat inevitable, ſcorned to ſurvive the diſgrace, and ruſhing into the thickeſt of the fight, fell in the midſt of their enemies. Beſides theſe two great generals, the headſtrong Narbonne, author of this their fatal overthrow, the ſon of earl Douglas, the counts of Aumale, Ventadour, and de Tonnerre, the lords Grandville, Manni, Gamaches, and Guitri, with many of Charles's beſt French and Scottiſh officers, and a vaſt number of private gentlemen, with a thouſand common ſoldiers, lay dead upon the field of battle; while the duke of Alençon, the baſtard his brother, the marſhal de la Fayette, and the lords Gaucourt and Mortemar, were taken priſoners. Nor did the Engliſh obtain a bloodleſs victory; they loſt about ſeventeen hundred of their beſt men, who were left dead upon the ſpot, and among them ſome officers of diſtinction *. The day after this victory Vernueil ſurrendered to the conquerors; and there being no longer any army to oppoſe the Engliſh in the field, they made themſelves maſters, one after another, of the ſtrong fortreſſes of Rambouillet, Mayenne le Juhez, Vitry en Patrois, and la Ferté Bernard, with other places in the neighbourhood.

The ſituation of Charles VII. was now deplorable: he had loſt the braveſt of his troops, and the flower of his nobility, by the late fatal defeat: his party was diſpirited; he had ſcarce money ſufficient for the common neceſſaries of life, much leſs to pay an army; and he could raiſe none from among his ſubjects, without cauſing a general diſcontent, which, in his preſent circumſtances, it was in a particular manner his intereſt to avoid. We may form ſome idea of his diſtreſs from what the French hiſtorians tell us, that he was reduced to make the ſilver mark paſs for ninety livres in the places ſubject to his command, inſtead of half a livre, which it was formerly worth. But at the very time that his affairs ſeemed beyond the poſſibility of being reſtored, fortune, or rather Providence, that preſcribes bounds to all mortal grandeur and depreſſion, interfered in his behalf. The duke of Bedford was called off from purſuing his victory, by the neceſſity he found himſelf under of meeting the duke of Burgundy at Paris, in order to try at accommodating matters between the dukes of Brabant and Gloceſter, which laſt had landed about that time, with a ſtrong army of Engliſh at Calais, from whence he had marched and taken poſſeſſion of the chief towns of Hainault, on the following occaſion.

Jaquelina, daughter of William V. duke of Bavaria, and heireſs of Holland, Zealand, and Frieſland, had been married to John, dauphin of France; and, after his death, compelled by his mother to wed the duke of Brabant, whoſe perſon ſhe deteſted. Indeed this averſion ſeems to have been reciprocal; and after they had lived together for ſome time, in continual diſſention, ſhe made an elopement to England, where ſhe was hoſpitably received by the late king, and through his mediation, applied to the pope for a divorce; but as this could not be obtained, ſhe gave her hand to the duke of Gloceſter, by virtue of a licence from the anti-pope Benedict, and the nuptials had been celebrated in England with great ſolemnity, ſoon after the acceſſion of the preſent king. It was about the end of October this year, that the duke of Gloceſter carried over his conſort, with an army of five thouſand men, to take poſſeſſion of her hereditary eſtates.

This marriage was, indeed, univerſally conſidered as a glaring outrage upon juſtice and decency; but the duke of Brabant, huſband of this lady, muſt have been leſs than man not to have reſented this double injury, both to his honour and property. Accordingly, he not only put himſelf in a poſture of defence, but applied to the duke of Burgundy for aſſiſtance. This prince who thought no other than that the duke of Gloceſter was come over with troops to reinforce his brother the regent, was not a little ſurprized when he heard that the duke had traverſed his dominions, and that all the towns of Hainault had ſubmitted, and taken the oath of allegiance to him and Jaquelina; and reſolved to ſuccour the injured duke of Brabant to the utmoſt of his power: however, unwilling to come to a rupture with the duke of Bedford, whom he knew to be ſtrongly connected with his brother of Gloceſter, he deſired a meeting with the former, at Paris, in order to engage him to interfere his good offices, and even authority, to prevail with the duke of Gloceſter to deſiſt from his unjuſt purſuit. The regent readily agreed, and an interview was held at Amiens, between the four dukes, in which the regent laboured to perſuade Gloceſter to agree to an accommodation, or at leaſt a ceſſation of arms, till he could be ſupported with the united ſtrength of France and England: but the latter, blinded by love and ambition, was deaf to all remonſtrances, ſo that the conferences were broke up entirely through his obſtinacy.

The duke of Burgundy, juſtly irritated at the behaviour of the duke of Gloceſter, put a ſtop to the career of his own ſucceſſes againſt the French king, that he might the better check the progreſs of the other; and he was continually at war, either in Hainault, Zealand, or Holland, againſt the partizans of Jaquelina and the Engliſh ſuccours ſent her, till the year 1426, the repeated endeavours of Bedford not having been able in all that time to bring his brother Gloceſter to reaſon, though the parliament had earneſtly recommended an accommodation. To make matters ſtill worſe, the duke of Gloceſter, thinking his honour injured by ſome expreſſions that the duke of Burgundy had let fall in the heat of his paſſion, ſent to challenge him to ſingle combat, and the very day was appointed; but the matter never came to that iſſue. Thoſe differences, however, threw a total damp upon the Engliſh affairs in France, which the regent duke ſaw with the utmoſt concern, but without being able to remedy the evil: for by Gloceſter's employing the forces, which ſhould have been ſent to reinforce his brother Bedford, in his wars in Flanders, and the army of the latter being moſtly divided among a great number of caſtles and towns, which he was obliged to garriſon, he found himſelf diſabled from proſecuting his conqueſts. Thus, by the obſtinacy and ambition of the duke of Gloceſter, and his ducheſs, the Engliſh intereſt in France, after the battle of Vernueil, was able to make no great effort for puſhing the war over the Loire.

In this dilemma the regent duke reſolved to paſs over to England, in order, if poſſible, to put matters upon ſuch a footing as to be inſured of a better ſupply for carrying on the war in France. His preſence was likewiſe neceſſary for compoſing ſome differences which had ariſen among the miniſtry here: the biſhop of Wincheſter, who was a prelate of great capacity and experience, but of a turbulent overbearing diſpoſition, had quarrelled with the duke of Gloceſter, and their diſpute threatned ſome ſerious conſequences; nay, the duke of Gloceſter had gone ſo far as to draw up a ſet of articles by way of impeachment againſt the biſhop. The regent duke hoped, by his preſence and authority, to quiet theſe jealouſies and diſtractions, and accordingly prepared for his voyage.

* By the report of Montjoy, French king at arms, and the Engliſh heralds then preſent, there were ſlain of French and Scots nine thouſand ſeven hundred, and of the Engliſh two thouſand one hundred: two hundred gentlemen, beſides many common ſoldiers, were taken priſoners. This battle, which Rapin, Carte, and others place on the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth of Auguſt, is ſaid by Hall to have been fought on the twenty-ſeventh of that month. Hall, p. 90.

But before he left France, he gave orders to the earl of Saliſbury to make freſh attempts for reducing all places which held for the French king in Maine and Anjou. Accordingly that nobleman, aſſiſted by the lord Scales, ſir John Montgomery, and ſir John Faſtolf, putting himſelf at the head of the few troops that could be ſpared, had for ſome time ſurprizing ſucceſs: the conſternation of the French, after their late defeat, was ſuch, that they gave up, almoſt without reſiſtance, the ſtrong caſtles of Beaumont le Vicomte, Teune, Sally, Oſce, Rouſie, Vaſce, and about twenty more, in leſs than a month. At laſt, the earl laid ſiege to Mans itſelf, the principal city of the province, and being provided with a dreadful train of artillery for thoſe days, he ſoon obliged the garriſon to capitulate. The taking of this place was attended with great advantages to the Engliſh, and opened the way for the conqueſt of St. Suſanne, the inhabitants of which were obliged to pay two hundred thouſand crowns, barely to have their lives ſpared.

In the courſe of this year, ſir John Mortimer, uncle to Edmund, earl of Marche, having been ſome time priſoner in the Tower, was charged with attempting to make his eſcape, in order to raiſe an inſurrection in Wales. It was pretended that his deſign was to proclaim the earl of Marche, his nephew, or, upon his refuſal, to proclaim himſelf. Whether his crime was proved, or it was thought proper to make away with a perſon who, in caſe he had eſcaped, might have done miſchief, he was condemned and executed *.

The earl of Marche, his nephew, did not long ſurvive him: he died in Ireland about the latter end of the year, without iſſue. By his death the title of earl of Marche, and his right to the crown of England, from which he was excluded by the election of Henry IV. deſcended to Richard Plantagenet, his nephew, ſon of Anne his ſiſter, and the earl of Cambridge, beheaded at Southampton, in the beginning of the reign of Henry V. This young nobleman, who was at this time under age, was afterwards created duke of York, as will be ſeen in its place †.

In April, 1425, a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, partly with a view to accommodate matters between the biſhop of Wincheſter and his brother of Gloceſter, who, in conſequence of a ſhort truce made with the duke of Brabant, had come over to England, leaving his ducheſs Jaquelina behind him, in Mons, whoſe citizens had engaged themſelves by a ſolemn oath to guard her ſafely with their lives. The biſhop of Wincheſter had gained ſo great an aſcendency in England, by the abſence of the duke, that he was in this parliament made chancellor, in the room of the biſhop of Durham, and opened the ſeſſion in that quality: at the ſame time ſir Thomas Nawton was choſen ſpeaker for the houſe of commons.

In this parliament a fierce diſpute happened between John Mowbray, earl-marſhal, and Richard, earl of Warwick, about precedency: this affair was very puzzling and intricate; but the earl-marſhal demanding to be reſtored in blood to the dukedom of Norfolk, the ſame was granted, which of conſequence gave him the precedency over his antagoniſt.

This difference, however, was but of ſmall importance compared to that which was daily increaſing between the duke of Gloceſter and the biſhop of Wincheſter, and was near producing a civil war, inſomuch that the parliament found itſelf under a neceſſity of renewing the antient writs for prohibiting any perſon repairing in arms to the houſe during the ſeſſion, which with ſome few adjournments continued to the end of the year. Notwithſtanding this prohibition, the violent party-men, though they laid aſide their arms, furniſhed themſelves with clubs or batts, and had frequent rencounters, which as frequently ended in blood: for this reaſon this parliament was called the Parliament of Batts.

Notwithſtanding theſe private feuds, this ſeſſion diſtinguiſhed itſelf by its zeal for the glory of the infant king: all the neceſſary ſupplies were voted, and many ſalutary acts paſſed for the advancement of commerce, the improvement of agriculture, and other matters conducive to the eaſe and benefit of the ſubjects, all which will be found under the head of Laws belonging to this period.

Towards the latter end of this year, and not before, the duke of Bedford arrived in England; and taking upon him the charge of protector, by his authority put a ſtop to the fatal quarrels that had diſturbed the peace of the realm: he at firſt endeavoured to effect a reconciliation between the duke and the biſhop; but finding his own influence inſufficient for that purpoſe, he perſuaded them to ſubmit their diſpute to the deciſion of parliament; and, after the matter had been fully diſcuſſed, they were both obliged to promiſe before that reſpectable body, to bury all their quarrels in utter oblivion: this did not happen till the month of March, in the following year. But it is now time to reſume the affairs of France, and trace thoſe cauſes which brought about the total decay of the Engliſh power there.

Whilſt the war in Hainault was carrying on between the partizans of Jaquelina and thoſe of the duke of Brabant, her former huſband, aſſiſted by the duke of Burgundy, which ſuſpended all military operations in France, Charles was not an indolent ſpectator of theſe events: he reſolved to improve this lucky diverſion to his own advantage, and he could think of no method ſo effectual as that of detaching the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany from their alliance with the Engliſh. He knew that the former had openly broke with the duke of Gloceſter, and that the other was wholly under the influence of his brother, the count de Richemont, who entertained a ſecret diſlike to the duke of Bedford, for having refuſed him the command of the allied army during his abſence in England, and conferred that poſt on the earl of Warwick. Charles was likewiſe encouraged and aſſiſted in this ſcheme by ſome accidents which fell out about the time we are ſpeaking of, and of which the following may ſerve as a conciſe account.

The duke of Burgundy had lately married Bona of Artois, widow of the earl of Nevers, and ſiſter to the count of Eu, who ſtill remained a priſoner in England, and half-ſiſter to the count of Clermont, princes zealouſly attached to the Valois family: moreover, the duke of Burgundy had procured a bull from pope Martin V. which not only annulled the contract of Jaquelina with the duke of Gloceſter, but likewiſe declared, that, even in caſe of the duke of Brabant's death, it ſhould never be lawful for her to marry an Engliſh nobleman. Gloceſter, thus diſappointed in his hopes, eſpouſed another lady, of inferior quality, named Eleanor Cobham, daughter to Reginald lord Cobham, of Sterborough, who had been his miſtreſs: the news of this coming to the ears of Jaquelina, ſhe threw herſelf entirely upon the protection of the duke of Burgundy, and even put on the appearance of a reconciliation with her huſband, the duke of Brabant; and he dying ſhortly after, ſhe appointed the duke of Burgundy her heir, in caſe ſhe died without male iſſue, and promiſed never to marry without his conſent. The great acceſſion of dominion likely to fall to him by this compact, as it alarmed the Engliſh, ſo it not a little raiſed the duke's idea of his own conſequence; and the quarrel between him and the duke of Gloceſter ſtill rankling at his heart, he affected on all occaſions to treat the Engliſh with a ſuperciliouſneſs which they could not bear, and which gave riſe to frequent diſputes, ſo that it was eaſy to foretel that a total diſſolution of their alliance might be brought about without a miracle.

Charles was not wanting, by his intrigues and emiſſaries, to make the moſt of appearances ſo favourable to his intereſt: he knew, as we have already obſerved, that the count de Richemont was incenſed againſt the duke of Bedford; he was likewiſe well acquainted with the pride and vanity of the count, which he took care to flatter in the manner moſt likely to gain him. The ſtaff of conſtable of France had not been diſpoſed of, ſince the earl of Buchan's death, and Charles thought it the moſt proper bait he could lay before the count's eyes, at the ſame time cauſing him to be told how great an eſteem he had for him, and that he ſhould deem himſelf invincible if he had him at the head of his army. This was attacking Richemont in the moſt ſenſible part; he now thought he had a glorious opportunity of triumphing over the duke of Bedford, who had ſo ſcornfully refuſed him the firſt command in his abſence: in a word, he yielded to the ſolicitations of Charles's emiſſaries; he accepted of the conſtable's ſtaff, and even undertook to bring over his brother, the duke of Brittany, to the intereſt of Charles, provided that prince would baniſh from his councils Louvet, one of the principal authors of the Penthievrian confederacy againſt the duke.

Charles accordingly declared him conſtable of France; and next ſet about ſounding the duke of Burgundy, on whom he thought he ſhould eaſily prevail, conſidering how highly he was exaſperated againſt the Engliſh government, for ſupporting the duke of Gloceſter in the affair of Hainault; but in the courſe of theſe negociations the French monarch found that the duke, notwithſtanding his reſentments againſt Gloceſter and the Engliſh in general, had not ſo entirely forgotten his father's aſſaſſaſſination, as to liſten readily to propoſals from the author of his murder; and the biſhops of Puy and Chartres, who had been ſent by Charles with a carte blanche to the duke of Burgundy, could make very little impreſſion upon him: in vain did they plead that Charles was innocent of the blood of his father; or that, if he had any knowlege of, or part in it, his youth at that time was to be conſidered, and that he had been under the guidance of evil counſellors, by whoſe pernicious advice he had been miſled againſt his own ſentiments. The duke returned no other anſwer to theſe excuſes, only that when the king ſhould have given proof of his diſapprobation of that act, by removing from his preſence thoſe evil counſellors, or others who had availed themſelves of his authority to perpetrate it, that it would then be a proper time to talk of accommodations. This anſwer, however, carried with it a kind of inſinuation that he was not inexorable, eſpecially as he had already conſented to the count de Richemont's acceptance of the office of conſtable.

Charles, however, was not a little perplexed how to act on this occaſion: the obnoxious perſons, Tannegui de Chatel and Louvet, had ſacrificed all conſiderations to his ſervice; and he thought he could not, without great ingratitude, give them up to the power of their enemies. Tannegui, however, with a noble fidelity, reſolved to rid his maſter of his embarraſſment, and inſiſted upon quitting his court, and retiring to end his life in ſome remote corner of the world. Charles could not, without great reluctance, comply with his requeſt; but knowing that his affairs were inevitably ruined, if he could not effect a reconciliation with the dukes of Brittany and Burgundy, both of whom were implacably irritated againſt the two favourites, he at length yielded to neceſſity, and diſmiſſed Tannegui de Chatelet to the government of Boquere; but Louvet, deaf to all conſiderations but that of his own intereſt, clung as cloſe to his poſts as if he had reſolved that his own fall ſhould bring along with it that of his maſter; he even inſinuated to Charles, that the views of the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany were no other but to amuſe him with falſe appearances, and at length deliver him up to the Engliſh. Diſtreſs is ever ſuſpicious; Charles began to think himſelf betrayed, and took ſuch ſteps in conſequence of this falſe notion inſpired into him by the ſelf-intereſted favourite, as muſt have brought inſtant deſtruction upon him, had not all the noblemen of his party, by a ſeaſonable boldneſs, declared that they would abandon him to a man, if he neglected the only means in his power of making the two dukes his friends. Unable to withſtand theſe diſpoſitions, and, perhaps, ſhamed into compliance by the generous example of Tannegui, Louvet at laſt retired into Provence; and the conſtable de Richemont, having gotten rid of a perſon ſo obnoxious to him, performed his promiſe in bringing over his brother, the duke of Brittany, who came and did homage to Charles at Saumur, for his duchy and for the earldom of Montfort, on the ſeventh of October, 1425; and at the ſame time concluded a treaty with him, whereby he engaged to aſſiſt him in driving out the Engliſh from France, upon the following conditions: 1. That Charles ſhould be reconciled to the princes of the blood, particularly to the duke of Burgundy. 2. That he ſhould deſiſt from proſecuting the earl of Penthievre. 3. That the duke of Brittany ſhould have the adminiſtration of the finances in the Languedoit, that is, the country between the Loire and Languedoc: but this was proviſionally, in caſe the duke of Burgundy could not be brought to break with the Engliſh likewiſe *.

The duke of Bedford perceiving the untowardly turn the Engliſh affairs were taking in France, haſtened his departure for England, that, by removing all animoſities there, he might direct the united efforts of all parties againſt their common enemies. He no ſooner arrived, than ſummoning a parliament, he laid before them the perfidy of the court of Brittany, as he choſe to term their conduct, and gave it as his opinion, that the only method to prevent the duke of Burgundy from purſuing the ſame meaſures, was to declare war againſt the Bretons, and to puſh it with the utmoſt vigour. This advice of the regent was unanimouſly approved; and, early in the year 1426, it was agreed by the parliament to declare open war againſt the duke of Brittany. In what manner the regent duke quieted the animoſities between his brother and uncle, we have ſhewn already, and therefore ſhall only obſerve that the biſhop ſeemed ſtill to retain ſome ſentiments of diſguſt, as we find him in this parliament deſiring to be diſcharged of his office of lord chancellor, which was accordingly done, and the great-ſeal was delivered to the biſhop of London.

In the mean while the earl of Warwick, who had been left governor of France during the abſence of the regent duke, took the field in perſon, notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon, and, laying ſiege to Pont Orſon, carried it by aſſault, and afterwards took and fortified the town of St. Jaques de Beauvron, where he fixed his head-quarters, and from thence terribly ravaged the adjacent country, up to the very gates of Rennes. But the conſtable de Richemont, having gotten together an army of twenty thouſand men, put himſelf at their head, and, entering Brittany, beſieged and took Pont Orſon, the earl of Warwick not daring to oppoſe him, on account of his great inferiority of numbers, contented himſelf with calling in all his detachments, and ſhut himſelf up in Beauvron with his little army, amounting to no more than eight thouſand men. The conſtable now thought he was at the eve of gaining great honour, and giving a mortal blow to the Engliſh intereſt by taking this place with the earl ſhut up therein; this he propoſed to do by blockade, from a perſuaſion that ſo numerous a garriſon muſt ſoon be ſtarved into a ſurrender. But de Giac, who had ſucceeded Louvet in his place in the king's councils, and had a hatred to the conſtable, neglecting to ſend him the neceſſary ſupplies of men and money, Richemont deſpaired of effecting his purpoſe; yet, mad with the thought of being baffled in his firſt campaign, he raſhly reſolved upon a general aſſault, but the garriſon made ſo brave a reſiſtance, that he was beaten back to his camp, and the beſieged, obſerving the diſorder of his ranks, ſallied out, and, falling upon them in the rear, put them to flight with great ſlaughter, taking all their baggage and artillery. The conſtable was almoſt at his wits end at this diſgrace; he vowed the ſevereſt revenge againſt de Giac, whom he looked upon as the author of it, which he ſoon after found means to effect, by cauſing that miniſter to be ſtrangled and thrown into the Loire. However, he found means after his late defeat to get together the ſcattered remains of his army, which he led into Anjou, and made himſelf maſter of la Flêche and Galerande belonging to the Engliſh.

All this while the regent duke was acting the part of a great and wiſe prince in England, by endeavouring at a reconciliation of all parties. With this view, having effected an apparent reconciliation between his brother and uncle, he next procured Richard Plantagenet, ſon of the late earl of Cambridge, to be reſtored to the honours and eſtates of the late duke of York, his deceaſed uncle, and to the honours and eſtates of the earldoms of Ulſter, Marche, and Rutland, belonging to the Mortimer family: at the ſame time this young lord, with twenty-one other noblemen, together with young king Henry himſelf, received the honour of knighthood from the hands of the protector.

The earl of Warwick ſeeing that the conſtable's defeat before Beauvron, the deſertion of his troops, and the broils in Charles's council had diſabled the French from appearing with any numbers in the field, formed a deſign of making himſelf maſter of Montargis, the poſſeſſion of which place would greatly facilitate the regent's intentions of carrying the war on the other ſide of the Loire: the earl accordingly ſat down before it with a ſmall but well-provided army, and was aſſiſted in his operations by the earl of Suffolk and his brother, John de la Pole, both experienced officers; and they had taken their meaſures ſo well, that the place was reduced to the laſt extremity, when the baſtard of Orleans, afterwards the famous count de Dunois, reſolved to march to its relief. This officer was not then above three-and-twenty years of age, but had ſerved with vaſt reputation in eight campaigns. He was natural ſon of that duke of Orleans who was aſſaſſinated by the duke of Burgundy, and had been bred to the church; but the good genius of France had ſo ordained it, that he had changed an eccleſiaſtic for a military habit. With a body of no more than ſixteen hundred men, this gallant young leader ventured to approach the Engliſh camp, and, with his handful of troops, made ſo furious an attack upon the enemy, who knew nothing of his approach, that he not only forced his way into the place, but even gave ſuch a ſevere blow to the Engliſh, as obliged the earl of Warwick to abandon the ſiege. This was the firſt action which diſcovered the great military genius of Dunois, and laid the foundation of that high character which he afterwards attained. However, the earl of Warwick loſt neither credit nor power by this misfortune; for we find that about this time he was nominated to ſucceed the duke of Exeter, deceaſed this year, as governor to the king; but he reſided long after this in France.

But the regent Bedford, who returned to France in the beginning of the following year, 1427, ſoon after his arrival, reſtored the honour of the Engliſh arms by an important enterprize, which he accompliſhed with a ſucceſs equal to the wiſdom with which he had planned it.

Having privately aſſembled a numerous army on the frontiers of Brittany, he fell ſo unexpectedly into that province, that the duke, unable to ſtop his progreſs, and the duke of Burgundy ſtill refuſing to declare himſelf againſt the Engliſh, the former was glad to comply with all the terms which the enemy thought proper to preſcribe; and, after having ſeen his territories waſted with fire and ſword during the whole ſummer, he at length conſented to an interview with the regent duke, and, on the eighth of September, a treaty was ſigned between them, by which the duke of Brittany not only returned to his old engagements with the Engliſh, but alſo ſigned the treaty of Troye, acknowleged the duke of Bedford for regent of France, and engaged to pay homage to the king of England for his duchy of Brittany, in the ſame manner as his predeceſſors and he himſelf had uſed to pay it to the kings of France †.

The regent duke juſtly looked upon this treaty as a great acquiſition; he now ſaw himſelf delivered from a troubleſome enemy, who lay behind him; he next reſolved to make himſelf maſter of Pont Orſon, the only place which now ſtood in the way of his carrying the war beyond the Loire; beſides, being in the hands of the French (for the reader may remember, that this place had ſome time before been taken by the conſtable de Richemont), it gave them an inlet into the dominions of the duke of Brittany, whom he now conſidered as his ally. Accordingly he ſat down before it, but met with a very vigorous reſiſtance, till at length the earl of Warwick coming to his aſſiſtance with ſeven thouſand men, he obliged the place to capitulate, and made the lords Rois and Talbot governors of the ſame, the latter of whom had lately diſtinguiſhed himſelf in recovering the town of Mons, which had been taken by treachery by the count de Foix, who was very near making the earl of Suffolk, who commanded therein, priſoner, had he not retired in time to the citadel; but Talbot arriving with a reinforcement, the French were driven out of the place with great loſs.

The regent duke, encouraged by his ſucceſſes, determined to attempt an undertaking, which, if crowned with like ſucceſs, would give a fatal blow to the affairs of Charles, and pave the way for the final reduction of France. With this view, after committing the care of the army to the earl of Warwick, he ſet out for Paris, there to concert the operations of the great expedition he meditated.

The biſhop of Wincheſter had by this time got himſelf dignified with the title of cardinal, which put him under the court of Rome's particular protection, and the pope having alſo inveſted him with a legatine power, his credit was ſo increaſed, that he had greater ſway in parliament than ever. The duke of Gloceſter, notwithſtanding the late ſeeming reconciliation, could not without jealouſy behold ſo much weight given to the cardinal; and ſome reflections which the latter threw out againſt his authority, as if he was no more than a ſubſtitute to the duke of Bedford, nettled Gloceſter ſo much that he made an attempt, in a parliament which was held this year, to increaſe his authority, either by change of his title into that of regent, agreeable to the declaration of the late king on his death-bed, or by getting ſome new powers annexed to his office of protector, but without ſucceſs; for, after deliberating upon the requeſt of the duke, the lords declared and ſigned the following reſolution, which was delivered to him in form:

"That he ought not to have been protector; notwithſtanding, to ſatisfy his deſire, it was granted that he ſhould be protector, and have farther power, as in anno 1 Hen. VI. The which name of protector, or defender, importeth only a perſonal duty of attendance to the actual defence of the realm againſt foreign enemies and inward rebels; and not any ſpecial government, as properly belongeth to tutors, lieutenants, governors, or regents; for if they had otherwiſe meant, they then would have expreſſed more whereby (i. e. by the office of protector) in council, as privy-counſellor, he had preeminence; but in parliament he had no other place than as duke of Gloceſter; ſo as they wiſhed him to ſupply his place in parliament, and to be content with the power aforeſaid, for the other they would not grant *."

We find little elſe remarkable in this parliament, which was held at Weſtminſter the thirteenth day of October, except an act which paſſed, that knights of the ſhire, who, in caſe of an undue election, were, by 11 Hen. IV. to loſe their wages, and ſheriffs who, making a falſe return, were, by the ſame ſtatute, to pay an hundred pounds, ſhould be permitted to have their anſwer and traverſe to offices before any juſtices of aſſize ‡.

It was towards the cloſe of this year that the affair of Jaquelina and Hainault was terminated by that lady's giving herſelf and dominions up to the duke of Burgundy, in the manner we have already related. The duke of Bedford had all along formed the deſign of attacking Charles in the provinces beyond the Loire, which had as yet felt nothing of the ravages of the war; but the quarrel between the dukes of Burgundy and Gloceſter had forced him to ſuſpend its execution: that diſpute being now determined, and the war of Hainault at an end, he knew that all the ſtrength of England might be united for the conqueſt of France, which ſeemed the more eaſy as Charles had not one body of troops in the field, and had lately given himſelf up to the pleaſures of indolence in the arms of a beautiful miſtreſs, named Agnes Sorel, as if he had laid aſide all thoughts of oppoſing the progreſs of the enemy.

The duke of Bedford therefore aſſembled the ſtates at Paris early in the year 1428, and propoſed to them the laying ſiege to Orleans, the taking of which would cover all the places on this ſide the Loire, whilſt thoſe beyond that river would be open to the ravages of the Engliſh. This enterprize was unanimouſly appproved, and it was reſolved to carry it into execution as ſoon as the earl of Saliſbury ſhould arrive with the ſupplies which were daily expected from England ‖. It was near Midſummer, however, before that nobleman came over with thoſe troops, which amounted to eight thouſand, and, with the forces already in France, were thought ſufficient to effect the conqueſt they meditated. Upon the arrival of the earl of Saliſbury, the earl of Warwick departed for England, to take upon him the education of the king.

The

The arrival of the earl of Saliſbury gave prodigious ſpirits to the Engliſh party in France, and the regent duke immediately committed the management of the enterprize againſt Orleans to his care, who began his march from Paris with a body of ſixteen thouſand men, about the latter end of July, attended by the earl of Suffolk, the lord Talbot, ſir John Faſtolf, with other excellent officers. He immediately advanced through the county of Beauſſe, and made himſelf maſter of all the towns which lay in his way to Orleans ‡, and ſat down before that place on the twelfth of October, upon the ſide of Sologne, having paſſed the Loire at Beaugenci.

The French eaſily perceived, by all the Engliſh general's motions, that he meditated the ſiege of Orleans; accordingly, whilſt he was employed in reducing the places he found in his route, they exerted their utmoſt endeavours to provide for the ſafety of this important city; and, above all, the count de Gaucourt, an officer of great courage and conſummate experience, inviolably attached to the Orleans family, was appointed to defend it. Many other officers of diſtinction threw themſelves into the place; the troops which they brought with them, were accuſtomed to war, and familiar with dangers, and even the citizens had acquired that military turn which was ſo much the mode of the age, and were thereby extremely well qualified to aſſiſt the regular forces in the defence of the place: add to this, that they burnt with reſentment againſt the Engliſh, for making their maſter, the duke of Orleans, ſuffer ſo ſtrict, ſo long, and ſo rigorous a captivity. Many new fortifications were raiſed, and the old ones put in repair; and we are told by Monſtrelet, that they pulled down all the moſt conſiderable buildings in the ſuburbs, and among the reſt twelve churches and ſeveral monaſteries, that the Engliſh might not make uſe of them in carrying on the ſiege. The eyes of all Europe were fixed upon this important object, as it was commonly imagined that the French would exert their utmoſt efforts in ſupporting the rights of their king and the independency of their kingdom.

The firſt operation of the Engliſh † was againſt a bulwark, which the beſieged had raiſed in order to cover the little caſtle of Tourelles, which defended the head of their bridge over the Loire. This bulwark was attempted by mine; but the Engliſh perceiving they were countermined, their general, the earl of Saliſbury, deſiſted from that way of proceeding, and prepared to attach the bulwark with his cannon: theſe ſoon ruined all the parapets, and a breach being made ſufficiently large, the Engliſh prepared to ſtorm it: the French, on the other hand, ſenſible of the importance of the place, defended it with ſurprizing courage, and the earl of Saliſbury ordered a retreat to be ſounded, leaving two hundred and fifty of his beſt troops dead before the breach. This repulſe, however, ſerved only to increaſe the vigour of the beſiegers; they continued their batteries with ſuch inceſſant fury, that, on the twenty-third of October, the place, being no longer tenable, was abandoned by the French, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of it the next day. The beſieged, apprehenſive of this event, had erected a new fort between the Tourelles and the town, and had demoliſhed ſome arches of the bridge between them, leaving only ſome beams of timber to ſerve for a communication.

The Engliſh having made themſelves maſters of the Tourelles, erected four great towers, two above the bridge and two below, upon the banks of the Loire, from whence they battered the city itſelf. But all this time the place was inveſted only upon the ſide of Sologne, and all acceſs to it on the ſide of Beauſſe was ſtill open; by this ſide, two days after the taking of the Tourelles, the baſtard of Orleans found means to throw himſelf into the city with a reinforcement of eight hundred men, accompanied by la Hire and ſeveral other gallant adventurers; and the Engliſh not being numerous enough to encompaſs the city, it was continually receiving reinforcements, inſomuch that the garriſon, which originally conſiſted of twelve hundred men, was, by the latter end of December, augmented to three thouſand. In order to deprive the town of all poſſibility of receiving future ſuccours in this manner, the earl of Saliſbury ordered ſixty ſmall forts or redoubts to be built around it; but whilſt he was taking a view of the ſeveral ſpots moſt proper to erect them on, a ſtone diſcharged from a cannon of the city took away half his face with the right eye. He was immediately carried to Melun, and died there on the third of November, univerſally regretted by the army, who thought themſelves invincible while under his command. After his death numbers deſerted, and returned to England. Thus fell the gallant Thomas Montacute, earl of Saliſbury: he was the lineal deſcendant of Montacute, the favourite general of Edward III. and died without male iſſue, leaving only one daughter, married to Richard Neville, third ſon of the earl of Weſtmoreland, afterwards created earl of Saliſbury in right of his wife*.

The death of this nobleman was a great loſs to the Engliſh; for though they were in no want of able generals, they had few ſo well experienced in the art of attacking and defending places. However, the ſiege continued to be carried on with great vigour under the direction of the earl of Suffolk, who now took the command, aſſiſted by the renowned Talbot, one of the greateſt captains which that age produced: but as it would be tedious to relate all the particulars of this ſiege, the attacks, ſallies, and daily ſkirmiſhes, either to introduce or repulſe convoys, I ſhall therefore content myſelf with obſerving in general, that, on the twenty-firſt of December, a freſh reinforcement of Engliſh and Burgundian troops, to the amount of eight thouſand, arrived to inveſt the city on the ſide of Beauſſe, and took poſt in the ſuburbs; nevertheleſs, the army of the beſiegers was not yet numerous enough to encompaſs the whole extent of ſo large a place, and the forts which had been erected in conſequence of the earl of Saliſbury's plan, were at ſuch a diſtance from each other as ſtill allowed the enemy to introduce into the place ſuccours of men with large quantities of ammunition and proviſion, magazines of which had been prepared at Blois, in order to be thrown into the town as opportunity might offer; the count de Clermont had alſo taken up his quarters in the laſt-mentioned town *, with a large body of troops, for the greater ſecurity of their own convoys, and for intercepting thoſe of the Engliſh in their way from Paris to ſupply the army with neceſſaries.

Four months had already been ſpent in continual ſallies and engagements, when the regent ordered a convoy to ſet out from Paris, with ſalt-fiſh, herrings, and the like kind of proviſions, for the uſe of the beſiegers in Lent. This convoy was eſcorted by a guard of ſeventeen hundred men, under the command of ſir John Faſtolf, an officer of approved valour and great experience. Charles, who had come to Chinon, a town in Touraine, about twenty leagues diſtant from Orleans, that he might be nearer to this great ſcene of action, receiving intelligence of the day on which ſir John was to begin his march, ordered the count de Clermont to attack him with three thouſand men, on his road to Orleans; and that nobleman, agreeable to his orders, ſet out at the head of his party, and came in ſight of the enemy on the twelfth day of February, 1429, at Rouvrai St. Denis, in Beauſſe. Faſtolf being apprized of his approach, and knowing himſelf too weak to encounter in open field an enemy ſo much ſuperior in numbers, drew up his men behind a barricade of waggons, where they ſuſtained the firſt ſhock of the French, who attacked them with their uſual impetuoſity; but, far from being able to break through this entrenchment, they met with ſuch a warm reception as threw them into confuſion, and the Engliſh commander, ſeeing their diſorder, cauſed openings to be made in his barricado, through which his men charged the enemy before they could rally, and routed them with great carnage.

In this action, called the Battle of the Herrings, one hundred and twenty noblemen and officers of diſtinction loſt their lives, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers. The baſtard of Orleans (whom we ſhall henceforth call the count de Dunois) having received notice from Clermont of his intent to cut off this convoy, had found means to get out of Orleans, and join the count with a body of veteran troops; however, he ſecured his retreat to the town with four hundred men, in good order, accompanied by the count de Clermont.

This defeat, and the untoward face of Charles's affairs in general, had filled that monarch and his whole court with ſo great a deſpondency, that it was abſolutely propoſed in the council to abandon the Orleannois, Touraine, and Berry, and to retreat into Dauphiné: however, willing to try every expedient that was left, and had the air of practicability, he ſent Xaintrailles to the regent at Paris, to propoſe that Orleans might be ſequeſtered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy until the war ſhould be finiſhed. This propoſal being rejected by the duke of Bedford, Charles endeavoured to obtain a farther ſupply of men from Scotland. A treaty of marriage had been ſome time on foot between the eldeſt daughter of James I. of Scotland, and the young dauphin of France, Charles's ſon; and now offers were made to James, to conclude the match on any terms, provided the latter would ſend ſix thouſand men to the aſſiſtance of the loyaliſts in France; but James, who had, ever ſince his reſtoration, been upon good terms with the Engliſh, could not be brought to do any thing till the truce with England was expired. Much about the ſame time Charles's court ſeems to have renewed its negociation with the duke of Burgundy, in hopes of detaching him from the intereſt of England; but that prince was not to be then prevailed on to liſten to their propoſals.

Charles, thus baffled in every attempt to ward off the impending blow which threatened the loſs of his crown and dignity, actually laid aſide all thoughts of farther oppoſition, when his affairs were ſuddenly reſtored by the ſtrangeſt and moſt unlooked-for revolution ever recorded in hiſtory.

In the village of Domremi, or, as Rapin calls it, Dompré, near Vaucoleurs, on the borders of Lorraine, lived a luſty ſtout virago of a girl, about twenty-ſeven years of age, named Joan d'Arc, who was ſervant in a ſmall inn; and, being of a maſculine turn, uſed to take care of the horſes, and ride them to water, and do many other offices of that kind, which are generally performed by the oſtler. It is allowed on all hands, that the girl's character for chaſtity remained wholly unimpeached. She poſſeſſed a genius ſuperior to moſt in her claſs of life. Baudicourt, governor of Vaucoleurs, having ſeen and converſed with this girl, probably thought her properly qualified for acting the part of a divine miſſionary, and raiſe the drooping ſpirits of the French, naturally of a ſuperſtitious diſpoſition, and, in their preſent ſituation, eager to catch at any thing that promiſed ſafety, and to embrace even the moſt diſtant proſpect of aſſiſtance and relief from the ſucceſsful arms of the Engliſh. This girl having been a proper time in training, and Charles and his court having been apprized of the part ſhe was to play, Baudicourt ſent her to that prince, who was then at Chinon. Care was taken, however, to prepare the way for her reception among the people, by ſpreading the moſt amazing ſtories of he ſupernatural knowledge, intrepidity, virtue, and other qualifications never yet found in a mortal, eſpecially one of her ſex. Charles, on his ſide, being informed that Joan was upon the road, declared that Mary of Avignon, a nun and reputed ſaint, had formerly told him, that Heaven would deliver France from its enemies by the arm of one of her ſex; adding, that, perhaps, this girl was the perſon deſigned by Heaven. The opinion of a king is generally that of his courtiers, at leaſt outwardly ſo; the complaiſant infection catches, and each ſubordinate claſs thinks, or appears to think, like its ſuperiors; ſo that every one of the loyal party ſeemed to be ſatisfied before-hand, that Joan of Arc had a miraculous call in their behalf. This will clearly account for the moſt ſurprizing parts of the following relation.

When ſhe arrived at Chinon, which was about the latter end of March, 1429, ſhe appeared at court in a man's dreſs, and was received there in the manner moſt proper to favour the deceit. Being required to give an account of herſelf, and upon what foundation ſhe built her belief of being divinely commiſſioned, ſhe made no other reply than by immediately diſcovering to the king a ſecret known only to himſelf and his favourite miſtreſs, Agnes Sorel. The whole court appeared ſtruck with amazement; and this circumſtance, ſo well calculated to ſtrike the minds of the vulgar with admiration, was carefully circulated. However Charles, willing to keep an appearance of impartiality, declared himſelf not thoroughly ſatisfied, and that he was reſolved to have her examined. The divines who had the interrogating her, declared (upon what grounds I leave the intelligent reader to judge) that her miſſion was of Heaven. After this ſhe was ſent to the parliament of Poictiers, who were of the ſame opinion. Laſtly, to put the matter beyond doubt, the king declared that ſhe had demanded of him, as the inſtrument of her future victories, a particular ſword which lay in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and which, though ſhe had never ſeen it, ſhe deſcribed with ſuch a number of circumſtances as plainly proved her ſupernatural knowlege: in a word, the affair was ſo well managed, that the French common ſoldiers, heretofore trembling at the name of the Engliſh, by whom they had been ſo often beaten, now felt themſelves revigorated; and believing that Joan of Arc, to whom they gave the name of la Pucelle, or the Maid, was ſent from God to ſave France, they gave credit to all her predictions, and were ready to ruſh into the moſt daring actions, from an aſſurance of victory; while the wench, on her ſide, kept her imagination warm by inceſſantly declaring that ſhe had been told by a celeſtial viſitor, that ſhe ſhould reliever Orleans, conduct Charles VII. to be crowned at Rheims, and deliver France from its enemies, the Engliſh*.

Thus far, as Mr. Rapin very judiciouſly obſerves, here is nothing that appears very ſtrange: it is eaſy to conceive that the whole might be a contrivance to revive the courage of the French, and perhaps of the king himſelf, diſmayed at ſo many loſſes, and beholding the kingdom ready to fall under the dominion of foreigners. But that this contrivance ſhould ſucceed according to the deſign of the authors, is what may, indeed, be juſt cauſe of admiration, and afford ample matter for moral and political reflections. But to return.

This extraordinary engine being thus prepared, it was reſolved to try its force upon the enemy. The ſword of St. Catherine was ſent for, and preſented to Joan; ſhe was armed cap à pié, mounted on a fine ſteed, and in that military garb ſuffered to harangue the troops every day. At length ſhe had the command given her of a large convoy of proviſions, for the beſieged in Orleans. A body of twelve thouſand choſen men were prepared to eſcort it; and, to manage as much as poſſible the honour of the new female military ſaint and propheteſs in the firſt enterprize, the lords of Gaucourt, Ray, and St. Severe, the admiral de Crevant, and other excellent officers were ordered to aſſiſt her; and Florentine d'Illiers, governor of Chateaudun was ſent the day before, with a party of four hundred men at arms, who got into Orleans, and gave the garriſon intelligence of the deſign. A great number of boats were prepared to waft the convoy over the Loire; and when the eſcorte drew near the town, on the ſide of Sologne, on the twenty-ninth of April, the count de Dunois made a vigorous ſally upon the Engliſh on the ſide of Beauſſe, to keep them from ſending ſuccours on the other ſide of the river, whilſt the boats were taking in the proviſions deſtined for the town. The Engliſh on that ſide were too weak to encounter ſo ſtrong a force as eſcorted the convoy, and their inaction being interpreted by the French as a terror imprinted on their minds by Heaven, to facilitate the enterprize of the Pucelle, they fell upon the Engliſh with enthuſiaſtic fury, who, after a long reſiſtance, were defeated, and obliged to ſuffer the convoy to paſs in. A natural event ſerved not a little to heighten the ſuperſtition of the French: during the whole time of the action there was a moſt violent ſtorm of thunder, lightning, and hail: it may eaſily be ſuppoſed this was taken for the voice of Heaven declaring in their favour. However, Joan made her entry into Orleans amidſt the generals, and with the repeated acclamations of the people, who aſcribed to her preſence the ſucceſs of that day.

The Maiden was now looked upon with adoration, and the French troops glowed with impatience to retrieve their honour under the auſpices of the female champion. She herſelf appears to have worked her mind into a ſtate of enthuſiaſm, and to have miſtaken the warmth of her own paſſion to render herſelf remarkable, for the impulſes of heavenly inſpiration; for, while ſhe was at Blois in her way to Orleans, ſhe ſent the following letter to the regent and the Engliſh generals, to be by them communicated to their king.

" King of England,

" Give an account to the King of Heaven for his royal blood; ſurrender up to the Virgin the keys of all the good towns which you have taken by force; ſhe is come from Heaven to vindicate the royal blood of France, and is very ready to make peace, if thou wilt ſubmit to reaſonable terms; and, as equity and juſtice require, reſtore what thou haſt taken from him. King of England, if thou wilt not do this, I am the captain of the wars; and in whatſoever part of France, I ſhall find any of the Engliſh nation, I will drive them out, whether they will or no; but if they will ſubmit, I will take them to mercy: I am come from the King of Heaven to expel you out of France; and if you will not obey, I will make ſuch a ſlaughter and ſtir among you, as hath not been theſe thouſand years in France. Believe me, the King of Heaven will give me and my forces ſuch irreſiſtible courage and ſtrength, as you ſhall not be able to oppoſe: go, in God's name, into your own country, and be not obſtinate to your own opinions, for you ſhall not hold France of the King of Heaven, the ſon of the Virgin Mary; but Charles the true heir of it, ſhall again poſſeſs it, and be king of it; for God hath given it him, and he ſhall enter Paris with a goodly train. You, William Pawlet, earl of Suffolk †; John, lord Talbot; Thomas, lord Scales, lieutenants of the duke of Bedford; and you, duke of Bedford, who calleſt thyſelf regent of the kingdom of France, be ſparing of innocent blood, and give Orleans its liberty: if you will not do juſtice to thoſe whom you have wronged, the French will do the nobleſt exploit that ever was done in Chriſtendom. Mind this wholeſome advice given you by God and his Virgin."

* Hiſtoire de Charles VII. Paſquier Recherches, liv. vi. chap. v.

† An egregious blunder in this pretended propheteſs; the earl of Suffolk's name being de la Pole.

And

And when about to begin her march for Orleans, ſhe commanded the ſoldiers to make confeſſion; and ordered a ſtandard to be made, which ſhe carried in her hand at the head of the troops, in which God the Father was repreſented graſping the globe of the earth, encompaſſed by fleurs de lis: and ſhe inſiſted, by virtue of her prophetic ſpirit, that the convoy ſhould enter Orleans on the ſide of Beauſſe; but the count of Dunois, who thought it more prudent to adhere to the rules of military art than to her inſpirations, ordered it to approach by the other ſide of the ririver, where he knew the weakeſt part of the Engliſh army was poſted. This alone is ſufficient to ſhew what the real opinion of men of rank and underſtanding in France was of Joan's divine miſſion.

However, not to let the ſpirit of the ſoldiery cool after the late event, Joan was ſent, on the fourth day of May, to attack the fort of St. Loup, which was one of thoſe the Engliſh had raiſed for the blockade of the place, and after a furious diſpute of four hours, carried it ſword in hand, againſt a garriſon of twelve hundred men, four hundred of whom were killed in the aſſault, and, amongſt the reſt, William Gladdiſdale, captain of the fort, and the lords Molings and Poynings. Two days after this action, our heroine proceeded againſt the fort of St. John, where ſhe met with very little reſiſtance from the Engliſh, who had well nigh abandoned it before her arrival. Having ſecured this conqueſt, ſhe attacked the fort of London, as it was called, which was the moſt conſiderable of all, and took it by ſtorm, after a very obſtinate engagement. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, the troops were led, without giving them the leaſt reſpite, againſt the fort of Tourelles, but, for want of day-light, were obliged to poſtpone the attack till next morning, when the French, with Joan ſtill marching with her ſtandard in the van, began the aſſault, which laſted fourteen hours without intermiſſion: the French were repulſed four ſeveral times, and as often returned to the charge, this extraordinary female always appearing in the foremoſt ranks. Under her eye the French thought themſelves invincible; they performed prodigies of valour, and at length made themſelves maſters of the fort, when ſix hundred of the garriſon were put to the ſword. During the action, Joan was wounded in the neck by an arrow; but inſtead of diſcovering the leaſt diſmay thereat, ſhe ſtepped aſide, pulled it forth, and returned to the fight as if no ſuch accident had befallen her. But we cannot paſs by unnoticed the words of Monſtrelet, a French author, who lived in the time of theſe events, who, in ſpeaking of the Pucelle, thus expreſſes himſelf; "Notwithſtanding that in theſe three aſſaults [of the forts], Joan is reported by common fame to have had the chief command, and the glory of them; yet they were chiefly performed by thoſe noble knights and captains, who had ſo bravely defended Orleans." And in another place he ſays, ſpeaking of the march of the French army, after the raiſing of the ſiege of Orleans, "Joan was ever in the front before her ſtandard; and in all the marches her fame was cried up as if there had been no other general but herſelf."

In theſe attacks the Engliſh loſt near eight thouſand men, and the French not above one hundred. Such a ſeries of misfortunes filled the former with terror and conſternation: treating the divinity of her miſſion with contempt, they conceived a notion rather more abſurd, and ſuppoſed ſhe acted by compact with the devil*. The common ſoldiers were ſtruck with an unaccountable panic, and trembled with the very apprehenſion of being led againſt this terrible inchantreſs. The earl of Suffolk, with the lords Talbot and Scales, beheld theſe attacks, and the loſs of the forts, without being able to ſuccour their party, having ſcarce men enough to defend the forts on the ſide of the Beauſſe. There was now in Orleans an army full as ſtrong as that of the beſiegers, and a free communication was now opened with Berry, by taking the forts on the other ſide of the river, ſo that the Engliſh general, finding it impoſſible to reduce the place whilſt it could receive ſuccours every day on the ſide of Sologne, raiſed the ſiege on the twelfth of May, and abandoned the enterprize, after having lain before the place full ſeven months. Such was the iſſue of the ſiege of Orleans, on which the fall of France had, in a great meaſure depended, and the miſcarriage whereof gave a fatal blow to the Engliſh affairs in that kingdom.

Charles, to improve his ſucceſs while his troops were in heart, and terror poſſeſſed the Engliſh, ſummoned the nobleſſe from all the provinces which acknowleged his authority; and they attending him in great numbers, with a body of ten thouſand men, he put them under the command of the duke of Alençon, who had lately recovered his liberty upon the payment of his ranſom. The conſtable de Richemont joined him at the ſame time with a corps of twelve hundred Bretons; and theſe forces being daily ſtrengthened by the arrival of freſh ſupplies, reſolved to take the field in purſuit of thoſe from whom they had ſo long fled.

The Engliſh, by an inconceivable miſtake, after retiring from before Orleans, inſtead of keeping their forces in a body, had diſtributed great part of them into places near the Loire, which they had ſubdued before they laid ſiege to Orleans. The enemy thus divided, the French found little reſiſtance in the places they attempted. Joan ſtill kept along with their troops: the troops, with her at their head, looked upon themſelves as invincible. Gargeau, a ſmall fortreſs, into which the earl of Suffolk had been ſo imprudent to throw himſelf with four hundred men only (probably ſeized with the general panic), was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and the earl was taken priſoner. Melun had the ſame fate, with many other towns and caſtles that the Engliſh had garriſoned: Beaugenci only held out, and this place it was neceſſary to take before the entrance into Beauſſe

* Even the regent duke himſelf appears to have had the ſame belief, for in a letter addreſſed to king Henry he expreſſes himſelf thus:

"And alle thing there proſpered for you, till the tyme of the ſiege of Orleans taken in hand, God knoweth by what advis. At the whiche tyme, after the adventure fallen to the perſone of my couſin of Salyſbury, whom God aſſoile, there falle, by the hand of God as it ſeemeth, a great ſtrook upon your peuple that was aſſembled there in grete nombre, cauſed in grete partie, as y trowe, of lakke of fadde beleve, and of unlevefulle doubte, that thei hadde of a diſciple and lyme of the feende, called the Pucelle, that uſed fals enchauntments and ſorcerie. The whiche ſtrooke and diſcomfiture nought oonly leſſed in grete partie the nombre of youre peuple there, but as well withdrowe the courage of the remenant in merveillous wyſe, and couraiged your adverſe partie and ennemys to aſſemble hem forthwith in grete nombre," &c. Rymer, vol. x. p. 408.

could be ſecured: accordingly Alençon formed the ſiege of it, and in a few days, compelled it to open its gates to him.

Of the two-and twenty thouſand Engliſh lately before Orleans, there were left but ſix thouſand, under the lord Talbot, who had taken the command of the army after Suffolk was made priſoner. As ſoon as the French were maſters of Beaujenci, they marched after this little army (themſelves near twelve thouſand ſtrong), and overtook it, on the eighteenth of June, near Patay. The Engliſh general would willingly have declined a battle till his men were recovered of the general conſternation into which the pretended miſſion, and almoſt miraculous ſucceſſes of the Pucelle, had thrown them; but there was no remedy, and the event proved ſuch as might naturally be expected, when a handful of men, and theſe under the power of ſuperſtitious prepoſſeſſion and panic fear, are attacked by numbers greatly ſuperior to themſelves, and encouraged by a ſeries of ſucceſs. The Engliſh were totally defeated; two thouſand of them lay breathleſs on the field; and upwards of two hundred were taken priſoners, among whom whom were the lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, ſir Thomas Rempſton, and ſeveral other officers of note. Monſtrelet tells us, that the Engliſh troops were in ſuch aſtoniſhment at beholding the banner of the Pucelle diſplayed in the front of the French line, and advancing towards them, that they forgot to fix the ſtakes, with which they were provided, to keep off the enemy's horſe, and ran away ſhamefully at the firſt onſet. In conſequence of this day's action, Jonville, a ſtrong place near Patay, though provided with a good garriſon, ſubmitted to the victors without any reſiſtance; and all the caſtles which held for the Engliſh about Orleans, were abandoned immediately, the garriſons retiring to Paris: in a word, both valour and victory ſeemed now to have changed ſides, and the once all-conquering Engliſh now fled like a herd of timorous deer before the enſigns of a female plebeian.

Charles VII. had never yet appeared at the head of his troops; but encouraged by this victory, declared he would take the field in perſon. This reſolution was worth an army to him: the French nobility, ever accuſtomed, on ſuch occaſions, to attend their ſovereign, even at their own expence, flocked from all quarters with their followers, to range themſelves under their famous oriflame *. Lewis III. duke of Anjou, and king of Sicily, Charles's brother-in-law, brought, immediately after the battle of Potoy, a ſupply of ſeveral brave officers, who had attended him into Italy ſome time before, and were come back with him into France: in a word, Charles ſoon found himſelf at the head of a conſiderable force, and his adherents daily increaſing; while the duke of Bedford was obliged to confine himſelf within the walls of Paris: ſo greatly had the late ſucceſs on the part of the French, and misfortunes on the part of the Engliſh, altered the ſtate of affairs.

Charles now made a general review and muſter of his troops at Gieau, and found that they amounted to fifteen thouſand fighting men; five of which he ſent off in two detachments, one under the command of the conſtable de Richemont, to make a diverſion in Normandy; and the other to carry the war into the heart of Guienne, under the conduct of the count de Pondriac. The king himſelf, at the head of the remaining ten thouſand, began his march for Rheims, at the preſſing inſtances of the Pucelle, who promiſed him that he ſhould be crowned in that city without oppoſition. The event anſwered the prediction; and, indeed, from the then ſituation of affairs, it required no ſupernatural gift to divine it would. Charles, in his route, received the ſubmiſſion of Troye and Chalons, while the inhabitants of Auxerre followed the example. The citizens of Rheims were no ſooner apprized of the king's approach, than they drove out the Engliſh garriſon, and ſent deputies with their keys to Charles, who entered the place in triumph; and in a few days after, viz. Sunday, July 17, was crowned there with great ſolemnity. As ſoon as this ceremony was at an end, the Maid of Orleans (for by this name Joan was called, ever after the raiſing of that ſiege), very prudently deſired leave to retire, affirming that ſhe had now accompliſhed the deſign of her miſſion; but the king was, or ſeemed to be, unwilling to part with his benefactreſs, and ſhe was at length perſuaded to continue at court, where it was more than probable her preſence might be ſtill thought neceſſary.

During this ſurprizing revolution in the affairs of Charles, the court of Henry in England was again embroiled by the revival of the quarrel between the duke of Gloceſter and the biſhop of Wincheſter, whoſe new dignity of cardinal, while it added both to his power and riches, had rendered him ſo inſolent and overbearing that the duke of Gloceſter reſolved to check him in his career; and, in order to humble his pride, he made a motion in the council, that he might not be permitted to keep the biſhopric of Wincheſter at the ſame time with the dignity of cardinal. After a very ſerious debate on this important point, the aſſembly, which conſiſted of moſt of the peers, ſpiritual and temporal, decreed, "that, becauſe it was an unknown thing to hold a cardinalſhip and the biſhopric of Wincheſter in England, they neither durſt nor would prejudice the king during his nonage, nor was it their intention to prejudge either him or the church; therefore they requeſt that the cardinal ſhould not appear as biſhop of Wincheſter next St. George's day, at Windſor †." This was a ſevere ſtroke to the cardinal's pride; nevertheleſs, he ſtill retained his temporalities and powers, and he now affected to decline the title of cardinal of Euſebius, under which he firſt received his hat, and to aſſume one leſs foreign in its room, namely that of cardinal of England; and, to conſole him for his late diſgrace, his good friend the pope appointed him his legate in Germany, and general of a cruſade againſt the Bohemian heretics, who were known by the name of Huſſites, and of whom we ſhall have occaſion to give a full account in our review of the State of the Church, at the end of the reign of Henry VII.

The cardinal was no ſooner inveſted with this commiſſion, than he applied to the council for leave to raiſe five hundred lances, and as many thouſand archers, for that expedition; and his demand being granted, under certain reſtrictions and limitations ‡, he began his levies with great diligence, and they went on with equal ſucceſs. I cannot help obſerving here, that it is amazing, at a time when the Engliſh were ſo much diſtreſſed in their own intereſts, they ſhould conſent to ſupport ſo romantic, ſo ridiculous an enterprize: in the end, however, this ſtep of the council happened to turn to the advantage of the nation.

For when the levies were completed, news came of the loſs of the battle of Patay by the Engliſh, and the imminent danger in which the duke of Bedford and Henry's affairs were in France. Upon this a council was held, on the firſt day of July, at Rocheſter, in which it was propoſed to employ the troops, deſigned for the cruſade, in the French war, and they entered into an agreement with the cardinal, who engaged to ſerve in France, under the duke of Bedford, till the end of December, with the troops of the cruſade, provided they were not employed in any ſiege *. In a few days after this agreement the council received letters from the Engliſh regent and council in France, ſetting forth the ſucceſſes of king Charles, whom they ſtyle the dauphin, deſiring a reinforcement might be ſent over with all expedition, and in particular earneſtly requeſting that the young king ſhould, with all convenient ſpeed, be ſent over to be crowned in Paris, which, if complied with, might, they thought, remove a great number of inconveniencies they then laboured under †.

But before this laſt requeſt could be complied with, it was thought proper that Henry ſhould be ſolemnly crowned in England, which was performed upon the ſixth of November, at Weſtminſter, Henry being then in the eighth year of his age: the duke of Gloceſter acting as lord high-ſteward in his own perſon, and as lord high-chamberlain by his deputy.

The parliament, which was convoked on this occaſion, voted that the names of Protector and Defender of the Nation, ought not, from thenceforth to exiſt, as being inconſiſtent with the majeſty of a crowned head §. And a committee of the lords being being ſent to acquaint the duke of Gloceſter with this reſolution, he very readily came into parliament, and expreſſed his acquieſcence in it; but with a ſalvo to all the pretenſions which his brother, the duke of Bedford, might have. The houſe then voted the king a ſubſidy on tonnage and poundage, as formerly, and then broke up. We ſhall now reſume the ſtate of affairs in France.

While the Engliſh government was employed in making preparations for the king's voyage to France, the duke of Bedford repaired to Picardy, where he intended to wait for the ſuccours from England; and Charles in the mean time made himſelf maſter of Soiſſons, Pervins, Chateau Thierry, Creſſi, and ſeveral other towns and caſtles in thoſe parts.

The regent being at length joined by the troops belonging to the cardinal, as alſo by another body ſent from England, under ſir John Radcliffe, he found himſelf enabled, in the beginning of Auguſt, to bring near twelve thouſand men into the field, at the head of whom he advanced as far as Montereau on the Yonne, and from thence ſent a challenge to Charles, who was then at Mont Nangi, offering to give him battle in any indifferent place he ſhould name, to end the war by a general engagement, if it could not be done by a reaſonable treaty; but Charles, grown wiſe by his paſt misfortunes, forbore hazarding his preſent ſucceſſes on ſo precarious an iſſue; and he knew the arms of the Engliſh too well, to think of attacking them in their trenches: thus the two armies continued to face each other for ſome days, without either venturing to attack his opponent. At length the duke of Bedford, deceived in his expectations from the impetuoſity of the French, and ſeeing that Charles had the advantage of him by reaſon of the country being plain and level, which admitted this laſt to make uſe of the ſuperiority of his horſe, the regent returned back to the Iſle of France, in order, by his preſence, to keep the towns from revolting, as thoſe of Champagne had done, as alſo to keep the French nobility in temper, who began to grow tired of a campaign, in which they all ſerved at their own expence.

Charles, on his part, propoſed to paſs the Seine at Brai, and retire into Berry; but this project being fruſtrated by an Engliſh garriſon entering Brai the night before his arrival, Charles croſſed the Marne, at Chateau Thierry, and advanced to Dampmartin, the duke of Bedford following him cloſe; but as both ſides were determined to run no hazard without an apparent advantage, and la Pucelle, who ſtill attended Charles's camp, varying in her opinion, declaring at one time for, and at another againſt an engagement, they parted at laſt without coming to a general action.

Charles returning to Crepi en Valois, made new propoſals for bringing the duke of Burgundy over to his intereſt; but though his ambaſſadors were received with great reſpect, and Charles had many advocates amoug the duke's council, in hopes of preferments and favours, which the ambaſſadors were very liberal in promiſing, the negociation proved unſucceſsful. He received, however, the ſubmiſſion of Compeigne, Creil, Pont St. Maizant, Beauvais, and other places; and had he advanced to St. Quintin, Corbie, Amiens, and Abbeville, theſe towns would likewiſe have received him with open arms: but the inhabitants of Senlis took arms, and expelling the Engliſh garriſon, ſubmitted to Charles ‖.

It may be eaſily ſuppoſed that theſe loſſes muſt have given the duke of Bedford ſenſible uneaſineſs, and the more ſo, as it was partly in his power to have prevented them; but he had now an alarm from another quarter, whence he leaſt expected it. The conſtable de Richemont, who had lately retired from the French court, in ſome diſguſt with the miniſtry, being joined by his friend the count de Marche, who had alſo withdrawn on the ſame occaſion, they both reſolved to ſacrifice private pique and reſentment to the good of their country and the ſervice of their prince; and, uniting their forces, which amounted to about twelve hundred men, over-ran all the country about Evreux, in Normandy, with great ſucceſs; they even took the ſtrong caſtle of Galliard, where they found the brave Barbaſon, the ſame who had defended Melun againſt the late king Henry*, and whom they now ſet at liberty; and this brave officer, ſecond to none in his age, immediately went and joined Charles, and was received by that prince with all the diſtinction due to his merit. The loſs of this place, together with that of Aumale, and ſome others of importance upon the confines of Normandy, alarmed the duke of Bedford ſo much, that, leaving two thouſand men, under Radcliff, in Paris and recommending the government of the city to Lewis Luxemburg, biſhop of Torouanne, Henry's chancellor in France, and Morluer, the provoſt of Paris, he marched with the main body of his troops to Normandy, to ſtop the conſtable's progreſs there.

Charles thought the abſence of the regent a favourable opportunity for making an attempt upon Paris, whither he now marched. Lagni and St. Denis making no reſiſtance, he poſted his troops at Montmartre, Aubervilliers, and the neighbouring villages, in hopes of ſome commotions in the city; but the regent had taken ſuch ſalutary precautions, that not a man ſtirred. Diſappointed in this reſpect, he yielded to the continual inſtances of la Pucelle, who was ſtill in high vogue with the people; and on Monday the twelfth of September, made an aſſault on the ſuburbs of St. Honoré: the event proved rather diſgraceful to the prophetic talents of the Maid, who was herſelf wounded in the attack, and the French were repulſed with great loſs; upon which Charles, ſeeing no likelihood of carrying his point, marched off with his troops, and retired into Berry. His departure was probably haſtened by receiving news that the regent was about to return from Normandy, which he accordingly did, after having drove the conſtable out of that duchy; and, ſoon after his coming back to Paris, recovered, by ſcalade, St. Denis and Lagni, which very much annoyed that city: Chateau Galliard was alſo retaken in the month of December.

Before we cloſe the occurrences of this year, it will not be improper to take a view of the conduct obſerved by the duke of Burgundy, ſince the revolution in the Engliſh affairs. Though this prince had about eight hundred men all this time in the ſervice of England, yet nothing is more certain than that, ever ſince the ſiege of Orleans, he had not acted with the ſame ſpirit and forwardneſs in the common cauſe, as he had ſhewn before that time: and the event pretty clearly ſhewed that he had formed other meaſures. His policy ſuggeſted to him, that by aſſiſting the Engliſh too powerfully, he might procure himſelf troubleſome maſters, as he had already experienced in the affairs of Hainault; and therefore, ſince he was to have a ſovereign, he choſe rather to have a prince of his own blood in poſſeſſion of the throne of France than a foreigner: his own ſubjects were alſo greatly prepoſſeſſed in favour of the houſe of Valois. Nevertheleſs, he carefully concealed his own ſentiments, leſt both parties ſhould take the advantage of them againſt him; and he reſolved to continue to aſſiſt the Engliſh, but at the ſame time to give Charles ſome hopes that his reſentment for the aſſaſſination of his father was not inſurmountable: in a word, his intent appears to have been to have made his own terms at the expence of the Engliſh, though he did not think fit to open himſelf ſo early. The duke of Bedford, on his part omitted no means for fixing this important ally; and a conference having been held between them at Paris, in the month of September, they entered into freſh agreements: but, from the effect of that inſincerity too common among men, and from which princes in particular are not free, notwithſtanding their treaties, they could not truſt one another, but lived in continual fear of being deceived, and that either the one or the other would, without ſcruple, break his engagements upon the proſpect of any conſiderable advantage.

During thoſe buſy ſcenes in France, very little of any importance ſeems to have paſſed in England: in ſhort, the principal thing we find done this year in England, was confirming the truce with Scotland, by a meeting of the commiſſioners from both kingdoms, by which the ſupplies which king James had ſtipulated to ſend to France, were farther delayed†: nor, indeed, did they take place till ſome years afterwards.

The year 1430 was opened by the duke of Bedford by a freſh negociation with the duke of Brittany, to whom he reſigned all the Engliſh pretenſions in Poictou. Having thus fixed this prince and the duke of Burgundy in the intereſt of England, at leaſt for ſome time, the regent next applied to the duke of Savoy, who was, to appearance, a zealous partizan or the houſe of Valois; but as that prince was both needy and ambitious, a little money and large promiſes ſoon gained him from the French intereſt; and, together with the prince of Orange, it was agreed that he ſhould attack Charles's dominions on the ſide of Dauphiné. The prince of Orange was to have Vienne, and all its dependencies, for his ſhare; while the duke was to poſſeſs Grenoble and the reſt of Dauphiné. Gaucourt, who acted for Charles in thoſe parts, ſoon had intelligence of this treaty, and managed matters ſo well, that he ſurprized the prince of Orange, who was to carry on the enterprize, and cut in pieces his troops, while he himſelf narrowly eſcaped being made priſoner; but it was only to ſee his whole principality and city of Orange fall into the French king's hands.

The revolution of affairs in France gave occaſion to great murmurs and complaints in England; and the parliament meeting in the beginning of this year, ſeveral warm debates enſued upon this ſubject. There were not wanting many who accuſed the generals of negligence and remiſſneſs in the execution of their duty; while others aſcribed the bad ſucceſs of the Engliſh to the miſconduct of the king's council, and particularly to the ambition of the duke of Gloceſter, who, by his obſtinate proſecution of the war in Hainault, had occaſioned ſuch a diverſion to the Engliſh arms, as had prevented the entire conqueſt of France, which muſt have been the certain conſequence of the whole ſtrength of England being united.

The deliverers of this great man being about to bring him forth in triumph, he abſolutely refuſed to ſtir, having given his word and honour to ſir William Kingſton, the Engliſh governor of that place, not to leave his confinement without his knowlege or conſent: Barbaſon's friends therefore were obliged to apply to Kingſton, who was about to leave the place in virtue of the capitulation, and who readily gave his conſent. been

But what gave riſe to the warmeſt altercations in this aſſembly, was the opinion of a certain party, who inſiſted that the untoward ſituation of affairs on the continent, had been owing to the imprudence of the council in detaining the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon priſoners in England, at a time when, had they been ſent home, they would probably have renewed their old quarrels and diſſentions with the duke of Burgundy, which had brought ſo much advantage to the Engliſh heretofore; and that prince, having theſe powerful adverſaries to encounter, would have found his intereſt in aſſiſting the Engliſh more heartily than he had done of late: in ſhort, the detaining theſe two princes captive, had procured France a tranquility deſtructive to England. It was farther urged by the abettors of this opinion, that it was not yet too late to releaſe them, and that, in the preſent ſtate of the Engliſh finances, their ranſoms might afford a reaſonable recruit.

This laſt argument had ſuch weight with the parliament, that nothing but the expreſs deſire of the late king could have prevented them from practiſing an expedient which bore ſo plauſible an appearance. At length it was thought that the government might diſpenſe with the royal reſtriction, in favour of the duke of Bourbon, who, by a private contract with the late king, had engaged to ſwear to the peace of Troye, to pay a certain ſum by way of ranſom, and to deliver his two ſons, and two fortreſſes, as hoſtages for the performance of his promiſe; and though Henry V. died before this treaty could be executed, it had been renewed, with ſome alteration, in 1428, and young Henry, as king of France, received the duke's homage: the treaty was ratified, but ſome intervening obſtacles retarded the duke's releaſe, and, after a captivity of eighteen years, he died at laſt a priſoner in England, in the beginning of the year 1434.

The parliament was the more diſpoſed to this accommodation, as it would have afforded a fund to defray the expences of the king's voyage to France; but this reſource failing, they practiſed another ſhift, which anſwered the purpoſe: all perſons poſſeſſed of lands to the value of forty pounds per annum, were ſummoned to receive the honour of knighthood; the jewels of the crown were pawned; and large ſums were borrowed from the towns, corporations, and individuals; and cardinal Beaufort, who accompanied the king, ſupplied him, on this occaſion, with about ten thouſand pounds for his uſe.

Every thing was in readineſs for the king's voyage about the beginning of May this year. The duke of Gloceſter was named keeper of the kingdom during the royal abſence in France, and Henry, with his court, ſet out for Canterbury, on his way thither; but the Engliſh in general were ſo deeply impreſſed with the notion of Joan's magic ſorcery and diabolical power, that many officers and ſoldiers, belonging to the forces who were to accompany the young monarch over, deſerted before their embarkation; and ſeveral of thoſe who had actually croſſed the ſea, terrified with the accounts they heard of the ſurprizing atchievements of la Pucelle, withdrew privately and returned to England.

Henry arrived on the nineteenth of May at Calais. The council of England had conſented to this voyage as a ſtep that was abſolutely neceſſary for retrieving their ſovereign's affairs; but thinking his perſon would be too much expoſed at Paris whilſt the enemy was ſtrong in the neighbourhood, they inſiſted on his reſiding at Rouen, till he might remove to the capital of his French dominions with ſafety†. Accordingly Henry, inſtead of marching directly to Paris, after repoſing ſome time at Calais, went to Rouen, where he continued moſt part of the year.

But this ſtep had almoſt loſt Paris to Henry; for the French intereſt in that capital, perceiving the affections of the duke of Burgundy's party ſenſibly cooled towards the Engliſh, laid a plan for betraying the city to Charles. The vigilant duke of Bedford, however, who was always on the watch againſt deſigns of this nature, having diſcovered the plot by intercepted letters, and by the confeſſion of the bearer, one hundred and fifty of the conſpirators were ſeized, and many of them executed with great ſeverity. This was done by way of example, to ſtrike terror into others; but, at the ſame time, it greatly alienated the affections of the Pariſians from the duke of Bedford, who thus ſecured his maſter's intereſt at the expence of his own popularity.

Whilſt young king Henry was at Rouen, the regent, apprehending that the duke of Burgundy began to lend a favourable ear to the propoſals that were inceſſantly making to him by the emiſſaries of Charles, endeavoured to attach him more firmly to his intereſt by yielding to him all the places that the Engliſh held in Champagne and Brie; but by this ceſſion the regent knew he ſhould be enabled for ſome time to ſtop the progreſs of Charles, who had carried on his conqueſts with wonderful rapidity.

The duke thus influenced, entered France at the head of a powerful army; and, after having reduced Torcy and Soiſſons, he ordered the earls of Suffolk and Arundel to join their troops with his, and to inveſt Compeigne. This place was defended by Flavi, a brave experienced officer, and provided with whatever could ſerve to make a long and vigorous reſiſtance. Upon the firſt news of this enterprize, the Maid of Orleans and Xaintrailles, one of Charles's beſt generals, threw themſelves into the place, which gave new ſpirits to the garriſon.

This happened on the twenty-fifth of May. Next day, which was the laſt of her liberty, Joan put herſelf at the head of five or ſix hundred men, with whom ſhe made ſo furious a ſally upon the quarters of John of Luxemburg, count de Ligny, the Burgundian general, that ſhe drove him from his poſt; but, in making her retreat into the city, ſhe was intercepted by a party of the Engliſh, and, after a moſt heroic defence, and having her horſe killed under her, ſhe was obliged to deliver herſelf priſoner to the baſtard of Vendoſme, who immediately gave her up to the Burgundian general *.

The Engliſh, long unaccuſtomed to deciſive advantages, looked upon the capture of the Maid in that light: Te Deum was publicly ſung at Paris; the duke of Burgundy, and all his chief officers, ſent for her, to ſatiate their curioſity by gazing on the perſon, before whom they had ſo lately trembled. Luxemburg, whoſe priſoner ſhe was adjudged to be, ſent her to be confined in a caſtle on his own eſtate. The garriſon of Compeigne, however, ſtill continued to make a gallant reſiſtance under its brave governor, till the latter end of the year, when it was relieved by the the count de Vendoſme: beſides, the army of the beſiegers was, during the courſe of the ſiege, much weakened by the duke of Burgundy's going off with a large corps, in order to take poſſeſſion of the duchies of Brabant and Limburg, which had fallen to him by the death of his couſin Philip; and by the ſending off another detachment to oppoſe the Liegeois, who had invaded the county of Namur‡.

Nothing could have happened more lucky for Charles than this advantage at that time. It reanimated his party, who thereby ſaw that his fortune was not ſled with the liberty of the gallant Maid. Many places in the neighbourhood of Compeigne ſurrendered to the French, and Xaintrailles defeated Heny, a Burgundian general, at Germini, where ſir Thomas Knyvet, a brave Engliſh officer, who had ſome time before defeated the count de Clermont near Beauvais, was taken priſoner.

The king of England remained all this time at Rouen. The various ſucceſſes of the war had for ſome time ſuſpended all talk of his coronation; but the duke of Bedford, who ſeems to have reſided all this ſummer at Paris, preſſed it ſo warmly, that, about the middle of November, Henry ſet out for that city, to be crowned, accompanied by the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and a ſplendid train of nobility of both nations. The ceremony of the coronation was performed in the church of Notre Dame, on Sunday the ſeventeenth of December, and was as magnificent as the nature of circumſtances would admit; but the cardinal of England was ſo impolitically ambitious as to place the crown upon his head, to the great diſguſt of the archbiſhop of Paris and the French nation in general.

We ſhall ſpare our readers the dry and unintereſting detail of the numberleſs attempts and ſkirmiſhes between the troops of Charles and Henry, as they contributed but little to the deciſion of the general affair. It will, however, not be improper to recount one inſtance of the deep impreſſion that Joan's pretended inſpiration had made upon the minds of the French: a ſhepherd, in the neighbourhood of Rouen, addreſſing himſelf to the marſhal de Bouſſac, aſſured him that, by virtue of a revelation from Heaven, he could conduct him through a ſecret path into the very heart of Rouen; and the marſhal communicating the propoſal to Xaintrailles, they agreed to embrace the opportunity, which they thought was offered them by Providence. Having, therefore, aſſembled a body of choſen troops, they followed the ſhepherd, who conducted them into an ambuſcade formed by the Engliſh, who deſtroyed the greater part of their forces, and took Xaintrailles priſoner.

With a view to convince their enemies of the mere mortality of this heroine, but more eſpecially to cure their countrymen of the terrors with which the belief of her ſupernatural agency had filled their minds, the Engliſh generals reſolved to leave nothing undone to get her into their power, that, by intereſting religion in the caſe, by proceeding in the forms of the church againſt heretics, and, by getting her condemned as a ſorcereſs and an impoſtor, they might more effectually anſwer the end they aimed at, of erazing from the minds of the people the idea of her virtue and divine commiſſion. Accordingly the duke of Bedford demanded her ſo earneſtly of the count de Ligny, that this general could not refuſe his requeſt: he required, however, a reward ſuitable to the importance of ſuch a priſoner; and Joan, being delivered up to the Engliſh, was brought to Rouen.

As ſhe had been taken in the dioceſe of Beauvais, Peter Cauchon, biſhop of that city, obtained leave of the chapter of Rouen (the ſee being vacant) to exerciſe his juriſdiction there, and proceed againſt the captive Maid. His requeſt was granted; and, in conjunction with a brother-inquiſitor, he began the proceſs, which laſted between four and five months; and being carried on with all the formalities of juſtice, was approved by the faculties of law and divinity, and in the parliament of Paris. Whether the imagination of this Maiden was really ſtruck with the notion of her being deſtined to be the deliverer of France, or ſhe had coined her ſtory in order to make a figure in the world, ſhe appeared before her judges with an air of intrepidity that ſtruck all preſent with awe and admiration: ſhe boldly avowed the deſigns ſhe had formed againſt the Engliſh; ſhe told them, with an air of confidence as from God, that they ſhould ere long be driven out of France.

Being interrogated about her pretended revelations, and whether ſhe would ſubmit to the judgment of the church in that point? ſhe only anſwered, "That ſhe was certain they came from God, to whoſe judgment ſhe would leave the deciſion; determined not to give them up to any other authority, even though the church ſhould declare them to be illuſions." This declining the judgment of the church was made uſe of, by her examiners, as a ſufficient ground to charge her with hereſy. When ſhe found theſe conſequences, ſhe would afterwards have ſubmitted to the pope, on condition ſhe might be ſent to Rome; but it was not the practice to admit ſuch appeals in caſes of hereſy, and the propoſal was conſidered as a mere contrivance to gain time for making her eſcape*: and as ſhe ſtill perſiſted in the ſtory of her heavenly viſitation, ſhe was at length condemned "as a blaſphemer againſt God, and an impious pretender to divine inſpiration, and the knowlege of future events; and as an idolater (on account of her kneeling to the ſaints, angels, or ſpirits which appeared to her as ſhe pretended), a witch, a heretic, a breaker of the decorum and modeſty of her ſex, by going in man's apparel, and leading the life of a ſoldier, and as an impudent impoſtor; and as ſuch condemned to perpetual impriſonment†.

* As ſhe had before attempted to do, while under the cuſtody of Ligny, by jumping from the top of the tower, where ſhe was confined, down to the ground; but ſhe was ſo bruiſed with the fall as not to be able to walk, and was retaken, and put into irons.

While

While this ſentence was reading on a ſcaffold, erected for the purpoſe, before the abbey of St. Ouin, in the hearing of a vaſt concourſe of people, Joan interrupted the officer that read it, declaring "That ſhe ſubmitted to the church and her judges; that, ſince they were of opinion ſhe ought not to maintain her revelations, ſhe ſhould not do ſo for the future; and that, as the ſpirit which ſpoke to her had aſſured her ſhe ſhould be delivered, ſhe was fully convinced ſhe had been deceived." After which ſhe made and ſigned a full recantation, in the preſence of all the ſpectators.

She now left off her man's dreſs, which ſhe could never before be perſuaded to lay aſide, though tempted by the promiſe of being admitted to hear maſs and to communicate, from which ſhe was debarred whilſt ſhe wore it: but as ſhe ſtill diſcovered a ſtrong inclination to that garb, thoſe who were bent on her ruin having, to tempt her, left a man's ſuit in the room by her all night, ſhe was found dreſſed in it next morning, pretending that ſhe had a viſion the preceding night, commanding her ſo to do. The fact being proved, the court met again, and declared her a relapſed heretic, and delivered her over to the ſecular arm, to be burnt alive; which ſentence was executed upon her in the Old Market-place of Rouen, on the thirtieth day of May, 1431.

Such was the end of this famous amazon, la Pucelle, or the Maid of Orleans, whoſe reputation in point of chaſtity was never impeached even by her enemies. Her actions were certainly extraordinary, and her courage can never be too much admired, whether it aroſe from her natural conſtitution, or was the effect of enthuſiaſm. The French had ſuch a regard for her memory, that, on a reviſion of her proceſs, in which, not ſo much the form, as the ſubſtance of the affair was examined, ſhe was, on the ſeventh of July, 1456, adjudged innocent. Father Daniel tells us, that there were ſeveral deſcendants from her family living in his time, who took the ſurname of du Lys *.

It cannot be denied that the Engliſh, on this occaſion, appear to have been actuated by a barbarous policy and bigotted ſuperſtition, in thus condemning to death a perſon, whoſe noble atchievements, in defending the liberty and independence of her country, ought to have recommended her to the eſteem of every humane and generous breaſt: beſides, they were guilty of a flagrant act of injuſtice, in puniſhing one who, being a native under another government, and taken in fair war, could neither legally be tried by their courts, nor put to death by their award. But it is now time to ſee what was tranſacting in England, during the courſe of this year.

Soon after Henry's departure for the continent, the duke of Gloceſter, taking advantage of the cardinal's abſence, who had accompanied the king over ſea, declared in the council that Wincheſter intended to quit the king and return to England, to excite freſh troubles in this kingdom, as well as to avail himſelf of the pope's authority for diſſolving his engagement to ſerve againſt the French king. This remonſtrance met with ſuch credit, that the council publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding all the king's ſubjects, of what rank or condition ſoever, on pain of impriſonment, to accompany the cardinal, ſhould he leave the king without the royal permiſſion †.

On the eighteenth of November, a truce for one year was concluded at London with the king of Caſtile, to commence on the firſt of May, 1431 ‡.

About the middle of December the ambaſſadors of England ſigned, at Edinburgh, in Scotland, a five years truce with that nation, to begin the ſame day with that made with Caſtile ‖.

On the twelfth of January, 1431, a parliament was held at Weſtminſter by the duke of Gloceſter, keeper of England, which gave the king one tenth and one fifteenth, and a third of both; a grant of tonnage and poundage for two years, with a ſubſidy of like value on all merchants ſtrangers, over and above the ſaid tonnage and poundage §, with other grants, and ſeveral public acts were alſo made, which will be found in their proper order under the head of Laws.

When the ſinews of war are defective, no great enterprizes can be expected: the moſt conſiderable undertaking on the continent this year, was the raiſing of the ſiege of Vaudemont by the troops of the duke of Burgundy, who ſupported Anthony, count de Vaudemont, in his pretenſions to the duchies of Lorraine and Barr, as heir male of his uncle Charles, the late duke, in oppoſition to René of Anjou, who claimed theſe two duchies as huſband to Iſabella, daughter to the aforeſaid Charles. René and the famous general Barbaſon riſing from before the town which they had beleaguered, met the Burgundians at Sandricourt, and offered them battle, which the others accepting, a bloody engagement enſued, in which the troops of René were routed, himſelf taken priſoner, and the gallant Barbaſon left dead upon the field of battle. All the advantages gained by the Engliſh conſiſted in the recovery of Louviers, which had been ſurprized by Stephen de Vignolles, called la Hire; and in defeating a party of French, near Beauvais, by the earl of Arundel. It is extremely difficult to trace all the rambling encounters which happened at this juncture, or to fix either the times or ſcenes of action: we muſt not, however, paſs by unnoticed the ſurpriſal of Montargis by the Engliſh, through a correſpondence they held with a young woman, who prevailed with her lover to admit them into the town by a back gate. On the other ſide, Loré, a French captain, made an inroad to the very gates of Caen, upon a fair-day, and carried away two thouſand perſons, with a very great booty: after which he retired to Sellé le Guillaume, a ſmall town in Maine, where he was beſieged by the earl of Arundel; but the duke of Alençon ſuddenly coming to his relief, obliged the Engliſh to retire ¶.

* There appeared ſuch another extraordinary maid in the laſt century, in Muſcovy. After the ſuppreſſion of a rebellion againſt Alexis, father of Peter the Great; amongſt the priſoners brought to the general there was a nun, who wore a man's habit, over that of her order.—She had commanded ſeven thouſand men, and ſhown great bravery on all occaſions. Death did not terrify her, though ſhe was condemned to be burnt, for leaving her monaſtery; and when ſhe went to the place of execution, ſhe ſaid, if every one had behaved as valiantly as herſelf, the general and his whole army would have been cut to pieces. ¶ Complete Hiſt. Rapin. J. Chartier Hiſt. de Charles VII.

This is all that paſſed worth notice in France between the two parties. In England, the duke of Gloceſter proved ſucceſsful in quieting ſome commotions which appeared there during this year. It ſeems the ſpirit of the lower people under Tyler and Straw, in the reign of Richard II. was not yet entirely rooted out of the nation; for, ſoon after the riſing of the parliament, numbers of diſorderly people aſſembled near Addington, under one Mandeville, a weaver, and bailiff of the place. This Mandeville took the name of Jack Sharp of Wigmoreland, in Wales; which being the chief manor of the Mortimer family, carries an appearance of ſome important deſign being in agitation, though it has not come to our knowlege: it is certain that the duke of Gloceſter thought it of ſo much conſequence, that he went down himſelf, at the head of ſome troops, and diſperſed the inſurgents. Their leader, Mandevil, was taken priſoner, and, according to Stowe, from whom we have inſerted this tranſaction, he confeſſed that the intention of his party was to have deſtroyed all the prieſts: upon this confeſſion, and his overt-acts of treaſon, he was executed as a traitor at Addington, his head was ſet upon London bridge, and the reſt of the principal abettors were put to death in other parts of the kingdom.

Young Henry had, ſoon after his coronation, left Paris and retired to Rouen, where the duke of Bedford thought him in greater ſafety; but here he was in danger of being ſurprized in the night of February 3, 1432. One Peter Audebœuf, a native of Bearne, but in the Engliſh ſervice, entered into a plot with one Ricarville, a French officer, to get poſſeſſion of the city and Henry's perſon, by introducing Ricarville, with one hundred and twenty men, into the great tower of the caſtle: and had this ſmall party been ſupported by a larger corps of troops, which were poſted within a league of the place for that purpoſe, it is more than probable the deſign would have ſucceeded; but the officers quarrelling about ſharing the booty which they ſuppoſed they ſhould find in the place, many of them refuſed to march, though they had advice of the lucky beginning of their enterprize by the ſafe introduction of Ricarville and his party, and the whole body returned to Beauvais. Thoſe who had entered the great tower being thus abandoned, were forced to ſurrender at diſcretion: Audebœuf, the traitor, was quartered; fifty of the French had their heads ſtruck off, and the reſt detained priſoners of war. The French had better ſucceſs in their attempt upon Chartres, which, on the twentieth of April, was ſurprized by the count de Dunois, and the garriſon, conſiſting of five or ſix hundred Engliſh, taken priſoners.

The late danger which he had ſo narrowly eſcaped alarmed king Henry to ſuch a degree, that he immediately ſet out for England, and arrived at Dover the middle of February. He was received with great ſhew of affection by his Engliſh ſubjects: and the firſt act of his government, after his arrival, was to take the great-ſeal from the chancellor, the archbiſhop of York, and give it to the biſhop of Bath and Wells: and a parliament being ſummoned on the ninth of May, the biſhop, in conſequence of his new dignity, made a ſpeech at its opening. John Ruſſel, eſq. was choſen ſpeaker to the commons.

The differences between cardinal Beaufort and the duke of Gloceſter appear to have been revived with great bitterneſs in this parliament. It ſeems the duke had, as keeper of the kingdom, given orders, ſome time before, for ſeizing at Sandwich ſome of the king's jewels, which were mortgaged to the cardinal, and which the latter intended to carry over with him to France, whither he was going to join the king. The cardinal complained of this to the houſe as a violent inſult offered to his perſon and property, and prayed that the duke might be obliged to make reſtitution; but the affair being ſtrictly enquired into, the houſe made an order, that, before they were reſtored to him, he ſhould pay the king ſix thouſand pounds more on them, and lend him ten thouſand marks beſides. The cardinal, who ſeems now to have been worth more money than almoſt all the other noblemen of England, ſubmitted to this mulct; and it was moreover ordered, that, if it ſhould appear upon a fair and equitable trial, that the baggage had been juſtly ſeized, the money ſhould be forfeited to the king. The cardinal, however, apprehending ſome other attacks againſt him from the ſame quarter, made ſuch intereſt in the parliament, that the commons were prevailed on to preſent a petition in his favour, and by which he, the cardinal, obtained an ample pardon, with a Non obſtante of all ſtatutes and ordinances, for all the offences and actions he might have been guilty of, either againſt the king or the ſtate †.

Very little elſe of moment paſſed in this parliament, which now proceeded to grant the king a continuance of the ſubſidy upon wool, tonnage, and poundage: and, before the houſe broke up, Richard Plantagenet, ſon to the earl of Cambridge, beheaded in the beginning of the late reign, being now of age, was reſtored to all the hereditaments belonging to the late Edward, duke of York (ſlain at the battle of Agincourt), and of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche; and ſir John Cornwall was, by a very honourable patent enrolled in full parliament, created baron of Fanhope ‡.

In the courſe of this year ſeveral ſkirmiſhes and ſurprizes happened between the troops of Charles and thoſe of the regent duke, chiefly to the diſadvantage of the latter; but the loſſes of the Engliſh were in ſome meaſure repaired by the ſurprize of Montargis, which facilitated, ſome time after, the recovery of Previns: but, in the month of July, Bedford having laid ſiege to the town of Lagni on the Marne, with an army of ſix thouſand men, notwithſtanding all his vigilance and precaution, the count de Dunois (baſtard of Orleans) found means to throw ſuccours into the place; and afterwards marching with all his forces towards Paris, the duke of Bedford, alarmed at this ſtep, and fearing that he might be in private correſpondence with the Pariſians, raiſed the ſiege, and retired with his troops to cover that capital. Here he was mortified by an event that gave the Engliſh intereſt a great blow: his wife Anne, ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy, and the chief means of that harmony and friendſhip which had hitherto ſubſiſted between them, died on the fourteenth of November, and was buried in the church of the Celeſtines, in the city of Paris *.

The

The regent duke had always taken a particular care to keep the duke of Burgundy and the duke of Brittany in the Engliſh intereſt, to which the latter was but very little inclined; and it was purely owing to his fear of not being able to defend himſelf from the reſentment of the Engliſh, that he had not long ago quitted their party, and openly ſided with king Charles, a ſtep which his brother, the count de Richemont, was inceſſantly ſoliciting him to take. The death of Anne of Burgundy diſſolved the cloſe connection that ſubſiſted between her brother Philip and the regent duke; and a ſtep which the latter took ſoon after, helped to bring matters to an open rupture between them. Bedford, being a widower, married, in March, 1433 (not quite four months after the deceaſe of his late duchefs), Jaquelina of Luxemburg, a young lady of about ſeventeen years of age, eldeſt daughter of Peter of Luxemburg, earl of St. Pol †. This haſty marriage was extremely reſented by the duke of Burgundy, who not only conſidered it as a ſlight put upon the memory of his ſiſter ſo lately deceaſed, but as an affront to himſelf, it having been done without his knowlege, whereas he thought the duke of Bedford ſhould have ſhewn him more reſpect, ſince, beſides the conſideration of the many ties by which they were united, he married the daughter of one of his vaſſals. The duke of Bedford, who was very prudent and circumſpect, had doubtleſs his reaſons for acting with ſuch ſecrecy and reſerve: be that as it may, ſeveral bitter recriminations were thrown out on this occaſion by both ſides; and cardinal Beaufort, fearful of the conſequences, laboured to make up the quarrel, and prevailed ſo far upon both parties as to obtain their conſent to a conference, in May, at St. Omer's, in order to adjuſt all differences. The two dukes came to the place appointed, but an unhappy diſpute about precedency prevented their reconciliation, and cauſed them to part extremely diſguſted with each other. It ſeems the conference was to have been held at a third place, and not at either of their houſes; the duke of Bedford, however, inſiſting on the firſt viſit, the other refuſed to comply with it, though in a town of his own dominions, and that the other was the ſon, the brother, and uncle to kings, but, above all, the repreſentative of his nephew, who, as king of France, was the duke of Burgundy's maſter. But the truth ſeems to be, that the latter had already reſolved to deſert the Engliſh intereſt, and laid hold of this pretext to break with the regent; though, at the ſame time, he determined to have it in his power to extort ſuch terms from Charles as he ſhould think proper to preſcribe, and for that reaſon he ſtill continued his hoſtilities againſt the French. Thus the war continued to be carried on, not only in Burgundy, where Philip's forces acted alone, but alſo in Picardy, where they were joined by the Engliſh, and where the French had ſurprized ſeveral places: the moſt conſiderable of theſe was St. Valery; but it was afterwards recovered by the earl of St. Pol, the duke of Bedford's new father in-law, and the lord Willoughby; but the death of St. Pol, who was ſoon after carried off by a peſtilential diſtemper, which raged this year in all the Engliſh part of France, almoſt ruined the regent duke's beſt-concerted ſchemes; for there being no general of eminence to take the command of the troops, the war was left to the conduct of the commanders of garriſons, and produced nothing but depredations, which ruined all the provinces on this ſide the Loire, rencounters of ſmall parties, and attempts on petty forts, without giving occaſion to one remarkable action. It was on this account that the duke of Bedford propoſed to king Charles the exchange of the gallant lord Talbot for Xaintrailles; and his offer was accepted. The duke of Bedford could not do without ſuch a general as Talbot, though, to procure him, he was forced to give his equal to the enemy.

If the affairs of the Engliſh were upon an ill footing in France, they wore not a much better face in England, where the people began to be heartily tired of the war, and were extremely deſirous of procuring a fair and equitable peace, ſo that there was an univerſal murmuring throughout the nation, and the parliament granted ſubſidies with the greateſt reluctance. The duke of Bedford had ſeverely felt the effects of this backwardneſs, and, deſirous to carry on the war with ſuch a force as, whilſt Charles's affairs were low, might at once clear the provinces on this ſide the Loire of the enemy, and, by the reputation which ſuch ſucceſs would give to the Engliſh arms, keep the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany firm in their alliances with England, appointed a meeting with the duke of Gloceſter at Calais. He expected ſome comfort, or at leaſt council, at this conference; but Gloceſter giving him no hopes of obtaining any aid from England, unleſs he came over himſelf, the regent duke, though he could be very ill ſpared from Paris, was forced to take this ſtep, and ſet out for England about the middle of June.

On the eighth of July this year, the parliament met at Weſtminſter; and on the thirteenth the duke of Bedford appeared in the houſe, when he acquainted the aſſembly, that, however neceſſary his preſence might be in France, the ſervice of his king had required his attendance in England: he then proceeded to give the two houſes an account, as well of what had paſſed of late years in France, as of the preſent ſtate of that country. His conduct was unanimouſly approved, and the parliament not only expreſſed their high opinion of his ſervices in France, but requeſted him to ſtay in England, and take the direction of affairs upon himſelf; with which the duke complied for the preſent, and actually remained in England till the year 1434.

In the mean time the duke of Orleans, who had, ever ſince the battle of Agincourt, been a priſoner in England, and who had long ſolicited his freedom in the moſt earneſt terms, but to no purpoſe, thought he now found, in the general diſpoſitions of the Engliſh towards a peace, a favourable opportunity for recovering that ineſtimable bleſſing. As he was indulged with a free correſpondence with France, he was perfectly well acquainted with the diſpoſitions both of that court and its enemies. There had lately happened a revolution in Charles's court: Tremouille, the firſt miniſter to that prince, having rendered himſelf obnoxious to the queen and the princes of the blood, they, with his capital enemy, the conſtable de Richemont, conſpired to deſtroy him: the deſign took effect; Richemont found means to ſeize his perſon at Chinon, where the French court then reſided, and cauſed him to be carried to the ſtrong caſtle of Mount Treſor, and there ſhut up. Charles at firſt appeared greatly enraged at this inſult put upon himſelf in the perſon of his miniſter; but ſoon growing calm, he received Charles of Anjou, count of Maine, as his prime miniſter; and in a ſhort time the count became a greater favourite than his predeceſſor.

This change in the French miniſtry proved of infinite advantage to Charles's affairs. New ſchemes for peace were now laid, and hopes were entertained, that, if an interview could be brought about between Charles and the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, theſe princes might be induced to exert their endeavours for that purpoſe, or be brought to deſert the Engliſh, if they continued obſtinately bent to proſecute the war. The bringing about this deſirable interview was now undertaken by the duke of Orleans, who wiſely judged, that if the parties could ſecurely truſt each other, they would be all of one mind, and join in ridding their country of an enemy who had lorded it there in the moſt imperious manner.

To bring about his favorite view, therefore, he, in Auguſt this year, gave in a paper of propoſals for a general congreſs towards eſtabliſhing a peace. He propoſed that the queen dowager of Sicily, her ſon, Charles of Anjou, the duke of Brittany, with his two brothers the counts de Richemont and St. Giles, the duke of Alençon, the counts of Armagnac, St. Foix, Perdriac, and Clermont (ſon to the duke of Bourbon), and the archbiſhop of Paris, ſhould meet ſuch plenipotentiaries as the Engliſh court ſhould nominate, at Calais; and he deſired permiſſion to aſſiſt at the congreſs, in order to enforce the negociation. At the ſame time he preſented a ſet of articles, which were ſo favourable for England, that the council embraced his propoſal without heſitation*, and he ſigned, ſealed, and ſwore to the treaty which he had planned: but, notwithſtanding, theſe ſolemn appearances of truth and real intention on the part of the duke of Orleans, and though ſafe-conducts were actually expedited by the government of England for the perſons who were to aſſiſt at the conferences, yet nothing can be more plain than that the whole was, on the part of the duke, an artful juggle, to give his countrymen an opportunity of underſtanding one another's ſentiments, and to divert the council of England from liſtening to the requeſt of the duke of Bedford, and making preparations for recovering their late loſſes in France. That this was the real ſtate of the caſe will clearly appear in the ſequel.

In the mean time the affairs of the Engliſh went very badly in France, through the abſence of the duke of Bedford, who, on his return thither, in the autumn of 1434, found the Lower Normandy in danger of being loſt: the peaſants, who were utterly ruined by the incurſions of parties, having, in the beginning of that year, taken arms to the number of fifty or ſixty thouſand men. Two thirds of theſe invaded the Vexin, and the other body of twenty thouſand attacked Caen, which, together with Harfleur, Dieppe, and Lillebonne, they ſoon reduced. The earl of Arundel was ſo ſooner informed of this inſurrection, than he advanced againſt thoſe who had fallen into the Vexin, and, attacking them in the night, obtained an eaſy victory.

It might have been more difficult to reduce thoſe in Caen, as they were headed by the marſhal de Rieux, but they were ſo terrified at the fate of their companions, that they immediately diſperſed, and the greateſt part of them returned to their own habitations. The marſhal, with a few of the moſt courageous, threw themſelves into Dieppe, which, together with Harfleur, was ſtill in the hands of Charles; though Arundel recovered Caen and Lillebonne, and afterwards marched againſt the French in Picardy, who had taken the ſtrong town of Rue: but being informed on his way, that the enemy was fortifying Gerberoy, near Beauvais, he thought it more adviſeable to drive them thence before the works could be completed. Accordingly he appeared before that place; but hearing that la Hire and Xaintrailles were approaching with twelve hundred men to its relief, he raiſed the ſiege, and marched to meet them in order of battle, when a bloody diſpute enſued. Sir Ralph Standiſh, with about one hundred horſe, were cut in pieces at the firſt onſet; and three culverins, which la Hire had brought into the field, did ſuch execution, that of five hundred horſe which the earl had with him, two hundred were killed, and one hundred and

* Theſe were of ſo very extraordinary a nature, that it would be unpardonable in us not to give our readers a ſight of them. The paper is worded in the moſt abject terms, for he there calls Henry "his lawful Lord of France," and gives Charles no other title but that of the dauphin.

I. He propoſes that the king of England and France ſhould ſend commiſſioners with full powers to treat of a peace; and that the queen dowager of Sicily, &c. as above

II. He, the ſaid duke, propoſes, if the peace ſhould take place, to continue for a year after its commencement a priſoner within England; after which time he is to be ſet at liberty without any ranſom, upon his ſwearing fealty, homage, and allegiance to Henry, as true king of France and England, and never to recognize any other perſon or family in that capacity, and to fight for him to death againſt all living, and to bring all his tenants and ſubjects to do the ſame, under grievous penalties; but if they ſhould agree to this, they were to enjoy all the benefits ſtipulated by the treaty of Troye.

III. He promiſes the ſame for his friends, the duke of Alençon, the earl of Armagnac, the earl of Perche, and his own brother the earl of Angouleſme; and likewiſe to employ all his good offices with his friends who had dominions without France, ſuch as the dukes of Milan and Savoy, to acknowlege Henry as king of France, and to enter with him into a firm league and friendſhip.

IV. In caſe the peace ſhould not take place, he offers to put into the hands of the Engliſh the cities of Orleans and Blois, with all the forts and poſſeſſions belonging to his own family; and likewiſe to procure them the poſſeſſion of an infinite number of other places, not immediately depending upon himſelf, particularly Rochelle and Mount St. Michael, with Liſieux, Xaintes, Bourges, Chinon, Poictiers, Tourney, &c. or an equivalent for them all, except the two firſt-mentioned, which were to be delivered up without admitting an equivalent; and that if, in the mean time, king Henry ſhould pleaſe to confer on him any eſtate or poſt in England, he was, in like manner, ready to ſwear homage, fealty, and allegiance to him.

V. In caſe a general peace ſhould not be concluded, he, the ſaid duke of Orleans, agrees, for the greater ſecurity of performing his promiſes, to re-deliver himſelf a priſoner in England until all his engagements ſhould be fullfilled, unleſs the king and council of England ſhould find it expedient for their ſervice to give him leave, under the great-ſeal, to depart from England.

In another article he ſuppoſes the dauphin (as he affects to call king Charles) would be contented with an honourable and conſiderable appenage, or proviſion, for him and his heirs; which was the very thing the Engliſh aimed at in the negociation: and there cannot be a clearer proof than this very article, that the duke of Orleans was in concert with the court of France to impoſe upon England; for can it be ſuppoſed that Charles ever would entertain a thought of being ſatisfied with the above appenage in lieu of a crown and kingdom, to which he had an undoubted right? This hope, therefore, was inſinuated only to cauſe the Engliſh the more readily to fall into the ſnare. Rymer's Fœdera, vol. x. p. 556—559.

fifty taken priſoners. As to Arundel himſelf, he was mortally wounded and taken priſoner, and in a few days expired, to the great ſorrow of the duke of Bedford, who in him loſt one of his braveſt generals, and England one of the moſt accompliſhed of her noblemen.

But the loſs of this great man was in ſome meaſure ſupplied by the ſervices of the gallant lord Talbot, who arrived about the latter end of the ſummer from England, with four or five thouſand men, to whom he joined ſome troops drawn from garriſons; and being joined by the marſhal de Liſle Adam (whom Henry had made marſhal of France), at the head of about three thouſand troops, he recovered Creſpi in the county of Valois, Beaumont on the Oyſe, Creil, Pont St. Maixence, and Clermont in the Beauvoiſis, which had been ſurprized by the French: he even began the ſiege of Beauvais, but the bad weather obliged him to deſiſt. During theſe petty excurſions Charles went into Languedoc and Dauphiné*.

This year died the duke of Bourbon, a priſoner in England, being ſucceeded by his ſon, the earl of Clermont, in his honours and eſtate. This prince had ever continued zealouſly attached to the French intereſt; and, putting himſelf at the head of a formidable body of troops, he made a terrible irruption into the duke of Burgundy's eſtates; and his progreſs was ſo rapid, that, before that duke could get together an army to drive him out of his dominions, he laid waſte with fire and ſword great part of the open country, and ſurprized many of the towns. Upon notice of this, the duke of Bedford altered the deſtination of certain troops, which were to have beſieged Manche, and ordered them to march, under the lord Willoughby, to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Burgundy. It was not long before they came up with the main body of the French, at Lyonnois, and, after an obſtinate encounter, the Engliſh and Burgundians remained maſters of the field.

The duke did not fail to lay hold of this opportunity to repreſent, in very warm terms, to the council of England, this invaſion on his territories as the effect of the great load he was obliged to take of the war through their inactivity, and which extremely exhauſted his ſubjects: in ſhort, he began to ſhew himſelf greatly diſcontented; he complained of the duke of Bedford as having treated him diſreſpectfully in the affair of his marriage. His violent averſion to Charles, on account of the murder of his father, began now to abate; and having, in purſuit of his vengeance, done enough to ſatisfy his honour, by reducing France more than once to the brink of ruin, he was not averſe to a reconciliation with Charles, and no longer to perſiſt in ſetting a foreign family on the throne, even to the excluſion of himſelf and his blood. In this diſpoſition he lent a willing ear to a propoſal made him by the conſtable Richemont, of a conference at Nevers, under pretence of adjuſting matters between him and the count de Clermont, now duke of Bourbon. Accordingly, in January, 1435, the two dukes and the conſtable repaired to Nevers: the latter and the duke of Bourbon were accompanied by their wives, who were Philip's ſiſters; and this conference finiſhed the work, and determined him to drop his reſentments, and make peace with France. But there was, however, no pretence in decency for breaking off the propoſed conferences at Calais; and this might greatly have embarraſſed the duke in his newly adopted views, had not the council of Baſil, which was then ſitting, interpoſed; for the cardinal of St. Croix, who had ſome time before been ſent by that council to labour for an accommodation between France and England, now received freſh inſtructions to continue and redouble his efforts; and, under colour of his authority, it was reſolved that the conferences for a general peace ſhould be held at Arras inſtead of Calais. In the mean time, however, the French court had intrigued ſo well, that the duke of Burgundy, in a meeting he had with the archbiſhop of Rheims, chancellor of France, and others of Charles's miniſters, put the final hand to a ſeparate agreement with that monarch; but this was to be kept a profound ſecret till the event of the congreſs of Arras ſhould be known; and, the more effectually to cover their deſigns, they ſeemed impatient to fix a day for opening the congreſs, which was accordingly appointed for the month of July; and notices were ſent to the council of Baſil, and to almoſt all the powers of Europe, not even excepting the court of England, to ſend their plenipotentiaries to aſſiſt at the negociation, which, it was ſaid, was intended not only to cloſe the wounds of France, but to reſtore peace to the Chriſtian world.

In a word, the duke of Bedford and the government appear to have been completely duped in this affair, and not to have entertained the leaſt doubt of the duke of Burgundy's ſincerity: this is clearly evinced in that, when they came to nominate their plenipotentiaries at the approaching congreſs, they put the duke at the head of the commiſſion: this, indeed, laid that prince under a difficulty how to act, both as a plenipotentiary for England, and a principal contracting party in the negociation; but this difficulty he got partly over by the inſtructions which he gave to his commiſſioners, who appeared there for him as duke of Burgundy: on the whole it muſt be confeſſed, that this prince acted a very treacherous part through the whole affair.

A little before the opening of the congreſs, the Engliſh council received intelligence that the duke of Burgundy had ſolicited pope Eugenius to abſolve him from the oath which he had taken to the late king Henry. Eugenius being applied to on this ſubject, declared that the French prince had not made any ſuch demand; and that, for the future, he would obſerve ſuch conduct as would be ſatisfactory to the king of England. How religiouſly his holineſs obſerved his promiſe will appear by the ſequel.

The congreſs of Arras was not opened till the ſixth of Auguſt, though the firſt of July was the day appointed, all the plenipotentiaries not being arrived at that time. Thoſe on the part of Henry were partly Engliſh and partly French, as Henry treated in quality of king of both people: the Engliſh commiſſioners (beſides the duke of Burgundy, as chief) were the biſhops of Norwich and St. David's, the earls of Huntingdon and Suffolk, the lord Hungerford, Lyndwood, the famous canoniſt, keeper of the privy-ſeal, ſir John Radcliffe, conſtable of Guienne, ſir John Popham, ſir Robert Shotſ-borough, ſecretary Reynel, with the doctors Everard, Ruſſel, and Sprevor, all of them civilians*.

The chief of thoſe for Charles were the duke of Bourbon, the count de Richemont, conſtable of France; the count de Vendoſme, great-maſter of the houſhold; Renaud of Chartres, archbiſhop of Rheims and chancellor of France; Chriſtopher d'Harcourt, and Gilbert de la Fayette, marſhal of France.

Thoſe for the duke of Burgundy were, Rolin, his chancellor; the biſhops of Liege, Cambray, and Arras; the duke of Gueldres; the counts of Eſtampes, St. Pol, de Ligny, Vaudemont, Nevers, Naſſau, Montfort, Magie, and ſome others.

The kings of Poland, Caſtile, Navarre, and Sicily, the dukes of Brittany, Barr, and Milan ſent likewiſe their ambaſſadors, as the city of Paris and the great towns of Flanders did their deputies. The conferences were to be held under the mediation of the cardinal of St. Croix, who aſſiſted as repreſenting the pope, and the cardinal of Cyprus, who appeared on the part of the council of Baſil. In ſhort, no fewer than ten thouſand people extraordinary repaired to Arras on this occaſion †.

The conferences were begun by the duke of Burgundy, as firſt plenipotentiary for England: he demanded of the French commiſſioners the terms they were inſtructed to proceed upon, in writing; which they accordingly gave in, and were to the following purpoſe:

"That Henry ſhould lay aſide his ſtyle of king of France, and renounce, for himſelf and his heirs, all claim to that crown; and alſo that he ſhould give up Paris, and all the places he held in other parts of the kingdom: in conſideration of which he ſhould enjoy what he actually poſſeſſed in Guienne, together with the entire duchy of Normandy, but on condition of ſwearing homage and doing fealty to Charles, as king of France, for thoſe territories, agreeable to the ancient uſage."

The Engliſh plenipotentiaries were next called upon to give in their propoſals, which were,

"That Charles ſhould be left in peaceable poſſeſſion of all he already held on both ſides the Loire, on condition that the Engliſh ſhould retain the like poſſeſſion of all they held in France; but that to prevent any future differences, the places of the one power that lay in the heart of the other's poſſeſſions, ſhould be exchanged for the like places to be given up by the other power, or for ſome other equivalent." They likewiſe offered, "That their king ſhould marry a daughter of Charles; and that the duke of Orleans ſhould be ſet at liberty for a moderate ranſom."

The conferences on the ſubject did not laſt long; the French not receding from their demands, and the Engliſh abſolutely rejecting them as ſo remote from what the duke of Orleans had made them expect, all farther proceedings towards a peace between the two crowns were ſtopped, and the Engliſh plenipotentiaries (all but the duke of Burgundy), with all their retinue and attendance, left Arras on the ſixth of September, and proceeded to Calais, from whence they ſent the duke of Orleans over to England; for the Engliſh had been ſo far impoſed upon by that prince, that they had actually brought him with them to Calais, hoping that his preſence, and the reflection of his captivity, might have a great influence with the French commiſſioners in the proſecution of the negociation; but this ſtep had a very contrary effect, for the duke underhand wrote to his countrymen, encouraging them not to abate aught of their demands, nor to ſuffer his confinement in the leaſt to influence their proceedings.

The haſty departure of the Engliſh plenipotentiaries was by no means a ſubject of ſurprize either to the duke of Burgundy or the French ambaſſadors; they muſt have foreſeen that the offers they made, would be refuſed; nay, it may very reaſonably be preſumed, that it was for this very purpoſe they projected the plan of a congreſs for a general peace, well knowing that the Engliſh would reject the conditions they meant to propoſe, and their refuſal would furniſh the duke of Burgundy with a pretext for concluding a ſeparate accommodation: and here we may learn the true motives of the magnificent offers made by the duke of Orleans to the king of England, in caſe the conferences ſhould prove ineffectual.

Agreeable to this plan, on the Engliſh plenipotentiaries quitting the congreſs, their abrupt departure was exaggerated, and repreſented as a clear evidence they never intended to make peace; and the duke of Burgundy now openly declared, that he was not obliged to be governed by their humour, or render the war everlaſting for their ſake, but thought himſelf at full liberty to act for his own own intereſt; and, by the aſſiſtance of the mediating cardinals, the accommodation between him and Charles was very quickly finiſhed, for on the twenty-firſt of September (only fifteen days after the departure of the Engliſh ambaſſadors), the cardinals having previouſly abſolved the duke from the oath he had taken to the late and preſent kings of England, concluded a ſeparate treaty of peace with France, on the following terms.

"I That king Charles, though he excuſed himſelf from the murder of the duke of Burgundy, his father, yet he ſhould make ſatisfaction for his death, by puniſhing all that were found guilty of it, if they could be diſcovered and apprehended, by death; if not, by perpetual baniſhment: and ſhould build a church in Montberras, with a monaſtery of twelve monks and a ſuperior, which he ſhould endow with a ſufficient maintainance, to pray for his ſoul for ever.

"II. That king Charles ſhould pay to the duke of Burgundy fifty thouſand crowns, for the jewels that were taken from his father at the time of his death; and ſhould have liberty to recover thoſe that were not named, particularly the fleece, which was of a very great value, from any in whoſe poſſeſſion they were found.

"III. That the following countries, cities, and towns, with all their pre-eminences and juriſdictions, ſhould be immediately delivered up to Philip, duke of Burgundy, and ſettled on him and his heirs, whether male or female, viz. Maſon in Xaintoinge, the city of Auxerres, with the juriſdiction of Barr up the Seine, the city of Caſtel, with the lay patronage of the church and abbey of Leuxeule, pretended to, but never poſſeſſed by the dukes of Burgundy before, the cities of Montidier, Peron, St. Quintin, Corbie, Amiens, and Abbeville, the county of Ponthieu and Poictou, with the outbounds of Champagne.

"IV. That,

"IV. That, in case the king of England should make war upon the duke of Burgundy and his subjects, king Charles should assist him both by sea and land, as in his own cause, and should not make peace with him, unless he concluded him in it: and that, if king Charles should not fully keep to his agreement, his own subjects should not be bound to obey him; but being free from all oaths of allegiance to him, might assist the duke of Burgundy against him.

"V. That Charles, count Charlerois, son to duke Philip, should marry the lady Catherine, king Charles's daughter, and have with her in portion one hundred and twenty thousand crowns †."

The princes of the blood in France, and the noblemen of Burgundy, ratified this agreement under their hands and seals; and, on the fifth day of November, it was confirmed by the council of Basil, which denounced sentence of excommunication and interdict against that prince who should infringe the articles. Never had king of France made so dishonourable a peace; but it seems as if the French court thought nothing too much to bring the duke of Burgundy off from his alliance with England, as the surest means to extricate Charles from his difficulties.

If the defection of the duke of Burgundy was an unlucky incident for the English interest in France, it received a still more fatal blow, and almost at the same instant, by the death of the duke of Bedford, which happened this year, on the fourteenth of September, in the castle of Rouen. Very probably his indignation to be thus imposed upon by Charles and the duke of Burgundy, and his foreseeing that the affairs of his nephew were going to be irretrievably ruined, helped to throw him into the sickness of which he died. We have already given the chararacter of this prince; and shall only add, that it is hard to say, whether he shone most in the field or the cabinet, whether he was a greater hero or politician, and whether he was most esteemed or admired for his valour, his equity, or his moderation. There cannot be a greater proof of the veneration in which the memory of this excellent prince was held, even by his enemies, than the reply which Lewis XI. son of Charles VII. gave to one of his courtiers, who advised him to demolish the monument of Bedford *: "God forbid (said Lewis) that I should be guilty of such a base and ungenerous action, as to disturb the ashes of a prince, who, were he alive, would make the boldest of us all tremble; I rather wish that a more stately monument were erected to his memory ‖."

About the same time died Isabella, queen dowager of France, at Paris, very little lamented by the French, who considered her as the principal cause of all those miseries and calamities with which the kingdom had been so long oppressed.

The death of the regent, as we have already observed, was a terrible blow to the English interest in France; and the misfortune was made still greater by the squabbles of parties in the council of England, which caused a delay of seven months, in a juncture where a moment was not to be lost, before they could agree in the choice of a successor. The French found their advantage in this delay; and the garrison of Pontoise going out to forage, the townsmen rose, seized the place, and applied for assistance to the marshal de Lisle Adam, who, taking upon him the government of the town, delivered it afterwards to Charles VII. and was confirmed by him in that charge, as well as in the dignity of marshal of France. This general had never been hearty in the service of the English; and though young Henry had created him constable of France, yet he gladly embraced the first opportunity of returning to his allegiance to his lawful sovereign. The marshal de Reux, who had thrown himself into Dieppe, getting an army of eight or ten thousand men together, before the end of this year, reduced Feschamp and Mortvilliers, with all the towns and castles in the Upper Normandy, except Arques and Caudebec.

All these misfortunes, which were but so many preludes to far greater ones, struck a deadly damp into the minds of the English. A parliament had been assembled, on the tenth of October this year, at Westminster, in which the bishop of Bath and Wells, lord chancellor of England, in his speech at the opening of the session, gave the members a particular detail of the negociations at Arras, in which he represented the conduct of the duke of Burgundy in the blackest colours; and the nation was so exasperated at the news of that prince's defection, that they voted a large subsidy for carrying on the war, and to punish the faithless conduct, as it was termed, of the duke of Burgundy ‡.

Mean time the duke, willing to shew still some regard for Henry, sent two heralds with letters, to excuse his concluding a separate peace, in which he declared it was through no disaffection to the English that he had taken that step, but to comply with the earnest wishes and remonstrances of his harassed people, sinking beneath the load and calamity of so long a war; and concluded with exhorting Henry to enter into the like pacific sentiments, and conclude a peace upon just and moderate terms, offering his mediation between him and Charles for that purpose. This offer was looked upon as a fresh insult; besides, it was observed that the superscription of his letters was now in a different style to that he was wont to use; for whereas he had before always directed to Henry as his sovereign lord and king of France and England, he now only gave him the appellation of "Henry, by the grace of God king of England, our well beloved cousin §." It was resolved to return no answer to his letters; his heralds were treated with indignity; the parliament even took no precaution to conceal their indignation from the public; and the populace getting a hint of the affair, the mob rose in London, and fell upon the Flemings and others of the duke of Burgundy's trading subjects then in that city, killing some and plundering others, till a proclamation was iſſued to ſtop thoſe diſorders, and protections were granted to ſuch as, being ſettled in England, would take the oath of allegiance; but thoſe who would not, were immediately expelled. This ſtep had a great effect, for moſt of the Flemiſh, or Brabanders, ſettled here, immediately naturalized themſelves Engliſhmen†.

The duke of Burgundy, after the treatment his ambaſſadors and ſubjects had met with, thought he had no meaſures to keep with the Engliſh court; and, to give Charles an earneſt of his ſincerity, he corrupted the Engliſh commanders of Vincennes and Corbeil to betray them into his hands, and immediately reſigned them into thoſe of the French king. Several towns in Normandy alſo revolted to the French, and theſe conqueſts paved the way to the reduction of Paris itſelf.

Nothing could give a greater reputation to king Charles's affairs than reducing the capital of his realm; but his finances not being in a condition to ſupport ſo large an army as was neceſſary to beſiege it in form, the only way left of ſucceeding in the enterprize was to amuſe the court of England with freſh propoſals, while he might find means to eſtabliſh ſome intelligence within the place, ſo as to ſurprize it before the Engliſh could be upon their guard. With this view he made overtures of peace to Henry in the beginning of the year 1436, and offered to confirm it by giving that monarch the eldeſt daughter of France in marriage; and, amazing as it may ſeem, notwithſtanding the court of England had ſo lately, and with ſo much haughtineſs, rejected all terms with France, and when they could not be ignorant of the diſpoſitions which Charles and the duke of Burgundy were taking to drive the Engliſh entirely out of France, they liſtened ſo attentively to this propoſition, that Henry even named the duke of York and ſome others as his plenipotentiaries to treat of a peace; nay, he likewiſe named for his commiſſioners to conclude the marriage, the cardinal of England and the duke of Burgundy, with whom he was actually at war*. Let others account for this glaring contradiction, in the beſt manner they are able; I muſt confeſs myſelf utterly at a loſs herein, and ſhould look upon it as incredible, did it not ſtand as a fact vouched upon the face of our records.

This inconſiſtency or fluctuation in the Engliſh councils, however, regained to Charles his capital and his crown; for while his agents, in concert with the duke of Orleans and the count d'Armagnac, were amuſing Henry's court, he diſpatched the conſtable de Richemont, the marſhal Liſle Adam, and the count de Dunois, to attempt the great and deciſive conqueſt, which he had ſo much at heart. Corbeil and Vincennes had been already betrayed into the hands of thoſe generals; and they now made themſelves maſters, by the like treacherous artifices, of Eſcouan and St. Denis; ſo that Paris was in a manner blocked up, and its ſupply of proviſions greatly ſtraitened: it is true, that the conſtable's troops did not amount to above ſix thouſand men, even after he had been joined by a body of five hundred lances ſent by the duke of Burgundy; but the French generals found means to procure ſuch exact intelligence from within the place, that, with this handful, they proceeded to the reduction of it.

The lord Willoughby at this time commanded for Henry in Paris: he had no more Engliſh regular troops within the place than fifteen hundred, ſo that he was obliged to depend upon the French-Engliſh (or rather Burgundian) party among the citizens themſelves to guard the gates. It was by the help of this party that Liſle Adam had ſurprized the place, about fifteen years before, for the Engliſh; to them therefore he ſecretly applied on this occaſion; and finding the ſole difficulty they had as to their giving up the city, was leſt Charles, if ſucceſsful, ſhould puniſh them ſeverely for their long diſloyalty, the marſhal, who had foreſeen this objection, and wiſely provided againſt it, produced an act of amneſty under Charles's own hand, and guarantied by the duke of Burgundy, ſtipulating a full pardon, and reſtitution of all their privileges, to the Pariſians. This ſatisfied the conſpirators, and they undertook to let him into the town, early in the morning of Friday, the thirteenth of April, by the gate of St. Michael.

On the day appointed, Liſle Adam, with a choſen party, ſcaled the walls, by ladders let down by thoſe within; at the ſame time another party let down the draw-bridge, that the conſtable might enter with all his forces. The alarm ſoon ſpread, the Engliſh took to arms immediately, and Willoughby, with a wonderful preſence of mind, gave ſuch orders, that the conſtable would have been driven out of the city; but the French and Burgundian parties joining in his favour, drew chains acroſs the ſtreets, and roſe in every quarter, and while the garriſon endeavoured to repel the aſſailants, they were overwhelmed with a ſhower of ſtones from the windows and battlements of the whole city, echoing with repeated acclamations of "Long live king Charles VII. and the duke of Burgundy!"

The governor, unable to oppoſe ſuch a multitude of enemies, retired to the Baſtile, where he might have defended himſelf for a conſiderable time, had it been properly furniſhed with ſtores and amunition; but finding it deſtitute of every thing neceſſary for ſuſtaining a ſiege even of a ſhort continuance, he capitulated a few days after, upon condition of being allowed to retire unmoleſted, with his garriſon and their baggage, to Rouen ‡. St. Germain and Charenton ſoon followed the fate of the capital.

Upon the death of the duke of Bedford, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, was nominated to the regency of France; but Edmund Beaufort, third ſon of John Beaufort, earl of Somerſet (by an unaccountable miſtake, in all our hiſtorians called duke of Somerſet, though no ſuch title then exiſted §), and himſelf earl of Mortaigne in Normandy, and lord of Chirkland in the Marches of Wales, conteſted with him that dignity; and having gotten the duke of Gloceſter on his ſide, they managed their intrigues with ſuch art in the council, that the expediting of the duke's patent was delayed from time to time, which had given the patrizans of Charles in France leiſure to extend their conqueſts without oppoſition; but the loſs of Paris ſeems to have awakened the council of England out of the lethargic diſpoſition which had made them hitherto ſo ſhamefully neglect the affairs of France, and to have convinced them of the neceſſity of proſecuting the war there with vigour; at the ſame time certain intelligence arriving, that the duke of Burgundy was meditating a great blow upon ſome other of the capital poſſeſſions of the Engliſh in that country, the cardinal of Wincheſter, who had warmly eſpouſed the cauſe of the duke of York, at length prevailed to have the ſeals put to a commiſſion, appointing him the king's lieutenant-general in France ‡, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition of the duke of Gloceſter; and the duke of York ſet out for France with an army of eighty thouſand men; but theſe unhappy diſputes had ſo much retarded the public ſervice, that he did not arrive in that kingdom till the middle of May, when he landed in Normandy, where he recovered many ſmall places and caſtles, which the French had taken ſince the death of the duke of Bedford. While he was thus employed, he received intelligence that the duke of Burgundy was making great preparations for the ſiege of Calais; in conſequence of which he wrote over to the council in England, preſſing them to put that place in a poſture of defence. Nothing could alarm the court of England more than this news: orders were immediately iſſued for equipping a fleet and army, the former to be commanded by the earl of Huntingdon (John Holland), and the latter by the duke of Gloceſter, who, on this occaſion, obtained from Henry, as king of France, a grant for life of the county of Flanders; as John, lord Beaumont, did that of Boulogne.

In the mean time the duke of Burgundy, glowing with reſentment to find his good offices, towards bringing about a peace, ſo contemptuouſly treated by the Engliſh, had been continually endeavouring to diſtreſs Henry all he could; and having aſſembled the ſtates of his dominions, before whom he laid the proceedings and practices of the Engliſh court in the moſt odious lights, he at length prevailed with that ever fickle people to reſolve upon entering heartily into a war with England, and to begin by forming the ſiege of Calais. He had drawn together an army of fifty thouſand men, of which ſeventeen thouſand were inhabitants of Ghent, and with theſe he ſurprized the caſtles of Oye Marque, Sangate, and other fortreſſes of importance about Calais.

Before this laſt place he ſat down about the latter end of June, with his numerous army. The Flemings fancied that they ſhould have little more to do than ſhew themſelves, and that the garriſon would be terrified into an immediate ſurrender; but they ſoon found their miſtake. The beſieged made a moſt gallant defence, the place was well ſupplied with all neceſſaries, and the beſiegers found themſelves moſt terribly harraſſed by the ſucceſsful and well-conducted ſallies of the enemy. Philip, who hoped to acquire immortal fame by taking of one of the ſtrongeſt places in Europe, began to perceive with regret, that the attempt was beyond his power; however, as he knew that the duke of Gloceſter was daily expected to the relief of the place, he reſolved to omit nothing to prevent their ſuccours from entering, and ordered five or ſix great hulks, loaded with ſtones, to be ſunk at the mouth of the harbour, to choak up the entrance; but theſe veſſels lying aground on the ſands at low-water, the people of Calais, when the tide was out, found means to burn them, and otherwiſe render them uſeleſs.

The deſign of blocking up the port by ſea thus miſcarrying, a ſmall wooden fort was erected on the land-ſide, and well ſupplied with cannon and other military engines, to batter the place, and hinder the ſallies of the beſieged: this was taken by the Engliſh, and the Flemings, who guarded it, all put to the ſword. In the mean time the duke of Gloceſter arrived, with about fifteen thouſand men: he found the garriſon in ſo high ſpirits, and ſaw ſuch manifeſt ſigns of fear in the approaches of the beſiegers, that he immediately ſent a meſſenger to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. The latter accepted the challenge, as the only chance he now had for ſucceſs, deſpairing of ever being able to carry the town; but his boaſtful Flemings had experienced too much of the Engliſh valour to dare to meet it, even with ſuperior numbers, in the field: they pretended they were betrayed, the place not being inveſted by ſea, as they had been aſſured it would; in a word they ſhamefully broke up their camp, and made a moſt precipitate retreat. Philip, fearing that the garriſon of Calais might take advantage of the confuſion cauſed by this ſudden deſertion, drew up his regular troops to ſecure their retreat; and, leaving his artillery, baggage, and proviſions in the hands of the Engliſh retired to Gravelines *.

The duke of Gloceſter, having provided for the ſecurity of Calais, marched, with about ten thouſand men, into the very heart of Philip's county of Artois, burning and deſtroying all before him, and taking great plunder; but, for want of proviſions, he was forced ſoon after to return back to Calais. Nor was this the only loſs that the duke of Burgundy ſuſtained: hardly had he returned to his own dominions, when he had the mortification to ſee the maritime coaſts of his poſſeſſions in Flanders ravaged by an Engliſh fleet, while he himſelf was even in danger of loſing his life in a ſedition at Bruges, after having ſeen the marſhal Liſle Adam almoſt torn in pieces by the furious populace †.

This year Margaret, princeſs of Scotland, daughter of James I. who, the reader may remember, was affianced ſome time before to the dauphin of France, Lewis, having now completed her twelfth year, was ſent over to France, and the marriage was celebrated with the utmoſt pomp, on the fourteenth of June, at Tours.

The truce between England and Scotland expiring much about the ſame time, hoſtilities were recommenced between the two nations. The earl of Northumberland, with the other lords of the Marches, invaded Scotland, but were encountered, at a place called Pepperden, by William Douglas, earl of Angus, and ſome other Scottiſh noblemen, when, after an obſtinate engagement, victory fell to the Scots, who routed the Engliſh, killing fifteen hundred of their men, and taking above four hundred priſoners; while their own loſs did not amount to more than two hundred in all. The Engliſh council being apprized of the intended paſſage of the princeſs Margaret over to France, fitted out a fleet, which was ſtationed in the Channel in hopes to intercept her; but the Scottiſh ſquadron, ſailing round by the Weſtern Iſles, eſcaped the enemy's cruiſers, and landed their precious charge ſafely at Rochelle.

In the beginning of the year 1437 died queen Catherine of Valois, widow of Henry V. at the end of whoſe reign we have given an account of this lady's ſecond marriage, the deſcendants from which afterwards ſat on the throne of England. This princeſs was followed by Joan of Navarre, the other queen dowager of England, relict of Henry IV. beſide whom her remains were interred; a proof that, before her death, ſhe had got the better of the aſperſion that had been caſt upon her conduct and loyalty to the royal family.

Early this year a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, who made ſeveral regulations for the benefit of the marine and trading intereſt; and provided for the farther ſecurity of Calais, in conſequence of a repreſentation from the duke of Gloceſter, governor of that place, ſetting forth the danger it was in, and proteſting in form, that the loſs thereof ſhould not be imputed to him, if its preſervation was not attended to in time. In this parliament likewiſe ſir Richard Woodville, a gallant young ſoldier, and who had been captain or deputy-governor of Calais, owned his marriage with Jaquelina of Luxemburg, ducheſs dowager of Bedford, which having been contracted without the king's licence, the bridegroom was obliged to pay a thouſand pounds fine for that, and to obtain livery of her dowry; but he was afterwards (in the twenty-ſixth year of this reign) created earl of Rivers by patent. The remarkable acts of this parliament will be found in their proper place: taking leave of the civil, we will now proceed to the military tranſactions of this year.

The two parties in France paſſed the greateſt part of this year in daily inroads and ſurprizes upon each other, unchecked by the ſevere cold of the early part of the ſeaſon; for the brave and indefatigable Talbot found means to turn this very circumſtance to the advantage of his maſter's arms. Having undertaken to ſurprize Pontoiſe, he effected his deſign by a ſtratagem worthy of his military genius: knowing that the ditches of the place were frozen, and the country all about being covered with ſnow, he ordered a large body of his men to march by night, with white cloths over their armour; and coming before day to the foot of the walls, he made them lay down in the ditch, where they could not be diſtinguiſhed from the ſnow with which it was filled: the centinels being to be relieved at day-break, the Engliſh, on hearing the garriſon's drums, clapped their ſcaling-ladders to the wall, and entered the place ſo ſuddenly, that neither the garriſon nor Varambon, the governor, had time to make the leaſt defence, but took to precipitate flight for their own ſafety. The taking of this important poſt enabled the Engliſh to waſte the country and make incurſions to the very gates of Paris, to the great annoyance of that capital.

The garriſon of Crotoy, which was commanded by ſir John Standiſh, encouraged by the ſucceſs of Talbot, committed the like ravages in the adjacent parts of Ponthieu, and greatly harraſſed Abbeville and other towns, belonging both to Charles and the duke of Burgundy; this made the latter reſolve to lay ſiege to Crotoy in perſon: he accordingly ſat down before it with about ten thouſand of his beſt troops, but had the mortification to find his project baffled; for the duke of York, after having reduced Tancarville, Beauchatel, and Mateville, detached the lord Talbot with a body of five thouſand men, to relieve the place; and this experienced general, having paſſed the Somme at Blauquetaque, without oppoſition, advanced to Crotoy with ſo much reſolution and good order, that the duke thought proper to decamp, and ſuffer him, without reſiſtance, to ſupply the place with all neceſſaries, and even to ravage the neighbourhood for ſome days, after which the Engliſh general went and joined the regent's army in Normandy.

In the mean time Charles, after having ſpent the concluſion of the preceding year in celebrating the marriage of his ſon Lewis, the dauphin, with the princeſs of Scotland, in aſſembling the ſtates of Languedoc, and in ſettling matters in his other provinces ſouth of the Loire, made preparations for marching to Paris, which he had not yet honoured with his preſence. Accordingly, getting together an army of ſix thouſand men, he advanced to Brai, a town on the river Seine, and, after having taken Chateau Landon, Charni, Nemours, and ſome other Engliſh garriſons that lay in his way, he inveſted Montereau ſur Yonne, a poſt of conſequence as interrupting the communication of the county of Gatinois with Champagne and Burgundy.

This garriſon was commanded by ſir Thomas Gerard, a brave Engliſh officer, who made a gallant defence, though his numbers in the place did not amount to more than four hundred men. Hitherto Charles had not been remarkable for his perſonal courage, but on this occaſion he performed ſuch noble exploits as greatly ſurprized his friends and his enemies: having, after a long ſiege, given orders for a general aſſault, he was the firſt who jumped into the ditch, where the water came up to his middle, and was the firſt who mounted the walls; and ſo greatly were his men animated by his example, that the town was taken ſword in hand. After this conqueſt, by which he acquired great reputation, Charles went to Melun, having ſent the conſtable Richemont to diſpoſe things for his entry into Paris, where he arrived in perſon on the fourteenth of November this year, and was received with the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty and joy; while he, on his part, ſeemed to forget that the city had ever ſhut her gates againſt him. His firſt care was to re-eſtabliſh the parliament and courts of juſtice there, and to provide for the future good government of the city. But a ſtop was put to theſe ſalutary regulations; for a terrible famine, followed by a peſtilence, broke out among the impoveriſhed and long-harraſſed inhabitants, which carried off ſuch numbers as rendered it unſafe to live within the walls; and the king and court leaving the city, with the greateſt part of the remaining people, it became a perfect deſart.

But France did not alone experience calamities; England was rent by factions: the Somerſet party

at that court, ſworn enemies to the duke of York, of whom they had conceived a jealouſy, founded upon reaſons of blood, had intrigued ſo effectually againſt him, that he was recalled from the government of France this year, and Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, was appointed Henry's lieutenant-general in that kingdom. The old feuds between the cardinal and the duke of Gloceſter were alſo revived, with the moſt rancorous animoſity: the latter was indefatigable in attacking him whereever he lay open; and the other entrenched himſelf deep behind repeated general pardons from the crown for all treaſons or treſpaſſes he might be guilty of. Gloceſter had ever been a ſtrong oppoſer of the releaſe of the duke of Orleans, and the dying charge of the late king gave his oppoſition no ſmall weight; but, notwithſtanding, the cardinal-biſhop, glad of any opportunity to humble his antagoniſt, even though at the expence of his country's intereſt, lent a favourable ear to the propoſal made him by Charles, for bringing about the ranſom of the duke of Orleans, as the only perſon whoſe merit and rank could balance the credit of a party which, to Charles's infinite regret, he ſaw daily increaſing in his court, and of which his own ſon, the dauphin, a young man of a reſtleſs and ambitious diſpoſition, was at the head, and had engaged the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, with the counts de Vendoſme and Dunois (the famous baſtard of Orleans), to enter into his counſels and deſigns. Accordingly we find, at the end of this year, that not only a treaty for the enlargement of the captive duke was ſet on foot, but there was alſo a project for a final accommodation between the two crowns, by means of that prince.

But, in order to have a clear view both of the deſigns and intereſt of the court of England at this time, we muſt attend the events of neighbouring courts, which, had they been as carefully improved, as they favourably happened, for the Engliſh might have once more given them the aſcendency on the continent. And firſt we ſhall take a view of the Scottiſh affairs at this period, and give ſome account of the conſtitution of that nation, as it has been gathered from their beſt writers by a modern hiſtorian, whoſe words we ſhall nearly tranſcribe.

"The feudal law, which had been eſtabliſhed in that country, continued at this time in much greater rigour than in England, or perhaps any part of the world: but the Scots, receiving it more early than the Engliſh, received it with much greater imperfection. It was not like the great ſyſtem introduced by the Norman Conqueror (and afterwards alternately improved by the crown and the people, as the ſcale of power preponderated in favour of either), modelled ſo as to keep the balance even among the conſtituent parts of the legiſlature; for, in Scotland, it had an evident tendency to agrandize the middle order, that of the barons. What made this a misfortune was, the ſmallneſs of the qualifications of thoſe barons, by which ſuch vaſt numbers of them enjoyed the feudal rights to the higheſt extent.

"That there ſeems to have been no ſuch order among them as that of a knight, in the Engliſh ſenſe of the word, viz. as one depending upon a baron, and holding his lands for the ſervices he performed to his lawful lord in the field; by this, the militia, in effect, was in the hands of the barons; and, in all domeſtic differences, the only ſafety of the crown was, that when the diviſion was pretty equal, as it generally happened, the king's weight caſt the balance upon the ſide into which it was thrown. It is true, in all diſputes with England, the crown had very great influence, the cauſe being common, the king their common leader; and in this his ſubjects agreed, though they often agreed upon nothing elſe. As to the form of their government, that too retained all the fierceneſs of its Gothic model, without any of thoſe ſoftenings introduced into that of England; and, it muſt be owned, that the commons ſeem to have had no manner of ſhare in their government, before they were introduced by the Engliſh, under Edward I. Robert Bruce was too good a politician not to perceive that the continuing this order might in time prove ſome kind of balance to the formidable power of the barons; he therefore encouraged it, and burgeſſes now ſat in parliament, in the ſame chamber with the barons.

"From this ſhort view of the Scottiſh conſtitution, the reader may perceive, that there was not any intermediate order between the crown and the commons, as peers of the king's court. There was no other difference between the barons and the commons, than that the former ſerved hereditarily and collectively, the other elective and repreſentatively. The meaneſt commoner, even to the lateſt period in which the people could boaſt of a parliament, had the ſame deliberative and deciſive voice as the greateſt baron; they joined in the ſame proteſt, and enjoyed the ſame privileges, while their political capacity laſted. There were, it is true, in Scotland, as in other parts of Europe, diſtinctions of nobility, ſuch as dukes and earls; but this gave them no pre-eminence in voice above the meaneſt commoner returned to ſerve in parliament: by thoſe means there was no proportion between the influence of the barons in parliament, and their power in the field, the latter ſo greatly outweighing the former, that the appeal was generally made to the ſword.

"As to what was afterwards looked upon to be the repreſentation of the commons from counties in Scotland, it was, in effect, no fundamental in their conſtitution, but a mere matter of conveniency, and, apparently inconſiſtent with the feudal law, which ſuppoſes every baron to be a Par Curiæ, and therefore repreſenting himſelf. But they were not the commons that thoſe members from counties repreſented, they were actually the barons, who at firſt ſerved collectively, till (as it happened in ſome caſes in England) they, in general, began to think their attendance too expenſive and inconvenient*, and James, as a matter of grace, diſpenſed with the attendance of the ſmaller barons, upon their joining to ſend up a repreſentative for their county. But it is to be remembered that this was not the caſe of all the barons; for the king obliged the moſt able and the moſt conſiderable of them to attend his court. Upon the whole, therefore, the original of nobility in Scotland was purely accidental, and, as all nobility ought to be, was annexed to great property and great parts. As to a peerage, they never had any, in the Engliſh ſenſe of the word; and in this Gothic form ſtood the conſtitution of Scotland at the time we now treat of‡." I have been the more particular in this account of a people to whom the Engliſh are now ſo intimately related, not only becauſe it has a connection with Engliſh hiſtory, but becauſe the reader, from this repreſentation, may form ſome conjecture how far the Engliſh had gained or loſt, by the alterations which had been introduced into their own feudal ſyſtem.

James I. of Scotland, though endowed with great abilities for government, had an education too foreign from the manners of the Scots, which had puſhed him upon ſome impolitic ſeverities. He had undertaken to humble the overgrown power of the barons, and he ſeems to have had it in view to worm them out of the militia, by bringing the parliament to paſs ſeveral acts eſtabliſhing a kind of reformed militia, which was to be commanded by the reſpective ſheriff of each county. He brought to juſtice many of his great men, who, during his exile, had acquired exorbitant powers: and, as he had the commons on his ſide, who were glad of the royal authority to ſhelter themſelves from the tyranny of their more immediate lords, he proceeded ſo far as to take off every man whoſe temper or power he dreaded, and that with a ſeverity too much ſavouring of cruelty.

Theſe proceedings neceſſarily gave diſguſt to many of the great men, but to no one more than Walter Stuart, earl of Athol, who, with the aſſiſtance of a bold outlaw, called Græme, and a briſk ambitious young man of his own name, and heir to his eſtates and honours, formed a conſpiracy for taking off a prince whom they looked upon as a bloody tyrant, for oppoſing the ambitious and oppreſſive proceedings of his nobles. The plot was carried on with ſuch ſecrecy, that James knew nothing of it till he ſaw himſelf ſurrounded by the conſpirators at dead of night, in the convent of Dominicans at Perth, where he then lodged. The king had juſt time to ſtart from his bed and ſeize his ſword, when the ruffians entered his apartment and attacked him; he bravely defended himſelf for ſome time, and his queen interpoſed her own body between that of her huſband and the ſwords of the traitors, receiving ſome dangerous wounds in his defence; but this noble exertion of conjugal affection proved ineffectual, and ſhe had the grief to behold her royal conſort expire under twenty-eight wounds, many of them mortal.

This tragical event might have been improved to the advantage of England, who was not only freed thereby from a dangerous neighbour, attached to its enemy of France, but ſaw him ſucceeded by an infant, during whoſe minority the government of Scotland was chiefly influenced by the queen-mother, an Engliſh woman by birth, and related to Henry; but the domeſtic diviſions of the Engliſh court prevented the ſuitable meaſures, which ſuch a ſituation of affairs ſeemed to point out, from taking place: on the contrary, on the laſt day of March, 1438, a new truce was concluded with Scotland for nine years, viz. form the firſt of May, 1438, to the firſt of May, 1447; and a meeting was appointed for fixing the Marches of both kingdoms. Thus did the Engliſh loſe the faireſt opportunity they could have of breaking the connexions between France and Scotland, and of recovering their intereſts in both countries.

Nor was their conduct leſs impolitic with regard to the former of theſe courts. Charles, the French king, as we have already obſerved, began to be diſtracted by civil jealouſies. Some of his great men, who had ſerved him faithfully, and who, thinking themſelves but indifferently rewarded, had begun to form a party under the young dauphin againſt the government. This had put Charles upon uſing all his endeavours to obtain the enlargement of the duke of Orleans, and he ſucceeded ſo well in this, that it was actually agreed to in the Engliſh court, by the influence of the cardinal-biſhop. This unpopular ſtep was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the duke of Gloceſter, but not all his credit could prevent a new train of negociations from taking place, for we find, in the Collection of Public Acts *, this year, 1438, that a treaty with France was ſet on foot, at the requeſt of the duke of Brittany, who it ſeems had been importuned thereto by the pope.

Thus the court of England ſuffered itſelf to be amuſed at this critical juncture, without taking advantage of the many happy circumſtances that preſented in its favour.

This year produced but few remarkable military events; England as well as France being afflicted with the peſtilence, the war languiſhed for want of reinforcements, and nothing was undertaken, on either ſide, of greater importance than ſome petty ſiege or pillaging excurſions. The duke of Burgundy, indeed, chagrined at his late miſcarriage before Calais, reſolved, if poſſible, to retrieve his honour by a ſecond attempt againſt that place, from the nature of which he hoped for greater ſucceſs than in his laſt. He employed a great number of pioneers, and other workmen, to cut a dyke, through which he imagined the town would be ſuddenly overflowed by the ſea ruſhing in, and he propoſed entering the town ſword in hand, when the inhabitants ſhould be in the midſt of the terror and confuſion cauſed by ſuch an unexpected event; but the town being higher than the ſea, his deſign was baffled, and the earl of Huntingdon arriving with a numerous ſupply of men from England, the duke was obliged to give over his undertaking.

No other event of conſequence happened this year, excepting William Brunellard, governor of Dreux, giving up that place to the French for eighteen thouſand crowns; and ſir Francis Surienne receiving ten thouſand ſaluts d'or† for himſelf, with five thouſand for his garriſon, for the ſurrender of Montargis. On the other hand, the lord Talbot made himſelf maſter of Longueville, Cales, Manille, and ſeveral other places.

But the famine and peſtilence ceaſing in England and France, both ſides prepared to renew the war with vigour, as the moſt effectual method to haſten the concluſion of a peace, which each court was equally deſirous of bringing about. Accordingly, in the month of March, 1439, the conſtable de Richemont, with an army of four thouſand men at arms, laid ſiege to Meaux, one of the ſtrongeſt places in France, which had formerly held out ſeven months againſt Henry V. This city was commanded by the bailard of Thian, an officer of diſtinguiſhed military talents and valour, who had under him ſir John Ripley and ſir William Chamberlain; but, notwithſtanding this general made ſo brave a defence as aſtoniſhed the beſiegers, yet the town was taken by ſtorm, after holding out three weeks, and the gallant governor was taken priſoner in the action; when the conſtable, by a cruel ſeverity, of which, to ſay the truth, the Engliſh had, in the courſe of the war, ſet him but too frequent examples, ordered his head to be ſtruck off, becauſe he was a Frenchman, and, as ſuch deemed a rebel.

The work of the beſiegers was, however, but half completed by the taking of the town; for the garriſon, conſiſting of about five hundred men, headed by Ripley and Chamberlain, retired into the Marché, or Market-place (that part of the city ſo called, which is ſeparated from the other by the river Marne which runs through it), and breaking down the bridge of communication over the river, the conſtable found that he had a new ſiege to undertake, more difficult than the former; however, determined to carry the place at all events, he drew lines of circumvallation, flanked with redoubts, quite round it.

The active Talbot, hearing of the brave defence made by his countrymen, got together a body of about four thouſand troops, and advanced with a reſolution of relieving them; and, falling upon the French camp ſuddenly, and with great fury, he cut his way through the enemy, and threw four hundred men, with a ſupply of proviſions, into the city; after which he retired, without the French daring to follow him, or come to an engagement. But Charles, being informed that Talbot meditated a return, with a ſtill more conſiderable ſupply, he reinforced the conſtable ſo ſeaſonably, and the latter puſhed the ſiege with a vigour and impetuoſity, that obliged thoſe within to capitulate †.

The reduction of this important fortreſs greatly raiſed the conſtable's reputation, who, to make the moſt of the ardour of his ſoldiers, elated by ſucceſs, immediately formed the ſiege of Avranches, now in the hands of the Engliſh; but Talbot, who was on his way to Meaux with a body of troops deſigned for the relief of that place, hearing of its fate, and how the conſtable was at preſent employed, he advanced againſt that general, attacked and forced his lines, and forced him to abandon his undertaking.

Talbot then turned his victorious arms againſt Harfleur; but as his army was not ſtrong enough to form a regular ſiege, he contented himſelf with blocking up the town, and at the ſame time entrenched himſelf in ſuch an advantageous manner, as to bid defiance to almoſt any numbers to force him; in the mean time the earl of Mortaigne kept the place beleaguered by ſea. The earl of Eu, lately arrived from England, where he had been long priſoner, and now exchanged for John Beaufort, earl of Somerſet, approached, at the head of a body of troops, to attack the Engliſh entrenchments; but perceiving the nature of their ſituation, he thought proper to retire, after making a ſlight attempt, in which the count de Gaucourt was made priſoner by the Engliſh. Talbot, after continuing the blockade for above four months, at length made himſelf maſter of the town. He then proceeded to clear the reſt of Normandy of the French garriſons that occupied ſeveral caſtles there, until he conquered the whole province, the ſingle town of Dieppe only excepted.

Though the war was thus carrying on in France with equal fury, yet both courts ſeemed to lean towards peace. We have already taken notice, that negociations had been ſet on foot the preceding year for that purpoſe, at the requeſt of the duke of Brittany; and the duke of Orleans took an opportunity to offer his mediation in conjunction with that of the beforementioned prince, and for that end renewed his inſtances for leave to go to Calais to confer with that duke. This was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by Gloceſter, who plainly ſaw, and loudly declared, that the duke of Orleans could not be an impartial mediator; but his great antagoniſt, the cardinal of England, began to gain an aſcendant over him, in proportion as the king advanced in years: poſſeſſed of greater wealth than any other ſubject in the realm, he was always able to furniſh Henry with ſupplies of money on every emergency, and by this and ſeveral other means, he ſo engaged Henry's affection, that he truſted wholly to him for information; and being naturally of a weak capacity and jealous diſpoſition, was eaſily induced to believe that the duke of Gloceſter deſigned to keep him in perpetual dependence; this raiſed in him ſo violent an averſion to his uncle, that he omitted no opportunity of thwarting him, ſo that Gloceſter's oppoſition was of more ſervice to Orleans than all the power and intereſt of his friends, or the largeneſs of the ſum he offered for his ranſom: in fine, it was agreed that he ſhould have liberty to go to Calais and confer with the duke of Brittany. But the moſt remarkable circumſtance of all, was a power which Henry gave to the cardinal-biſhop of repairing to Calais, and there opening the conferences with the French miniſtry. This is a further proof in how ſmall conſideration the duke of Gloceſter now was at his nephew's court. What is here related paſſed in the preceding year; but, as we choſe to keep the account of this negociation entire, we reſerved it for this place.

In the month of January this year, Iſabella of Portugal, ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, and the cardinal of Wincheſter, had an interview between Calais and Gravelines, when they agreed that the negociation ſhould be double on the part of England, one with the duke of Burgundy, which was to be managed between the ducheſs and the cardinal-biſhop; and another between the commiſſioners of England and France, the ſaid ducheſs and cardinal, together with the dukes of Brittany and Orleans, acting as mediators. Purſuant to this agreement, the very place where the ducheſs and cardinal were, was choſen for holding the congreſs; and plenipotentiaries were nominated on both ſides from the princes of the blood and the chief noblemen of both kingdoms *.

† Monſtrelet, p. 162, 163.

* The commiſſioners for Henry were, beſides the cardinal, John, archbiſhop of York; John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk; the biſhops of Norwich and St. David's; with the earls of Stafford and Oxford, and the lords Bourchier and Hungerford; beſides ſeveral civilians and other officers of ſtate: thoſe for the king of France, beſides the duke of Orleans, were the chancellor archbiſhop of Rheims, the counts of Vendoſme and Dunois, the lord of Buſche, and ſome other French counſellors. Rymer, vol. x. p. 728.

We have, in Mr. Rymer's Collection, a full copy of the inſtructions given to the Engliſh plenipotentiaries on this occaſion, of which we ſhall here give the ſubſtance, as it will ſerve to ſhew how the council of England ſtood diſpoſed with regard to a peace; as alſo enable the intelligent reader to judge which of the two parties is to be blamed for breaking off the conferences. The chief heads were:

Firſt, that they ſhall inſiſt upon the king of England's hereditary right to the crown of France, and enforce it by mentioning the many ſignal victories obtained by the Engliſh againſt the French; and that they ſhall propoſe to leave Charles in poſſeſſion of Languedoc, and as many other eſtates beyond the Loire as ſhall amount to twenty thouſand pounds a year, to be held of Henry.

Secondly, that if this offer ſhould be rejected, the cardinal, in his quality of a prelate of the church, and a mediator, ſhould make pathetic repreſentations to the aſſembly upon the miſeries of war, and the damage which it has already entailed upon the whole Chriſtian world; he is likewiſe to repreſent, that the indiviſibility of the monarchy is a mere chimera, ſince both before and after the reign of Charlemaign, ſeveral princes had divided it among themſelves: but that if thoſe repreſentations ſhall have no effect, the plenipotentiaries are to proceed to offer Charles all the dominions beyond the Loire (the duchy of Guienne, and the earldom of Poictou excepted, and thoſe other eſtates which the kings of England were poſſeſſed of there before they ſucceeded to the crown of France.) But we are to underſtand that Charles is ſtill to hold the ſame of Henry, as ſovereign.

Thirdly, if this propoſal ſhould be likewiſe rejected, the plenipotentiaries were further empowered to offer all the territories beyond the Loire, excepting thoſe places which Henry was then actually poſſeſſed of,; and they were to expatiate greatly upon this conceſſion, which gave up ſo many fair towns and fruitful provinces, &c.

Fourthly, if the laſt propoſition ſhould likewiſe be rejected, the plenipotentiaries are to offer, that their maſter ſhall accept of all that part of France, which his predeceſſors enjoyed, not as kings of France, but in their own private right, comprehending the towns and marches of Calais, the county, caſtle, and lordſhip of Guiſnes, according to the limits and bounds ſpecified in the treaty of Bretigny; but without holding them of the crown of France, or any other power.

They are likewiſe inſtructed, that, if the French plenipotentiaries ſhould inſiſt upon the crown of France being reſtored to the eſtates it held in Normandy, and other places, while they were poſſeſſed by the kings of England, they ſhall agree to the ſame, provided thoſe eſtates are not already given or granted away to Henry's ſubjects; but that Henry will conſent that Charles ſhall have the reverſion of them, or purchaſe them from their preſent owners.

This laſt article ſeems to have been the ultimatum of the Engliſh plenipotentiaries, for the reſt of their inſtructions proceeded upon two points, which were in the breaſt of the cardinal: the firſt of which was Henry's renouncing the title and arms of France; the other was the marriage between Henry and the daughter of Charles, upon which the plenipotentiaries were to ſay they had no inſtructions.

It is extremely plain, from the tenor of theſe inſtructions, that though the council were earneſtly deſirous of a peace, they durſt not preſume ſo far upon the patience of the people to purchaſe it too dear, for they deſcend no farther than what we have ſeen; but at the ſame time the plenipotentiaries are inſtructed at the end of the writing, to conclude a truce for any term of time, between forty and eight or ten years, in caſe that a final peace could could not be agreed upon, and that towns ſhould be exchanged for the better obſervation of the ſame. By the ſame inſtructions, likewiſe, the ranſom of the duke of Orleans was fixed at one hundred thouſand marks, of which Henry would accept of Harfleur, Dieppe, and Mount St. Michael, for one half.*

Very different were the inſtructions given to the French plenipotentiaries; all that they were empowered to offer, was "That the Engliſh ſhould enjoy all they poſſeſſed in the duchy of Guienne, with the balliages of Evreux, Caen, and the Contentin, Calais and Guiſnes, with their marches and dependencies, the ſovereignty of the duchy of Alençon, and what they held in Picardy; but then Henry was, on his part to do homage and fealty to Charles for all thoſe territories, to make an abſolute renunciation of his claim to the crown of France, and to deſiſt from bearing either its arms or titles †."

The ducheſs of Burgundy and the duke of Orleans ſaw very plainly that it was impoſſible peace could be concluded, whilſt both ſides continued ſo ſtiff, the Engliſh for the arms, titles, and crown of France, which they were required to renounce, and the French for the homage and ſuperiority of the ceded territories, that, far from either yielding aught to the other, they would not agree to a ſuſpenſion of their claims for fifteen, twenty, or thirty years, as propoſed in a plan of accommodation drawn up by the ducheſs of Burgundy and the duke of Orleans. Accordingly, after the ambaſſadors had exerted their utmoſt ſagacity and penetration, in order to diſcover the extent of each other's powers, but without effect, it was propoſed to adjourn the conferences till both parties had the ſenſe of their courts upon the heads in diſpute: this was agreed to, but the terms propoſed were ſo diſagreeable to both parties, that the negociation never was reſumed.

Whilſt this affair was in agitation, the court-diviſions among the French aroſe to ſuch an height as to endanger their newly recovered ſtate. The dauphin and many of the princes of the blood were joined in a league againſt the king, which tended to no leſs than the dethroning him, and ſetting the crown upon the head of his ſon. The particular reaſons that cauſed this commotion are foreign to our purpoſe to relate; we ſhall, therefore, only obſerve, that Charles, by his reſolution and the aſſiſtance of the conſtable Richemont, reduced the refractory to obedience towards the latter end of this year; and that, though theſe diſturbances continued in France for near twelve months, the Engliſh, either for want of ſtrength to improve the opportunity, or from ſupineneſs and neglect, derived not the leaſt advantage therefrom to their affairs in France.

Early in the year 1440 died Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, regent or lieutenant-general of France: he was ſucceeded by the duke of York, who was now ſent thither in that quality, though he had been before recalled to give place to the earl. The duke was probably indebted for this honour to the cardinal-biſhop, who had the ſole management of Henry's government.

About this time the affair of the duke of Orleans was again reſumed. This prince had, by his zeal for bringing about the late treaty to a concluſion, or by ſome other means, ſo recommended himſelf to the council of England, that they reſolved to ſet him at liberty upon the payment of forty thouſand nobles in hand, and giving ſecurity for fourteen thouſand more, payable at different terms, and engaging not to bear arms againſt Henry, nor do any thing to his prejudice ‡.

The duke of Gloceſter had always oppoſed the releaſe of the duke of Orleans: the late king his brother's will was with him an inviolable law; beſides, he was perſuaded the giving Orleans his liberty, would only increaſe the number of the enemies of England; and now, when he ſaw this matter drawing towards an iſſue, he renewed his oppoſition with the greateſt firmneſs; but finding all his endeavours in vain, and that the majority of the council were for admitting the duke to ranſom, he drew up a formal proteſt againſt that meaſure, with the reaſons for his opinion. The ſum of the duke's proteſt was as follows:

"His chief reaſons, he ſaid, were taken from the known weakneſs of Charles VII. and the dauphin his ſon, and the diſſentions between them, which, in all probability, would influence the ſtates of France to truſt the duke of Orleans, whoſe great and extenſive knowlege has been well approved, with the adminiſtration of the affairs of the kingdom: the diſcouragement his enlargement would give to the eſtates of Normandy, which had hitherto contributed ſo largely, and with ſo much alacrity, to the defence of that country: the uncertainty whither the duke would not think himſelf more obliged to obey his ſovereign's commands, than to obſerve his own oath; and the want of a remedy, in caſe the bonds and obligations for his ranſom-money ſhould not be paid: the danger of loſing Guienne, that ancient inheritance of the crown, from the alliance between the duke of Orleans and the counts of Armagnac and Foix, and the lord d'Albret: the late reconciliation between the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, at Calais, during the negociations, which ought to create a dread of their joining forces to drive the Engliſh out of France, inſtead of expecting any advantage by their diſſention: the ill look it would have abroad, as if the crown of England (which had no alliance but with Portugal) could not maintain the war without raiſing money by a ranſom, which would endanger the loſs of all it as yet poſſeſſed in France: laſtly, that it was known to every one, the late king, wiſely weighing the danger which would ariſe from the enlargement of the duke of Orleans, forbade, upon his death-bed, to releaſe that prince till a peace was concluded †."

Theſe reaſons, however, appeared to have no weight, and the duke of Orleans obtained his liberty, after an impriſonment of twenty five years, on much eaſier terms than thoſe he had offered before the conferences at Arras; and, having taken an oath, before he left London, to perform all the conditions of his ranſom, he was finally enlarged at Gravelines, on the twelfth of November: and being met there by the duke of Burgundy, went with him to St. Omer's, where he ſoon after married that prince's niece, Margaret of Cleves, agreeable to an agreement that had been made with the ducheſs of Burgundy, in her ſon's name, during the conferences at Calais.

Very little, beſides what we have related, paſſed either in England or on the continent, during this year, if we except an attempt made by Charles, who had now taken a liking to military avocations, to recover Pontoiſe, which, being ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh, greatly annoyed the Pariſians. He laid cloſe ſiege to this place for ſome months; but the duke of York arriving in France about the middle of Auguſt, with an army of twelve thouſand men, advanced to the place, and offered the French king battle; and, upon his declining it, paſſed the river Oyſe, in ſight of the French army, in order to attack Charles's head-quarters at Maubueſſon; upon which that prince, whoſe unvarying maxim it was, never to fight the Engliſh but with the moſt deciſive advantage on his ſide, thought proper to retreat, and the Engliſh entered Pontoiſe in triumph. After leaving a thouſand freſh men in the place, they marched out, and again offered Charles battle at Poiſy, but not finding themſelves able to force him to fight, they were obliged to return into winter-quarters at Rouen.

But Charles could not eaſily digeſt the affront put upon his almoſt maiden arms at Pontoiſe; determined to retrieve his baffled honour and ſtill the clamour of his people, who looked upon their late ſucceſſes as earneſts of their future invincibility. In this diſpoſition he aſſembled a greater army than he had for many years commanded; the French hiſtorians tell us that it amounted to twenty thouſand men. He was attended by the dauphin, the earl of Maine (or Anjou), and Richemont the conſtable; and, taking the field in the ſpring of the year 1441, his firſt attempt was againſt Creil, a town ſituate on the Oyſe, which he carried without much reſiſtance. He next formed anew the ſiege of Pontoiſe, with twelve thouſand of his beſt troops. Charles was bent on the reduction of the place, but he had a great general to oppoſe. Talbot, commiſſioned by the duke of York to introduce a convoy into the town, deſpiſing the moſt difficult enterprizes, marching up with only four thouſand men, made ſuch a ſeaſonable and vigorous attack upon the enemy's quarters, that he obliged them to give way, and introduced his ſupplies into the place.

Charles, however, behaved on this occaſion with equal bravery and conduct; he was the foremoſt in all poſts of danger. The garriſon, on their ſide, conſtantly harraſſed the French by their ſallies; while the beſiegers continued to batter the walls furiouſly with their cannon: at length, having made three breaches, and beaten down the church of Notre Dame, they attacked and took a fort, which, overlooking the town, enabled them to annoy the beſieged with their long guns and culverins. Soon after Charles gave orders for a general aſſault, and, forcing his way in deſpite of all the efforts of the enemy, he mounted the battlements ſword in hand, and was himſelf the firſt who planted the French colours on the walls. Sir Nicholas Burdet, with five hundred of the garriſon, were ſlain in the defence of the breaches, and about as many more taken priſoners. Four days after the taking of Pontoiſe, the town of Evreux was ſurprized by the French, as was likewiſe Beaumont le Rayer. Thus, before the end of this year's campaign, the Engliſh were ſtripped of all their places of ſtrength in the neighbourhood of Paris, excepting Vernon and Mante †.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting in France, there paſſed a ſcene in England that attracted the whole attention of that people; a ſcene infamous by its agents, and more ſo by its motives. We have already obſerved, that the duke of Gloceſter's credit ſenſibly declined; in ſhort, he had no other footing in the cabinet than what his perſonal integrity gave him. But the cardinal of Wincheſter, his implacable enemy, not contented with having ruined his intereſt, concerted ſchemes even againſt his life, by endeavouring to fix upon him the imputation of high-treaſon; but the duke's known attachment to his ſovereign getting the better of theſe arts, Wincheſter was obliged to change his battery. Eleanor, ducheſs of Gloceſter, had formerly been that prince's miſtreſs: ſhe loved him with the greateſt warmth of affection; the duke, however, was not ſtrictly true to her bed. She was apprized of this; and a certain fanaticiſm, compoſed of ſuperſtition and ignorance, prompted her to apply to certain perſons, who pretended to underſtand necromancy and to deal in love-powders and incantations. This coming to the cardinal's ears, who had planted emiſſaries to obſerve all that paſſed in the duke's family, he from thence took occaſion to have the ducheſs ſeized, together with her accomplices, who had all along impoſed upon her credulity; and a charge was immediately made out againſt her, for having practiſed ſorcery againſt the life of the king, by making an image of wax to reſemble Henry, and melting it gradually before the fire, in hopes that as this conſumed, the king's conſtitution would decay. A ſlight indiſpoſition under which Henry had for ſome time laboured, favoured this charge; the credulous populace, ready to adopt every idle tale, gave into the ſnare. Judges were appointed to try the ducheſs and her accomplices on this abſurd charge: as there are always wretches to be found, in every degree, ready to ſacrifice honour, virtue, truth, and religion at the altar of preferment, it was not long before ſhe was adjudged guilty, and ſentenced to do public penance for three days ſucceſſively, by walking bare-footed and bare-headed, with a waxen taper in her hand, through the ſtreets of London, to St. Paul's church, and then to be committed priſoner for life to Cheſter caſtle, under the cuſtody of ſir Thomas Stanley*. This ſentence was literally executed: the enemies of the duke of Gloceſter hoping that this public diſgrace would either ruin his popularity, or provoke him to take ſome deſperate meaſures againſt the government; but they were diſappointed in part of their expectation; the duke was an enthuſiaſt in loyalty, and bore his wrongs with the utmoſt reſignation: however, this dreadful mortification ſhook his credit ſo much, that he could never again recover his ground.

As for the accomplices of the ducheſs, or rather her deceivers, who were one Roger Bolinbroke and Thomas Southwell, two prieſts, a woman named Margery Gurdeman, a pretended witch, with Hume and another prieſt, and one Woodham an eſquire, the two former were hanged, and the woman was burnt alive; but Hume and Woodham received their pardon, which gave moſt people reaſon to believe that they had been in concert with the duke and ducheſs's enemies, eſpecially as they kept up to the ſtory of the image, thereby to ſerve the cardinal's inſatiate malice, while the others diſclaimed all knowlege of ſuch a circumſtance even with their dying breath.

Nor was this the only triumph which the cardinal gained over his antagoniſt, the duke of Gloceſter: he ſhewed his ſuperiority of intereſt in other affairs of more importance to the nation. He always ſeconded every propoſal of accommodation with France, with which the court of England was continually amuſed; this occaſioned a heavy deſponding inactivity all the remaining part of this year, and the French were left in quiet poſſeſſion of their late acquiſitions.

But while England was ſuffering by theſe ſhameful diſſentions, the ſtate of affairs at the court of France wore not a much better face. Charles had ſcarcely time to repoſe himſelf after the ſiege of Pontoiſe, when he was alarmed by the ſtrongeſt cabal of oppoſition that ever threatened his government. Almoſt all the princes of the blood were in a freſh league againſt him, with the duke of Orleans at their head. This prince was highly offended at the cold reception he received from the king, after a twenty-years captivity for the intereſt of France, and even during which he had done him ſignal ſervices. Probably this league would have entirely ruined the king's affairs, if, by his prudent conduct he had not found means to gain over the head by conſiderable favours; the duke of Orleans deſerting the faction, all their meaſures were broken, and they were forced to throw themſelves upon the king's mercy, who, with a politic gentleneſs, gave them pardon, and thus put an end to their league ‡.

In the year 1442, the Engliſh ſeemed to awake from their infatuation. At that time the duke of York was in France, and all the beſt officers in England ſerved under him. It was reſolved to take advantage of the before-mentioned diſſentions in the French court, which laſted for ſeveral months: and the duke of York formed the army into three diviſions, one of which he commanded in perſon, another he committed to the charge of the lord Willoughby, and Talbot was at the head of the third; while the earl of Huntingdon, who had a ſeparate command in Guienne, was appointed to act in that province. By theſe diſpoſitions the French found themſelves extremely harraſſed; but the chief and moſt vigorous operations were carried on by the lord Talbot, whom the king this year created earl of Shrewſbury ‖, and the earl of Huntingdon, we ſhall therefore confine ourſelves to the narrative of theſe.

Talbot's firſt operation was againſt the caſtle of Conches; and the count de Dunois ſeeking to divert him from his undertaking, ſat down before Gaillardon: but the ſtratagem turned againſt the inventor, for Gaillardon making a better reſiſtance than Conches, Talbot, after taking poſſeſſion of the latter, marched to beat up the quarters of Dunois before Gaillardon; but this general knowing that he could not engage but under a diſadvantage, retired before the other could come up. By this retreat Talbot found himſelf at liberty to purſue a more extenſive plan which he had formed, and which he now began to put in execution by laying ſiege to Dieppe, which was defended by de Forêt, a brave French gentleman, who had under him ſeveral gallant officers. Talbot having made himſelf maſter of an eminence above the ſuburbs on the land ſide, erected a fort there, from whence he moſt furiouſly battered the tower of Polet and the walls of the place with almoſt two hundred cannon. Nevertheleſs it continued to hold out obſtinately for above nine months, the count de Dunois having found means, during the ſiege to throw himſelf into it with nine hundred ſoldiers; but Talbot, having likewiſe gotten a new reinforcement, muſt at length have carried it, had not the dauphin, ſent by his father Charles, arrived before the place, now almoſt in ruins, about the middle of Auguſt, and attacked the Engliſh with great fury: the earl of Shrewſbury was then gone to Rouen, and had left the care of the ſiege to his ſon, John Talbot, who made a moſt gallant reſiſtance, but was taken priſoner, and the place relieved. On this occaſion the dauphin behaved in ſo gallant a manner as gained him great reputation.

While the ſiege of Dieppe was carrying on, the earl of Huntingdon undertook that of Tartas, which lay in the lordſhip of d'Albret, in Guienne. The ſiege laſted for ſeveral months, with equal obſtinacy on both parts, at laſt the garriſon capitulated to ſurrender, if not relieved by Midſummer; but Charles, being ſtrongly ſolicited by the lord d'Albret to march to the relief of the beſieged, the latter began his march at the head of no fewer (ſays Monſtrelet) than eighty thouſand horſe, and appearing before Tartas on the twenty-fourth of June, offered the Engliſh battle; but the latter being much inferior in numbers, broke up the ſiege, and Charles reſtored the place to d'Albret. After this, the French king attacking St. Sauveur, the ſtrongeſt place the Engliſh held in Guienne, carried it by aſſault, and no leſs than eight hundred Engliſh were ſlain, and the governor, ſir Thomas Rampſtone, made priſoner. Following the tide of his ſucceſs, he next laid ſiege to Acq, which held out five weeks, but at length ſurrendered. La Reole was carried by ſtorm; and Marmande fell likewiſe into the hands of the now victorious Charles, who ſoon after put an end to the campaign on that ſide, and went himſelf to Montauban, where he paſſed the reſt of the winter.

There happened about this time a civil tranſaction on the continent, which had great effects upon the affairs of England, and therefore claims a place in this work. The circumſtance was this: John IV. count d'Armagnac, in conſequence of a grant of the earldom of Comminges, made, for a valuable conſideration, to his uncle John III. by Margaret, heireſs of that eſtate, and counteſs of Comminges, claimed the ſucceſſion of that county after her death; but Charles, after the breaking up of the laſt campaign, coming to Montauban, had delivered the old counteſs from a confinement in which ſhe had been kept near twenty years by her huſband Matthew de Grailly; in conſideration of which, Charles procured from the lady a ceſſion of Comminges in his own favour *; and not only ſtripped the count d'Armagnac of all he poſſeſſed from the Comminges family, but alſo compelled him to lay aſide the title of Earl by the Grace of God. All this mortified the count to the greateſt degree, and put him upon making a treaty with England, in the ſpring of the enſuing year, 1443, and upon offering one of his daughters in marriage to Henry, in hopes of ſuccours from thence to ſupport his title to the earldom of Comminges. Charles, getting ſome intelligence of his treaty with Henry, who had actually given orders to Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, to ſupport the count †, laid a deep and well concerted ſcheme for defeating the confederacy; and, before the earl of Shrewſbury could raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies of men for taking the field, Charles ſent his ſon Lewis, the dauphin, with the marſhal de Loheac, at the head of a powerful army, to cruſh the count before he could receive the intended aſſiſtance from the Engliſh. Lewis uſed ſuch diligence, that he appeared before l'Iſle Jourdain ere Armagnac had the leaſt notice of his march. This vigorous proceeding had its deſired effect: neither the counts of Foix, Perche, nor Marche, who had entered into the confederacy, durſt appear to ſupport him, and the count d'Armagnac found it neceſſary to throw himſelf on the mercy of Charles, who ſent him priſoner to Carcaſſonne, with all his family except his eldeſt ſon, who fled to Navarre. The dauphin, before the end of this year, entirely reduced the counties of Armagnac and Roſay, belonging to that count, excepting two fortreſſes, which were obliged ſome time after to capitulate likewiſe. Thus did the Engliſh, by an unaccountable ſupineneſs, ſuffer themſelves to be deprived of an ally, who, if they had properly ſupported him, might have been as ſerviceable to them in the defence of Guienne, as his anceſtors had been to the French towards the reduction of it.

In the beginning of this year a private negociation was ſet on foot between Henry and the duke of Burgundy: the latter ſeeing that the diſpute between the two kings was not likely to be decided, reſolved to extricate himſelf from a ruinous war by concluding a ſeparate peace with England. He was particularly excited to this by the behaviour of Charles, who betrayed an evident coolneſs towards him; and he was apprehenſive, in caſe that monarch's affairs ſhould be reſtored, either by peace or war, he might reſume his old enmity againſt him; he therefore thought it his intereſt to deſiſt ſupporting him him in a war, which, if it ſhould prove ſucceſsful, might render him too powerful, and gave his ducheſs full powers to conclude a general truce for all his dominions, with the king of England *. There had been one already made, which related only to the commerce between the Low Countries and that kingdom; but this, which was concluded the twenty-third of April, comprehended Burgundy and all the duke's territories in general, and was to continue in force until one of the parties renounced the engagement, in which caſe he ſhould give notice of his intention three months before the actual rupture.

The earl of Somerſet was ſent over this year to France, with an army, in order to aſſiſt the earl of Shrewſbury in the reduction of Dieppe; but, on his landing at Cherbourg, he received advice of the place being relieved; upon which all he could do, was to commit ravages in the open country: he took the caſtle of la Guerche, in Brittany, probably for the ſake of plunder, ſince it belonged to a neutral prince, to whom it was ſoon reſtored. He afterwards made great depredations in Anjou, lying two months near Pouanié, without attacking the place, and though joined by ſuch numbers from Normandy that his army amounted to above twelve thouſand men, he continued theſe petty hoſtilities without doing any action worthy of notice, and at length returned to Cherbourg.

It is about this time we may date the beginning of that diſſention between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, that afterwards drenched their unhappy country in the blood of its own natives. The duke of York, who had now acquired a great power, both in the nation and the cabinet, found his family intereſt ſtrengthened by the birth of a ſon, whom we ſhall ſee hereafter mount the throne of England by the name of Edward IV †. He had prudently diſguiſed thoſe ambitious ſentiments he really entertained, and appeared a devoted and zealous partizan of the court and its meaſures; he had entered into all the cardinal's pacific ſecrets, and therefore ſuffered the war in France to languiſh under his command; there was, moreover, a mutual animoſity between him and the earl of Somerſet, who had alſo a chief command in that country, and was particularly favoured by Gloceſter; and as York foreſaw that prince could never be brought to favour his ſchemes, however heartily he might be diſguſted with the cardinal, he uſed all means to weaken that prince's credit with the nation, and rival it in the council. And here we cannot forbear taking notice of the great error in politics committed by the late duke of Bedford, in aggrandizing the houſe of York, of whoſe claim and pretenſions he could not be ignorant. There is no accounting for this miſtake, but by ſuppoſing him to have had a great perſonal friendſhip for, and an high opinion of that duke; and that he thought, by the kindneſs he ſhewed him, to cancel in his mind all family reſentments and prejudices: a ſuppoſition, however, which does more credit to the duke's own goodneſs of heart, than to his knowlege of mankind.

On the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, this year died John V. duke of Brittany; and was ſucceeded in the ſovereignty of that duchy by his eldeſt ſon Francis.

The cardinal-biſhop of Winchеſter, who had now acquired the whole direction of ſtate affairs, had taken care to fill the king's council with eccleſiaſtics, to ſtrengthen his party. The cardinal-archbiſhop of York, an aſpiring prieſt, was taken by Winchеſter for his colleague; the biſhop of Bath and Wells, a profeſſed courtier, was, upon the death of Chicheley, a prelate of great abilities and integrity, promoted to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury: in a word, the king and council were no better than cyphers to fill up the ſum of Winchеſter's conſequence, who had ſtarved the Engliſh intereſt in France, and whoſe pride, inſolence, and ambition had by this time rendered him odious to the whole nation. The common people could by no means reliſh his politics, nor could they bear the thoughts of any connection between England and the duke of Burgundy, who, they imagined, had ſo infamouſly betrayed them. The public diſcontents were ſo violent, that they broke out into ſeveral dangerous riots, particularly in Yorkſhire and Norfolk, eſpecially in the latter of thoſe counties, where the citizens of Norwich attempted to fire the priory of that city, and proceeded to ſuch outrages, that the court ordered the duke of Norfolk to march with ſome troops to ſuppreſs them: he ſucceeded in his undertaking, but ran into ſuch impolitic ſeverities on the occaſion, that the common people in general were exaſperated afreſh.

The cardinal of England, however, not to be diverted from his purpoſe, called a great council in the king's name, which met ſoon after the Chriſtmas holidays; and here Beaufort laboured with all his might to enforce his pacific plan, and ſupported his opinion by various arguments, which were more ſpecious than ſolid. He alleged, that as matters were then ſituated, it was utterly impoſſible for the Engliſh to extend their conqueſts in France, or even to retain thoſe which they had already made; the parliament, he obſerved, was extremely backward in granting ſupplies for the maintenance of the war; the Engliſh affairs in Normandy were involved in the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion; the power of the French king was daily becoming more formidable: and from all theſe circumſtances he inferred, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to ſtop the progreſs of the enemy's arms by a temporary ſuſpenſion from hoſtilities, which might allow the Engliſh time to recruit their ſpirits, and retrieve their ruined fortunes.

The duke of Gloceſter, naturally bold and ambitious, could not reliſh theſe dilatory meaſures; he could not be perſuaded to reſign all hopes of prevailing over France; nor could he patiently endure to ſee his own advice over-ruled by the ſuperior power and intereſt of his rival. But all his oppoſition had no effect, for a freſh negociation was ſet on foot for a definitive treaty, in January, 1444; and the Engliſh miniſtry was ſo tame as to conſent to the congreſs being held at Tours, where Charles reſided: the earl of Suffolk, Dr. Moleyns, keeper of the privy-ſeal, the lord Roos, ſir Thomas Roe, ſecretary, and Reeve, a civilian, with John Wenlock, were plenipotentiaries for England; while the duke of Orleans and the count de Vendoſme were the principal of thoſe for France ‡.

The conferences being opened, ſeveral propoſitions were ſtarted on both ſides, on the ſubject of a general peace, but, as they were mutually rejected, the whole result of the negociation was a truce for about two years between the two crowns, which was to commence at land the following first of June *, and at sea on the first of July ensuing, and to end the first of April, 1446 †: it included the allies of both princes ‡.

The powers given to the other English ambassadors, related only to the peace or truce, but Suffolk was entrusted with a commission of another nature, which was no less than chusing a queen for his sovereign; a point of far greater consequence than may be at first imagined. Henry himself was naturally of such weak intellects, and of such a milky disposition, that he seemed formed to be implicitly governed by any person who could gain the ascendancy in his affections.

The court of England, as we have seen, was divided into two parties, that of the cardinal of Winchester, and that of the duke of Gloucester; and though the former had greatly gained upon the latter, in point of influence and credit, yet the superiority was not so great but that it might be easily destroyed, and even the balance cast upon the other side, by the interest of a queen, provided she was a woman of capacity and address; each party therefore was extremely desirous of having the honour to provide their prince with a consort, as it was more than probable that this circumstance would for ever decide the victory between them. The duke of Gloucester had warmly recommended the match with the daughter of the count d'Armagnac, while the treaty was depending between that prince and the court of England; but the cardinal and his friends had fixed their eyes upon Margaret of Anjou, daughter to Regnier, duke of Anjou and Lorraine, a princess who possessed all the requisites they wanted in a wife for Henry, and a powerful protectress for themselves: she was of a lively and daring spirit; of great penetration, uncommon resolution, and not to be intimidated by opposition or difficulties.

The lady's father was brother to the queen of France, and enjoyed the pompous title of king of Naples, Sicily, and Jerusalem, but without being possessed of a foot of land in these kingdoms; he was still in debt to the duke of Burgundy for his ransom, and unable to give any dowry with his daughter: this defect, however, was looked over, and Suffolk took care to send such an animating description of her beauty and merit to his court, and to represent this alliance as the surest means of obtaining a lasting peace, which Henry extremely coveted, that the ductile monarch readily gave his consent to the match, nay he even empowered Suffolk to promise, in his name, to cede the duchies of Anjou and Maine, then in the hands of the English, to Charles of Anjou, brother to the lady's father, Regnier pretending that it was inconsistent with his honour to marry his daughter to the usurper of the estates belonging to his family. On these terms, then, the treaty was concluded, and the English plenipotentiaries returned home. Many of our historians have taxed the earl of Suffolk with having of his own accord proposed this match, in order to establish his own favour at court; but, from what has been said above, I think it is highly probable, that it was a scheme contrived between Suffolk and the cardinal before the former was appointed chief of the embassy.

However that might be, when, upon Suffolk's return home, the negociation came to be laid before a council, purposely called on the occasion, the duke of Gloucester violently exclaimed against the whole of the proceedings, particularly the intended match; and exerted his utmost endeavours, as did all his party, to get the council to set it aside; the superior advantages that would arise by a marriage with a daughter of the count d'Armagnac, the poverty of the intended bride's family, and the important territory that was to be given up, were all strongly urged; but, in spite of all he could do or say, the contract was ratified at London; Suffolk was dignified with the title of marquis, and even received the thanks of the parliament for concluding the marriage, and sent over, in November this year, to Nanci, in Lorraine, where he espoused the princess Margaret by proxy, in presence of the king and queen of France, the dauphin, and a great number of the French nobility. She was conducted in the ensuing spring to England, attended by the marchioness of Suffolk, and an honourable train of English ladies; and being married, on the eighteenth of April, 1445, at the priory of Southwick, near Portsmouth, where she landed, was crowned, on the first Sunday after Trinity, May 30, in Westminster abbey ‖.

On this occasion a great promotion was made in the English nobility: John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, was made duke of Exeter, with precedency in parliament next to the duke of York; Humphrey, earl of Stafford was made duke of Buckingham; and Henry Beauchamp, son to the late earl of Warwick, created duke of that title. The king also granted this nobleman, in reversion, from the death of Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, the isles of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and Alderney, and also the manor and hundred of Bristol; and, what is very extraordinary, crowned him king of the Isle of Wight with his own hands, in consideration of his father's great descent. Henry also granted him place in parliament next the duke of Norfolk, and before Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, which created great animosities between them: by a special act made in parliament, it was established, that they should have precedency by turns yearly, the duke of Warwick to begin the first year; but his death, which happened shortly after, put an end to this matter §.

The new queen had not been long in possession of her dignity, when she shewed her intentions of being mistress of her husband's conduct as well as his affections. The opposition which the duke of Gloucester had made to her marriage, had fixed her to a personal aversion for that prince; and she entered into close correspondence with the cardinals of Winchester and York and the marquis of Suffolk, who, strengthened by her friendship, and animated by their common hatred againſt Gloceſter, reſolved to effect the ruin of that worthy and patriotic nobleman, in which, as the ſequel will ſhew, they ſucceeded but too well. But we muſt now attend to other matters.

The truce being made only in order to a peace, this whole year was ſpent in general negociations concerning the time and place of a new congreſs. It was thought likewiſe, that an interview of the two kings might promote the concluſion of a peace, but Charles inſiſting upon the meeting being held within his dominions, this propoſal was laid aſide, and the archbiſhop of York, the duke of Buckingham, the marquis of Suffolk, with the lord Sudley, were appointed plenipotentiaries, to meet commiſſioners from France in London; but all they could agree upon, was a confirmation of the former truce, and a prolongation of the ſame for ſome months.

The parliament, which was aſſembled at Weſtminſter on the twenty-fifth of February this year, was, on account of an epidemic diſtemper which raged in London and the parts adjacent, prorogued till the twenty-fourth of January, 1446, when the marquis of Suffolk made a ſpeech to each of the houſes, ſetting forth the benefits which the nation had already received from the truce, and expatiating on his own conduct, labours, and ſervices in war, as well as his great prudence and diſcretion in treating for a ceſſation of hoſtilities, and ſettling the contract of marriage. His conduct thus favourably blazoned by himſelf, and ſupported by the court-party, who had now a majority in the parliament, was approved by both houſes, who joined in an act declaring the marquiſs of Suffolk a true and faithful ſubject; and, to ſecure him from being called to an account in any future parliament for his advice or conduct in the affair of the truce, they repealed a ſtatute made in the time of Henry V. that no peace or truce ſhould be made with the common enemy, without the conſent of the three eſtates of the kingdom. And in the ſame fit of good humour they granted the king a conſiderable ſubſidy for a vigorous proſecution of the war with France, as ſoon as the truce ſhould be expired; and half a fifteenth to Suffolk, for the charges of going over ſea to eſpouſe and bring over the queen*.

The duke of York, having now little to do in France, returned to England in the beginning of this year, 1446, while the parliament was ſitting. He met with a very gracious reception from the king, and the parliament thanked him for his ſervices to the ſtate: but, as he ſtill wiſhed to continue at the head of the army, which he was daily modelling agreeable to his own ſchemes, he took occaſion to recommend a vigorous proſecution of the war, and in ſuch terms as gave great offence to the cardinal and his party; and the earl of Mortaigne (Edmund Beaufort), who had ſucceeded to the title of earl of Somerſet on the death of his brother John in the preceding year, and was the implacable enemy of York, and who had followed him over from France, took this opportunity to do him ſuch ill offices, that, after he had procured a renewal of his commiſſion as lord-lieutenant of France for five years, the ſame was revoked. This the duke of York could not but highly reſent, and ſwore revenge againſt Somerſet; and he even made ſome overtures towards a coalition with the duke of Gloceſter.

The court ſeems to have foreſeen and dreaded this event, and to have exerted themſelves to the utmoſt to prevent the fatal effects that might ariſe therefrom to themſelves. The queen, who was of a bold and enterprizing genius, and who had a mortal hatred to Gloceſter, encouraged this reſolution, and it was determined to remove him, not only from all poſts of profit and honour, but alſo from his place at the council-board. This reſolution was no ſooner taken than put in execution, and the duke was diſmiſſed in form. But this barefaced proceeding againſt ſo great a ſubject, and one ſo very popular, raiſed ſuch commotions in the nation, that the authors of his diſgrace thought it neceſſary to colour over this ſtep with a ſhew of juſtice.

With this view they plauſibly gave out, that they would bring an impeachment againſt him before the parliament, and one was ſummoned to meet on the tenth of February, 1447, at Weſtminſter; but the place being too near London, which was known to be devoted to the duke's intereſt, it was thought proper to alter the place of its meeting, which was fixed at St. Edmundſbury; and the term in January was put off†, and all pleas were adjourned till a fortnight after Eaſter, that the juſtices of the King's Bench might attend the parliament at St. Edmundſbury, as if articles of treaſon were to be exhibited againſt him; and the duke was ſummoned by writ to appear before the king in parliament on the day appointed.

The duke, ſecure in the conſciouſneſs of his own innocence, thought he might bid defiance to the malicious efforts of his enemies, and, in obedience to the writ, left his caſtle of Devizes, the chief place of his reſidence ſince he retired from court, and came, apprehenſive of no danger, to Bury, where he was preſent, on the tenth of February, at opening of the parliament; but the very next day he was arreſted by the viſcount Beaumont, conſtable of England, aſſiſted by Edmund, earl of Somerſet, and Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, and put under a ſtrong guard‡. To give a plauſible colour to this ſevere treatment, care was taken to publiſh, that he was accuſed of conſpiring to kill the king in order to ſeize the crown, and, with an armed force, to deliver his ducheſs from her impriſonment. This ridiculous charge, however, gained no credit with the people, though, indeed, it anſwered the end deſigned by it in one way, for, as it was univerſally believed, that he would exculpate himſelf upon his trial, there was no ſtir in his favour.

But a fair and open trial was by no means the thing deſigned or wiſhed by his enemies; for the lords, who were to try him as his peers, did not appear ſo obſequious to the directions of the court as they generally had been: this circumſtance, together with the ill-grounded charge ſet up againſt the duke, and which his perſecutors were ſenſible they could not ſupport, have given occaſion to moſt of our hiſtorians, perhaps too raſhly, to aſſert, that Wincheſter and his party had recourſe to a more certain and ſanguinary method of accompliſhing their purpoſe, and by a ſecret and violent death to rid themſelves of a man, whoſe popularity might prove dangerous to their power, and whoſe reſentment, ſhould he eſcape, they had reaſon to dread.

Of the truth of this aſſertion, however, we dare not to decide, becauſe not warranted therein by any abſolute fact, which, in ſuch caſes, ought to be the only guide of the impartial hiſtorian. Thus much is certain, that, after having been confined ſeventeen days without any trial, he was found dead in his bed, on the twenty-eighth of February; but, as it is unanimouſly granted by our hiſtorians, that the dead body of the duke was expoſed for ſome time to public view, and that not the leaſt mark of violence was found upon it, it may be preſumed, that a man, endued with ſuch ſtrong paſſions he was, might feel ſuch an exceſs of grief and reſentment for the affront put upon his perſon and character, as might bring on an apoplexy, or ſome of thoſe violent diſorders which inſtantly ſtop the ſprings of life.

However this might be, the death of Humphrey, duke of Gloceſter, was bitterly lamented by the people in general, and particularly by learned men and ingenious artiſts, of whom he was a conſtant protector and patron *. After his death, his adverſaries induſtriouſly circulated reports to the prejudice of his character, in order to impreſs the public with a notion of his being actually guilty of the crimes laid to his charge; and, to render theſe reports ſtill more plauſible, his domeſtics were, immediately after his death, apprehended on ſuſpicion of being accomplices with him; and a commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer granted to the marquis of Suffolk, and others, to try them for high-treaſon, when ſeveral gentlemen of the duke's family, and twenty-ſeven ſervants, were, after a confinement of ſeveral months, brought to trial at Deptford; and being charged with having entered into ſeveral dangerous conſultations, and of having laid a deſign of ſurpriſing the parliament that was to meet at St. Edmundſbury, and afterwards to raiſe the duke of Gloceſter to the throne, they received ſentence of death. Suffolk, who conducted this trial, ſought to recommend himſelf to the people by a popular act on this occaſion: he ſuffered the convicts to be drawn through the city on ſledges to the place of execution, and to be hung by their necks, but they were immediately cut down alive, and received their pardon, to the inexpreſſible joy of all the ſpectators.

But this affectation of lenity, which was no part of his character, did not ſave Suffolk from the general odium he fell into, by being deemed the author of Gloceſter's death; and though the parliament, flattered by the falſe hopes given them of a ſpeedy peace, and by a promiſe from the throne of conſulting them about the terms on which it was to be made, complied with his deſires in paſſing, on the third of May, the laſt day of the ſeſſion, an act to exclude Eleanor, the late duke of Gloceſter's widow, from her dower, on account of her miſconduct, yet he did not long enjoy his power: nor did the cardinal of Wincheſter triumph long in the fall of his adverſary, whom he did not ſurvive above ſix weeks. This haughty prelate was ſeized with a diſtemper that brought him to his grave on the eleventh of April, this year, and he died in all the horrors of a man, who, placing his whole affections upon this world, had entirely neglected to make any preparation for his removal to the next.

Wincheſter's death deprived the queen and her favourite Suffolk of the great ſupport his experience, his birth, his credit, his riches, and his order gave them, and left them expoſed to the ill effects of the unpopular meaſures which they ſoon after purſued. As for Suffolk, finding that the parliament could not be brought to ratify the ceſſion of Anjou and Maine, and that the murmurs among the people began to grow very loud and licentious on that head, he deſired that he might be allowed to vindicate his conduct in that affair. This could not be denied him; and he appeared on the twenty-fifth of May this year, before the king and council, when, after much flouriſhing in his own praiſe, Henry gave him letters patent, declaring himſelf fully ſatisfied of his integrity, and the meaſures he had purſued ‡. The world, however, was not to be convinced by this declaration; the general clamour ſtill ran high againſt him; all the misfortunes which happened afterwards were charged to his account, and were, indeed, in a great meaſure the conſequence of that tranſaction, which he got warranted by his maſter's conſent.

On the twelfth of February, 1448, a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, which granted the king a very large ſubſidy. Before the riſing of this parliament, which ſeems to have ſat very late in the year, Henry, at the queen's ſuggeſtion, raiſed Suffolk to the dignity of a duke; the like rank was alſo conferred on Edmund, earl of Somerſet, who, at the ſame time, was inveſted with the ſole command in France, in the room of the duke of York ‖, who could not fail being deeply affected with this indignity put upon him, and finding that the public diſcontents againſt the ſole management which the queen and her favourites had aſſumed in the government, grew very ripe, he gave way to them, dropping, by his emiſſaries, ſome dark hints among the people concerning his family-pretenſions to the crown; theſe were privately handed about, by way of manifeſto, and had the deſired effect; for every mouth was now open in praiſe of the virtues, abilities, and great ſervices of the duke of York, though without any mention of his pretenſions to

* His body was carried to St. Alban's, where a noble monument, afterwards erected to his memory, ſtill remains in the conventual church. The vault wherein his body was depoſited, and the exact place of which was, it ſeems, then unknown, was diſcovered in the late queen Anne's reign. He was called, The good duke of Gloceſter. Having had his education in Baliol college, he became a great proficient in learning, and was a great favourer of learned men. He laid the firſt foundation of the famous library at Oxford, ſince known by the name of the Bodleian, from ſir Thomas Bodley, by whom it was wonderfully increaſed. Sir Thomas Moor gives an inſtance of this duke's ſagacity. The king coming one time in progreſs to St. Alban's, a beggar, born blind, as he ſaid, recovered his ſight at the ſhrine of St. Alban. The miracle being noiſed about, the duke being there with the king, deſired to ſee him; the beggar being brought, he aſked him whether he was born blind? he anſwered, yes truly. And can you ſee, ſays the duke? yes, I thank God, and St. Alban, replies the beggar. Tell me then, ſays the duke, of what colour is my gown? the beggar readily told him the colour. And what colour, ſays the duke, is ſuch a one's gown? the beggar likewiſe told him; and ſo of ſeveral others. You counterfeit knave, ſays the duke, how came you that were born blind, and could not ſee till now, ſo ſuddenly to know the difference of colours? and thereupon, inſtead of an alms, ordered him to be ſet in the ſtocks. the crown. The particulars of this manifeſto the reader will find in the note †.

Much about this time alſo the affair of the ceſſion of Anjou and Maine came to a criſis. The court of France had taken no notice of this article in the marriage-contract, by which the province of Maine was to be ceded to Charles of Anjou, the queen's uncle, during the life of the duke of Gloceſter, as they knew it would be dangerous, if not impoſſible, to carry it into execution; but his death having removed all obſtructions to the performance, Charles (who had always enjoyed the title of count of Maine, and was the riſing favourite and firſt miniſter of the king of France) now demanded to be put in poſſeſſion of the county. To deliver it up, was to juſtify and heighten all the clamour made upon the ſubject: numberleſs excuſes were therefore made to delay the ceſſion, founded on a proviſion for ſome recompence to thoſe who had grants of poſſeſſions in that county; but at length orders were ſent, under the king's hand, to ſir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, the capital of the county, to deliver that city into the hands of count Charles of Anjou, purſuant to the private article of Margaret's marriage.

Surienne, by birth an Arragonian, had ſerved the Engliſh for above twenty years, was a knight of the Garter, and governor of Lower Normandy: believing an Engliſh council could never be ſo wicked to agree to ſuch a pernicious meaſure, he diſputed the authenticity of the order, and abſolutely refuſed to obey it, or deliver the town. Upon this the count de Dunois coming before it with a numerous body of forces, and a large train of artillery, laid ſiege to it in form. Surienne defended himſelf for a conſiderable time with undaunted bravery; but Somerſet, who was then in Normandy with a large army, not taking the leaſt ſtep to ſuccour him, and even diſavowing his procedure, he was at laſt compelled to yield, and to deliver up not only Mans, but all ther fortreſſes of that province, which was thus entirely alienated from the the crown of England.

The garriſon of Mans, which conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred men, was allowed to march out, with all their effects; and, retiring into Normandy, fell into great diſtreſs, no fortreſs caring to receive them, either by the duke of Somerſet's directions, or for fear of offending the government of England, whoſe orders they had diſobeyed. Upon this Surienne directed his march into Brittany, ſurprized the town of Fougeres, repaired the fortifications of Pont Orſon and St. James de Beuvron, committed depredations over the whole province, and in this way procured ſubſiſtence for himſelf and his followers.

Upon advice of this breach of the truce, in which Brittany had been included, the king of France ſent immediately to the duke of Somerſet, to demand reſtitution of the place and goods that had been ſeized, the duke of Brittany joining likewiſe in this demand. Somerſet returned for anſwer, "That he was greatly concerned for this action, but that it had been committed without his knowlege or conſent, nor had he any power over Surienne or his men, to call them to account." On failure of redreſs from him, application was made to the court of England, and the council promiſed redreſs; but the whole year was ſpent in delays, which the French thought affected; and that court promiſed the duke of Brittany, in caſe he would enter into a league againſt England, and would begin the war in his own name, that they would, as auxiliaries, powerfully ſupport him. The duke thereupon publiſhed a manifeſto, ſetting forth the reaſons of his quarrel, which was followed by vaſt preparations for doing himſelf juſtice by force of arms. We ſhall make uſe of this interval to take a curſory view of the Scottiſh affairs, ſince the murder of their king.

James II. who had ſucceeded his father, was at this time in the eighteenth year of his age, and under the tuition of James, earl of Douglas, ſon of him ſlain in the battle of Vernueil. The dauphineſs of France, daughter to the late, and ſiſter to the preſent monarch, was by this time dead; the regent Douglas, therefore, began to caſt about how he might beſt renew that family-alliance which had ſubſiſted between the courts of France and Scotland, and ambaſſadors had been ſent into France, to conclude a marriage for James with the princeſs Anne of Gueldres, daughter to that duke and the ducheſs of Cleves, and granddaughter to John, duke of Burgundy.

The Engliſh court, alarmed at this alliance, particularly when on the eve of a rupture with France, reſolved to attack the Scots, with a view to force them to make a ſeparate peace. Accordingly Richard Neville, earl of Saliſbury *, and Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland were this year ſent with an army into Scotland, where they burnt the towns of Dunbar and Dumfries. The Scots failed not to return the viſit, by an irruption into England, where they burnt Alnwick, and ravaged ſome part of Cumberland. After mutual depredations of this kind, both ſides at length came to a battle, in which fortune ſo far favoured the Scots, that the Engliſh were entirely routed, and loſt, according to the Scottiſh hiſtorians ‡, three thouſand men; the lord Piercy, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Northumberland, ſir John Pennington, the ſecond in command, and ſir Robert Hemington being taken priſoners.

France was at this time in a very good condition to recover thoſe dominions which had been wreſted from her by the victorious arms of the Engliſh. Charles had eſtabliſhed an excellent reform of his military force in France; a long ſeries of war had rendered the whole nation warlike: Charles, however, did not immediately run to arms upon the infraction of the truce committed by the Engliſh under Surienne, but affected to act for the duke of Brittany; however, he did not fail to take advantage of the invaſion of Scotland (included in the truce as an ally of France) to ſet the inſincerity of the Engliſh in a glaring light, and even ſent to demand ſatisfaction for the ſame; but not being able to obtain any anſwer thereto, nor with regard to the affair of Fougeres, he reſolved to have recourſe to the way of retaliation.

† It was hinted, that the houſe of Lancaſter had uſurped the throne. That indeed the uſurpation had been tolerable, whilſt the kings of that houſe were princes of diſtinguiſhed worth, and had acted for the welfare and honour of the nation; that even, during the non-age of the preſent king, there had been hopes of his treading in the ſteps of his anceſtors, and his being a worthy follower of the king his father; but that ſince he became of age, nothing glorious was to be expected from him: that therefore the Engliſh could have no reaſon to ſupport any longer the uſurpation of the crown, for the ſake of a queen, who, being ſprung from the blood of their moſt mortal enemy, ruled the kingdom with an arbitary power: that in viewing the poſterity of Edward III. it was evident, the houſe of Marche had been unjuſtly deprived of the crown: that the duke of York, being the ſole heir of that houſe, and deſcended from Edward III. by his paternal anceſtors, ought to have his due right. In fine, that his noble qualities, his known virtue, and his ſignal ſervices to the nation, very ſtrongly ſupported the juſt title given him by his birth.

Accordingly, on the firſt of May, 1449, a party of the garriſon of Louviers ſurprized Pont de l'Arche, taking priſoners the lord Fauconberg, who was governor, and all his garriſon, amounting to one hundred Engliſh. Soon after, Gerberoy and Conches in Normandy, and Cognac and St. Megrin in Guienne, were ſurprized in the like manner: upon which the Engliſh, in their turn, complained of infractions of the truce, and demanded reparation. The French offered to reſtore all theſe places, if Fougeres was reſtored to the duke of Brittany, and ſatisfaction made for the loſſes his ſubjects had ſuſtained at the taking of that place; but theſe loſſes being ſwelled to the enormous ſum of one million ſix hundred thouſand crowns, the Engliſh would not liſten to the propoſal.

Charles had not yet come to a determinate reſolution for making war in his own name, though moſt of his council were for improving the opportunity that the defenceleſs condition of Normandy offered him for an eaſy reduction of that province; Charles's heſitation was owing to the low ſtate of his finances, but Jaques le Cœur, one of his ſubjects, and the greateſt merchant in Chriſtendom, exerted himſelf on this occaſion, and readily advanced two hundred thouſand gold crowns towards defraying the firſt expences of the war, and undertook to provide the neceſſary ſupplies. It is, perhaps, one of the greateſt blots upon the memory of Charles VII. that he ſuffered ſo uſeful a member to be afterwards perſecuted and baniſhed his native country: we do not know the reaſon of this; for, indeed, who can diſcover the ſecret cauſes of the unjuſt dealings of men? It was to this merchant that the French owed the reduction of Normandy, which, without his ſeaſonable aſſiſtance at this juncture, they would never have been able to retake.

The truce expiring in the month of June this year, and Charles freed from all manner of obligation to act any longer as an auxiliary only, he declared war in his own right and name, after publiſhing a kind of manifeſto, ſetting forth his earneſt deſire for a peace, and his conſtant endeavours for its continuance, with all the advances he had made for that effect.

After Charles had thus declared war in his own name, his conqueſts were almoſt too rapid for the pen of hiſtory to attend them: Vernueil en Perche, one of the ſtrongeſt places in all France, Pont Eau de Mer, and Beuvron, which had been lately improved by the Engliſh, together with Liſieux, Mantes, and Vernon, with ſeveral other fortreſſes on the confines of Normandy, either opened their gates to the French, or ſurrendered after the appearance only of a ſiege.

The brave Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, was, indeed, in the field, but what could he do? He had but few hands, and no hearts to attend him: he made an attempt to interrupt the ſiege of Vernueil, but the count de Dunois getting between him and the beſiegers, he found it impracticable, and therefore was obliged to retire to Rouen.

Unhappily for the Engliſh, at that time all Europe was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed againſt them, as it was plain that they had broken the truce. The government at home was ſo miſerably divided, and the queen's faction in the council ſo thoroughly deteſted, that their intereſt in France could expect but little ſupport now the war became general. Charles was perfectly well acquainted with all theſe circumſtances, and with the advantage they gave him, and reſolved to proſecute his ſucceſs with unremitting aſſiduity. Accordingly, having the barrier of Normandy now laid open, he invaded that province with four different armies; one commanded by himſelf in perſon, another by the duke of Brittany, or his brother the conſtable de Richemont, a third by the duke of Alençon, and a fourth by the count Dunois, whom Charles had lately made count of Longueville.

As the Engliſh had not a body of troops ſufficient to oppoſe them in the field, they proceeded in their conqueſts with amazing rapidity, and the towns were ſo poorly ſupplied with garriſons, that they had little elſe to do but receive the ſubmiſſion of the inhabitants. In a few weeks, Nogent, Chateau Gaillard, Pont l'Eveque, Neufchatel, Giſors, la Roche Guion, Feſchamp, and Harcourt, were made to acknowlege Charles as their maſter. The duke of Brittany, with his brother the conſtable, falling into the Contentin with an army of Bretons, reduced Coutances, Valagnes, St. Lo, Torigny, Carenton, Gavré, and Pont d'Euve, with all the leſſer places in thoſe parts: Fougeres, indeed, held out ſix weeks, but was at length carried by aſſault. The duke of Alençon, with his body of troops, took Freſnay; and, entering Normandy on the ſide of Maine, ſurprized Condé, and reduced Alençon, the capital of his own dominions, together with Beleſme, Epay, and Yſmes, with the adjoining country. But no one appeared more zealous in this war than Regnier, king of Sicily, Margaret of Anjou the queen of England's father, and her brother John, duke of Calabria; they brought a gallant body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the French, and, having acted with the duke of Alençon in ſome of his enterprizes, joined Charles's diviſion with his forces, who, thus ſtrengthened, reſolved to form the ſiege of Rouen, the capital of Normandy.

The earl of Shrewſbury had adviſed the duke of Somerſet, who acted as lord lieutenant of France for Henry, to make the great ſtand in that city, as the duke of Bedford had formerly done in Paris, and with that view moſt of the native Engliſh had been drawn thither from the other garriſons, which may in ſome meaſure account for the ſpeedy reduction of ſo many places by Charles and his generals, they being defended only by French natives of Normandy and Gaſcony in the Engliſh pay, and moſt of them perhaps, under French officers. The reaſon of Shrewſbury and Somerſet's ſhutting themſelves up in Rouen, was the belief that the approaching winter-ſeaſon would diſable Charles from undertaking the ſiege of that capital this year, and that in the mean time ſuccours might arrive from England ſufficient to regain great part of what they had loſt.

But they were deceived: Charles was aware of their views, and ſought to fruſtrate them. Having ing aſſembled all his forces, making a body of fifty thouſand men, he came before the place in perſon, on the eighth of October, and ſummoned it to ſurrender; but receiving no anſwer, he returned after ſome days ſtay to Pont de l'Arche: he had advice there ſent him, on the ſixteenth of the month, that if an attack was made upon the tower of St. Hillary, a poſt guarded by the citizens, the latter would introduce his troops. The count de Dunois was accordingly ordered to form that attack, while the reſt of the army made a falſe one on another part of the city: the feint had well nigh ſucceeded; Dunois, and ſeveral of his men had already entered, but the vigilant Shrewſbury, having a ſuſpicion that ſome deſign of that kind was on foot, kept ſo ſtrict an eye upon the different forts, that he ſoon found what was going on in that quarter; and, marching up ſuddenly, attacked thoſe who had entered with ſuch fury that only two eſcaped being put to the ſword by leaping into the ditch; of theſe the count de Dunois was one, who, finding his attempt thus baffled, ſounded a retreat.

Two days after, the citizens grew clamorous for a treaty, and the archbiſhop joining with them, the duke of Somerſet went to the town-houſe, and agreed to ſend deputies to Charles to ſettle the terms of a ſurrender. The conditions offered by the French were, a general pardon for all the inhabitants, and liberty for the Engliſh, and all who choſe to follow them, to retire whither they pleaſed, with their effects. Somerſet rejected theſe conditions, though it is certain they were as good as could be expected, ſince the place was not tenable againſt the will of the inhabitants, who ſo greatly out-numbered the Engliſh garriſon, conſiſting in all of no more than three thouſand men. Accordingly, on Sunday the nineteenth of the month, the whole city roſe in arms with one conſent, ſeized the walls and ramparts, and forced the Engliſh to retire into the palace and the caſtle; after which they introduced the French army into the town. The king fixed his head-quarters in fort St. Catherine, after the ſame had been taken by aſſault, and the garriſon, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty men, moſt of whom were put to the ſword.

Somerſet would now have accepted the terms he had before rejected; but the caſe was altered: the fortifications of the palace and caſtle were in bad repair, and were very ill ſtored with proviſions; thus he could neither hold out, expect ſuccours, nor make his eſcape; he therefore deſired to ſpeak with the king: but the beſt terms he could get for himſelf, his ducheſs, and his garriſon, where either to remain priſoners of war, or purchaſe their liberty by giving up all that the Engliſh as yet held in Upper Normandy. A treaty was carried on for ſome days, and it was at lengh agreed, "That he ſhould retire, with all the Engliſh, to Harfleur, upon the payment of fifty-ſix thouſand crowns, and engaging to deliver up the caſtles of Arques, Tancarville, and Liſlebonne, with the towns of Caudebec, Montvillers, and Honfleur: for the performance whereof the earl of Shrewſbury, with James Butler, ſon to the earl of Ormond, and other perſons of quality, were to be left as hoſtages."

Somerſet marched out with his Engliſh on the fourth of November; but Charles, ſtaying till ſome regulations were made in the city, did not make his ſolemn entry into it till the twenty-fifth of that month. All the places ſtipulated to be given up, were punctually delivered, except Honfleur, whoſe governor, Curſon, refuſed to comply with the duke of Somerſet's orders to evacuate the place in favour of the French: this gave occaſion to the earl of Shrewſbury and the other hoſtages being detained priſoners. Curſon made a bold and vigorous defence, but was finally obliged to yield to the ſuperior forces of the count de Dunois. Evil fortune, perhaps the conſequence of their own neglect, attended the Engliſh in all places: Gaſton, count de Foix, made himſelf maſter of Mauleon en Soule, the ſtrongeſt fortreſs in Guienne, which the duke of Suffolk had lately got intruſted to his cuſtody: it was now given up by the treachery of Lewis de Beaumont, conſtable of Navarre. Thus ended the year, though not the campaign, ſo glorious to France. But we are now to attend the tranſactions in of England.

The univerſal confuſion of their affairs in France, the negligence of the court in that reſpect, the loſs of almoſt all Normandy in one ſingle campaign, the conqueſt whereof had coſt ſo much blood, began at length to provoke the impatient ſpirit of the Engliſh: the party of the duke of York, and the other enemies of the adminiſtration, inſtead of contributing to calm the riſing diſcontent, or retrieve the national diſgraces, were buſied in diſtreſſing the government, and oppoſing its meaſures. This could be no ſecret to the queen and the duke of Suffolk, who now caſt about for a pretence to remove York out of the kingdom: the way they took to do this, was, however, the moſt impolitic they could have adopted.

A commotion having happened in Ireland, which threatened ſerious conſequences, the only perſon thought proper to reſtore tranquility to that country was the duke of York, who was, in his family-right, earl of Ulſter and Corke, lord Connaught, Clare, Trim, and Meath, in Ireland; and the queen now ordered his commiſſion to be made out as lord-lieutenant of that kingdom. York was at no loſs to fathom their deſign in this meaſure, but, foreſeeing it would turn to his advantage, he accepted his commiſſion with a good grace; and having procured from the council very advantageous powers, he ſet out to take upon him his new poſt; and ſo conducted himſelf therein, by his mild and gentle behaviour, that the Iriſh were won to their duty without his being obliged to uſe force: what is more he made them ſo much his friends, that from thenceforth they were always devoted to the ſervice of him and his family, even in the midſt of their greateſt misfortunes.

Margaret and Suffolk having thus, as they thought, got rid of a troubleſome opponent, and having the ſovereign direction of all public affairs, thought to govern the nation in Henry's name without controul; but the general diſcontent grew loud and intractable: it was every where openly ſaid, that the queen and Suffolk were in concert to ruin the nation. They were charged with being the contrivers of the duke of Gloceſter's death, and of having entered into an agreement with the enemies of England for betraying Normandy and Guienne into their hands; nor did the people ſtop at exclamations only, a great number of ſevere libels were daily publiſhed, and fixed on the doors of churches and all public places.

It was dangerous for the miniſtry to call a parliament at a time when the nation was in ſo ill a humour;

mour; but the neceſſities of the crown were ſo urgent, that one met on the ſixth of November this year, at Weſtminſter. It proved very backward in the point of a ſupply, and ſtrongly diſpoſed to call the duke of Suffolk to an account: to ward off this blow, the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-ſecond of January, 1450, then to ſit for the diſpatch of buſineſs. In the mean time the popular diſcontents broke forth into tumults in ſeveral places, and Adam Moleyns, biſhop of Chicheſter, was murdered by the rioters.

In this diſpoſition were the people when the parliament met, in the beginning of the year 1450; and as to that aſſembly, it was rather more exaſperated than before, by ſome declarations of the murdered biſhop, who, in the agonies of death, charged Suffolk with a traitorous conduct in regard to the delivery of the county of Maine, and with having boaſted, "that he had as great intereſt in France as he had here, and was equally truſted in the cabinet of Charles as in that of Henry."

The duke of Suffolk, perceiving that the tide of national rage ran ſtrong againſt him, and that no buſineſs would be done till the houſes had levelled their ſtroke at him, thought it beſt to put a good face upon the matter, and deſired leave of the lords to vindicate himſelf from the treaſon charged upon him by the deceaſed biſhop of Chicheſter. His ſpeech on this occaſion was little more than an enumeration of his own and his family's merits, urging his father's death at Harfleur; his elder brother's being ſlain in the field of Agincourt, and that two other of his brothers were likewiſe in that action, wherein he was himſelf taken priſoner, and paid twenty thouſand pounds for his ranſom; a fourth brother's dying in hoſtage for him; his own ſerving thirty-four campaigns, ſeventeen years abroad without coming home, and fifteen years ſince, about the king's perſon, and being thirty years knight of the Garter: from all which he inferred, that he could not be ſuſpected to have been debauched by French promiſes; and ſo, aſking God's mercy as he had been true to the king and the realm, he required his purgation.

The commons, however, were not to be drawn from their purpoſe by this parade; for, on the Monday following, January 26, they drew up a petition to the crown, deſiring that the duke of Suffolk might be committed to ſafe cuſtody till he ſhould clear himſelf of the crimes charged upon him by common fame and report: however, it was adjudged by the king's council, that he ſhould not be committed till the ſpecialty ſhould be declared. The commons then, by their ſpeaker, ſent up a charge, on the ſeventh of February, to the lords, accuſing the duke of ſeveral articles of treaſon, contained in a bill then delivered, importing,

I. That he had treated with the count de Dunois, Bertrand de Preſſigny, and W. Couſinot, the king's enemies, adviſing them to perſuade the French king to invade England, dethrone Henry, and beſtow the crown upon his ſon John de la Pole, who, by marrying Margaret, daughter and heir to John late duke of Somerſet, might juſtly claim it in her right, as next heir to Henry, who had no iſſue.

II. That he had received money and promiſes from the duke of Orleans, to induce the king to agree to his releaſe, that he might aſſiſt Charles in the recovery of France.

III. That he had encouraged the French king to break the truce, and renew the war in Normandy.

IV. That he had, without ſufficient authority, promiſed to yield le Maine; and, after his return, performed that promiſe, in conſequence of which the Engliſh were deprived of the province of Normandy.

V. That he betrayed the ſecrets of the king's council, to the count de Dunois and other French ambaſſadors.

VI. That he had acquainted them with the ſtate of all the French fortreſſes belonging to the Engliſh.

VII. That he diſcloſed the ſecret inſtructions of the Engliſh ambaſſadors, and ſent to treat of a peace between the two crowns.

VIII. That he had boaſted his intereſt was as good at the French court as here.

IX. That he had received bribes from the enemy, for preventing reinforcements being ſent to the continent; and, in the truce which he made, not only omitted to comprehend the king of Arragon, the old ally of England, but included the duke of Brittany, as ally of France; a circumſtance which had deprived the Engliſh of that aſſiſtance which they might otherwiſe have derived from the friendſhip of that prince.

The lords preſented this bill of articles againſt the duke of Suffolk to Henry on the twelfth of February, and were for giving a copy thereof to the judges for their conſultation and opinion; but he deſired that this might be reſpited till he ſhould be otherwiſe adviſed. Thus the matter reſted for near a month, till the ſeventh of March, when the greateſt part of the lords agreed that Suffolk ſhould be called to his anſwer; but the commons, fearful that they ſhould find it very difficult to bring the peers to find him guilty, as many of the king's counſellors had been parties in the meaſures of which he was accuſed, by approving them, they therefore framed a freſh ſet of articles againſt him, and ſuch as more immediately affected his perſon, independent of any other privy-counſellor: thoſe articles, however, amounted only to miſdemeanors. In theſe they accuſed him,

I. Of having, in quality of a privy-counſellor, perſuaded the king to make ſuch laviſh grants of the crown lands, that a ſufficient fund was not left for defraying the expences of the houſhold.

II. Of having obtained grants of privileges and franchiſes, to obſtruct the execution of the laws, and ſcreen offenders from juſtice.

III. Of having procured for the captal de Buche, his ſon in law, the earldom of Kendal, and lands in Guienne to the value of a thouſand pounds a year, taken by force from the lawful owners.

IV. Of having prevailed upon the king to alienate ſo many caſtles and lordſhips in Guienne, as had greatly weakened the power of the crown in that country.

V. Of having acquainted the French court with the ſecret negociation for concluding a treaty between England and the count of Armagnac; by which means the project was defeated, the count ruined, and the Gaſcon lords oppreſſed, until they were obliged to ſubmit to the French government.

VI. Of having procured offices and commands in France and Normandy for unqualified perſons.

VII. Of having adviſed the king to grant a toll on wine and merchandize brought down the Seine, to Peter de Brezé, an enemy to the Engliſh nation.

VIII. Of having procured, without the conſent of the council, a grant of Evreux, Longueville, and other ſignories in Normandy, for the count de Dunois, Preſſigny, and the ſaid Brezé; grants, in conſequence of which the great towns were taken without oppoſition.

IX. Of having brought the France ambaſſadors to a private conference with Henry, in which he agreed to a perſonal interview with Charles, and other articles ſtipulated without the knowlege or conſent of the privy-council.

X. Of having miſapplied and embezzled ſubſidies.

XI. Of having given thirteen hundred pounds of the public money to the queen of France, and very conſiderable ſums to the miniſters of Charles.

XII. Of having divided, between himſelf and his adherents, ſixty thouſand pounds, being the produce of ſubſidies left in the Exchequer by the lord Sudely, when he reſigned his poſt of treaſurer.

XIII. Of having procured for himſelf a grant of the county of Pembroke, the reverſion of Haverfordweſt, and other caſtles in Wales, together with the wardſhip and marriage of Margaret, daughter of John, duke of Somerſet.

XIV. Of having embezzled the bonds of the duke of Burgundy, and other perſons, bound for the ranſom of the duke of Orleans.

XV. XVI. XVII. XVIII. And of having likewiſe embezzled writs, prevented juſtice, maintained bad cauſes, and weakened the ancient friendſhip ſubſiſting between the crown of England and the princes of the empire.

The ſame day that theſe additional articles were preſented, Suffolk was brought to the parliament-chamber before the lords, and required to give in his anſwer. He deſired a copy of the articles; and the Tower of London being thought too remote, he was, for the greater diſpatch and readineſs, committed to a tower in the royal palace of Weſtminſter. Being ſent for by the lords, on Friday the thirteenth of March, to give in his anſwer, he kneeled down, and made a general one to the nine articles of high-treaſon, aſſerting them to be falſe and groundleſs; but more particularly to the firſt, he maintained, "that it was impoſſible that article ſhould be true, ſince the lady Margaret was not next heir to the crown by law; and that ſeveral lords (to whom he appealed) were privy to his deſign of marrying his ſon to the duke of Warwick's daughter, if ſhe had lived: as to the reſt, he referred to acts of the council and parliament, and to the king's orders, for his juſtification, and particularly with regard to the releaſe of Anjou and the giving up of Maine, to which other lords, he ſaid, were privy and aſſenting as well as himſelf: that he had not ſpoken the words in the form as repreſented in the eighth article, but to a different intent."

On the ſeventeenth of March, Henry ſent for all the lords, ſpiritual and temporal, that were in town, to his chamber. Suffolk being brought before them, kneeled down, and the chancellor aſking him what he had to ſay for himſelf, he again proteſted he was innocent, affirmed the articles to be falſe, and ſubmitted himſelf to the king's pleaſure. Then the chancellor gave him to underſtand, "that the king did not hold him convicted on the firſt bill of articles of high-treaſon; and as to the ſecond, charging him with miſpriſions and miſdemeanors, the king, by virtue of his ſubmiſſion, out of his own royal motive, and not by way of judgment, baniſhed him the realm for the term of five years, during which he ſhould not abide in France, or any country under the French dominion; nor ſhould he, by word, deed, or writing, by himſelf or his adherents, ſhew malice to the commons in parliament."

This tranſaction, which was certainly a furious ſtretch of prerogative, occaſioned, on the part of the lords, a very ſtrong proteſt; a proof that the exerciſe of proteſting is much older than is imagined. This proteſt was entered by the viſcount Beaumont, importing, "that the ſentence pronounced on the duke of Suffolk was not the reſult of their advice, but purely the king's own act, which ſhould not at all derogate from their liberties in caſe of peerage*.

The duke of Suffolk bore his ſentence without repining; nay, rather looked upon his baniſhment as the ſureſt method of ſecuring him from the fury of the people; beſides, he did not doubt of being recalled as ſoon as the preſent ſtorm ſhould be a little blown over: he therefore made all expedition to prepare himſelf for his departure, and ſoon after embarked at Ipſwich for Flanders; but the veſſel being brought to, in the Channel, by an Engliſh man of war, named the St. Nicholas of the Tower†, and it being diſcovered that Suffolk was on board, the captain of the man of war, who had imbibed the current hatred to the duke, took him on board his ſhip, and putting into Dover road, he there inſtantly cauſed his head to be ſtruck off. His body, being thrown upon the ſands near Dover, was taken up and interred in the collegiate church of Wingfield, in Suffolk‡.

The commons were ſo diſpleaſed at being thus baffled in their impeachment, and at ſeeing a corrupt miniſter, whoſe crimes they thought deſerved the ſevereſt puniſhment, ſheltered by the unconſtitutional interpoſition of regal authority, that, though they continued to ſit for ſome time after Suffolk's ſentence, and the crown was never in greater neceſſity, they would not grant a ſupply. Upon this the parliament was prorogued to the twenty-ninth of April, at Leiceſter, in hopes they would meet in a more compliable humour; but the contrary happened, and they began, the very firſt day of their ſeſſion, to examine into the management of the revenue and houſhold expences of the crown; and finding it very heavily in debt, they declared they were utterly unable to raiſe the neceſſary ſum for making good the ſame, and adviſed a reſumption of all grants made by the king ſince the firſt day of his acceſſion. They were proceeding in this manner, when news came of the untimely fate of the duke of Suffolk: the death of this deteſted miniſter ſeems ſomewhat to have molified the commons, for they granted a ſubſidy at the end of the ſeſſion, though far ſhort of the wants of the court.

† Rapin, and after him Smollett and Ryder, makes the captain's name Nicholas, inſtead of the ſhip's: and Ryder, from what authority appears not, makes this murder to have been committed by the private order of the commons: thus much is certain, that no proſecution was ever commenced againſt the perpetrator.

The parliament had ſcarcely broken up before the diſcontents of the people appeared in various commotions in different parts of the kingdom. A deſperate fellow called Thomas Thany, but nicknamed Bluebeard, had attempted, in the beginning of the year, to raiſe an inſurrection in Kent, but had been taken and executed at Canterbury; but theſe petty commotions ſerved only as the prelude to a great ſcene of national calamity, which we are now to open.

The duke of York, who ſtill remained in Ireland, being, by Suffolk's fate, freed from a powerful antagoniſt, and though he himſelf was abſent from England, yet his friends ſerved him effectually by extolling his merit, and repreſenting to the people the king's incapacity, and the queen's maladminiſtration, not without ſeaſonable hints of the fitneſs of the duke of York to be at leaſt regent of the kingdom, both on account of his blood, and his abilities, and that nothing elſe could ſave the nation, or retrieve her credit and glory.

Theſe diſcourſes, added to the alarming reports of the court's ſending an army to lay waſte the whole county of Kent, in revenge for the duke of Suffolk's murder, committed by one of that county, had put the inhabitants there into ſuch a ferment, that every thing ſeemed ripe for a revolt. At this time there dwelt, or rather ſkulked about, in thoſe parts a deſperate fellow called John or (more commonly) Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, who, having been outlawed for a rape and murder committed by him in Suſſex, had taken ſanctuary, and been forced to abjure the realm. This fellow, who did not want ſenſe, hoped to enrich himſelf by the diſturbances he ſaw on the point of breaking out; and obſerving that the country-people, uneaſy under the preſent government, were continually talking of one of the houſe of Mortimer as the right heir of the crown, and the only perſon who could redreſs their preſent ſufferings, Cade aſſumed to himſelf the name of John Mortimer, pretending that he was a ſon of ſir John Mortimer, who had been beheaded in the beginning of this reign, and conſequently a near relation to Richard, duke of York, the popularity of whoſe name he doubted not would procure him a number of followers. This ſeems to have been the only reaſon for ſuſpecting the duke of York of having any way encouraged this inſurrection, founded chiefly on events which he could not foreſee, and raiſed by a man he did not know, whilſt himſelf was at a diſtance in Ireland. The preſent diſpoſition of the greateſt part of the nation with regard to the court, aiding this bold and artful rebel in his deſign he ſoon found himſelf at the head of ſuch a numerous train of followers, that he was enabled to advance as far as Blackheath, giving out as he advanced, that he was coming to reform the government, and eaſe the people of their taxes.

Henry being apprized of this proceeding, ſent a meſſage to the inſurgents, demanding the reaſon of their hoſtile appearance: Cade replied, that they had no deſign to hurt the perſon of the king, but only deſired to preſent a petition to the parliament, that the evil miniſters, who oppreſſed the people, might be removed from the royal preſence. At the ſame time he gave the deputies two papers, ſetting forth the grievances of the nation: among other things, they prayed that the duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed, as being the principal author of the loſs of Normandy: that the king's council might be filled with the princes of the blood, and other prudent and judicious perſons; and not with vicious and profligate men of ill principles and manners, and utterly incapable of managing the affairs of ſtate: in a word, theſe petitions, which are to be found at large in Stowe, appear to have been the compoſition of heads much better furniſhed than thoſe of the rabble who attended their low-bred leader. It is not improbable that ſome of the duke of York's friends and agents, thinking this inſurrection favourable for their purpoſe, might have ſecretly abetted Cade with their aſſiſtance and advice: thus much is certain, that the grievances they complained of, were but too well founded. The government, however, deeming itſelf highly inſulted by thoſe petitions, reſolved to quell the rebellion by force of arms; and an army of fifteen thouſand diſciplined men were ſent againſt the inſurgents, under the command of ſir Humphrey Stafford (a couſin of Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham.) Cade, affecting to be afraid of this general's approach, retired to Sevenoak; and Stafford following him too incautiouſly, fell into an ambuſh, which the artful rebel had prepared for the purpoſe, and a great number of his men being cut to pieces, the reſt ſought their ſafety in flight, leaving their commander lifeleſs on the field.

Cade, animated by this ſucceſs, returned to Blackheath on the twenty-ninth of June, from whence he again ſent petitions to the king and council, demanding, "that the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, ſhould be recalled to court; that the murderers of the good duke Humphrey (Gloceſter), with all who had contributed to the loſs of the Engliſh territories abroad, might be puniſhed; that the lord Say, the treaſurer, and his ſon-in law, Cromer, high ſheriff of Kent, might be taken into cuſtody, the grievances of the nation be redreſſed, and the authors of them brought to condign puniſhment." The government, alarmed at the late defeat of their troops, and well knowing the duke of York's ſecret friends were by this time on the point of declaring themſelves openly, reſolved, if poſſible, to purchaſe its general ſafety by the ſacrifice of ſome particulars; Say and Cromer were committed to the Tower, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the duke of Buckingham were ſent to treat with Cade and his followers. They found him very complaiſant, but reſolute not to lay down his arms until the king ſhould in perſon come and grant their requeſts. The archbiſhop and the duke, on their return, reported this conference ſo little to the encouragement of the court, that the king and queen, leaving the Tower under the command of the lord Scales and ſir Matthew Gough, ſet out for Kenelworth caſtle.

Cade no ſooner heard of their retreat, than he directed his march towards London: the citizens, alarmed at the ſucceſs of the rebels, opened the gates at their approach, and Cade entered in triumph at the head of his troops, and had the inſolence to ſtrike his ſword againſt London-ſtone, uttering theſe words, "Now is Mortimer lord of London!" However, he forbade his men, on moſt ſevere penalties, to be guilty of any outrage, or to give the inhabitants the leaſt cauſe of offence; this gave the citizens a very favourable opinion of him; but it was not long before the maſk dropped off, and rebellion ſtood avowed in all its diabolical colours.

For, on the third of July, the day after their entering the city, the rebels ſent to demand that the lord Say and Cromer ſhould be brought from the Tower; and the conſtable was mean enough to comply with this demand, and Cade cauſed them both to be put to death, without any form of trial; after which the rebels retired to the borough of Southwark. For ſome days Cade continued the practice of entering the city in the morning and quitting it at night, that he might not give umbrage to the inhabitants, with whom he and his followers lived at firſt in very good underſtanding; but the inſurgents having plundered the houſes and effects of two wealthy aldermen, even after they had entertained Cade at their tables with bounteous hoſpitality, and growing daily more and more licentious, the citizens plainly ſaw there was a neceſſity of uniting with the king's troops in the Tower, for their common preſervation: for this they took the opportunity of Cade's return by night to Southwark; and the mayor and aldermen ſent a meſſage to the lord Scales, offering to arm the citizens, and guard the bridge againſt the return of the rebels, if he would ſupport them with a detachment from the Tower. The lord Scales thereupon ſent ſir Matthew Gough with the detachment, upon which the citizens, immediately riſing, ſeized upon the bridge, and cut off the rebel party that guarded it.

Cade and his followers returning the next morning, as uſual, found the bridge gate ſhut and barricadoed againſt them; attempting to force a paſſage, a battle enſued between them and the citizens, both ſides maintaining the fight with equal obſtinacy until night put an end to the conflict: Gough himſelf, with the aldermen Sutton and Hazard, loſt their lives.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury and the chancellor, who was then the archbiſhop of York, and had both taken refuge in the Tower, being informed by their emiſſaries that the inſurgents were greatly diſpirited by this repulſe, drew up a general pardon for the rebels, provided they would lay down their arms; as alſo one for Cade in particular, if he would deſiſt from his rebellious projects; theſe pardons they confirmed by putting the great ſeal to them, which was in the archbiſhop of York's cuſtody, and found means to publiſh them by night in the borough of Southwark. This wiſe and critical meaſure had amazing ſucceſs, for the next day Cade ſaw himſelf abandoned by the greater number of his followers, and retreated to Rocheſter, where the reſt of them diſperſed, notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances and artful ſpeeches, in which he endeavoured to perſuade them, that the pardon which had been ſent them, being without authority of parliament, was of no effect: but, unable to keep them together, Cade fled into the Wild of Suſſex, with a few who choſe to ſhare his fate; and Alexander Iden (or Eden), at that time ſheriff of Kent, with the poſſe comitatus, attacked and took him, after a moſt obſtinate defence, in which he received ſeveral mortal wounds, of which he ſoon after expired. Iden ſending up his head to London, was, for this ſervice, made governor of Rocheſter caſtle, beſides receiving a gratuity from the court of a thouſand marks.

While the peace of England was interrupted by this and other inſurrections, the war continued in France, but ſtill to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh. The indefatigable Charles had continued his winter-campaign to the month of March this year; and though the ſeaſon was exceſſively ſevere, he kept the field in perſon, and acted with ſo much courage and intrepidity, that he obliged the garriſon of Harfleur to ſurrender, though conſiſting of two thouſand men, and to give up the two towers of Havre de Grace, which the Engliſh had built to command the mouth of the Seine. Thus, when the French army went into quarters, the latter end of the month of March, the Engliſh poſſeſſed in Normandy but few places of importance beſides Caen, Bayeux, Cherbourg, Vere, and Falaiſe.

Theſe loſſes made the Engliſh miniſtry think at laſt of ſending over ſuccours. Sir Thomas Kyrle (Kiriel ſome of our hiſtorians call him) landed in the ſpring, with about four thouſand men, at Cherbourg; and being reinforced from the neighbouring garriſons, took Valanges, after a ſiege of three weeks; but being defeated, and taken priſoner with about fourteen hundred of his men, by the count de Clermont and the conſtable de Richemont, in a pitched battle, near Fourmigny, the loſs of the reſt of Normandy ſeemed inevitable: above three thouſand Engliſh were ſlain in that action, drawn a great part of them from the garriſons of Vere, Bayeux, and St. Sauveur le Vicomte, all which places fell thereupon an eaſy prey to the victors, together with Valanges, Avranches, and Tombelaine.

Charles, eager for completing the reduction of Normandy, and the way being open to Caen, that place was inveſted on the fifth of June, by the conſtable and the count de Clermont, aſſiſted by the famous Dunois and a numerous army. The duke of Somerſet was ſhut up in the place, and had with him four thouſand men, inured to ſervice; but the beſiegers, having a proportionable force, made ſuch vigorous attacks, that, on the fifteenth day of the ſiege, the duke capitulated to ſurrender the place, if not relieved by the firſt of July, the duke and the garriſon being allowed to retire, with all their effects, to England. Upon the very day that Charles made his public entry into Caen, Xaintrailles inveſted Falaiſe with part of the French army, as the conſtable and the count de Clermont did Cherbourg with another part. Falaiſe belonged to the earl of Shrewſbury, who ſtill remained a priſoner in the hands of the French; and this garriſon, in fifteen days, was obliged to capitulate: one of the articles granted them was, that their maſter, the earl of Shrewſbury, ſhould be ſet at liberty. Two days after the reduction of Falaiſe, the French laid ſiege to Domfront, which ſurrendered on the tenth of Auguſt: and the taking of Cherbourg, which ſubmitted on the twelfth of the ſame month, completed the entire conqueſt of Normandy, all effected within the ſpace of a year, though there were an hundred fortified towns and caſtles in that province.

The diſſentions of the Engliſh nation doubtleſs furniſh one obvious cauſe for their loſing Normandy; but we think it is going rather too far to ſay, with many of our Engliſh hiſtorians, that this loſs was contrived between the French king and the queen of England, or at leaſt connived at by the latter. It cannot, with propriety, be ſuppoſed, that a princeſs of ſuch ſpirit, diſcernment, and ambition, ſhould not have looked upon her huſband's glory as her own, and to have preferred his intereſts to thoſe of France, to which ſhe was now an alien: we may rather ſuppoſe, that as all things return eaſily into their natural channel, when the force which diverted their courſe is removed, this eaſy and rapid conqueſt was owing in a great degree to the affection the Normans had to the French government, and their averſion to the Engliſh.

But the caſe was the very reverſe in reſpect to Guienne, the conqueſt of which Charles now undertook: the Gaſcons, who had lived ſo long under the Engliſh government, were not near ſo averſe to it as the Normans; and the country itſelf was ſituated at a greater diſtance from the ſeat of Charles's power; nevertheleſs, the conqueſt of this province, though more difficult than that of Normandy, was at length effected, the tide of ſucceſs continuing to run rapidly in favour of the French. In the next month after Cherbourg was taken, the count de Dunois, entering Guienne with a numerous army, reduced Bergerac, and Jonſac, on the Dodogne, together with Montferand, St. Foix, and Chalens; but the winter-ſeaſon ſetting in ſeverely, the French were obliged to deſiſt from purſuing their conqueſts, and to retire into winter quarters: and thus ended this year, no leſs fortunate to the French and diſgraceful to the Engliſh than the preceding.

When the duke of Somerſet returned to England, he found the parliament ſitting, and the outcry againſt him was ſo loud and univerſal, that the commons could not help taking ſome notice of his conduct: they preferred an addreſs againſt him, in which they deſired the king that he might be ſent to the Tower, till he ſhould give an account of his conduct in France. The court, deſirous to keep well with the parliament, acquieſced in their deſire, and the duke was accordingly taken into cuſtody: in the mean time, the mob, riſing in a tumult, plundered his houſe at Black-friars, demoliſhing what they could not carry off. The commons next petitioned Henry to remove from his preſence Edmund, duke of Somerſet; Alice, ducheſs dowager of Suffolk; William Booth, biſhop of Cheſter; John Sutton, lord Dudley; and others: but Henry amuſed them with an equivocal anſwer. Then they brought in an act of attainder againſt the late duke of Suffolk; but this act was rejected by the king; and the humour of the commons growing every day more and more obſtinate, the parliament was diſſolved in the beginning of June, 1451, after having ſat from the ſixth of November in the preceding year, without having granted any ſupply. Immediately after their ſeparation, the duke of Somerſet was releaſed, and made, in the duke of Buckingham's ſtead, governor of Calais, a poſt of the greateſt truſt, power, and profit belonging to the crown of England.

This was all brought about by the queen's management, in whoſe favour and confidence the duke had ſucceeded Suffolk; and ſhe was continually repreſenting to the king, that Somerſet was the only man that could ballance the power of the duke of York, concerning whom the court began now to grow very uneaſy. The term of that prince's government in Ireland being near expired, and his friends having given out, with a confidence that had ſomething alarming in it, that he would ſoon come over to England, where he would not be a quiet ſpectator of the miſmanagement of the queen and her cabal, it was thought neceſſary to take every precaution to ſecure her power: with this view ſhe prevailed on the king to ſend orders to all the officers on the ſea coaſt to oppoſe the duke of York's landing, ſhould he attempt it with any conſiderable number of attendants.

This was a very impolitic precaution, as it not only publiſhed the apprehenſions the court entertained of the duke of York's credit and influence, which it was their intereſt to conceal, but it alarmed the duke ſo as to put him upon his guard, and furniſhed him with a plauſible pretext for taking up arms afterwards for his own defence. When the time of his government in Ireland was expired, he embarked for England; but when he would have landed at Beaumaris, in the Iſle of Angleſey, in Wales, he was refuſed admittance; notwithſtanding all the vigilance of the ſheriffs, he found an opportunity of landing in another place without oppoſition, and repaired to London, where he was to hold a meeting with his friends, in order to confer with them in relation to his intereſts, and the plan he had formed, of aſcending a throne to which he pretended a better right than its preſent poſſeſſor.

The court being on a progreſs to the weſtern counties, the confederates had an opportunity of concerting their meaſures without moleſtation, and the ſtate of public affairs at this time gave but too plauſible an handle for cabals of this kind. But before we proceed to give an account of the proceedings of this junto, it will not be amiſs to ſketch ſome outlines of the characters and connections of thoſe who formed it, as this will ſerve to ſhew us the motives and cauſes which induced them to declare in favour of Richard, duke of York, againſt Henry VI.

The family of Neville was at this time, as well by the large eſtates poſſeſſed by its different branches, as from the valour and abilities of the ſeveral noblemen placed at their heads, one of the moſt powerful that ever appeared in England; for, not to mention the earl of Weſtmoreland, the chief of the family, the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, the lords Latimer, Fauconbridge, and Abergavenny were of that name, and were of themſelves, on many accounts, the moſt potent barons in the kingdom.

Richard Neville, earl of Saliſbury, brother-in-law to the duke of York (who had married his ſiſter Cicely), was the eldeſt ſon, by a ſecond marriage, of the earl of Weſtmoreland, and enjoyed, in right of his wife Alicia, daughter and heireſs of Thomas de Montacute, earl of Saliſbury, killed at the ſiege of Orleans, the title and eſtate of that great family. He was a perſon of conſummate knowlege, wiſdom, and experience, and had gained in the wars of France an high reputation for his valour and conduct in the ſervice; he was likewiſe governor of Carliſle, and warden of the Eaſt and Weſt Marches towards Scotland.

His eldeſt ſon, Richard Neville, had eſpouſed Anne, daughter and heireſs of Richard Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, who died governor of France, and poſſeſſed the title and eſtate of that ancient family, mily, which, in point of wealth, antiquity, and influence, was inferior to none. But theſe two noblemen depended leſs upon the largeneſs of their eſtates and the ſplendor of their families, than upon their own perſonal merits and abilities: Warwick in particular (who, from the great ſhare he had in the enſuing revolutions, was commonly diſtinguiſhed by the title of the King-maker) was the moſt popular man of his age, and deſerved all the popularity he enjoyed, as well by his bravery in war, as his hoſpitality in peace, by his ſtrict adherence to the principles of honour and virtue, and his declared hatred and averſion to every kind of treachery and deceit, and by his frank, open, and generous behaviour: in a word, the prodigious number of his tenants, attached to him by the obligation of their tenure, the ſplendor of his manner of living, the tenor of his conduct, the nobleneſs of his ſpirit, and his many amiable qualities, joined to an excellent underſtanding, rendered him at once the object of reſpect and love to the whole nation.

Beſides the family of Neville, the duke of York had many other friends among the great nobility: John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, eſpouſed his cauſe, on account of his being the ſon of Catherine, ſiſter to the earl of Saliſbury, but more from a reſentment of his father's wrongs, who had been baniſhed by the houſe of Lancaſter; and thoſe of his uncle, who had been beheaded in the reign of Henry IV. Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, ſprung from the royal blood of France, was warmly attached to the ſame cauſe, out of reſentment to the duke of Somerſet, whoſe ſiſter he had married, and who had nevertheleſs given him great cauſe of diſguſt. Edward Brook, baron of Cobham, was another member of this confederacy, but it does not appear what induced him to declare againſt Henry VI.

The head and animating principle of theſe, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, was a man of courage and capacity, prudent in his conduct, and gentle in his diſpoſition: in right of his father, the earl of Cambridge, beheaded in the reign of Henry V. he enjoyed the rank of the firſt prince of the blood; and by his ſtation he added a freſh luſtre to his title, derived from the family of Mortimer, which, though one of the moſt ancient in the kingdom, was equalled by other families, and was eclipſed by the royal deſcent of the houſe of Lancaſter. By the union of the eſtates of Cambridge, Mortimer, Clarence, and Ulſter, he was poſſeſſed of an immenſe fortune; and by his marriage with Cæcilia, daughter of Ralph Neville, earl of Weſtmoreland, he had greatly increaſed his intereſt among the nobility, and procured many ſtrong connections in that formidable body *.

But, notwithſtanding this prince's great power and intereſt, the reigning family was by no means deſtitute of friends and adherents: the earl of Northumberland was attached to the preſent goverment: the earl of Weſtmoreland, notwithſtanding his connections with the duke of York, and with the family of Neville, of which he was the head, leaned to the ſide of Henry; and by means of theſe two noblemen, the whole North of England, the moſt warlike part of the kingdom, was engaged in the cauſe of the houſe of Lancaſter. Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, and his brother Henry, were zealous friends of that party; as were likewiſe Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, John Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, and the lords Clifford, Dudley, Scales, Audley, and many other noblemen.

It behoved the duke of York, therefore, to proceed with great caution in the mighty work he had undertaken, and, before he appeared perſonally in ſupport of his pretenſions, to prepare the nation, by rendering the royal family and its favourites as obnoxious to it as poſſible. It was with this view that the preſent conſultation between the duke and his family had been held; and the reſult of their deliberations were, to proceed in all their ſchemes with ſubmiſſion to the royal perſon and authority, but at the ſame time to make alarming repreſentations of the grievances of the nation: it was reſolved that the duke of York ſhould write a reſpectful letter to the king, laying before him "the abuſes of the government through evil counſels; and offering himſelf as an aſſiſtant to the king, in bringing the authors of the late diſgraces which had befallen the Engliſh arms, to juſtice, and the duke of Somerſet in particular, who, having been impeached by the commons, was reſtored to favour without any examination."

It was eaſy for the miniſtry to perceive the duke of York ſought an occaſion to quarrel; but, as their preſent ſituation required them to act with precaution, it was judged proper that the king ſhould ſend a civil anſwer, as the moſt effectual method of diſappointing his deſigns. Accordingly the king, in a letter to the duke, told him, "that he had been ſenſible, for ſome time, of the neceſſity of reforming the government, and propoſed nominating a council for that purpoſe, of which the duke of York ſhould be the head; and that, until this could be done, ſuch precautions ſhould be uſed, as that the duke of Somerſet ſhould be ready, when called upon, to take his trial." It was ſuppoſed that ſuch an inſtance of condeſcenſion would have deprived the duke of York of all pretence of taking up arms; but this anſwer was declared unſatisfactory by the cabal, and they reſolved to proceed in their ſcheme early in the enſuing ſpring.

While theſe things were tranſacting in England, the king of France, having raiſed money for defraying the expences of the approaching campaign, gave the command of the army, which was to act in Guienne, and conſiſted of forty thouſand good troops, to the count de Dunois and Longueville. That general, taking the field in May this year, preſently made himſelf maſter of Montguyon, Blaye, Bourg, Fronſac, Libourne, and Caſtillon, in Perigord; Bourdeaux was likewiſe ſurrendered by capitulation, becauſe not relieved before Midſummer. The ſame was the caſe with all places in that neighbourhood: Dax was reduced by the counts of Foix and Armagnac; and, on the firſt of Auguſt, the city of Bayonne was inveſted by the count de Dunois. The caſtle was defended by ſir John Beaumont, but it was ſo vigorouſly preſſed, that he was obliged to ſurrender himſelf and all his men priſoners of war. The town was then ſummoned, and the French inhabitants obliged the reſt to demand a capitulation likewiſe, which was granted; and on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt the place was given up.

Thus the whole province of Guienne fell under the dominion of Charles, after it had been united three hundred years to the crown of England, and had for above double that time been diſmembred from that of France. It is certain that the great towns were well affected to the Engliſh government, and dreaded the oppreſſion of the French, and yet the whole province was conquered even in leſs time than that of Normandy; but the great lords, tempted with the hopes of preferment at the court of France, co-operated with the efforts of Charles in wreſting this county from the king of England, who was now diſpoſſeſſed of every foot of land which his anceſtors had acquired in France, except Calais and its dependencies.

This event, though at that time eſteemed the moſt diſgraceful and unhappy that could have befallen the nation, will appear different in the eye of a modern Engliſhman; ſince it is very certain, that, had an Engliſh king entirely ſubdued France, his conſtant reſidence muſt neceſſarily have been in that kingdom, not only on account of its being the greater and finer country of the two, but for other political conſiderations, and particularly becauſe the royal preſence there ſeems to be abſolutely requiſite, for the retaining ſo numerous and active a people as the French, in due ſubjection; England, therefore, would in that event have neceſſarily become a mere province of the French monarchy, than which nothing could have been more ungrateful or diſadvantageous to this nation, as well in reſpect of its commerce and opulence, as of the liberty and independence of the people. How much ſoever, therefore, moſt of our hiſtorians have exulted on the conqueſts of Edward III. and Henry V. in France, it muſt be allowed, that the death of the latter at the juncture it happened, and the expulſion of the Engliſh in the feeble reign we are now recording, were real bleſſings to England, though not ſo well underſtood then, as in our days. But to return.

Early in the ſpring of 1452, the duke of York, who was then in Wales, and his friends, in purſuance of the plan they had concerted the preceding winter, were in motion, and gave out that the reaſon for their riſing was the good of the realm; the releaſe of the oppreſſed ſubject; and the bringing to juſtice a corrupt adminiſtration. The people, who were indeed horribly oppreſſed by the miniſtry, gladly joined him for effecting ſuch purpoſes, and he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of an army of ten thouſand men, with which he began his march towards London. On this occaſion the queen and Somerſet exerted themſelves in a manner York did not expect: for they levied an army in Henry's name, and the duke was no ſooner on his march, than he heard that the king was advancing againſt him; upon which, not chuſing to riſque a battle, he altered his route, and by forced marches, got before him, and preſented himſelf at the gates of that capital, which, to his great mortification, he found ſhut againſt him, inſtead of being received therein with open arms as he expected.

It was ſome days before Henry had intelligence that the duke had got paſt him; upon which he turned about, and made the beſt of his way towards London. The duke hearing that the king was ſo cloſe after him, with a ſuperior army, paſſed the Thames at Kingſton, and, being joined by Thomas Courtney, earl of Devon, and the lord Cobham, encamped on Brentheath, near Dartford, twelve miles from London. He probably made this march into Kent with ſome expectations of the country riſing in his favour; but Henry, having made a progreſs into that county the preceding year, had put to death ſeveral that had been concerned in Cade's rebellion, the people ſeemed to be ſo terrified by theſe examples, that they did not chuſe to ſtir on this occaſion. The king followed him cloſe, and, marching over London bridge, encamped on Blackheath.

The duke of Somerſet, who attended the king on this occaſion, and ſeems to have been an able man, adviſed Henry to cruſh this rebellion in its neſt, and not to wait till it ſhould gather ſtrength to become formidable: he obſerved, that this was the time, as the chief and the fomenter of it was yet weak, and might be attacked with eaſe and ſucceſs, to rid himſelf of all future uneaſineſs, by giving his rival battle, as the great ſuperiority of the royal army enſured a victory: but Henry was ſo impolitic to neglect this counſel, and to liſten to the advice of ſome timid, or perhaps treacherous, noblemen, to apply to the ways of negociation. This counſel ſuited beſt with Henry's pacific genius, and with that averſion he always entertained to ſpilling his ſubjects blood. A commiſſion was given to the biſhops of Wincheſter and Ely, and the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury to go and know the reaſons of the duke's appearing in arms, or upon what terms he would lay them down.

This treating ſaved York: the two lay commiſſioners from the king were his intimate friends, though they had not yet declared themſelves. York put on a ſhew of great reſpect and moderation on this occaſion: he urged the bringing to juſtice the duke of Somerſet, and others of the council, who had made it their buſineſs to trample on the nobility and clergy, and to oppreſs the poor people, as the motive of his taking up arms; and offered to diſband his forces, and throw himſelf at Henry's feet, if they were taken into cuſtody, and brought to anſwer the crimes he was ready to prove againſt them in parliament. The duke certainly did not expect his demand would be granted, ſince the king and queen were ſolely guided by him who was moſt concerned to have it rejected; and he hoped, from a refuſal on the part of the court, to load them with all the blame, and to demonſtrate to the people, that the miniſtry, rather than part with their power, would expoſe the nation to all the horrors of a civil war. But here he was, for once, the dupe of his own policy: Henry took him at his word; Somerſet was put under confinement, and the duke of York deprived, by this condeſcenſion, of all excuſes for keeping up an armed force, diſmiſſed his troops on the firſt of March, and, as a teſt of his ſincerity, came to court unarmed, unattended, and without a paſſport: when he came into Henry's preſence, he openly profeſſed the cauſe of his taking arms, and inſiſted upon the duke of Somerſet's being immediately brought to trial, when, to his great aſtoniſhment, that miniſter (who had been arreſted in ſhew, but immediately after ſet at liberty) ſtepped forth from a private cloſet in the preſence-chamber, and, bitterly reviling York for his treaſonable practices, the other replied, and both parties poured out a torrent of indecent invectives even before the king: but the duke of York, finding that he had been duped, and was now entirely at the mercy of his enemies, out of regard to his own ſafety, moderated his pretenſions.

Had Somerſet had his will, the duke would have been inſtantly put to death; but the more diſpaſſionate of the council were fearful of carrying matters with too high an hand, and their advice prevailing, no violence was offered to his perſon: and, indeed, any attempt of that kind would probably have occaſioned very diſagreeable conſequences to the government. The duke of York was the idol of the people, who would not have failed to revenge his death upon the authors of it, however dignified by rank, or ſecured by authority. He had likewiſe many friends in the king's army, whom it would not have been prudent to incenſe at the preſent juncture of affairs; beſides, his ſon Edward, earl of Marche, a brave ſprightly young nobleman, was actually in arms on the borders of Wales, and the offering any violence to his father would be a ſufficient motive for him to declare immediate war againſt the government. From theſe, and the like conſiderations, it was reſolved to diſmiſs the duke of York, on condition that he ſhould, in St. Paul's church, make a formal ſubmiſſion to the king, and acknowlege his title by oath, the tenor of which condemned his late proceedings; but Richard, glad to get himſelf out of the hands of the court upon any terms, readily acquieſced, and the ceremony was performed on the tenth of March, before moſt of the principal lords of the kingdom *: and then the duke of York retired to his caſtle of Wigmore, on the borders of Wales, leaving Somerſet maſter at court, and director of all public affairs.

But there was another incident which contributed to York's releaſe: the turbulent Gaſcons had ſent deputies into England, offering to revolt from the French government, if they were properly ſupported. As the court had no money to defray the expence of a civil war, which the duke of York's death might have occaſioned, and as the ſupporting the Gaſcons was the only popular pretext by which they could get money from the parliament, it was reſolved to make their revenge give way to their more immediate intereſt.

The purport of the embaſſy from Guienne being laid before the council, and approved of there, the earl of Shrewſbury received a commiſſion conſtituting him governor of all Guienne, with very full powers. The public having vaſt expectations from the abilities of this great general, he ſoon got together five thouſand men, with whom he landed on the iſle of Medon, in the beginning of September; and, being joined by the lord of l'Epais, ſoon made himſelf maſter of that country. Bourdeaux, which had already began to feel the burden of French taxes, opened her gates to him; and all the Bourdelois followed her example: in a word, the Engliſh arms were attended with a train of conqueſts as rapid as thoſe of the French had been againſt the Engliſh in the ſame country. Old Talbot, being joined by a reinforcement of four thouſand men, under his ſon the lord Liſle, from England, he cloſed the year with the reduction of Fronſac and Chaſtillon, on the Dodogne; while all the French king could do this winter, was to diſpatch the marſhal de Jalognes, and ſome other officers, for the ſecurity of the places yet unſubdued, till the count de Clermont, his governor of Guienne, could take the field with an army in the ſpring.

By the month of March, 1453, the laſt-mentioned nobleman had gathered together an army of twenty-two thouſand men; with a detachment of theſe the marſhal de Lohac undertook the ſiege of Chaſtillon, while Chalais was taken by aſſault. It was the fifteenth of July before the French army formed the ſiege of Chaſtillon; on hearing of which the earl of Shrewſbury advanced, with eight or ten thouſand men, to relieve the place, and, on the twentieth of that month, early in the morning, drove the French out of their poſt in an adjoining abbey, the body which defended it making their retreat to their main body, ſtrongly encamped in the park of Chaſtillon. Talbot would never have thought of attacking them there, but being deceived by a falſe account that the enemy were retiring in great diſorder, he marched up to their camp; and though, upon his approach, finding the intelligence falſe, he would have retreated in time, yet being unable to reſtrain the ardour of his troops, he ſet the beſt face upon the matter, and gave orders for attacking the entrenchments. The conteſt, which was extremely bloody, laſted for near three hours; and though the enemy's artillery made a terrible havock among the Engliſh, the latter continued the attack with that intrepid reſolution for which they have been always ſo noted, and the fortune of the day ſeemed at laſt ready to declare for them: but a body of Bretons, all of them cavalry, who had never yet been engaged, paſſing their own entrenchments on the oppoſite ſide, took a compaſs, and fell upon the rear of the Engliſh juſt time enough to prevent the overthrow of the French.

The old Engliſh general now ſaw the total defeat of his troops inevitable; he found himſelf hemmed in on every ſide, while the French, having new pointed their artillery, plied him with greater fury than ever. At length, after having his horſe ſhot dead under him by a cannon-ball, he himſelf was transfixed to the ground by a ſpear, which put an end to his life. His gallant ſon, the lord Liſle, after many acts of courage, was killed by his father's ſide, the generous youth diſdaining to ſeek ſafety by flight. The Engliſh now looked upon themſelves as a deſolated herd; each ſhifted for himſelf, ſome towards Chaſtillon, and others towards Bourdeaux.

Thus fell Talbot, the brave earl of Shrewſbury, the honour of England's arms for the laſt twenty-five years of his life, who, in matters of war during that time, had no equal among his countrymen. Beſides the earl and his ſon, ſir Henry Talbot, the earl's baſtard brother, with ſir Edward Hall and about twelve hundred Engliſh, fell in this battle and purſuit: the lord Molyens and about ſixty ſoldiers were taken priſoners †.

The conſequences of this defeat were very fatal to the Engliſh intereſt, for Chaſtillon ſurrendered the next day; and Charles VII. coming up with the reſt of his forces, ſeveral places were beſieged at the ſame time; but few of them made any reſiſtance, except Cadillac, which was taken at laſt by aſſault: St. Millian, Libourne, St. Macaire, Langon, Fronſac, Rious, Chateauneuf, and other places, deſpairing of relief, ſubmitted readily; and in the mean while the blockade of Bourdeaux was formed both by ſea and land, under the marſhal de Loheac, the count de Penthievre, and other French officers. The garriſon held out till the ſeventeenth of October, when the beſieged, being miſerably diſtreſſed by famine, and without the leaſt proſpect of being relieved, deſired to capitulate, which Charles, with his accuſtomed moderation, granted, and even agreed that the Engliſh might have liberty to depart, with all their ſubſtance, ſafely into England or Calais, and the Gaſcons enjoy their goods and poſſeſſions. The ſurrender of Bourdeaux completed the conqueſt of Guienne, and all hopes of reannexing that duchy to the crown of England were for ever extinguiſhed.

Whilſt the French were thus ſucceſsfully employing their arms on the continent, Henry was, towards the beginning of this year, ſeized with a long and dangerous illneſs, during which the queen and Somerſet ruled every thing more abſolutely than ever. This, added to the news of the misfortunes in France, arriving in England, blew the diſcontent of the people into a violent flame: they exclaimed with great virulence againſt the treachery and miſconduct of the miniſtry, who had neglected to furniſh the earl of Shrewſbury with the neceſſary reinforcements. The court and the country of England were filled with the duke of York's friends, who did not fail to keep up the ill humours of the nation as the moſt likely means of bring about their own ends. But the duke's hopes received a violent blow, by the queen's being delivered of a ſon (named Edward), on the thirteenth of October. This event deſtroyed all proſpect of the quiet ſucceſſion of the duke of York, who was otherwiſe, in the right of his father, and by the laws enacted ſince the acceſſion of the houſe of Lancaſter, next heir to the crown, and rather tended to widen than repair the breach between the two parties, and the duke of York was now reduced to employ his natural and acquired intereſt for obtaining his end.

We have already given the characters of ſome of the nobility who were attached to his intereſt: the two principal of theſe, the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, did not chuſe to declare themſelves till they could be ſure of a majority in the council; and adviſed the duke of York likewiſe carefully to conceal his aim, at the preſent juncture, beneath the maſk of ſubmiſſion and quiet demeanor; the frankneſs wherewith he had diſbanded his troops, and his late oath to the king, having lulled the court into a perfect ſecurity on his account.

The parliament, which had been ſummoned in the beginning of this year, had been ſeveral times prorogued, on account of the king's illneſs: the ſecret friends of the duke of York laid hold of this interval to inſinuate to the queen and Somerſet (who thought them to be of the court party), that, conſidering the preſent diſpoſition of the people, they had very little reaſon to expect much complaiſance from the parliament, but, on the contrary, there were good grounds for ſuppoſing, that it would, in compliance with the ſenſe of the nation, appoint a new miniſtry: in order to prevent this misfortune, they obſerved, that it would be neceſſary to admit into the council the duke of York, the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, and ſome other popular noblemen, to convince the public that they had no intention to make their own wills the ſole rule of government. This advice appeared ſo plauſible, that the queen and her favourite ran headlong into the ſnare, and theſe noblemen were appointed members of the council before the meeting of the parliament, which, after repeated prorogations, was to ſit on the fourteenth of February, 1454; but, as ſoon as the duke of York and his cabal got a footing in the council, they found means to have it yet farther adjourned to the fifteenth of March, in order to gain time to concert meaſures with the members; mean while the Yorkiſts, who, from the inſtant they gained admiſſion into the cabinet, ſuperſeded the credit of their adverſaries, began to renew their proſecution againſt Somerſet, and even ventured to arreſt him in the queen's chamber, and from thence ſent him to the Tower.

The king ſtill continuing ſo ill as to be unfit even for the ſhadow of buſineſs, the council, now entirely at the duke of York's devotion, taking into conſideration the deſtructive ſtate of the kingdom, and Henry's helpleſs condition, thought it neceſſary to appoint the duke of York, by a commiſſion, dated the thirteenth of February, 1454, lieutenant of the kingdom, with powers to open and hold the enſuing ſeſſion in the king's name. He made uſe of this great power to the full: the office of chancellor being then vacant by the death of Kemp, archbiſhop of Canterbury, he conferred the ſame upon his friend and ally the earl of Saliſbury.

The ſeſſion opened with a petition from the houſe of commons, for a conſervation of their privileges, and that Thomas Thorpe, their ſpeaker, and Walter Reut, another of their members, might be releaſed and ſet at liberty: it ſeems the duke of York had cauſed them both to be arreſted. This petition, however, was refuſed; and the commons, returning to their houſe, choſe ſir Thomas Charleton their ſpeaker. The curious reader will find upon what principles this arreſt and detention was founded, under the article of Laws reſpecting this reign.

The next ſtep of the commons was to appoint the duke of York lord-protector of the realm; and on the third of April, the king's letters patent were iſſued, confirming him in that title, and alſo conſtituting him defender of the kingdom and church of England, and principal counſellor of the king; a poſt which he readily accepted, being the ſame titles and power as the duke of Gloceſter formerly enjoyed; and a ſalary of two thouſand pounds per annum was allotted him, for the maintenance of his new dignity, and an act paſſed for inveſting him, with it (on a ſuppoſition of Henry's incapacity) till Edward, prince of Wales, ſhould come to years of diſcretion. The duke of York, thus poſſeſſing all but the name of royalty, in the plenitude of power conſtituted himſelf captain-general of Calais, in the room of the duke of Somerſet: but the latter, it ſeems, not chuſing to reſign that poſt without an expreſs order from the king, a writ for that purpoſe was made out, and York was confirmed in the government of Calais by the parliament.

In this parliament Edmund (Tudor) of Hadham, and Jaſper (Tudor) of Hatfield, ſons of Catherine of France, Henry's mother, by her ſecond huſband, Owen Tudor, a gentleman de-ſcended from the ancient princes of Wales, were declared the king's uterine brothers, and were created, the firſt earl of Richmond, and the other earl of Pembroke, with a right of precedence above all other earls, and next to dukes, in all councils and parliaments. To conclude the tranſactions of this parliament, it ſeems that the earl of Devonſhire, Somerſet's ſon-in-law, was, by the ſecret practices of the York party, accuſed of treaſon, but was honourably acquitted.

The duke of York did not long enjoy the exerciſe of the new dignity which he procured with ſo high an hand; for Henry appearing to be a little better, his commiſſion was ſuperſeded; Somerſet admitted to bail on the fifth of February, 1455; and, on the fourth of March, the king took from the duke of York the command of Calais, which was ſoon after reſtored to the duke of Somerſet, who re-entered into the adminiſtration, and, in conjunction with the queen, directed all the affairs of the realm as formerly, without controul, making uſe of Henry's name to warrant all his proceedings.

Theſe proceedings, which were all effected by the queen, drove the duke of York once more into arms. Having concerted meaſures with his friends, he retired again to Wales in order to aſſemble forces. The proceedings of the court, in releaſing the duke of Somerſet, without giving the nation any ſatisfaction, gave him a plauſible handle for renewing his former popular pretext of reformation, in which he imagined, from the diſpoſition of the people, he ſhould be ſtrongly ſupported: nor was he deceived in his expectations; for, in a very ſhort ſpace of time he ſaw himſelf at the head of three thouſand men, with which force he thought to ſurprize the king in London; but Henry, aware of his deſign, marched out of that city to meet the inſurgents, though not with more than two thouſand men, but all of them brave, and determined to ſerve their king. The chief officers of the royal army were, Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerſet; Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, and the earl of Stafford, his eldeſt ſon; Henry Piercy (ſon of Hotſpur), earl of Northumberland; James Butler, earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond; John Beaufort, earl of Dorſet; Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke; Thomas lord Clifford; the lords Sudley, Barnes, Roos, and other noblemen: with the duke of York were John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk; Richard Neville, earl of Saliſbury; Richard Neville, earl of Warwick, his ſon; William, lord Falconbridge; Edward, lord Cobham, and others.

On the twenty-firſt of May the royal army lay at Watford; and the next day they reached St. Alban's, where the king took up his head-quarters, in St. Peter's ſtreet; while the duke of York and his followers lay encamped at Keyefield. This latter, on his arrival at Royſton, in the courſe of his march, had wrote a letter to the king, with one to the archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſiring him to deliver that for the king into his own hands*; but this was ſecreted by Somerſet and Thorpe †, two of York's ſworn enemies, who took it from the archbiſhop's meſſenger: in it the confederate lords made ſtrong profeſſions of duty to Henry, and of zeal for his ſervice and the good of the ſtate: and deſired "admiſſion to his preſence, to vindicate themſelves from the calumnies of their enemies, and to lay before him the ill conduct of his miniſters, in order to their being brought to examination according to law, and treated as their miſdemeanors ſhould be found to deſerve." This was alſo the ſubſtance of a demand they ſent to the king, on the morning of the twenty-third of May; but Henry, with a ſpirit he never before diſcovered, told the duke of York's agents who delivered his meſſage, that he would ſooner deliver up his crown than the leaſt ſoldier in his army, to pleaſe a ſet of ſuch inſolent rebels; and that he would treat as a traitor every man that ſhould preſume to fight him in the field.

Upon receipt of this anſwer from the king, the confederates began a furious attack upon the town; and the earl of Warwick, with a body of men, breaking down a garden-wall, which ſtood between the Key and the Chequer, in Holywell ſtreet, a hot diſpute enſued between the inſurgents and the royal party; while the duke of York, marching up with his diviſion, attacked the vanguard of Henry's army, under the lord Clifford: the king's army, being not only pent up in the town, but inferior in number to that of the duke, was at laſt totally routed. The duke of Somerſet, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, the lord Clifford, with many knights and gentlemen of great eminence, were killed on the ſpot: the duke of Buckingham, receiving a wound, retired out of the battle; the earl of Wiltſhire, and Thorpe, chancellor of the Exchequer, eſcaped; and about eight hundred of the king's beſt troops lay dead on the field of battle. Henry himſelf was wounded in the neck with an arrow, but was the laſt to retire from the fight (for he did not naturally want courage, though conſcientiouſly he hated bloodſhed), and then took refuge in an adjacent hut: there he was found out by York, Warwick, and Saliſbury, who, approaching him with all the external humility imaginable, beſeeched him to forgive what they had done, aſſuring him that, the enemy of the nation and them being now dead, he ſhould hereafter find them the moſt obedient of his ſubjects, at the ſame time requeſting him to truſt his perſon with them; which Henry, not able to help himſelf, complied with, and York, carrying him to London, cauſed writs to be iſſued on the twenty-ſixth of May, for calling a parliament.

It met on Wedneſday, the ninth of July, and ſir John Wenlock, who was of the royal party, was choſen ſpeaker. The duke of York appearing in the houſe, laid before the members a long detail of his conduct: he accuſed the duke of Somerſet, Thorpe, and one William Joſeph, with concealing from the king the letters which he and his party had written from Royſton, and which, if the king had read, might have prevented what afterwards happened: he declared, that, when he came to St. Alban's, his intention, and that of the lords who were with him, was only to have thrown themſelves at the royal feet with their dutiful petition; and that the duke of Somerſet's obſtructing their acceſs had occaſioned the bloodſhed which followed. All this was confirmed by deeds procured from the king himſelf, who was no more at liberty to follow his own counſels in this juncture than when he was under the guardianſhip of the queen and the duke of Somerſet; and, on the twenty-third of July, the duke of York's acquital, with that of his whole party, was confirmed in full parliament, which was then adjourned to the twelfth of November, at Weſtminſter, after having paſſed a general pardon for all offences committed before the firſt day of the ſeſſion. On this occaſion, every prelate preſent laying his hand on his breaſt, and every temporal lord taking the king by the hand, renewed their fealty to him *.

The parliament reaſſembling on the day appointed, the commons preſented a petition, praying the lords to move the king "to appoint an able protector and defender of the realm, ſeeing his highneſs would not attend the ſame, and that the commons might have knowlege of him †." Whereupon, five days after, the king ſigned letters patent, in which he declares, that, "having been petitioned by his parliament to nominate a protector, he appointed the duke of York for that important office; but he ſhould be removed by the parliament, or when the young prince of Wales ſhould be capable of it ‡." The duke accepted the poſt, with the ſame powers and privileges as before, but with a larger allowance || for ſupporting the honour and charge of the dignity.

The immediate occaſion or pretence for the petition of the commons for York's being appointed protector, was the hoſtilities lately committed in the Weſt between the earl of Devon and the lord Bonneville, who had come to an engagement, in which a great number of the followers on each ſide had been ſlain, and the whole country was harraſſed by continual riots and depredations, ſo that there was an abſolute neceſſity to put a ſtop to theſe outrages; and the duke of York being determined to repair thither in perſon, the parliament was, on the thirteenth of December, prorogued to the fourteenth of January following, having firſt paſſed an act for the reſumption of all grants ſince the death of Henry V. and appropriated a ſum for the expences of the houſhold.

While the duke of York thus enjoyed his triumph, the queen did not behold his ſucceſs with idle reſignation. Henry Beaufort, the new duke of Somerſet, ſon of him who fell at St. Alban's, glowed with impatience to revenge the death of his father; Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, breathed no leſs vengeance for the loſs of his ſon, who fell on the ſame occaſion; and all the princes and nobles allied or attached to the houſe of Lancaſter, perceiving the duke of York taking large ſtrides towards the throne, reſolved to exert all their endeavours to ſtop his progreſs. Notwithſtanding this oppoſition, he lived in ſuch ſeeming ſecurity as aſtoniſhed his enemies. He thought he ſhould run too great a riſque in pretending openly to the crown, which had remained near ſixty years in the houſe of Lancaſter, and therefore he waited for ſome favourable opportunity to broach his pretenſions: his chief aim was to acquire the favour of the people, without which he foreſaw all his efforts would prove ineffectual; and, that they might ſee his conduct was not influenced by paſſion or intereſt, he affected a great attention to, and reverence for, the royal family: he provided a decent maintenance for, and ſettled the houſhold of, the king's eldeſt ſon §; he alſo left the king and the queen at perfect liberty to act as they ſhould think proper. He thought it was not in their power to diveſt him of the dignity of protector, which, according to his patent, could not be revoked but by the parliament; but the queen was too active and enterprizing to be deterred from her purpoſe by ſuch ſlender obſtacles.

The king having recovered his health, the enemies of the duke, with the queen at their head, reſolved to ſeize this opportunity to deprive him of his protectorſhip. The parliament reaſſembling at the appointed time, on the twenty-fifth of February, 1456, Henry came to the houſe, and declared from the throne, that, as he now enjoyed perfect health, and was in a condition to reſume the reins of government, he did not think the kingdom had any further occaſion for a protector; he therefore deſired the parliament would diſcharge the duke of York from that office. Whether the two houſes thought the requeſt reaſonable, or that, during the receſs of the holidays between the fourteenth of December and fourteenth of January, the queen and her party had brought over the majority of the members, it is certain that the parliament agreed to a final repeal of the duke's powers as protector of the kingdom; and a writ was directed to him, notifying his ſuſpenſion. He was no ſooner exonerated from this charge, which he enjoyed only three months, than the earl of Saliſbury was deprived of his poſt of chancellor, to which he had been advanced in the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, as the earl of Warwick had to the government of Calais; but this laſt, being the darling of the ſoldiery, it was not an eaſy matter to turn him out of his poſt.

Had Margaret been ſatisfied with this ſucceſs, ſhe might perhaps have enjoyed her authority for ſome time, without any diſturbance; but, puffed up with this favourable turn of fortune, ſhe reſolved to enſure her future tranquility by arreſting the perſons of York, Saliſbury, and Warwick. With this view the court was removed, early in the following year, 1457, to Coventry, where ſhe thought ſhe could execute her purpoſe with greater eaſe than in London; and letters were ſent, under the privy-ſeal, to thoſe three noblemen, requiring their attendance upon the king, upon affairs of importance to the ſtate.

|| Namely, four thouſand marks per annum. Stat. 33 Hen. VI. c. 7.

§ What this was will appear from the following words of the record, "The king by his ſeveral letters patent, confirmeth to his ſon Edward, prince of Wales, and to his heirs, kings of England, his creation of the principality and earldom of Cheſter, with all the particular dominions and hereditaments belonging thereto; and for that the ſaid prince, the king's firſt begotten, the day of his birth, ought to be duke of Cornwall, the king granteth to the ſaid prince livery of the ſame, and of all other hereditaments belonging of common conſent. And farther, it is enacted, that the ſaid prince ſhall be at diet, and ſojourn in the king's court till the age of fourteen years; for the which diet the king ſhall take yearly all the revenues and profits of the ſaid principality, earldom, and duchy of the ſaid prinee, until he come to the age of fourteen years, allowing yearly to the ſaid prince, towards his wardrobe and wages, ten thouſand pounds until his age of eight years; and from the ſaid age to the age of fourteen years, twenty thouſand marks yearly." mined mined to obey the order; accordingly he and his aſſociates ſet out for Coventry: but when they were within a few miles of the place, they received, from ſome of their ſecret friends, intelligence of the deſign formed againſt them, and it came ſo late that they had not a moment to loſe, but were forced to fly in all haſte; York, with only a groom and a page, to his eſtate of Wigmore, on the borders of Wales; Saliſbury to his own caſtle of Middleham, in Yorkſhire; and Warwick to the ſea-ſide, where he got ſhipping, and paſſed over to his government of Calais *. The queen was greatly chagrined at this diſappointment, but comforted herſelf with the thoughts that theſe three lords, by being ſeparated, would be leſs formidable.

This treacherous attempt, however, put an end to all manner of confidence: court invitations and promiſes were looked upon as ſnares for the ruin of the oppoſite party, and occaſioned ſuch a breach among the nobility in the different intereſts, that they left all viſiting and correſpondence with each other; and this ſtrangeneſs proving habitual, turned in a ſhort time to ſuch an inveteracy, that, when they came under the names of Yorkiſts and Lancaſtrians to engage in a civil war, it was carried on with an unuſual degree of fury and cruelty. Upon the retreat of the three confederate lords, the dukes of Buckingham and Somerſet acted as chief miniſters, and, with the queen, governed all at court.

But the mutual jealouſy and machinations of the two parties were at this time interrupted by other conſiderations. The French having intelligence of the diſtractions in England, ſought to avail themſelves of them, and Charles began to think of repaying one of the many dreadful viſits he had received from this country. A French hiſtorian † will have it that Charles received an invitation from queen Margaret for that purpoſe, who knew no readier means of effecting the duke of York's ruin; but this aſſertion does not appear ſufficiently authenticated by cotemporary writers, for us to adopt it as fact. It is certain, however, that, about this time the French king entered upon a project to invade England, in concert with the Scots, who, agreeable to the plan adjuſted between them, actually entered the northern counties, about Midſummer this year, under their king James II. notwithſtanding the truce ſubſiſting between the two nations, and carried off a conſiderable booty: and the earl of Northumberland, with the Scottiſh earl of Douglas, then a refugee in England, marching againſt them, were defeated with ſome loſs by the Scottiſh generals, the earl of Angus and ſir James Hamilton. On this occaſion the duke of York, nobly ſacrificing his private pique to the intereſt of his country, got together a powerful force, with which he joined the earl of Northumberland, and both generals marching againſt the invaders, drove them before them into their own country, whither they followed them, and laid great part of their borders waſte with fire and ſword. The French, ſlower in their attempt, through the neceſſity of equipping a fleet, were not ready to ſail from Honfleur, in Normandy, till the twentieth of Auguſt. On the twenty-eighth of the ſame ſame month, the marſhals de Brezé and de Loheac, with about ſeven thouſand men, landed near Sandwich, and plundered the place; but the militia of the country aſſembling in great numbers, and ſhewing a noble reſolution of defending their properties, the French were glad to reimbark with the booty they had made. In their return they made a deſcent in the Weſt, and plundered the village of Fowey, in Cornwall, and alſo ſome places in Devonſhire; but this predatory expedition redounded little to the glory of Charles's arms.

This ſtorm being happily blown over, Henry who was of a pacific diſpoſition, and equally dreaded the rage of foreign and domeſtic war, was very anxious to make up the feuds among the nobility, in order to unite them all in the defence of his perſon and government. Great part of this year was therefore ſpent in endeavours for that ſalutary purpoſe; but the late treacherous attempt againſt the Yorkiſts had put that party ſo much upon their guard, that neither the duke nor his aſſociates could be brought to liſten to any propoſal of a meeting, till Henry condeſcended to write them a letter with his own hand, in which he promiſed, upon his ſalvation, they ſhould receive no injury, and earneſtly requeſted that mutual animoſities ſhould be buried in mutual forgiveneſs. Henry, though a prince of mean capacity, had, by the innocence of his life, and the piety of his devotion, acquired, if not the eſteem, at leaſt the good will of his ſubjects, ſo that when theſe his cordial invitations were made public, the nation had ſo high an opinion of his candour, that the oppoſing lords could no longer ſtand out, with any ſhadow of decency. Perhaps they did not think their ſcheme yet ripe for an open revolt againſt the eſtabliſhed king, ſo they agreed to meet at London, to ſettle the articles of their reconciliation: but as each ſide ſeemed ſtill to entertain a diſtruſt of the other's ſincerity, it was agreed by the meditators (who were Thomas Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury, with ſeveral other prelates) that they ſhould come, attended with proper retinues.

Accordingly, on the fifteenth day of January, 1458, the earl of Saliſbury arrived firſt, with a body of five hundred men; as York did, on the twenty-ſixth, with four hundred, taking up their quarters near each other, the former in Cold-harbour, and the latter in Baynard's caſtle; Warwick came over from Calais with ſix hundred followers, and choſe the Grey-friars for the place of his reſidence; and the reſt of the Yorkiſts lodged in different parts within the city.

Of the Lancaſtrian party, Somerſet, Exeter, Northumberland, Egremont, and Clifford came with a pompous train of followers, who quartered in the ſuburbs; and ſir Godfrey Bulleyn, the lord-mayor of London, at the head of ten thouſand men, patrolled through the ſtreets, for preventing all diſturbances that might happen between the numerous retinues of the treating lords.

The conferences met with great difficulties, occaſioned by the heats, animoſities, and jarring intereſts of the two parties, inſomuch that it was the twenty-fourth of March before every thing was adjuſted, when at length the following terms were mutually agreed to.

I. That there ſhould be a general pardon for all parties concerned in the late diſturbances, on the part of the duke of York as well as the king; and that both ſhould equally be held thenceforth as ſubjects:

ſubjects: but that the duke of York, with the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury, ſhould ſettle forty pounds a year upon the abbey of St. Alban's, for ſuffrages and obits to be kept, and alms to be employed, for the ſouls of the noblemen and others killed in the late battle there.

II. That the duke of York ſhould pay five thouſand pounds to the ducheſs of Somerſet, which was to be divided amongſt her youngeſt children: and that the earl of Warwick ſhould pay two thouſand marks, for the uſe of the younger brethren of the lord Clifford.

III. That whereas ſir Thomas Piercy, the lord Egremont, and Richard Piercy, ſons of the counteſs of Northumberland, were fined to pay to the earl of Saliſbury, his wife and ſons Thomas and John Neville, fourteen thouſand eight hundred marks for treſpaſſes, found by Richard Bingham and Ralph Pool, the king's judges, to be done to the ſaid earl of Saliſbury and his ſons, it was agreed the ſaid ſums ſhould be releaſed by them to the ſaid offenders; yet upon condition that the ſaid lord Egremont and his brothers ſhould enter into recognizance in Chancery, to keep the peace with the ſaid earl of Saliſbury, his wife, children, ſervants, and tenants: and the ſaid earl ſhould diſcharge the tenants of the ſaid earl of Northumberland and lord Egremont from the obligations to ſtand to their order and government.

The IVth article contains general releaſes on all ſides: and expreſſes, that all matters of property ſhall ſtand upon the ſame footing as they were before the troubles. The other articles of this agreement relate only to the ſecurity which all the parties were obliged to give to its performance.

This agreement being ſettled, nothing remained but to notify it to the public; to do which with all poſſible ſolemnity, a public proceſſion was made, in great pomp, by all parties, to St. Paul's cathedral, the duke of York leading the queen, followed by the duke of Somerſet, the duke of Exeter, and the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, one of each party walking abreaſt, hand in hand, with every appearance of a cordial reconciliation and undiſguiſed confidence: but, unhappily, there was little ſincerity on either ſide; inſtead of labouring chearfully in the great ends of the reunion, inſtead of taking their places at the council-board, to which they were now entitled, the confederate lords ſuddenly retired to where their ſeveral intereſts lay; the duke of York to the borders of Wales; the earl of Saliſbury to the North; and the earl of Warwick, who had contracted for the guard of the ſea, to take the command of the fleet. While the latter was on a cruize in the channel, he fell in with ſome merchant-ſhips belonging to the Genoeſe and Lubeckers, who then made a great figure in the commerce of Europe; and a diſpute ariſing in conſequence of the foreigners refuſing to pay the proper compliment to the Engliſh flag, the earl attacked them, ſunk ſome, and carried the reſt into Calais, on board of which he found an immenſe booty. Theſe two republics, however, making vigorous remonſtrances at the Engliſh court againſt this outrage, as they termed it, the king appointed commiſſioners to enquire into the particulars, and Warwick was obliged to come over to juſtify his conduct.

During his ſtay in London on this account, a fray happened between one of his ſervants and a domeſtic of the queen's, in which the latter, who was the aggreſſor, was deſperately wounded. The companions on each ſide took part in the quarrel, the ſtreets of London were filled with blood and confuſion, and matters went ſo far, that the queen's attorney-general was killed in one of theſe frays; and it was with great difficulty that, in another on the like occaſion, the earl himſelf eſcaped with life, by taking to his barge. He failed not to repreſent this as a premeditated attack, contrived by the queen, in order to aſſaſſinate him; and ſet out ſoon after for Yorkſhire, where he had an interview with his father, the earl of Saliſbury, and the duke of York, when it was reſolved again to appeal to arms for ſatisfaction upon the violation of the late agreement. Warwick made but a ſhort ſtay with his friends, poſting over in all haſte to Calais, for fear of ſome attempt on the part of the court to ſeize it during his abſence.

It being diſcovered ſoon after, that the queen, to juſtify the late attempt upon the earl's life, had procured an order to arreſt and throw him into the Tower, where it was ſuppoſed effectual methods would have been taken for removing ſo powerful an adverſary; the duke of York and the earl of Saliſbury made their complaints to Henry of theſe treacherous proceedings, inſiſting that he would diſmiſs from his council all ſuch who had a ſhare in them, or had adviſed the breach of the agreement. But Henry, wholly under the guidance of his wife and her cabal, took no notice of their remonſtrances: upon which the confederate lords began to make proviſion for taking the field in caſe of neceſſity.

Early in the year 1459, the duke of York and his party were in arms; and it was agreed by them, that, whilſt the duke was ſtrengthening his intereſt in Wales, the earl of Saliſbury ſhould advance to London, at the head of five thouſand men, and openly demand ſatisfaction for the injury done to his ſon. But as theſe meaſures could not be taken without the knowlege of the court, the lord Audley *, who had a great family intereſt in the counties through which Saliſbury was to march, was ordered to raiſe troops, and had a commiſſion as commander in chief of the royal army. Audley in a ſhort time was at the head of ten thouſand men, and in a condition to march againſt the earl of Saliſbury, who was advanced as far as the borders of Shropſhire and Staffordſhire. There the two armies met; and though Saliſbury had not above half the force which his adverſary brought againſt him, he would not retreat, and, by a ſtratagem, gained a victory which he had no reaſon otherwiſe to expect.

The river Sow, a ſmall ſtream but of a conſiderable depth, ran between the two armies, and its banks were lined by the lord Audley's troops. Saliſbury ordered a detachment of his beſt archers to advance briſkly to his ſide of the river, and to pour a diſcharge of arrows upon the royaliſts on the oppoſite ſide. The latter, upon this, coming up in their turn, the earl of Saliſbury ordered his men to retreat, which they did with the appearance of precipitate confuſion: this had the effect Saliſbury wiſhed; the royaliſts, deceived by this feint, and thinking the enemy flying, began to paſs the ſtream, with lord Audley at their head, in order to complete the rout of the Yorkiſts. The earl of Saliſbury had made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for their reception; before half the royaliſts were paſſed over, he charged them with his whole force upon a plain called Bloreheath, and gave them a total defeat. The lord Audley was killed at the head of his men *: his chief officers who fell with him were Hugh Venables, of Kinderton; Thomas Dutton, of Dutton; Robert Molineux, of Siſſon, with many more, in all to the number of two thouſand four hundred. In this battle, which was fought on the twenty-third of September, the Cheſhire men were the greateſt ſufferers, who wore this day little ſilver ſwans, which the queen had ordered to be diſtributed to all the gentlemen of that county; no doubt with a view to put them in mind of Henry's deſcent from Edward III. who wore the ſame for his device †.

The duke of York, encouraged by this ſucceſs, raiſed all the forces he could in the Welſh Marches, appointing Ludlow for the place of rendezvous, where all their friends from different quarters were to join him and Saliſbury; and the duke, now unable to keep on the maſk any longer, was obliged to avow his pretenſions of claiming the crown. This attack upon Henry's perſon and dignity raiſed all the friends he had in the nation; the dukes of Somerſet, Exeter, and Buckingham, all of them riveted by blood and inclination to the Lancaſter family, had great intereſt in the kingdom, and ſaw now more than ever the neceſſity of their entering heartily upon the defence of Henry's title; in ſhort, they beſtirred themſelves ſo effectually, that Henry in a few days got together an army far ſuperior to that of the confederate lords. On the ninth of October writs were iſſued for the meeting of a parliament at Coventry, on the twentieth of the following month. The duke of Somerſet was appointed governor of Calais, in the room of the earl of Warwick, who, upon advice of this, left that place under the care of William Neville, lord Fauconbridge (his uncle), and taking with him part of the garriſon, of which he gave the command to ſir Andrew Trollop, who had ſignalized himſelf in the wars in France, and to ſir John Blount, another experienced general, he croſſed the ſea, and joined his friends at Ludlow.

To this place, where the lords were encamped, it was reſolved by Henry's council immediately to advance. When the royal army came to Worceſter it made a halt, and Henry ſent Richard Beauchamp, biſhop of Saliſbury, with an offer of pardon to the rebels, if they would lay down their arms; but theſe were ſlighted; for, after ſo many repeated breaches of faith, no one would truſt the court. The king, therefore, continued advancing; and, on the thirteenth of October, he came to Ludeford, a few miles diſtant from Ludlow, with a fixed reſolution to give the Yorkiſts battle: they, on their ſide, made a ſhew as if they would reſiſt to the utmoſt. The two commanders from Calais, and the troops they brought over with them, imagined they were only to reſcue their king out of the hands of a wicked miniſtry; but now, finding the duke of York's intention was to wreſt the crown from him, whom they looked upon as the rightful poſſeſſor, they deſerted by night to the royal army; and the chiefs of the Yorkiſts, apprehending that their men might be diſcouraged by that revolt, or be tempted to follow the example, thought fit to ſeparate the next day; York, with his ſecond ſon, the earl of Rutland, making the beſt of their way, through Wales, into Ireland; and the earls of Marche, Warwick, and Saliſbury into Devonſhire, where ſir John Denham provided ſhips, which carried them over to Calais, into which place they were received by lord Fauconbridge, notwithſtanding the duke of Somerſet being appointed governor thereof by the king ‡.

As ſoon it was found that the rebels forces were diſperſed, ſeveral troops of light horſe were diſpatched in purſuit, who took a great number of ſtragglers, none of whom, excepting thoſe capitally concerned, ſuffered; but the town of Ludlow, for its remarkable attachment to the cauſe of the confederates, was plundered by the king's troops; and the ducheſs of York, with her two younger ſons, were made priſoners in the caſtle.

The parliament meeting at Coventry, on the twentieth of November, agreeable to its ſummons, paſſed an act of attainder againſt the duke of York, the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, with their chief adherents, who were all declared traitors, their eſtates forfeited, and their heirs diſinherited. The reader will find in the note § an abſtract of the proceedings of the houſe on this occaſion, with a particular § The attainder of Richard duke of York, wherein are contained theſe matters enſuing: Firſt, a commemoration of the king's great care in bringing the ſaid duke up, and the manifold benefits to him ſhewed. The confederation of the ſaid duke with Jack Cade, to be advanced to the crown. The duke's coming out of Ireland with force, to the king's court and preſence. The duke's practices to be protector. The battle of St. Alban's, at what time the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford were ſlain; and the pacification made by the king between the heirs of the ſaid duke and earls, and their promiſes of due obedience; with renunciation of ſundry benefits to them afterwards, ſhewed the ambition of the ſaid duke and earls. Their new oaths and promiſes made to the king. Their politics in not coming to the council, for their readineſs in coming together, being far aſunder. The expedition of the earl of Saliſbury, with Thomas and John Neville, knights, ſons of the ſaid earl Thomas; and Thomas Oringe, of Toungue, in the county of York; with five thouſand men, with banners diſplayed, on Bloreheath, on the feaſt of St. Matthew, anno 1437. ticular recapitulation from records of all the duke's conduct, and an account of his principal abettors by name, much more particular than we have in almoſt any hiſtory.

The queen ſeemed now to have ſet her foot upon all oppoſition: all grants, poſts, or penſions which had been given to any of the duke of York's adherents, were revoked and cancelled by order of parliament; the Scottiſh earl of Douglas, who had been for ſome time an exile in England, was gratified with a penſion during life, for his eminent ſervices to the houſe of Lancaſter. But, in this diſtreſſed conditon of their affairs, and in the height of the triumphs of the Lancaſtrian party, the Yorkiſts found a reſource in the admirable genius of the earl of Warwick: that nobleman was ſtill in poſſeſſion of Calais, and refuſed to deliver it up, on pretence that he held it from the parliament; upon which, Henry, duke of Somerſet, to whom that government had been granted, ſailed over to take poſſeſſion of it, with a mere handful of men, imagining that, after the deciſive blow lately given to the confederates, he ſhould meet with very little difficulty in entering upon his charge. But the earl of Warwick was ſo univerſally beloved by the whole garriſon, that, when Somerſet appeared before the place, and ſummoned it to ſurrender, he had no other anſwer than what came from the mouth of its cannon. Being in no condition to force his entrance, he retired to Guiſnes, where he reſided in expectation of farther ſupplies. Having gone aſhore, he left his ſhips, with ſome of his friends on board, at ſea; but the mariners were ſo well affected to the duke of York's intereſt, or rather to the earl of Warwick's perſon, that they roſe and carried the ſhips into Calais, where the duke of Somerſet's friends were barbarouſly put to death by Warwick's orders †.

The queen, incenſed beyond meaſure at this monſtrous inſult, and determined to wreſt this important fortreſs out of the hands of her enemies, equipped a fleet for the aſſiſtance of Somerſet, and ordered a conſiderable body of troops to be put on board, under the command of the lord Rivers and his ſon Anthony Woodville (afterwards lord Scales in right of his wife.) While the fleet lay in the harbour of Sandwich, waiting for a fair wind, the earl of Warwick, having intelligence of their deſtination, gave ſir John Denham the command of the ſhips that had lately deſerted from Somerſet, and a body of troops on board, who ſailed to Sandwich, where he found Rivers and all his officers, who were carried to Calais, together with their ſhips, the ſailors themſelves favouring the enterprize.

Warwick, having now got a fleet, ſailed for Ireland in the beginning of the year 1460, in order to conſult the duke of York about the meaſures to be taken for another inſurrection in England, where the people eſpouſed their cauſe, and their friends expected them with impatience. The duke agreed with him, that the lords at Calais ſhould make a deſcent in the county of Kent, which abounded with their adherents and well-wiſhers, and proceed directly to the capital, which they did not doubt would receive them with open arms. The earl of Warwick, in his return to Calais, fell in with the Engliſh fleet, commanded by Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, who had lately been appointed admiral of England in the earl's ſtead, and been ſent out to intercept him in his paſſage: but the mariners and ſoldiers on board the duke's fleet refuſing to fight againſt their old and beloved commander, he, in order to prevent a total revolt, ſailed into Dartmouth, where the greater part of his men deſerted for want of pay and proviſion.

The queen and the miniſtry doubted not that the interview between the duke of York and Warwick was the forerunner of a freſh rebellion, and reſolved to leave nothing untried to prevent the bad conſequences of their landing in England. James Butler, earl of Wiltſhire, the lords Scales and Hungerford were ſent down into the counties ſuppoſed to be in the duke's intereſt, particularly thoſe of Kent and Hampſhire, with a commiſſion to impriſon and try all whom they judged to be of that party. They executed their commiſſion with great rigour, putting to death many who were only ſuſpected of favouring the duke of York; others were deprived of their offices, plundered, and otherwiſe ill treated, which much inflamed the animoſities of the two parties: add to this, that the caſtle of Denbigh, which had belonged to the duke of York, was taken by aſſault by the earl of Pembroke, who had a commiſſion to be Henry's general in Wales and upon its Marches.

In ſhort, the proſpect of ruin which the confederate lords had, as to their own private eſtates, did not, perhaps, a little quicken their reſolution of a ſecond invaſion: they ſent over the lord Fauconbridge with a manifeſto, which he had orders to diſperſe throughout the kindom, and to ſend a copy of it to the archbiſhop of Canterbury. It was to the following purpoſe: "that the duke of York, the earls of Marche, Saliſbury, and Warwick, had divers times offered, and ſent, to come into the king's preſence, to have declared for their duty to God, his highneſs, and proſperity of the realm, theſe following matters, viz.

"I. The great extortions, murders, robberies, and oppreſſions to the church, and miniſters of it, againſt the laws both of God and man.

"II. The poverty and miſery of his highneſs himſelf, who, being cheated and defrauded of the revenues of the crown, which might, and would, ſupport his royal grace, by the deſtroyers of the eſquire; and Robert Bold, brother to Henry Bold, knight; who, with ſeveral others pitched their camp in the fields of Ludlow, in the county of Hereford, on Friday, the vigil of the Tranſlation of Edward, in anno 1438: the duke pretended to his company that the king was dead, for whoſe ſoul maſs was ſaid in the ſaid duke's camp. The king's expectation of the ſaid duke: the duke's ranging in battle; the fortifying his ground with carts, and his guns ſet, before the ſkirmiſh made: his ambuſh laid; and his meaning to have ſuddenly ſurprized the king's hoſt. The departure of the ſaid duke and earls out of the field about midnight, under cover to repoſe themſelves at Ludlow, and their flight into Wales; for that their army fainted, and ſubmitted themſelves unto the king, who granted their pardon. The attainder of the ſaid duke, earls, and other aforeſaid perſons as traitors. Alice, wife to Richard, earl of Saliſbury; William Oldhall, knight; and Thomas Vaughan, eſquire, of London; were attainted as traitors, for procuring the treaſons aforeſaid. All and ſingular the hereditaments of the ſaid duke and others, attainted, in fee or fee-tail, are forfeited. Richard Gray, lord Powis, Walter Radford, knight, being in the field with the duke at Ludlow, were pardoned; but all their hereditaments, as before, and other profits, forfeited. commonwealth, commonwealth, was forced to oppreſs and ſpoil his ſubjects.

" III. That the laws were partially and unjuſtly executed, and made to ſupport their injuſtice and oppreſſion by ſuch as ſhould moſt love and tender them.

" IV. That the commons were marvellouſly taxed, and their goods taken from them without payment; becauſe he premitted the deſtroyers of the land to live upon his own revenues, ſuffering all the king's poſſeſſions in France to be loſt.

" V. That the people begin to have new impoſitions laid upon them, viz. every town to find men for the king's guards, after the example of the French, our adverſaries; which, if continued to our heirs, will be a charge and bondage none of our anceſtors were ſubject to.

" VI. That divers lords had cauſed the king to write letters to his enemies in Ireland and France, to conquer the ſaid kingdom, and take Calais; which letters were ſhewn to the duke of York by the Iriſhmen, with deteſtation of their villiany.

" VII. That, ſince the barbarous and ſhameful murder of Humphrey, duke of Gloceſter, at Bury, it hath been ſtudied and conſpired to have deſtroyed and murdered the duke of York, and his iſſue of the royal blood; as alſo the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury; for no other cauſe but for the true heart they have ever borne, and do bear, to the king's profit and wealth of the realm.

" VIII. That the earls of Shrewſbury and Wiltſhire, that the lord Beaumont, the mortal enemy of the ſaid duke and lords, having the guiding of our ſoverign lord, would not ſuffer the king to receive and accept them, as he would have done in his preſence, dreading the charge which would have been brought againſt them for deſtroying the nation.

" IX. That the ſaid earls of Wiltſhire, Shrewsbury, and lord Beaumont, not ſatisfied with the king's revenues and goods, had ſtirred up and excited his highneſs to hold his parliament at Coventry, where an act was made, to deſtroy the ſaid duke of York, earls of Marche, Rutland, Saliſbury, and Warwick, and their iſſue, and eſtates, and tenants, were given up to their hands, who robbed them, and hanged many of them without the king's conſent or approbation.

" Theſe miſchiefs they declared they could not but behold with grief; and therefore now propoſed again to offer themſelves to the preſence of their ſaid ſovereign lord, to declare them to him in the moſt reverend manner, that he may have pity and compaſſion on his miſerable ſubjects, and not ſuffer theſe miſchiefs ſtill to reign; to the effecting of which, they required all people, to whom their declaration ſhould come, in God's behalf and their own, to aſſiſt them in doing their duty to their ſovereign, his perſon and dignity, to whom they have been and ever would be, true as any of his ſubjects alive, to which they call God, and the Virgin Mary, and all the ſaints in heaven to witneſs."

We muſt not forget to relate, that as Fauconbridge was on his paſſage over, he met at ſea ſir Simon Munford, who was appointed to guard the coaſt, attacked him, and taking him priſoner with many other officers, he ſent them all to Calais. Upon their arrival, the earl of Marche, York's eldeſt ſon, ordered Munford with twelve of his captains to be beheaded, by way of retaliation for the ſeverities exerciſed upon his father's adherents in England. Such are the cruelties almoſt conſtantly annexed to civil wars! But to return.

The lords in Calais being punctually apprized of the favourable effects which their manifeſto had on the minds of the people, the earls of Marche, Saliſbury, and Warwick, leaving Calais in a good poſture of defence, came over into England with fifteen hundred perſons in their retinue. Immediately on their landing (at Sandwich), they were joined by the lord Cobham, with four thouſand men; but their greateſt acceſſion of ſtrength was in the archbiſhop of Canterbury (Bourchier), who joined them, and ſuffered their manifeſto to be affixed to the doors of his cathedral, and engaged ſeveral other prelates in the ſame cauſe.

They now began their march towards London, where they were ſure of a welcome reception from the citizens. They reached that capital on the ſecond of July, being about forty thouſand ſtrong, and on the ſame day had peaceable admiſſion into the city, being welcomed by the lord mayor and aldermen in their formalities. The queen was then at Coventry, where her army rendezvouſed, and Henry at Northampton. Upon the firſt news of the Yorkiſts landing and progreſs, the royal army was ordered to march for London; but the confederates were ſo quick in their motions, that on the morning of the ninth of July, only ſeven days after their entry into London, the king's troops ſaw them advancing, in three diviſions, towards Northampton; the firſt was led by the earl of Warwick; the ſecond, which was the main body, by the earl of Marche (now in his twentieth year); and the lord Fauconbridge, with the troops under his command, formed the rear. The queen, who was herſelf really general of the royal army, ſince every thing was done by her orders, though the king was preſent in perſon, pitched her camp on a plain near Northampton, with the little river Nyne behind her: the earls of Marche and Warwick encamped between Towceſter and Northampton. Marche was for immediately attacking the king's camp, but the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the other prelates were of a different opinion, and propoſed to attempt a reconciliation: the lords ſubmitting to their advice, the biſhop of Saliſbury was ſent, in their name, to the king, requeſting admittance to his preſence, in order to compromiſe differences without bloodſhed. But the court, falſely imagining that this offer proceeded only from the ſenſe the confederates had of their own weakneſs, rejected, with equal haughtineſs and bad policy, theſe overtures. In this the queen was the dupe of too great ſecurity. The biſhop, finding his mediation refuſed, returned to the camp of the Yorkiſts, and both parties prepared for battle.

Whether this rejecting of all means of an accommodation had an effect on Edmund, lord Grey of Ruthyn, who commanded Henry's vanguard, or whether his conduct was owing to any other motive, he deſerted to the earl's party ſoon after the engagement began, and contributed not a little to the victory of the malecontents. The battle began about two o'clock of the afternoon of the tenth of July, and was maintained with equal courage and obſtinacy on both ſides till ſeven in the evening, when the royaliſts were completely routed with a terrible carnage: the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewſbury (ſon of the great Talbot), who performed wonders that day, the lord Egremont, the lord Beaumont*, and ſir William Lucy were among the number of the ſlain: the queen, the prince of Wales, and the duke of Somerſet, with difficulty eſcaped and fled northward. As to Henry, that empty ſhadow of a king, he once more fell into the hands of the Yorkiſts, who, nevertheleſs, treated him with the exterior of profound reſpect; and this deference ſerved in ſome meaſure to conſole him for his late misfortunes, which would have been to any other prince worſe than death itſelf; but Henry's natural imbecility ſeems to have made him equally inſenſible of good or bad fortune.

earl

He was immediately conducted to Northampton, where he repoſed himſelf for three days, and then ſet out for London, where he arrived on the ſixteenth of July, attended by a crowd of noblemen and others, who had lately appeared in arms againſt him. The ſucceſs of the confederate lords had ſo elated the Londoners, who were well affected to their cauſe, that they broke out into ſeveral outrages againſt many perſons of the Lancaſtrian party. The lord Scales, governor of the Tower for Henry, who had refuſed to deliver it up to the earl of Marche before the battle of Northampton, now finding his maſter in the power of his enemies, thought proper to abandon his charge, and privately took water, in order to ſeek ſanctuary in the abbey of Weſtminſter; but being diſcovered, was moſt barbarouſly murdered, and his body thrown into the river. No enquiry being made after the perpetrators of this vile deed, it gave encouragement to carry on a kind of proſcription; and among others who ſuffered death by the violence of the mob, was Thorpe, formerly ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, but now a baron of the Exchequer.

The king, ſoon after his arrival, called a parliament, to meet in the beginning of October following: in the mean time the great-ſeal was given to the biſhop of Exeter; the earl of Warwick was confirmed, by a new commiſſion, in the government of Calais, to which was added that of Guiſnes, which was ſtill held by the duke of Somerſet; and on the firſt of Auguſt the earl of Saliſbury received a commiſſion as warden of the Northern Marches, with power to raiſe an army to oppoſe the progreſs of James II. king of Scotland, who, taking advantage of the inteſtine troubles of England, had laid ſiege to the caſtle of Roxburgh; but while the earl was preparing to ſet out on this expedition, news arrived that James had been killed before the place, by the burſting of one of his own cannon; and that his queen, a woman of a maſculine ſpirit, had puſhed the ſiege with ſuch vigour, that the caſtle of Roxburgh had capitulated; after which ſhe laid ſiege to, and carried that of Werk, and then ravaging a great part of the Engliſh borders, ſhe returned into Scotland before the earl of Saliſbury could aſſemble his army. James II. of Scotland was ſucceeded by his ſon James III. then but ſeven years old.

In the courſe of the ſame month (of Auguſt) died Charles VII. king of France. It is pretended he ſtarved himſelf, through an apprehenſion of being poiſoned by the dauphin, his ſon, who now aſcended the throne by the name of Lewis XI.

The confederate lords, who had now the king and government entirely in their power, failed not to give the duke of York, who was ſtill in Ireland, continual notice of what was tranſacting, and that prince was now preparing to come to England, and put the finiſhing ſtroke to his grand project. The meeting of the parliament had been purpoſely delayed by his friends here, to give him time for being preſent at the opening; but, by the unforeſeen accidents of wind and weather, he did not arrive in London till the third day of the ſeſſion (viz. the fifth of October), when, without waiting even to refreſh himſelf, he poſted directly to the houſe of peers, who were then ſitting, and, placing himſelf under the canopy of ſtate, with his hand laid upon the throne, he gave a broad hint, that he expected the aſſembly would invite him to ſeat himſelf in the royal chair; but herein his own vanity, or the flattering inſinuations of his creatures, had miſerably deceived him; the majority of the members were far from entertaining any ſuch thought, as they evinced by keeping a profound ſilence: at length the archbiſhop of Canterbury, a truly good man, who had joined the oppoſition merely becauſe it tended to reformation, and at the ſame time had a ſincere regard for Henry on account of his virtue and piety, came up to the duke, while he was ſtanding in the manner already deſcribed, and aſked him if he had as yet waited on the king, or whether he deſigned ſo to do? So ſudden and unexpected a queſtion involved the duke in the utmoſt perplexity: he had not yet openly avowed his claim to the crown; the ſilence of the houſe ſhewed him his intention was not univerſally approved: after ſome heſitation, during which the different changes of his countenance betrayed the tumult in his mind, he without giving a direct anſwer, ſaid, that he knew no perſon in the realm to whom that compliment was due from him. This ſudden declaration ſo greatly alarmed the whole aſſembly, that they broke up in ſome confuſion.

Richard, however, was not to be diſcouraged by this rebuff. He went again the next day to the houſe of lords, and boldly ſeated himſelf upon the throne; but riſing up ſoon, claimed the crown "as the next lineal heir of Edward III. and rightful ſucceſſor to Richard II. who had been barbarouſly murdered by Henry of Derby, duke of Lancaſter and Hereford, who wrongfully ſtyled himſelf king Henry IV. as his own father had by Henry V. to ſecure the uſurpation in his family: he put the lords in mind of the blood which had been ſhed by the firſt of thoſe uſurpers; of the loſs of France, Normandy, and Guienne, with the many other diſgraces and calamities that had befallen the nation, from the weakneſs and incapacity of the reigning king, Henry VI. and the corruption of the adminiſtration: he then exhorted them to ſhake off the government of an uſurper and his iſſue, that peace might be reſtored to the land, and the crown recover its priſtine glory†." The lords ſitting like ſilent ſtatues after the ſpeech was ended. Richard roſe up again, and deſired them to conſider what he had ſaid, and the juſtice of his claim.

* He was the firſt viſcount in England, ſo created 18 Hen. VI. Dugdale.
† Hollingſhed, p. 1300—1302.

On the fifth day of the ſeſſion the proceedings of the parliament of Coventry againſt the duke of York were annulled; and it was not before the eighth day of the parliament that the duke had it moved in the houſe of peers to be heard by his council touching his right and claim to the crown of England and lordſhip of Ireland: this claim was preſented in writing on the ſixteenth of October, by his council.

The duke of York's own account of his pedigree, as we find it on record, is as follows. "That the right noble and worthy prince Henry III. king of England, had iſſue and lawfully begotten, Edward his firſt begotten ſon, born at Weſtminſter the fifteenth calend of July, on the vigil of St. Martin and Marcellanus, in the year of our Lord 1239. The which Edward (who, after the death of the ſaid king Henry his father, was entitled and called king Edward I.) had iſſue Edward his firſt begotten ſon, entitled and called (after the deceaſe of the ſaid Edward I. his father) king Edward II. who had iſſue, lawfully begotten, the right noble and honourable prince Edward III. true and undoubted king of England and France and lord of Ireland. Which Edward III. had iſſue, and lawfully begotten, Edward, his firſt begotten ſon, prince of Wales; William of Hatfield, ſecond begotten; Lionel, third begotten, duke of Clarence; John of Ghent, fourth begotten, duke of Lancaſter; Edmund of Langley, fifth begotten, duke of York; Thomas of Woodſtock, ſixth begotten, duke of Gloceſter; and William of Windſor, the ſeventh begotten. The ſaid Edward, prince of Wales, who died in the life of the ſaid king Edward, had iſſue, lawfully begotten, Richard, who ſucceeded king Edward III. his grand-father, in the regal dignity, and was entitled and called Richard II. and died without iſſue. William of Hatfield, the ſecond begotten ſon of the ſaid king Edward, died without iſſue. Lionel, the third begotten ſon of king Edward, had iſſue, and lawfully begotten, Philippa, his only daughter and heir, who was married unto Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, by whom ſhe had iſſue, lawfully born, Roger Mortimer her ſon and heir; which Roger had iſſue, and lawfully begotten, Edmund, earl of Marche, Roger Mortimer, Anne, and Eleanor; which Edmund, Roger, and Eleanor died without iſſue; and the ſaid Anne, being married unto Richard, earl of Cambridge, ſon of the ſaid Edmund of Langley, fifth begotten ſon of the ſaid king Edward III. as it is preſpecified, had iſſue, and lawfully born, Richard Plantagenet, commonly called duke of York. The ſaid John of Ghent, the fourth begotten ſon of the ſaid king Edward III. and younger brother of the ſaid Lionel, had iſſue, and lawfully begot, Henry, earl of Derby, who, immediately after that the ſaid king Richard II. did reſign the crowns of the ſaid realms and the ſaid lordſhip of Ireland, unrighteouſly entered upon the ſame, there being yet alive Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, ſon to Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, ſon and heir to the ſaid Philippa, daughter and heir to the ſaid Lionel, third ſon of the ſaid king Edward III. to which Edmund the legal title of the ſaid crowns and lordſhip belonged ‡." And from hence he concluded, that it was evident, that, in right of blood, he, the ſaid duke of York, claimant, had a priority to all living, in ſucceſſion to Edward III. the right of female ſucceſſion to the crown of England being always admitted.

It was not without ſome difficulty that the lords would even permit this claim to be read in the houſe; but they came to a reſolution to proceed no farther without communicating it to the king. Accordingly the lords ſpiritual and temporal waiting upon Henry, to acquaint him with the ſame, received for anſwer from him, that "it was his pleaſure the affair ſhould be referred to his judges, ſerjeants, and attorney-general, to conſider upon the matter of right."

In conſequence of the royal pleaſure thus notified, on the morning of October 18, the lords ſent for the king's juſtices, ſaith the record (the words of which we ſhall quote at large, as the beſt authority) "to defend his title againſt the claim of the duke of York, and in the king's name, ſtrictly commanded them to find all objections as might be laid againſt the ſame, in fortifying the king's title; who, on Monday following, on the twentieth of October, anſwered, That the matter was ſo high, and touched the king's high eſtate andregalia, which is above the laws, and paſſed their learning; wherefore they durſt not enter into any communication of the ſame, for that it pertained to the lords of the king's blood, and the apparage of this his land; and therefore beſought all the lords to have them utterly excuſed. Then the lords ſent for all the king's ſerjeants and attorney, and gave them ſtrait commandment, in the king's name, that they ſadly and wiſely ſhould ſearch and take all things, as might ſeem beſt and ſtrongeſt to be alleged for the king's avail, in objection and defeating of the title and claim of the duke: they anſwered, That if this matter paſſed the learning of the juſtices, it muſt needs exceed their learning, and alſo that they durſt not enter into any communication in that matter; and prayed and beſought all the lords to have them excuſed by giving any advice or counſel therein: but the lords would not excuſe them, and therefore, by their advice and aſſiſtance, it was concluded, by all the lords, that the articles following ſhould be objected againſt the claim and title of the duke.

"I. It is thought that the lords of the land muſt needs call to their remembrance the great oaths the which they have made to the king, the which may be laid to the ſaid duke of York, and that the lords may not break their oaths.

"II. It is thought alſo, that it is to be called to remembrance the great and noble acts of parliament of divers of the king's progenitors, the which acts be ſufficient and reaſonable to be laid againſt the title of the ſaid duke of York, the which acts be of much more authority than any chronicle; and alſo authority to defeat any manner of title made to any perſon.

"III. Item, It is thought that there is to be laid againſt the title divers entails made to the heirs of Henry IV. as for the crown of England, as it may appear by divers chronicles and parliaments.

"IV. Item, it is thought to be alleged to the title of the ſaid duke, that the time that king Henry IV. took upon him the crown of England, he ſaid he entered and took upon him the crown as right

inheritor

inheritor to king Henry III. and not as a conqueror."

To which articles the duke answered:

"Ist, That no oath, being the law of man, ought to be performed, when the same leadeth to suppression of truth and right, which is against the law of God.

"To the IId, and III, That in truth there being no such acts and entails made by any parliament heretofore, as it is surmised, but only in the seventh year of king Henry IV. a certain act and ordinance was made in a parliament by him called, wherein he made the realms of England and France, among other, to be unto him, and to the heirs of his body coming; and to his four sons, and to the heirs of their body coming, in manner and form as it appeareth in the same act; and if he might have obtained and enjoyed the crowns, &c. by title of inheritance, descent, or succession, he neither needed, or would have desired or made them to be granted to him in such wise, as be by the said act, which taketh no place, neither is of any force or effect against him that is right inheritor of the said crowns, as it accordeth with God's law, and all natural laws; how it be that all other acts and ordinances made in the said parliament sithen being good and sufficient against all other persons.

"To the IVth, That such saying of king Henry IV. may in no wise be true; and that the contrary thereof, which is truth, shall be largely enough shewed, approved, and justified by sufficient authority, and matter of record; and over that his said laying was only to shadow and cover fraudulently his said unrightwise and violent usurpation, and by that mayen to abuse deceivably the people standing about him*."

These, and many arguments of the like nature, having been debated for nine days together, with great learning and capacity, the lords agreed unanimously in opinion, that the title of the duke of York was indefeasible †; but, as a mean, to prevent inconveniencies that might ensue, they proposed, that, as Henry had now reigned thirty-eight years, and had all along led an innocent life, without giving any person cause to complain, he might retain the crown during his life, and the duke, with his heirs, succeed him. The argument against stripping Henry of his dignity seemed very strong; but the managers for the duke of York observed, that as Henry himself was altogether incapable of managing the reins of government, such a measure would only tend to the advantage of the queen and her ministry, who abused his name and authority; that, out of tenderness to him, they ought not to ruin the whole kingdom, nor commit a flagrant act of injustice from a principle of charity." Nevertheless, the duke of York, willing to pay deference to the authority of the parliament, and desirous to prevent the effusion of blood in prosecuting the immediate possession of a title which had been adjudged him, and out of regard to the peace and good of his country, agreed to a compromise, which contained the following articles.

"I. That Henry should be reputed king of England, with the royal dignity annexed, during his natural life.

"II. That Richard, duke of York, without prejudice to his own right, should honour him as such.

"III. That the said Richard should succeed therein, immediately after Henry's decease or resignation.

"IV. That all the lords in parliament should swear to maintain the succession of the said Richard, duke of York, and oppose, to the utmost of their power, all that should attempt to break this agreement.

"V. That Richard should be declared immediately the true and rightful heir to the crown, and have a grant of ten thousand marks per annum in land and castles, to support the dignity.

"VI. That the compassing the death of the said duke should be made high-treason.

"VII. And lastly, it was enacted that all the acts of Henry IV. and V. for settling the succession of the crown should stand repealed, and be held annulled, void, and invalid ‡."

The duke of York and the earls of Marche and Rutland, his two elder sons, came in person to the parliament house, on the thirty-first of October, and there, in presence of the lords spiritual and temporal, bound themselves by oath to observe this agreement, provided it was duly kept by Henry; who, on his part, promising so to do, both these engagements were entered upon record under the guardianship of the parliament; and the next day, being the first of November, this accommodation was celebrated by a solemn procession to St. Paul's, at which Henry and the lords assisted. It was also notified by Henry's letters patent to the nation, and the duke of York was proclaimed protector of the realm and heir apparent of the crown, on Saturday the eighth of November, in the city of London, amidst the repeated acclamations of the populace ‖. As for Henry, he did not appear to be in the least affected with this sudden revolution in his affairs: satisfied with the present tranquility which he was suffered to enjoy, he devoted his whole time to exercises of devotion, and committed the administration to those who acted under the sanction of his name and authority.

Very different were the sentiments of his queen Margaret, who was now, with the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, in the North, where the whole strength of the Lancastrian party lay: she was filled with inexpressible fury and indignation when she received the news of the compromise between her husband and the duke of York, which at once excluded her from power, and her son from the succession. By the advice and assistance of the last-mentioned noblemen, she set about levying forces, for undoing all that the parliament had done, and, in a short time, she got together a considerable army of fighting men, all determined to stand by the house of Lancaster.

The duke of York was soon apprized of the impending storm, and trembled for the consequences. Having the king entirely at his disposal, he prevailed on him to sign an order for the queen to repair immediately to London: but no regard being paid on her part to this extorted summons, York, putting the king under the care of the earl of

Warwick,

Warwick and the duke of Norfolk, ſet out, at the head of an army, on the ſecond of December, and advanced by eaſy marches towards the North; while his ſon Edward, earl of Marche, was diſpatched to the borders of Wales, to raiſe an additional body of forces, with which he was to join his father. The queen appears to have had exceeding good intelligence of his motions, and having her army ready, under the command of Somerſet and Exeter, ſhe marched ſouthward, with twenty thouſand men, to fight the duke before he could be reinforced, whoſe whole force at preſent did not exceed ſeven thouſand men. Upon hearing that the queen was in full march to attack him, the duke, conſcious of his inferiority, retired to his caſtle of Sandal, until he ſhould be joined by his ſon Edward.

Queen Margaret, whoſe knowlege in military matters, and profound policy, ſo ſuperior to her ſex, might have done honour to the moſt experienced general, had recourſe to every method ſhe could deviſe for luring the duke from his retreat: ſhe pretended to continue her march towards the ſouth; ſhe poſted the greateſt part of her troops in ambuſh, and, with only a part of her army, preſenting herſelf before the caſtle of Sandal, challenged the duke to battle by the moſt inſulting meſſages. Whether the duke was provoked by her reproaches, or was ſtraitened for want of proviſions, or, what is more probable, from former defeats of the royal party had acquired a contempt for his enemy, certain it is he drew out his men, on the thirty-firſt of December, determined to venture a battle, and advanced in excellent order towards Wakefield Green*, on each ſide of which the queen's ambuſhes were placed, under the command of Butler, earl of Wiltſhire, and Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, while the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter led her main body.

The duke of York had ſcarcely marſhalled his troops, when his ears were ſtruck with ſhouts on each ſide of him, and the two corps in ambuſh ſuddenly ſtarting up, he found both his flanks and his rear incloſed. He now, too late, found his error in truſting to appearances, or building upon former ſucceſs in arms; he ſaw no probability of eſcaping, far leſs of victory: he reſolved, therefore, to ſell his life and newly affianced crown as dear as poſſible, and his courage being converted to fell deſpair, he ruſhed furiouſly on to the charge. The enthuſiaſtic valour with which he was fired ſeemed to communicate itſelf to all his followers, who purſued the track of ſlaughter he marked out in a firm, reſolute, and well-compacted body: but all their efforts availed little againſt the numbers with which they were overpowered: the bloody conteſt did not laſt above half an hour, each ſecond of which, however, was marked by ſome diſtinguiſhed death; and, in the ſhort ſpace above-mentioned, two thouſand eight hundred of the duke's army were cut in pieces. The duke himſelf fell, tranſfixed with numberleſs wounds, after fighting valiantly on foot; ſir Thomas Harrington, ſir David Hall, ſir Hugh Haſtings, ſir Thomas Neville (third ſon of the earl of Saliſbury) ſir John and ſir Hugh Mortimer, with many other gentlemen, ſigned the royaliſts victory in their own blood: but no fate was more truly deplorable than that of Edmund Plantagenet, earl of Rutland, ſon to the duke of York, a youth of about thirteen years of age, who was inhumanly butchered on Wakefield bridge, as he was attempting his eſcape, by the lord Clifford; that nobleman, inflamed with revenge for the loſs of his father, who had been killed in the battle of St. Alban's, had made ſuch carnage with his own hands, that thoſe even of his own party unanimouſly gave him the name of the Butcher; and now eſpying one Aſpil, the duke of York's chaplain, conveying the young Rutland out of the field, he purſued them, and, notwithſtanding all the entreaties of the prieſt, or the more melting eloquence of youthful innocence, the implacable Clifford plunged his dagger in the breaſt of the defenceleſs child. Returning reeking from this ſlaughter, he fell upon the dead body of the duke of York, and cutting off the head, carried it to the queen, who crowned it with a diadem of paper, by way of deriſion of his pretenſions, and then ſent it to be fixed on the walls of York.

Thus fell, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and of whom the duke of Somerſet, his chief opponent, ſaid, "that if he had not learned to play the king by his regency in France, he had never forgot to obey as a ſubject in England." He had iſſue, by Cecily, daughter of Ralph Neville, earl of Weſtmoreland, eight ſons: Henry, who died young; Edward, earl of Marche, afterwards king Edward IV. Edmund, earl of Rutland; John, William, and Thomas, who all died young; George, duke of Clarence; and Richard, duke of Gloceſter, afterwards king Richard III. He had alſo four daughters: Anne, married to Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, but afterwards divorced from him, and married a ſecond time to ſir Thomas St. Leger; Elizabeth, married to John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk; Margaret, married to Charles the Hardy, duke of Burgundy; and Urſula, who died young.

The queen had a farther triumph by the earl of Saliſbury, ſir Ralph Stanley, and ſome other perſons of quality, being made priſoners, who were ſoon after ſent to Pontefract, and there beheaded; their heads were afterwards ſet upon poles on each ſide that of the duke of York. As to the loſs of the victorious army, it is not mentioned; we can only ſay that the victors diſgraced their ſucceſs with ſhocking inſtances of the moſt ſavage barbarity. Short lived, however, were theſe bloody triumphs; for the hands of the ſon ſoon plucked down the trophies erected over the grave of the father, and cruelly repaid the ſufferings of his party.

Edward Plantagenet, hitherto ſtyled earl of Marche, but now, by this fatal event, poſſeſſor of the title of duke of York, was raiſing forces in the Marches of Wales when he received the news of his father's death: far from being diſcouraged by this dreadful accident, he was inſpired with the

* Wakefield is a town in the Weſt-Riding of Yorkſhire, famous for its cloth trade, largeneſs, neat buildings, markets, and the bridge, upon which king Edward IV. built a very neat chapel, in memory of thoſe that were cut off in this battle. The carved work of ſtone upon the chapel was very beautiful, but is now defaced. On the right-hand of the road from Wakefield to Sandal, there is a ſquare plot of ground hedged in from a cloſe, whereon, before the civil war between king Charles and the parliament, ſtood a ſtone croſs, where the duke of York was ſlain. moſt moſt implacable reſentment, and determined to riſque his life and fortune in revenging the untimely fall of the author of his birth, and aſſerting his pretenſions to the crown. All the great qualities of the third Edward's race ſeem to have united in his perſon: the beauty of his figure is deſcribed to us by cotemporary hiſtorians as fair as fancy could form; his conſtitution was active and hardy; he had a quick and penetrating judgment; his fame as a ſoldier was ſurpaſſed by none, equalled by few, in his time; and ſucceſs had hitherto waited on every martial exploit in which he had been engaged: in a word, this young prince ſeemed formed to re-eſtabliſh the affairs of his family, and to add the right of glorious conqueſt to that of blood: but while we are relating his virtues, we muſt not conceal his failings; unhappily they were ſuch in the courſe of his life as obſcured the fair dawn that uſhered in his youthful days. Like moſt of his anceſtors, he was cruelly vindictive; and the laurels which he gained in the field, were ſtained and diſgraced by the ſtreams of noble blood which he cauſed to be ſhed, as well in the field as on the ſcaffold. Such as he was, however, we ſhall ſoon ſee him mount the Engliſh throne over the neck of all oppoſition.

After he had completed his levies, Edward began his march for London, at the head of twenty-three thouſand men, intending to join the earl of Warwick, who had been left with another reſpectable body of forces, to ſecure the capital, and then go in queſt of Margaret, whoſe cruel treatment of his friends he eagerly wiſhed to retaliate. On his march he was met by Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and James Butler, earl of Ormond and Wiltſhire, who had been ſent by the queen, with a body of Welſh and Iriſh troops, to intercept him in his route. The two armies were in ſight of each other on the ſecond of February, 1461, at a place called Mortimer's croſs, in Herefordſhire: a battle enſued; but the army of the two earls being far inferior to the duke of York's, either in number or diſcipline, were routed with the loſs of above four thouſand men; and all thoſe who had the misfortune to be taken priſoners, were put to death with unrelenting barbarity. Thus, with more than ſavage rage, did Engliſhmen bury their daggers in the breaſts of their countrymen, contending with each other for the horrid palm of brutality: among others who ſuffered on this occaſion, our hiſtorians have mentioned Owen Tudor, the huſband of queen Catherine, and father to the earls of Richmond and Pembroke.

Mean while the queen, with her ſon the prince of Wales, the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the earls of Northumberland, Devonſhire, and Shrewſbury, and ſeveral other of the nobility and gentry well affected to her cauſe, was on her march towards London, at the head of a very numerous army. The earl of Warwick, diſtruſting the affection of the Londoners, which he knew to be guided by every breath of ſucceſs, did not chuſe to be ſhut up within the walls to wait the queen's arrival, to whom the citizens might poſſibly open their gates, reſolved to go forth, meet, and fight her. Accordingly, taking Henry along with him, he advanced as far as St. Alban's, though with a force much inferior to that of the queen.

The two armies met on Shrove Tueſday (February 17), and joining battle upon Barnard's Heath, the earl had at firſt the better, till the lord Lovelace, who commanded the main body, moſtly made up of Londoners, treacherouſly delaying to come up to the ſupport of the vanguard, that body was almoſt cut in pieces, and in a ſhort time the whole army of the Yorkiſts was put to the rout: however, the earl, rallying his men, made an excellent retreat, with the loſs of about two thouſand common ſoldiers, but not one officer of diſtinction. King Henry was left alone in the field, without any one to protect him from the outrages of a brutal ſoldiery, fluſhed with victory and bent on ſlaughter: there he was found by the queen, who received him with more joy than affection, and carried him to her army, at the head of which he knighted his ſon, the prince of Wales. Henry had given his promiſe to two gentlemen, the lord Bonneville and ſir Thomas Kiriel, to whoſe care he had been committed during the action, that, in caſe the queen's party obtained the victory, he would enſure their ſafety: truſting to the royal word, they had neglected to make their eſcape with the reſt of the defeated corps: but being now taken, Margaret, without regard to her huſband's honour, ordered both their heads to be ſtruck off, in revenge for the blood of Thorpe, that zealous partiſan of the Lancaſter family.

The chief advantage reſulting to Margaret from this victory, was the getting the king her huſband into her hands, whoſe name ſhe could now make uſe of to authorize her tranſactions. But ſhe certainly committed a groſs blunder in not advancing immediately to the capital, where the conſternation her victory had thrown the citizens into, would, in all probability, have procured her an eaſy admittance. The citizens, indeed, were under great apprehenſions of being plundered by her northern troops, who committed the moſt intolerable ravages in their march, and had already plundered the town of St. Alban's; but they were ſtill more afraid of incurring the diſpleaſure of a victorious army, whom they could not oppoſe: but Margaret, giving them time to recover themſelves, and the ravages of her troops being repreſented in the moſt glaring light, the citizens now determined at all events to oppoſe her entrance; nay, they even went ſo far as to ſeize ſeveral waggons loaded with proviſions that the mayor was ſending to her army at St. Alban's, and killed thoſe of her party who were detached to eſcort them. Margaret denounced vengeance againſt the Londoners for this inſult, and had actually ſent a detachment to force admittance into the city, intending to follow with her whole army; but the detachment was cut in pieces, and at the ſame time ſhe received intelligence that the duke of York and the earl of Warwick had joined their forces at Chipping Norton, in Oxfordſhire, and begun their progreſs for London. This news obliged her to retire back to the North, where ſhe hoped to increaſe her army to ſuch a formidable number, as would enſure ſucceſs againſt all oppoſition.

On the twenty-fourth of February, the duke of York and the earl of Warwick entered the city, and were received as its guardian angels: nor was it in London only where Edward had ever been the idol of the people, nor yet in Kent or Eſſex, which had long declared their attachment to the houſe of York, and whence they repaired in incredible numbers to his ſtandard, but from almoſt all the other counties in the eaſt, ſouth, and weſt of England:

multitudes ſtrove who ſhould be foremoſt to offer their perſons to fight his battles, and their purſes to contribute towards the exigences of his military operations: in a word, the tide of affection ran ſo rapidly in his favour, that it ſeemed to carry away with it all remembrance of Henry or the line of Lancaſter.

The duke's friends were encouraged by theſe marks of general zeal and attachment to improve ſo favourable an opportunity, and reſolved to ſave him the trouble and uncertainty of a parliamentary deciſion, and advance him to the throne by the conſent of the people and the nobles. Accordingly, on the firſt of March, as the lord Fauconbridge was exerciſing a body of four thouſand men in the fields near Clerkenwell, and an infinite crowd of people were aſſembled to amuſe themſelves with the ſpectacle, the earl of Warwick, attended by his brother, George Neville, biſhop of Exeter, rode into the midſt of the multitude, holding in his hand the agreement made between Henry and the late duke of York, and ratified by the parliament, which he read aloud, and then appealed to all preſent, whether Henry had not incurred the forfeiture expreſſed in that accord, by countenancing and joining the queen in her rebellion againſt his own deed and that of the eſtates of the land? This was anſwered in the affirmative by a loud peal of aſſent. The biſhop of Exeter next addreſſing them, aſked if they would ſtill have Henry of Lancaſter for their king? the whole multude exclaimed againſt the propoſal; but when he demanded if they would acknowlege Edward, duke of York, for their ſovereign? all preſent, ſhouting and clapping their hands, cried out, as with one mighty voice, "King Edward for ever!"

The experiment thus ſucceeding to the wiſh of the party, a great council was called in Baynard's caſtle, where the archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſeveral other prelates, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Warwick, the lords Fitz Walter, Ferrers of Chartley, and others of the temporal nobles were preſent; and it being reſolved, "that Henry had, by breach of the late agreement, forfeited all claim to the benefit thereof, or to the poſſeſſion of the throne in which he had been indulged; and that Edward, duke of York, ought to be acknowleged king, according to his right of blood;" they waited upon him, on Tueſday the third of March, and petitioned him to aſſume the exerciſe of the government, to which petition he gave his aſſent.

The next day he rode in proceſſion to St. Paul's, and there made his offering, Te Deum being ſung with great ſolemnity. From thence he proceeded, with the like ſtate to Weſtminſter hall, and, ſitting on the throne, with the ſceptre of Edward the Confeſſor in his hand, was again recognized by all preſent. He next went to the abbey church, where he received the homage of all the nobility that were preſent. Then, returning to the city by water, he took up his quarters in the biſhop of London's palace, the ordinary place where our kings were wont to reſide when they lodged within the city: and the ſame day, being the fifth of March, he was proclaimed in London and Weſtminſter, by the name of Edward IV.

Thus ended the reign of Henry VI. which had laſted thirty-eight years and a half, without his having ever intermeddled in all that time with the adminiſtration of public affairs. He was about thirty-nine years and a quarter old when he was diſpoſſeſſed of a crown, which he had worn almoſt from his very birth. He ſtill lived long enough to be the ſport of fortune, as will appear in the hiſtory of the following reign, where we again ſhall ſee him veſted with the regal power.

Henry was poſſeſſed of many virtues: he was compaſſionate, devout, religious; but theſe qualities fitted him rather for a cloyſter than a throne: of weak and narrow intellects, and of an unſteady and irreſolute temper, he was eaſily drawn into every cruel or oppreſſive meaſure that the paſſion of his wife, or the views of his miniſters, ſuggeſted; and yet ſo free was he from cruelty in his diſpoſition, that he could not, without extreme reluctance, conſent to the puniſhment of thoſe malefactors who were ſacrificed to the public ſafety, and would ſuffer the groſſeſt inſult offered to his own perſon without the leaſt mark of reſentment. He was remarkably continent, inſomuch that, before marriage he would hardly allow any of the female ſex to enter the court, who were ſingle women. He was ſo inoffenſive in the whole of his conduct, that the biſhop who had been his confeſſor for ten years, avowed that, in all that time, he had not committed any crime deſerving of penance. Yet, after, all it muſt be confeſſed, that this king was rather reſpectable for thoſe vices he wanted than for the virtues he poſſeſſed; nay, theſe very virtues proved ſometimes pernicious, by making him the dupe of thoſe, who, under the ſanction of his name and authority, committed the moſt flagrant acts of violence and injuſtice: and we cannot help ſubſcribing to the opinion of a modern writer, that "a wiſe people could no more chuſe to have their throne filled with a fool than a tyrant."

Henry had iſſue by his queen, Margaret of Anjou, only one ſon, Edward, prince of Wales, who, at the time of his father's depoſition, was but in the eighth year of his age.

Remarkable Occurrences.

In the courſe of this reign queen Margaret began Queen's college, Cambridge, which was completed by the conſent of Edward IV. Archbiſhop Kemp erected the Divinity ſchool in Oxford, as it now ſtands; together with St. Paul's Croſs. William Eſtfield, mayor of London, built, at his own charge, the water-conduit in Fleet-ſtreet; and John Wells, while he filled the ſame poſt, laid the conduit, commonly called the Standard in Cheap. In the year 1446, ſir Simon Eyre, mayor of London, built Leadenhall, and allotted it as a common granary for the city. And in 1453, ſir John Norman, while he enjoyed the ſame office, went by water to Weſtminſter to take his oath: he was the firſt mayor that ever went in that manner, all his predeceſſors had rode thither on horſeback. Stow's Survey.

In the fifth year of this reign, on Saturday, being the eve of St. Michael, in the morning between two and three o'clock began a very dreadful earthquake, which, being accompanied with thunder and lightning, ſtruck terror into every one.

In the thirteenth year of his reign, on the twenty-fourth of November began a violent froſt, which laſted till the tenth of February, and with ſo great violence that the Thames was frozen over, ſo that the merchandize and proviſions brought to the Thames

In the ſeventeenth year of his reign there was ſo great a dearth, that wheat was ſold for two ſhillings and ſix pence the buſhel, and malt at eight pence; and in ſome parts of the nation they were ſo ſtraitened, that they made bread of ferne-roots and ivy-berries. On the twenty-fifth of November, 1438, there was ſuch a terrible wind, that it blew off the leads of the Grey Friars church, and almoſt beat down the whole ſide of a ſtreet call the Old Exchange.

EDWARD IV. The firſt King of ENGLAND of the Line of YORK. A. D. 1461.

THE firſt act of Edward's reign was marked with blood: two days only after his being proclaimed, a tradeſman of London was taken up, and executed for ſaying he would make his ſon "heir of the crown*," meaning only, as it is ſaid, his own houſe, which had the ſign of the Crown. It is probable, however, that this man might have been a favourer of the Lancaſtrian party, and have ſpoken contemptuouſly of the new king. However this might be, an execution upon ſo ſlight an account, was by many conſidered as a melancholy preſage of thoſe ſcenes of ſlaughter which were yet to follow, during the quarrel of the two contending houſes. In order, however, to conciliate the affections of the generality of his ſubjects, he iſſued a proclamation, by which he declared himſelf ready to receive into favour all thoſe who had adhered to Henry, upon their coming in, and ſubmitting to the new government; an offer which was embraced by very few; a convincing evidence of the ſincerity of each party in the cauſe it eſpouſed; and though both could not be in the right, yet both are praiſe-worthy for their inviolable loyalty and unſhaken conſtancy.

Edward, though he had aſſumed the title and authority of king, was far from being eſtabliſhed in the quiet and undiſturbed poſſeſſion of the throne: he had a powerful adverſary to encounter in the perſon of Margaret, Henry's queen, who poſſeſſed every qualification that conſtitutes the true heroine. An utter ſtranger to deſpair, ſhe conſidered repeated defeats as ſo many motives to renew her endeavours to make a freſh ſtand. The lords of her party, the chief of whom were of the Lancaſter race, were all riveted to her intereſt; and ſhe had rendered herſelf ſo extremely popular in the northern counties, whither ſhe had retired after quitting St. Alban's, that ſhe ſoon collected an army of ſix thouſand determined veterans.

The new king was no ſooner informed of this, than, neglecting the ceremonies of his coronation, and the rejoicings attending it, he ſet out, on the twelfth of March, accompanied by the earl of Warwick, with an army of forty thouſand men, to oppoſe the queen's progreſs, ſcarce reſting till he came to Pontefract. From thence the king detached a body of troops, under the command of the lord Fitz Walter, to make themſelves maſters of Ferrybridge, a paſs in Yorkſhire upon the river Eyre, being convinced that the great puſh for victory muſt be made ſomewhere about that quarter. This body executed their commiſſion with great ſucceſs, and took poſt on the north ſide of the river. On the other hand, the queen committed the care of her army to the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford, all of them noblemen of high courage, and faſt friends to her and her family: ſhe, with her huſband Henry, and their young ſon, the prince of Wales, retired to York city, in expectation of an event which was finally to decide their fate.

Clifford, by an admirable conduct, in part repaired the diſadvantage Henry's army was likely to ſuſtain by the ſurpriſal of Ferrybridge; for, ſetting out with a party on the night of the twenty-eighth of March, he attacked the enemy's detachment ſo ſuddenly and critically, that he recovered the paſs, the lord Fitz Walter himſelf being ſlain, with the baſtard of Saliſbury, and the greateſt part of their men.

This loſs might have proved fatal to Edward, at a time when a general battle was every moment expected, had it not been for the admirable courage and preſence of mind of the earl of Warwick, who, immediately hearing of this diſaſter, rode up to the king, to acquaint him of it, who was then employed in reviewing his troops; and diſmounting in ſight of the whole army, he drew his ſword and ſtabbed his horſe, after which, kiſſing the hilt of his weapon, he ſwore to die in the field or conquer. This noble declaration of an officer ſo idolized by all the ſoldiery, ſeemed to awaken in every breaſt an inſuppreſſible ardour; they rent the heavens with ſhouts of Long live king Edward, and the noble earl of Warwick! and when Edward, taking advantage of this diſpoſition, cauſed proclamation to be made throughout his camp, "That every man who was unwilling to ſtay, or was afraid to fight, had leave to depart," they cried out, as with one voice, to be led on, declaring their reſolution to gain the day, or die at the feet of their king and general. Nor were the officers leſs zealous than the private men: Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, hereditary earl-marſhal of England, who had by his office the leading of the vanguard of the king's army, happening then to be ſick, his poſt devolved to William Neville, lord Fauconbridge, who, with ſir Walter Blount, his friend and companion in arms, diſdaining to be out-done in hardineſs of enterprize by the enemy, undertook to regain Ferrybridge; and, with that view, paſſing the Eyre at Cailleford, three miles above, they marched with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, that they came upon Clifford before he had the leaſt notice of their deſign; and being thus ſurprized in his turn, his men put to the rout, and he himſelf was ſlain, together with the lord John Neville, ſon to the earl of Weſtmoreland, and almoſt the whole party.

* Rapin has fallen into a droll blunder here; for not underſtanding the equivocal ſenſe of the Engliſh expreſſion, he tells us very gravely, that this man ſuffered for ſaying "that he would make his ſon prince of Wales." The man's name was Walter Walker, a grocer, in Cheapſide. Habington. p. 413.

The next day, being Palm Sunday, March 24, Edward croſſed the river by day-break, and advanced towards the Lancaſtrians, who, to the number of ſixty thouſand, occupied the fields between Towton and Saxton. Whether it was becauſe the enemy were ſo much ſuperior in numbers, or out of reſentment for the cruelties exerciſed by them at the battle of Wakefield, Edward now publiſhed an order through his army, that his ſoldiers ſhould not encumber themſelves with priſoners, which ſeems to have been the principal cauſe of the carnage of that day. The van of Henry's army was led by the earl of Northumberland and the brave ſir Andrew Trollop, who had ſerved many years in France; the other diviſions were commanded by the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the earl of Weſtmoreland, the lords Dacre, Grey, Wills, and other noblemen and officers. The lord Fauconbridge commanded Edward's vanguard; the main body was headed by the earl of Warwick: and ſir John Wenlock, with ſir John Denham, had the bringing up of the rear; while Edward himſelf, confined to no poſt, held himſelf ready to fly on every occaſion where counſel or danger demanded his preſence.

The battle began about nine o'clock in the morning, at which time a thick ſnow falling, was driven by a briſk wind full in the faces of the Lancaſtrians *, who were thereby prevented from obſerving the juſt diſtance of the enemy. The lord Fauconbridge, an old and experienced officer, made an admirable uſe of this accident; for he ordered his men to advance as near as they conveniently could, and to diſcharge a flight of arrows upon them, and then retire with all ſpeed out of the reach of thoſe of the enemy. This ſtratagem had a wonderful effect: the Lancaſtrians feeling the arrows, and thinking their enemies were not many yards diſtant, emptied their quivers by repeated diſcharges, Edward's men all the while keeping theirs in reſerve; and the lord Fauconbridge perceiving the Lancaſtrians ſhot was near ſpent, and that they were advancing, as was cuſtomary, ſword in hand, to begin a cloſe fight, he plied them with another furious diſcharge, which obliged them to fall back to the main body. The earl of Northumberland and ſir Andrew Trollop ſeeing the diſadvantage under which they laboured in this way of fighting, preſſed on to nearer combat, and then the battle became firm, obſtinate, and bloody: the deathful conteſt raged with unremitted fury for ten hours equal diſpute, and, after great numbers of Engliſhmen, lay dead in the field, towards the evening the Lancaſtrians began to give ground, and retreat towards Tadcaſter bridge, all the while preſerving their ranks, and facing about occaſionally as they retired. Edward, who this day exhibited ſuch proofs of ſurprizing courage, activity, and conduct as not a little inclined the victory in his favour, now endeavoured, in conjunction with the earl of Warwick, who had nobly ſeconded his royal maſter, to animate his men to render the action deciſive; the voice of their king, the preſence of their beloved general, inſpired every breaſt with manly reſolution; they redoubled their efforts, and charged the Lancaſtrians with ſuch impetuoſity, that theſe latter could no longer keep themſelves unſhaken; the rout once begun, became general. Henry's men flying to gain the bridge, great numbers of them were drowned in attempting to paſs the narrow but deep river, or rather brook, of Cock, which lay in their way. Edward followed cloſe at their heels, dealing death to thouſands of the fugitives: the purſuit laſted the greateſt part of the night and the next day; and, dreadful to relate, many miles of the country round were ſtained with the blood of ſix-and-thirty thouſand Engliſhmen, ſlain in the action by the hands of — Engliſhmen! Henry's party made by far the greateſt number of the killed; they loſt, beſides private men and officers of inferior note, the earls of Northumberland and Weſtmoreland, the lords Dacres and Wills, ſir John Neville, brother to Weſtmoreland, ſir Andrew Trollop, and many other knights and gentlemen; the earl of Devonſhire (Courtney), who had lately eſpouſed the cauſe of Henry, was taken priſoner, and brought to York, where he was ſoon after beheaded by martial law, and his head placed on a pole over one of the gates of that city; while the head of the duke of York, Edward's father, and that of the earl of Saliſbury, were taken down and interred with their bodies.

After this ſignal victory, Edward marched directly to York, hoping to find Henry and Margaret there, and by their captivity to crown the ſucceſs of his arms; but this unhappy pair were no ſooner informed of the defeat of their army, than they fled to Berwick, accompanied by the dukes of Exeter and Somerſet, and, leaving that fortreſs under the care of the latter, they ſet out directly for Scotland. That kingdom was then under a wiſe and politic adminiſtration, who governed during the minority of James III. (ſon of James II. ſlain before Roxburgh caſtle), and were perfectly diſpoſed to make the beſt advantage to themſelves of the miſeries of England. Notwithſtanding the connexion between the royal family of Scotland and the houſe of Lancaſter, by the young king's grandmother, who was a daughter of the earl of Somerſet, Margaret ſoon found that ſome conſiderable ſacrifice of intereſt muſt be made to engage ſuch a miniſtry heartily in the cauſe of her huſband; ſhe therefore offered to cede to them the important fortreſs of Berwick and the city of Carliſle, to be reannexed to the crown of Scotland, and to affiance her ſon, the prince of Wales, to a ſiſter of king James: the bargain was ſoon ſtruck; and we find by the rolls of parliament †, that, ſo early as the twenty-fifth day of April this year, Berwick was actually delivered to the Scots; but the intended marriage never took effect. This convention made, and the Scots having engaged to exert their utmoſt efforts in order to reſtore her family to the throne of England, the queen left her huſband in the Grey Friars, at Edinburgh, a retirement which his love of ſolitude made agreeable, and embarked for France, to ſolicit ſupplies from Lewis XI. who then ſat on that throne. In the mean while Edward continued to keep his head-quarters at York, from whence he made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions for preſerving the northern parts in awe.

Having, as he thought, fully provided for the peace, quiet, order, and ſecurity of thoſe parts, by a pretty long ſtay in them, he returned, on the firſt of June, to his palace of Shene, near London; and was crowned, on St. Peter's day, Monday, the twenty-ninth of June, at Weſtminſter. The king's younger brothers, George and Richard, who, being very young, had been ſent, near ſix months before, to Bruges, as a place of ſafety during the war, came back to England on this occaſion, and were created dukes †, the firſt of Clarence, and the other of Gloceſter: Henry, lord Bourchier, was made earl of Eſſex; as the lord Fauconbridge was of Kent; and the lord John Neville, brother to the earl of Warwick, was created viſcount Montagu; and others were raiſed to the dignity of barons.

The corruptions which prevailed univerſally, during the late reign, had produced an infinite number of diſorders in all places, particularly in the courts of judicature. Edward applied himſelf with great aſſiduity to the correcting of theſe grievances; ſat frequently in the courts of juſtice, to obſerve their methods, and the behaviour of the judges; and made a progreſs through Kent, Suſſex, Hampſhire, and other counties of the Weſt as far as Briſtol and the Marches of Wales, to learn the ſtate of thoſe parts, and to ſee how juſtice was adminiſtered. He returned in the latter end of October, to hold a parliament, which had been ſummoned to meet on the ſixth of July, but, on the news of the Scots having inveſted Carliſle, had been prorogued to the fourth day of November.

The parliament meeting on that day, at Weſtminſter, as ſoon as the forms uſual at the beginning of a ſeſſion were over, the commons waited on the king with an addreſs, reciting "his great exploits and glorious victories, and returning him their humbleſt thanks for expoſing his perſon for the ſafety of the realm, and the relieving the good people of England from the inſupportable tyranny under which they had ſo long laboured; concluding with a requeſt, that the king would be pleaſed to puniſh all perſons guilty of ſuch extortions, rapes, murders, and other outrages as had been paſſed over uncenſured during the late reign." Being returned to their houſe, the firſt buſineſs they fell upon, was a review of all the uſurpations of the houſe of Lancaſter, from the time Henry IV. had ſeized the crown. Then an act was paſſed, confirming the title of Edward: all thoſe which had been made againſt the houſe of York were repealed: Henry VI. after a reign of thirty-eight years, was declared an uſurper, and all his tranſactions were annulled as illegal: and, laſtly, he himſelf, his queen, and his ſon, with all their adherents, were attainted as traitors. The attainder of the earl of Cambridge, grand-father to the king, was next reverſed: ſeveral acts of the like tendency paſſed; and on the twenty-firſt of December, the king adjourned the parliament, in the following ſpeech to the commons, which we ſhall give our readers in the old Engliſh language of thoſe days; as it is the firſt genuine ſpeech we have of any king of England.

"James Strangways, and ye that be commyn for the commons of this my lond, for the true hertes and tender conſiderations that ye have had to my right and title, that y and my aunceſtres have had unto the coronne of this reame, the which from us have been long withholde. And nowe, thanked be almighty God, of whos grace groweth all victory, by youre true hertes and grate aſſiſtens, y am reſtored unto that is my right and title; wherefore y thanke you as hertely as y can. Alſo for the tender and true hertes that ye have ſhewed unto me, in that ye have tenderly had in remembrance the correction of the horrible murder and cruel deth of my lord my fader, my brother Rutland, and my coſyn of Salyſbury, and other, y thanke you right hertely: and y ſhall be unto you, with the grace of almighty God, as good and gracious ſovereign lord as ever was of my noble progenitours to their ſubgettes and liegemen. And for the faithfull and lovyng hertes, and alſo the grate labours that ye have born and ſuſteyned towards me, in the recovering of my ſaid right and title which y now poſſeſſe, y thanke you with all my herte; and yf y had any better good to reward you with all then my body ye ſhold have it, in which ſhall alway be redy for your defence, never ſparing nor letting for noo jeopardie. Praying you all of your herty aſſiſtens and good contynuance, as y ſhall be unto you youre veray right-wiſſe and lovying liege lord."

The parliament was then prorogued by the chancellor, at the king's command, till the ſixth of May enſuing.

The year 1462 began in England with a ſcene of proſcription and bloodſhed, the fatal effect of jealous ſovereignty. Not contented with the numbers of perſons whoſe blood had been attainted, and their eſtates confiſcated, for adhering to the houſe of Lancaſter, Edward now determined to proceed againſt all ſuch who had not heartily joined with him, as if they had declared themſelves open enemies, and to puniſh them accordingly. Among many others ſacrificed to this murderous policy was John de Vere, earl of Oxford, a venerable old nobleman of unblemiſhed character, who was accounted the oracle of his time in all points of the conſtitution *, and whoſe qualities, virtues, experience, and parts gave him ſuch authority as was deciſive with the public. As he could not ſtoop to be the flatterer, he was doomed to be the victim, of the new government: he was arreſted on pretence of having engaged in a correſpondence with queen Margaret, and, without being admitted to trial, the moſt ſacred right of Engliſhmen, was beheaded on Tower-hill, on the twelfth of February, together with his eldeſt ſon, Aubrey de Vere; and, on the twenty-ſixth of the ſame month, ſir Thomas Todenham, ſir Walter Tirrel, and ſir John Montgomery ſuffered the ſame fate, as did ſir Baldwin Fulford not long after, at Briſtol.

The lands and effects of theſe victims Edward diſtributed among his own adherents; at the ſame time, to ſecure one ſtrong party in the nation in his favour, he courted the good-will of the clergy, by confirming their privileges, exempting them from being profecuted in civil courts for felony and other offences; with many other indulgencies, which he thought moſt likely to win them over to his ſide.

All this time queen Margaret was ſoliciting the French court at Chinon for ſuccours for her huſband, and which, if obtained, ſhe knew would put the Scots upon acting vigorouſly in her favour; but it ſoon appeared what little ſtreſs was to be laid on foreign aſſiſtance: all her own and her father's inſtances could not engage the court of France to embark heartily in her intereſt; nor could ſhe procure in any other manner ſuccours equal to her enterprize. Lewis XI. was ſtrongly prepoſſeſſed againſt any breach with England, and the moſt ſhe could obtain of him was an underhand connivance at her raiſing troops in his dominions, and the privately furniſhing her with a good general, Peter de Brezé, ſeneſchal of Normandy, who was releaſed from his confinement in the caſtle of Loches, on condition of entering into the ſervice of her father, Regnier, king of Sicily, and commanding the forces levied by him and Margaret for a deſcent in England.

The French writers have computed theſe at two thouſand men; but the Engliſh hiſtorians reduce their number to five hundred at moſt. With theſe Margaret and Brezé embarked for the North of England; but her ſhips were moſt of them diſperſed or wrecked, and the veſſel in which ſhe herſelf was with her ſon, driven into Berwick: thither ſhe was ſoon followed by Bregé, who, finding himſelf incapable of keeping the field againſt the lord Haſtings, ſir Ralph Grey, and ſir John Howard, who were ſent to oppoſe his attempts, ſhut himſelf up in Alnwick caſtle, where he defended himſelf gallantly, till he was relieved by the earl of Angus, at the head of twenty thouſand Scots, who made an agreement with the Engliſh, that he ſhould be allowed to retire with his troops to Scotland; and the caſtle being ſurrendered on the thirtieth of July, ſir Ralph Grey was appointed governor. The lord Dacre ſoon after ſurrendered the caſtle of Naworth to John Neville, lord Montagu, warden of the Eaſt Marches. King Edward, on the firſt advice of this deſcent, had ſet out for the North; but finding it defeated, and having ſecured Donald, lord of the Iſles*, and James earl of Douglas, in his intereſt, returned ſoon to London.

Upon the twentieth of March this year, the earl of Warwick was made keeper of the Narrow Seas, a poſt different from that of admiral of England, which, on the thirtieth of July following, was conferred on the new-made earl of Kent. In the autumn of this year, the new admiral, with the earl of Eſſex and the lord Audley, made a deſcent in Brittany, where they took the town of Conquette, and plundered the Iſle of Rhée.

Queen Margaret, on finding that the force which ſhe had brought over was not ſtrong enough to encourage the Northumbrians to join her, ſhe ſet ſail in April, 1463, with four ſhips, from Kircudbright, in Galloway, through the Iriſh Channel, to Brittany, where ſhe prevailed on Francis II. who had ſucceeded his father John in that duchy, to ſupply her with twelve thouſand crowns: and proceeding thence to the court of France, procured a ſuccour of two thouſand men. With this inconſiderable force, which was purchaſed by an engagement to deliver up Calais†, ſhe landed, in October, near Bamburgh, in Yorkſhire; and though the country did not riſe in her favour, ſhe found means to get poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Alnwick, which was either treacherouſly given up by ſir Ralph Grey, the governor, or reduced for want of proviſions. Edward, alarmed at her progreſs, and expecting that ſhe would be ſhortly reinforced by a powerful ſupply from Scotland, left London, on the third of November, with a numerous force, and marched directly for York. Margaret, hearing of his arrival there, thought fit to retire into Scotland, leaving the cuſtody of Alnwick caſtle to the ſon of de Brezé and the lord Hungerford, and that of Bamburgh caſtle to the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Pembroke, and ſir Ralph Piercy. The king, ſeeing no enemy in the field, laid ſiege at once to the caſtles of Alnwick, Bamburgh, and Dunſtanburgh; the two laſt of which places ſurrendered after a ſhort ſiege: the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Pembroke, and the lord Roſs were ſuffered to retire into Scotland, with ſir Ralph Piercy, ſir H. Lewis, and ſir Nicholas Latimer. Alnwick ſurrendered the ninth of January, 1464, to the earl of Warwick.

Queen Margaret, however, beſtirred herſelf ſo effectually in Scotland, that ſhe was in a condition to return again to the North of England with a conſiderable force, whom ſhe had gotten together by promiſes of a full liberty in reſpect of plunder. Henry accompanied his warlike conſort in this expedition, and they entered Northumberland the latter end of April. Fortune ſeemed at firſt to favour their undertaking; the queen ſurprized the caſtle of Bamburgh, of which ſhe apppointed ſir Ralph Grey, who had entered into her ſervice, governor: and, being joined by the duke of Somerſet and ſir Ralph Piercy, with their followers, ſhe proceeded to take many places in that part of the county. The firſt check ſhe met with was from Neville, lord Montague, who, on the twenty-fifth of April, routed a party of her forces, in an action on Hedgely Moor, where ſir Ralph Piercy was ſlain, fighting valiantly in her cauſe, though deſerted by his men, who acted upon no other principle than that of rapine.

Edward by this time began to look upon Margaret's progreſs as a ſerious affair: he had, on the firſt advice of her entering the Marches, fitted out a fleet, which he ordered to the northward, and was now on his march to York, attended by the principal noblemen of his court, and a large army, part whereof, upon his arrival there, he detached to reinforce the lord Montagu. But this able general, encouraged by his late ſucceſs, reſolved to have the ſole honour of terminating the war, and, without waiting for the ſuccours ſent him, he, on the fifth of May, advanced againſt the main body of Henry's army, which lay encamped on a plain called the Levells, upon the river Dowal, near Hexham. Here he made a moſt deſperate attack, in the night-time, upon Henry's camp, and was as manfully received: however, after repeated attempts, he forced the trenches, and put the Lancaſtrians to a total diſcomfiture. There the duke of Somerſet, with the lords Hungerford, Roſs, and Moleyns, ſir Thomas Huſſey, ſir Thomas Wentworth, and ſir John Findearn were taken priſoners. The duke of Somerſet was immediately carried to Hexham, and beheaded; and the others were in like manner put to death a few days after, at Newcaſtle. As to Henry, being well mounted, he fled towards Lancaſhire, but was ſo cloſely purſued, that ſome of his body-attendants were taken almoſt by his ſide; and, among others, the perſon who carried his cap of ſtate, which was preſented to Edward at York.

Hexham lying at too great a diſtance from the Scottiſh territories to allow the Lancaſtrians an eaſy retreat thither in the ſudden rout of their forces, and the country about it being full of woods and mountains, a great number of them, loſt or ſkulking in the woods, were hunted and picked up from time to time, for two months after the battle; and it was the likelieſt ſcene for that adventure which Monſtrelet, the French hiſtorian, relates of queen Margaret.

This writer ſays, that, flying with her ſon in the confuſion of the rout, and in the duſk of night, without any other attendant than her own heroic ſpirit, ſhe was bewildered in one of theſe woods, where the ſplendor of her attire ſoon betrayed her into the hands of robbers. It happened, fortunately for her, that the richneſs of the booty occaſioned a quarrel among thoſe thieves, and, while they were diſputing the matter, the queen, with her ſon, eſcaped out their hands. She had not gone far before ſhe fell in with another robber, who was one of the out-guards of the gang, and on ſight of her advanced with his ſword drawn in his hand; finding it impoſſible to make her eſcape a ſecond time, being already near exhauſted with fatigue, ſhe trembled for the life of her ſon; but happily recollecting that the party might have been driven into the practice of rapine by being proſcribed for their adherence to her huſband's intereſt, ſhe ſummoned up all her reſolution, and, taking her ſon in her hand, ſhe approached the outlaw with an air of majeſtic confidence, and preſenting to him the young prince, "Here, my friend (ſaid ſhe), ſave my ſon, the ſon of good king Henry." The robber, ſtruck with awe at the name of his king, and with compaſſion at the diſtreſſes of perſons of ſuch high dignity, forgot the ferocious manners of his profeſſion: he laid hold of the young prince with one hand, and ſupporting the queen with the other, he carefully conducted them out of the foreſt to a village by the ſea-ſide, from whence ſhe had ſoon after an opportunity of paſſing over to the duke of Burgundy's dominions in Holland, where we muſt for ſome time leave her, to attend the fate of her ſtill more unfortunate conſort.

Henry, having eſcaped after his defeat at Hexham, though with great difficulty, took refuge in Scotland; but having received intelligence that a truce was on foot between his rival Edward and that government, and fearing he ſhould be delivered up; having no conveniency to eſcape by ſea, he unfortunately thought of ſheltering himſelf in England. Accordingly he ſet out in diſguiſe, and reached Waddington hall, in Cleatherwood, in Lancaſhire, where he remained concealed for a conſiderable time; but at length he was diſcovered by the indefatigable pains of ſir James Harrington; a ſervice which was amply rewarded by Edward, who ordered the unhappy Henry to be conducted to London, where he was confined cloſe priſoner in the Tower.

Edward, after the victory of Hexham, having no longer any enemy to dread, returned in great triumph to London, where he employed himſelf in cultivating a good correſpondence with the duke of Burgundy, by whoſe mediation a truce for fifteen years was concluded with the Scots, who had now deſerted Henry's ruined fortunes, and who engaged on this occaſion "to give no farther aſſiſtance or comfort to Henry, late calling himſelf king of England, Margaret his wife, Edward his ſon, or any of their friends or adherents:" and king Edward promiſed, on his part, to give no countenance or protection to any rebels or traitors to king James.

Edward's next care was to reward thoſe who had moſt diſtinguiſhed themſelves in his ſervice. To the earl of Warwick he gave the temporalities of the biſhopric of Carliſle, which was then vacant, and created him great-chamberlain of England and warden of the Weſt Marches of Scotland. The lord Montagu, his brother, was made earl of Northumberland, in the room of Henry Piercy, whoſe title and eſtate were forfeited as being a Lancaſtrian; and ſir William Herbert, a knight of great intereſt in Wales, was created earl of Pembroke, in the place of Jaſper Tudor: but Piercy ſubmitting afterwards to the king, and obtaining his pardon, had his earldom of Northumberland reſtored to him, and the title of marquis was given to Montagu, in lieu thereof. But the two illuſtrious brothers, Warwick and Montagu, thought their rewards rather ſpecious than ſolid; and from this time we may date their ſecret diſcontent with Edward.

This king, though no deep politician, had yet ſenſe enough to perceive that the loſs of this family might prove a ſevere blow to him, unleſs he could ſupply it by the means of a general popularity, to acquire which he ſpared no pains, extending his grace to all his opponents who ſubmitted, and living among his loyal ſubjects with an unuſual frankneſs and liberty. He carried this laſt point perhaps to exceſs, ſhewing himſelf more familiar with the commonalty as well as the nobility, than became his dignity and honour, particularly with the Londoners, whom he made his faſt friends: in a word, he ſet himſelf up for the general patron among the men, as he was the general lover among the ladies. He laboured to reſtore the tranquility of his realm by an impartial adminiſtration of juſtice, and reforming the abuſes of public offices. Nor were his cares to gain eſteem confined to his own dominions only; he ſtudied how to bring princes, hitherto neutral or averſe to his friendſhip, to court it, in which he ſucceeded ſo well, that the public records ſhew us that, about this time, ſeveral matches were propoſed to him by foreign courts, but particularly the three following ladies; Margaret, daughter to the king of Scotland; Iſabella, ſiſter to Henry IV. of Caſtile; and the lady Bona,

Bona, daughter to the duke of Savoy, and ſiſter to the queen of France: Edward reſolved upon Bona, and it was thought proper to appoint the great earl of Warwick to negociate the match, who accepted the commiſſion. He accordingly went over, with a vaſte quipage, to France, where he was received with raptures by Lewis XI. and his queen, who reliſhed the propoſition of the marriage ſo well, that Dammartin was appointed ambaſſador to England, to conclude the ſame. During the earl of Warwick's ſtay on the continent, he found means to conclude a truce with the duke of Brittany for one year. About the ſame time the ſee of York becoming vacant, George Neville, brother to the earl of Warwick, was promoted to it, by the king's recommendation.

The earl of Warwick applied himſelf with great aſſiduity to fulfil his commiſſion; but, whilſt he was labouring for the glory and advantage of his maſter and his country, an unforeſeen accident ſubverted all this mighty ſcheme of policy, the amorous temper of Edward betraying him into a meaſure which proved very prejudicial to his future tranquility, and had almoſt deprived him of the throne. The young monarch, at a hunting-match in Wychwood foreſt, coming to the manor of Grafton, near Stony Stratford, in Buckinghamſhire, reſolved to pay a viſit to the ducheſs dowager of Bedford (Jaquelina of Luxemburgh) who reſided there, having been married a ſecond time to ſir Richard Wydeville, or Woodville, afterwards created lord Rivers, by whom, among other children, ſhe had a daughter named Elizabeth, who had been married to ſir John Grey, of Groby; and her huſband being ſlain, fighting for Henry at the late battle of St. Alban's, his eſtate on that account was confiſcated, and the young widow, who was eſteemed the greateſt beauty of her time, withdrew to her father's ſeat at Grafton, where ſhe lived in privacy and retirement. Elizabeth thought the king's viſit to her mother furniſhed her with a favourable opportunity of obtaining ſome grace from the young monarch, who was ſo extolled for his condeſcenſion and gallantry, eſpecially to thoſe of her ſex. Accordingly ſhe came into the royal preſence, and throwing herſelf at the king's feet, ſhe implored a maintenance for herſelf and her two ſons, Thomas and Richard Grey, out of the forfeited eſtate of her huſband.

Edward was young and amorous; he was inſtantly ſtruck with the charms of the fair ſuppliant; he felt an impreſſion which he miſtook for compaſſion, but which was in truth love; he raiſed her from the ground with aſſurance of favour, and even intimated it was not in his power to refuſe her any thing. He protracted his viſit for ſeveral days, during which time he found his paſſion daily ſtrengthened by the company and converſation of the lovely widow; till at length, his flame growing too furious for reſtraint, he avowed his love, and, in his turn, became a ſuitor for favours, which Elizabeth would not grant on any other condition than that of marriage. Edward, who had never known any of the ſex proof againſt his charms, glowed with diſdain at finding his ſuit ſo peremptorily rejected; he withdrew, reſolving to conquer an inclination which he thought he could not indulge conſiſtent with his honour and high dignity: he ſought a cure in abſence, but the ſhaft was too deeply fixed in his heart to be removed by all the efforts of reaſon. Hopes of ſucceſs engaged him to repeat his viſit; each interview and converſation fed and increaſed the flame; oppoſition rendered the lover more eager; and Jaquelina, a woman of good ſenſe and great art, managed matters ſo well for her daughter, that the king was at length perſuaded to marry her, finding no other way of gratifying his paſſion; and the ceremony was performed on the morning of the firſt of May, at Grafton, by a private prieſt, no one elſe being preſent but the ducheſs of Bedford and two of her gentlewomen.

Edward had reaſon to dread the conſequences of ſuch an haſty inconſiderate marriage coming to be known; he is even ſaid to have repented, and endeavoured to diſengage himſelf; but he was too faſt tied in the bands of wedlock, and all he could do was to keep it as ſecret as he could, and put the beſt face upon the matter when it could be no longer concealed.

Warwick had laboured ſo effectually at the court of France, that nothing remained but the ratification of the treaty, and the conducting the princeſs Bona over to England; but when the earl heard of Edward's clandeſtine marriage, which was not long before it tranſpired, he conſidered it as the higheſt inſult that could have been offered to his honour, and, inſtantly breaking off the negociation, he returned to England, glowing with rage and indignation: nevertheleſs, he ſeems to have concealed his reſentment, for the king's marriage being publicly declared on the Michaelmas-day following, he himſelf aſſiſted, with the duke of Clarence, in leading Elizabeth to the church of the abbey of Reading, where ſhe was declared queen, and received the compliments of all the nobility; and on the twenty-ſixth of May, 1465, ſhe was crowned in Weſtminſter abbey, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. Her riſe was immediately followed by that of all her relations: her father was created earl Rivers, and made high conſtable of England; her brother, John Woodville, at the ſame time was married to the daughter and heireſs of the lord Scales, to whoſe honours he ſucceeded; her ſon, Thomas Grey, was created marquis of Dorſet, and married the heireſs of the lord Bonneville. Thus the queen's kindred were not only ennobled by titles, but enriched with great eſtates to ſupport them.

The kings of England were accuſtomed not to take any ſtep of moment without the advice of their council, and this advice is conſtantly mentioned in all their acts. The nobility of the kingdom, who, according to the rigour of the feudal ſyſtem, could not marry without the king's conſent, conceived themſelves particularly intereſted in his marriage, and thought they had a right to be conſulted on the occaſion; therefore the king's marrying one of his ſubjects, without once conſulting any of them, and that too when he was negociating a match at the court of France, nay when that match was already concluded, made moſt of the nobility in a very bad humour with the court; and the partiality ſhewn in the late promotions of the new queen's relations, contributed not a little to encreaſe their jealouſy and diſcontent: but the earl of Warwick thought himſelf injured in a particular manner, by being made ſuch a tool in the late negociation, and he only waited for a favourable opportunity to make Edward feel the weight of his reſentment. With this view, upon pretence of health, he got leave leave to retire to his caſtle of Warwick, where he began to practiſe all the arts of popular patriotiſm diſcontented with a court. Edward, alarmed at his ſullen retirement, redoubled his attention to his conduct.

Determined, therefore, to provide againſt every accident which might interrupt his pleaſure, or give encouragement to the diſcontent of this haughty ſubject, he endeavoured to ſtrengthen himſelf by foreign alliances; and, in the courſe of this year, he concluded a treaty with the count de Charolois, and Philip, duke of Burgundy; and another of definitive alliance with the duke of Brittany: neither muſt we omit that Lewis XI. notwithſtanding his late provocation, wanted to bring Edward over to his alliance; and that he was courted at the ſame time by the kings of Denmark and Poland, and by the great-maſter of the Teutonic order and the deputies of the Hanſe towns, with all whom he entered into alliances till October, 1467*. Edward was equally ſucceſsful with other courts, for he renewed his alliances with the kings of Caſtile and Arragon; and, after a long negociation, concluded a treaty with James III. of Scotland, at Newcaſtle, whereby a truce then ſubſiſting between that nation and England, which was to end on the thirty-firſt of October, 1470, was farther prolonged to the thirty-firſt of October, 1519, viz. for forty years †.

While Edward was thus ſucceſsful abroad he was equally happy in the affections of his parliament at home, which granted him ſubſidies with a liberality unknown under any former reign. The commons alſo paſſed a bill of attainder againſt all who remained unattainted of the Lancaſter party, the forfeiture of whoſe eſtates to the crown enabled the king to gratify his friends: in a word, faction was dumb at home, his friendſhip was courted and his enmity dreaded abroad, till the year 1466.

In the mean time, however, the queen was very active in improving the advantages which her marriage gave her; ſhe was equally careful to procure every favour and grace to her own friends and adherents, and to exclude thoſe of the earl of Warwick, whom ſhe looked upon as her inveterate and implacable enemy: beſides the preferments already beſtowed upon her family, ſhe now procured her ſiſter Catherine to be given in marriage to the young duke of Buckingham, a minor and ward of the crown: Mary, another of her ſiſters, was married with William Herbert, who was thereupon made lord of Dunſter, and afterwards earl of Huntingdon: and Anne, a third ſiſter, eſpouſed the ſon and heir of Grey, lord Ruthyn, who was honoured with the title of earl of Kent: her father, the earl Rivers, had alſo the office of treaſurer added to that of high-conſtable, with which he had been before inveſted.

Edward, who was jealous of the earl of Warwick's power, that power which had placed him on the throne, and which had been ſtill farther increaſed by his own liberality and munificence, was glad to raiſe up ſome counterpoiſe to it by creating him rivals among the new nobility; and thus, while he indulged his extreme partiality to the queen's relations, he pretended to be guided merely by the motives of national intereſt: the conſequences of this conduct will appear in the ſequel.

Early in the year 1466, Edward was made bleſſed by the birth of a daughter, the princeſs Elizabeth, who afterwards became the happy inſtrument of healing the wounds of England after a long and bloody civil war: and ſoon after Michaelmas the court of England was graced with ambaſſadors from almoſt all the powers of Europe; but none made ſo ſplendid an appearance as Anthony, baſtard of Burgundy, who was ſent over by the count de Charolois, to conclude a treaty of marriage between that prince and the lady Margaret, ſiſter to Edward; a match which was not conſummated till the year 1468. Hiſtorians have given us a very circumſtantial and diverting account of a juſt or tournament, which was held for five days ſucceſſively in Smithfield, between the baſtard and the lord Scales, the queen's brother.

The year 1467 was diſtinguiſhed by farther proſecutions of the Lancaſter party, in which the earl Rivers, the queen's father, and ſir John Fogg, treaſurer of the king's houſhold, rendered themſelves very unpopularly conſpicuous: but what ſhews the jealouſy and weakneſs of the government moſt, is that the queen and her father had intereſt enough to get ſir John Markham diſmiſſed from being lord chief juſtice of the Common Pleas, for not heartily concurring in the work of proſecution.

About Midſummer this year a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, the great buſineſs of which was to paſs an act of reſumption, which in effect was propoſed by the king himſelf, who, in a formal ſpeech he made to the commons, declared, that "he deſigned to live upon his own revenue, without any charge to his ſubjects, except on great and urgent occaſions, in which not ſo much his own inclinations or particular pleaſure, the uſual motives of former kings in their conduct, as the ſafety and welfare of his people, and the defence of the realm, were immediately concerned; and therefore he hoped they would be as kind to him as they had been to any of his predeceſſors ‡." The deſign expreſſed in his ſpeech was very agreeable to the commons; but Edward's real view herein ſeems to have been to get the Neville family and their friends in his power, and make them dependent upon him for the enjoyment of thoſe vaſt eſtates he had granted them as a reward for their eminent ſervices. The commons underſtood his meaning, and, for the better enabling him to live upon the crown revenue, brought in a bill to reſume all grants of lands and offices ſince the day of Edward's acceſſion, annulling them all, except in certain caſes mentioned in ſpecial proviſoes added to the act when it paſſed the royal aſſent ‖. The king was ſo well pleaſed with having carried his point, that he ordered the chancellor (the biſhop of Lincoln, in abſence of the archbiſhop of York), to return the parliament thanks for this act of reſumption; and the ſeſſion was then adjourned to the ſixth of May, 1468.

Philip, duke of Burgundy, dying on the fifteenth of June, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age, was ſucceeded in his title and dominions by his only ſon, Charles (count de Charolois), whoſe martial atchievements procured him the ſurname of the Hardy. This prince being ſprung by his mother, a daughter of Portugal, from John of Ghent, was of courſe diſpoſed to wiſh well to the houſe of Lancaſter; but this circumſtance was more than overbalanced by political conſiderations.

The dark and inſatiable ambition of Lewis XI. of France, had raiſed great apprehenſions among all his neighbours and vaſſals; and, as he was poſſeſſed of great abilities, and reſtrained by no principles of faith or honour, they found no ſecurity to themſelves but in a mutual league and combination againſt him. The heads of the confederacy were the count de Charolois, whom we muſt hereafter name the duke of Burgundy, the dukes of Berry, Brittany, and Bourbon, and the duke of Calabria, brother to the exiled queen Margaret, Henry VI's conſort. Burgundy's ambition was even more unbounded than that of Lewis, but ſupported by leſs power and policy, and therefore regarded with a more indulgent eye by the other potentates of Europe.

The claſhing of intereſts, and a ſtill greater antipathy of temper, occaſioned a violent hatred between theſe two bad princes (Lewis and Burgundy), and Edward had the advantage of making either of them his friend, whoſe cauſe he choſe to eſpouſe. The duke of Burgundy, while earl of Charolois, had, as we have already obſerved, entered into a treaty with Edward, and actually agreed to marry that monarch's ſiſter, the princeſs Margaret: the death of duke Philip appeared an incident the moſt proper to cement the propoſed alliance, and the new duke, the very day of his father's death, ratified his agreement with England, and offered to put his hand to the final concluſion of the match with Edward's ſiſter.

The friendſhip of Burgundy was more agreeable to the Engliſh than that of France; the commercial intereſts of the two nations were more cloſely connected; the jealouſy and ſuſpicion which both parties entertained of the growing power and dangerous deſigns of the French monarch, naturally led them to an alliance againſt ſuch a formidable neighbour; and Edward, pleaſed to have it in his option to fortify himſelf by ſo powerful an ally, immediately accepted the propoſal, and gave his ſiſter to Charles.

A league which Edward made, in the beginning of the year 1468, with the duke of Brittany, ſeemed ſtill farther to eſtabliſh him in his throne, and to afford him a proſpect of recovering thoſe provinces which had formerly belonged to the Engliſh crown: but whatever towering projects the king might have formed, in conſequence of theſe alliances, they were ſoon defeated by inteſtine commotions, which engroſſed his whole attention.

The earl of Warwick, who, as we have already ſhewn, had retired from the court in great diſcontent, on account of the injuries and inſults he had received from the family of the Woodvilles, prepared now to diſcharge the long-concealed bolt of his vengeance againſt the houſe of York. He redoubled his attempts towards popularity; his houſe was always open, his table always ſpread, for every one who choſe to partake of his hoſpitality; and by theſe meaſures he ſoon rendered himſelf a greater favourite with the people than ever; but the moſt powerful friend whom Warwick engaged in his party, was George, duke of Clarence, the king's ſecond brother. This prince was no leſs diſſatisfied than the reſt of the old nobility at the influence the queen and her relations had acquired over the king; and as Edward had excluded his brother Clarence from all ſhare in the adminiſtration of government at home, he was ſtrongly inclined to join the earl of Warwick in his oppoſition to the court.

That diſcerning nobleman quickly perceived the duke's real diſpoſition, and reſolved to turn it to his own advantage: in order therefore to make ſure of ſo valuable a confederate, he offered the duke his eldeſt daughter, Iſabella, in marriage. The young lady was coheireſs of her father's immenſe fortune; and as this was a ſettlement ſuperior to any thing the king himſelf could beſtow upon Clarence, it effectually attached him to the earl's party.

Edward ſeems to have been jealous of the earl of Warwick's proceedings; for, about the beginning of the year 1469, we find the ſaid earl named in a commiſſion of inqueſt concerning ſome lands in Picardy; on the ſeventh of Auguſt, the ſame year, he was made chief-juſticiary of South Wales, and conſtable of Cardigan caſtle, with other offices conferred upon him*. But Warwick's reſentment was too ſtubborn to be removed by theſe advances: beſides, if we may believe Hall, an hiſtorian worthy of credit, he had a ſtronger reaſon to hate Edward than any yet mentioned, and that is, the latter had attempted the chaſtity of one of his daughters; and this prince's character, who was not very ſcrupulous in theſe reſpects, makes the thing ſtill more credible: the earl, however, was too wiſe to blaze this laſt circumſtance abroad, but, retiring to his government of Calais, under pretext of ſolemnizing his daughter's marriage with the duke of Clarence, while he reſided in this place, he ſeems to have tried the pulſe of the Engliſh by raiſing an inſurrection in Yorkſhire, through the means of the archbiſhop of York and the marquiſs of Montagu, his two brothers; though the latter, in order to keep himſelf clear from ſuſpicion, actually headed the king's troops in that part of the country, and, marching againſt the rebellious rabble, put them to rout, and cauſed their chief, Robert Hillyard, to whom they had given the nickname of Robin of Ryddeſdale, to be hanged. This conduct would give occaſion to preſume that the marquis had no ſhare in raiſing the ſedition, had not his real views been more fully explained by his after-proceedings.

The malecontents, however, rather animated than diſcouraged by the ill ſucceſs of their firſt attempt, re-aſſembled in greater numbers than ever, and found themſelves joined by the lord Fitz Hugh and Henry Neville, ſon of the lord Latimer, friends to the Warwick party; ſo that it was no hard matter for the government to gueſs that this inſurrection was promoted by the Neville intereſt. As neither of the two noblemen above-mentioned had experience in military matters, the command of the rebel troops was given to ſir John Conyers, an officer of great reputation and conduct. Their firſt project was to make themſelves maſters of York; but as that could not be done without artillery, in which they were deficient, they reſolved to march ſouthward; and, ſtriking into the London road, they openly declared, "that they marched to deliver their lawful ſovereign, king Henry, from his confinement, and place him again upon the throne."

Edward was then in London, and not a little apprehenſive of the conſequences of this commotion. In the preſent exigency he took the wiſeſt courſe he could have fallen on: he iſſued out orders to John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Anthony, earl Rivers, to array and aſſemble all perſons able to bear arms, in Norfolk and other parts; and made Henry, earl of Northumberland, and the prior of St. John's of Jeruſalem, renew their oaths of fealty to him: he alſo wrote to his friend Herbert, earl of Pembroke, to aſſemble the Welſh, and, croſſing the country, to intercept the march of the rebels from the North; he ordered him at the ſame time, at all events, to fight the malecontents on their march, promiſing him to be as expeditious as poſſible in raiſing an army to join and ſupport him.

The earl of Pembroke applied himſelf ſo heartily to obey his maſter's orders, that in a ſhort time he had gotten together ten or twelve thouſand men, at the head of whom he began his march in queſt of the rebels, who as he underſtood were advancing by Northampton. In his route he was joined by Humphrey, lord Stafford, lately created earl of Devonſhire, with a large body of archers. The two armies coming in ſight of each other, the earl of Pembroke detached all his horſe, being two thouſand, under his brother, ſir Richard Herbert, with orders to obſerve the enemy's poſition, and, if he found it practicable, to attack their rear. Sir Richard, after due obſervation, was of opinion that the rebels could not be attacked without manifeſt diſadvantage to his own troops; however, the fiery ſpirit of the Welſh not brooking the leaſt appearance of coolneſs, they fell, againſt their leader's will, upon the rear of the malecontents; but Conyers had made ſuch an admirable diſpoſition, that the Welſh were repulſed with great loſs.

In the mean time the earl of Warwick, pretending that he could not remain an idle ſpectator of his country's diſaſters at a diſtance, returned to England, and repaired forthwith to his caſtle of Warwick, where he and his ſon-in-law, the duke of Clarence, who had accompanied him over, aſſembled a conſiderable army, with which they lay perdu till they ſhould ſee the event of the preſent commotions. The marquis of Montagu joined his brother Warwick ſoon after his arrival.

The rebels, upon hearing of the earl's arrival, inſtead of purſuing their road to London, took the way for Warwick, where they hoped to meet a cordial reception; but the earl of Pembroke, impatient to have his revenge, marched directly towards them, and forced them to halt near a town called Edgecot, about four miles from Banbury, and the two armies encamped at a ſmall diſtance from each other; but the earl of Pembroke and the earl of Devonſhire quarrelling about an inn, where each of them inſiſted upon taking up his quarters, a fatal diſſention aroſe from this trifling cauſe: the earl of Devonſhire, in revenge, during the night, traiterouſly drew off all his archers, and thereby left Pembroke expoſed to the defeat which afterwards followed.

On the morrow, by break of day, the malecontents marched in good order to attack the king's army. They had heard, by deſerters, of the earl of Devonſhire's retreat, and were reſolved to make the moſt of ſo fortunate an incident. Henry Neville, one of their leaders, venturing to charge at too great a diſtance from the main body, was ſurrounded by the royaliſts, all his men were cut to pieces, and himſelf taken priſoner: this ſomewhat checked the ardour of the inſurgents, who thereupon retreated to their camp for that day; but the Welſh having inhumanly put Neville to death in cold blood, the rebels were raiſed to ſuch fury by this act of barbarity, that the next day they attacked the royaliſts with irreſiſtible fury. They were received, however, with equal courage, and the fortune of the day was on the point of declaring for the earl of Pembroke, when ſir John Clapham coming up in the heat of the battle with a body of fifteen hundred men, bearing the enſigns of the earl of Warwick, one of whoſe officers he was, the rebels, upon his appearing in ſight, ſet up the cry of "a Warwick! a Warwick!" which ſo terrified the Welſh, who thought that earl, with all his troops, was at hand, that they betook themſelves to precipitate flight. The earl of Pembroke and his brother, ſir Richard Herbert, fell into the hands of the conquerors, who, carrying them to Banbury, ordered their heads to be ſtruck off, in revenge for the murder of ſir Henry Neville. After this, a party was ſent to the houſe of earl Rivers, the queen's father, at Grafton, who dragged that nobleman from thence, and, carrying him to Northampton, there ſtruck off his head, without any trial. The inſurgents, having thus taken vengeance on the moſt obnoxious of the miniſters, retired without doing any more harm; for the earl of Warwick, by keeping himſelf neuter, in appearance at leaſt, put a ſtop to any farther action on any ſide: not that there is the leaſt room to doubt that he was the prime mover of all the outrages that had been committed; and yet, by an inconceivable blindneſs, Edward was ſo far from ſuſpecting this to be the caſe, that, early in the next year, a commiſſion was iſſued to the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence, for holding a general array of all the king's ſubjects within Worceſterſhire and other counties where they had intereſt.

The winter of this year, 1469, was ſpent in receiving ambaſſadors from Lewis XI. of France, under colour of renewing a truce; though his true aim was to be particularly informed of the ſituation of affairs here. At the ſame time Edward, deſirous of ſtrengthening his alliance with the duke of Burgundy, ſent him the order of the Garter, which he received with great marks of honour and eſteem.

We muſt not forget to note, that Edward, imputing the loſs of the battle of Banbury to the earl of Devonſhire's ſeparating from Pembroke, on his return he ordered his head to be ſtruck off, which ſentence was executed at Bridgwater, on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt this year*.

The duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick, who had hitherto preſerved the exterior of ſubmiſſion and loyalty, thought they could never have a more favourable opportunity of coming to a breach with Edward, than that with which he himſelf had furniſhed them in their late commiſſion of array. Accordingly Warwick levied what forces he pleaſed in the king's name, but reſerved the command of them to himſelf; and Clarence did the like. Early in the year 1470 they began to give ſuch broad indications of their deſigns, that Edward could be no longer miſtaken; and we find him, on the thirteenth of March, iſſuing a proclamation from York, where the court then reſided, appointing John, lord Tiptoft, lately created earl of Worceſter, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the duke of Clarence who before enjoyed that high poſt; and alſo ſetting a reward of a thouſand pounds, or an hundred pounds a year, upon the heads of the duke and the earl of Warwick. Three days after, general commiſſions of array againſt the duke and earl by name were iſſued all over the kingdom, but with very little effect, for all Edward's authority could neither diminiſh the army of the rebels, nor raiſe one ſuperior to them.

In this ſituation of affairs, Edward's beſt friends thought it would be moſt prudent to bring about a reconciliation; if poſſible, upon the baſis of public reformation. The propoſal was made, and accepted by the duke and earl, and an interview was agreed to be held between the king and the two chiefs of the oppoſite party, in London. But the conference had not the deſired effect; it paſſed only in mutual recriminations, and Warwick in particular behaved ſo haughtily on the occaſion, that Edward, unable to bear the inſolence of the over-grown traitor, ordered him from his preſence, and each ſide immediately appealed to the ſword.

Warwick, immediately after leaving London, commiſſioned ſir Robert Wills, ſon of the lord Wills, to levy troops in Lincolnſhire, which he did with ſuch great ſucceſs, that Edward, alarmed thereat, ſent an expreſs to order the lord Wills to repair to court, with a deſign to oblige him to uſe his authority with his ſon to deſiſt from ſupporting the rebels. The lord Wills did not think proper to ſlight this ſummons from his ſovereign, and accordingly ſet out for London; but being informed on his way, Edward was highly incenſed againſt his family for the attachment they had ſhewn to the Warwick party, he did not dare to face the king, but immediately upon his arrival took ſanctuary in Weſtminſter abbey, with ſir Thomas Dimmock, his brother-in-law, who had accompanied him in his journey. Edward, informed of this, immediately ſent them both letters of ſafe-conduct, upon the faith of which they quitted their aſylum, and, at the inſtances of Edward, lord Wills wrote a preſſing letter to his ſon, perſuading him to abandon the rebels and return to his duty. But this order the young nobleman refuſed to obey, juſtly imagining his father to be under compulſion when the letter was wrote; and Edward marching towards Stamford, and finding that ſir Robert Wills was more than ever attached to the party he had embraced, inſomuch that the earl of Warwick had given him the command next under himſelf, Edward, with a cruelty which nothing but the inhuman practices common in civil wars can account for, ordered the lord Wills, and ſir Thomas Dimmock to be put to death for the diſobedience of their ſon and nephew.

This cruel deed incenſed ſir Robert Wills to ſuch a degree, that, deaf to all the dictates of prudence, he ventured to attack the royal army with a body of raw and undiſciplined troops, without waiting to be reinforced by the earl of Warwick and the duke of Clarence, who were on the march to join him, and were expected every moment to arrive. The event was ſuch as may be ſuppoſed from ſo precipitate a meaſure; the rebels were obliged to yield to the ſuperior valour and diſcipline of the royaliſts, and were routed with great ſlaughter. Ten thouſand men are ſuppoſed to have fallen in this engagement †; and ſir Robert Wills and ſir Thomas de la Launde, being taken priſoners, were executed immediately after the action.

This defeat quite diſconcerted the earl of Warwick, who now gave over all thoughts of being able to keep the field that ſeaſon; and the forces he had with him not being ſufficient to face the royal army, ſuperior in numbers and flushed with ſucceſs, he ſaw no other remedy than to embark for France, in order to ſhun the impending danger, and therefore, diſmiſſing his troops, he ſet out, with the duke of Clarence in his company, for Exeter, in order to provide and fit out ſhips to carry them and their families to Calais.

But Edward, not thinking proper to allow Clarence and Warwick time to debauch the principles of the inhabitants of the Weſt by any long ſtay amongſt them, marched thither with ſo much expedition, that he was, by the fifteenth of April, at Dartmouth, from whence he iſſued commiſſions to the earl of Wiltſhire, the lord Mountjoy, and ſir John Forteſcue and others, for arraying the counties of Devon and Cornwall. The confederate princes, finding themſelves thus preſſed, embarked on board the few ſhips they had ready, on the twenty-fifth, and ſailed for Calais; but, to their great ſurprize, when they offered to enter the harbour, the cannon of the place fired upon them, upon which being forced to ſtand off to ſea, to add to their diſtreſs the ducheſs of Clarence, who, with her ſiſter, had accompanied her huſband and father, fell in labour and was delivered of a ſon, named Edward, who was afterwards earl of Warwick.

The command of the garriſon had been entruſted by the earl of Warwick to one Vauclere, a Gaſcon gentleman, one who had always before ſerved him with unſhaken fidelity; however, all he could obtain on this occaſion, were a few bottles of wine for the refreſhment of the ladies, who were in a truly pitiable ſtate; but at the ſame time Vauclere accompanied this trifling preſent by a private intimation, that he was compelled, by the diſpoſition of the garriſon, to act as he did, and counſelled the earl his maſter to retire into France, and truſt to his fidelity for improving any change of circumſtance to the advantage of his intereſt. It is not improbable that the Gaſcon intended to act a double game, and to lie by till he ſhould ſee which was the ſtrongeſt ſide: however this might be, Edward was ſo pleaſed with his behaviour, that he beſtowed the government of the place upon him; and the duke of Burgundy added a farther reward of a thouſand crowns by way of penſion. In the mean time the duke and earl, obliged to give way to their untoward fortunes, directed their courſe towards Normandy, and, in a few days after, landed at Harfleur, where they were amicably received by the baſtard of Bourbon, lieutenant-general of the province; and from thence they repaired to the court of France, at Amboiſe, where they were received by Lewis XI. with all the honours due to their dignity and reputation.

Lewis would not interfere in the affairs of England while the two rival families were contending for the crown; but now that Edward had engaged in ſuch a ſtrict alliance with the duke of Burgundy, his inveterate foe, he was induced from motives of intereſt to attempt the ruin of both; and to this he was the rather inclined, becauſe, while he conſulted the good and ſafety of his own dominions, by ſuppreſſing the inſolence of Burgundy, he ſhould at the ſame time have an opportunity of avenging the affront he had received from Edward in the affair of the marriage: moreover, the ſuccours which that monarch deſigned to ſend to the confederate princes of France in arms againſt Lewis, plainly ſhewed, that while he ſhould enjoy the crown of England, thoſe princes would always conſider him as a ſure protector and ally.

Influenced by theſe and the like conſiderations, he determined, if poſſible, to effect a reconciliation between Margaret of Anjou, queen of Henry VI. and the earl of Warwick; and for that purpoſe ſent for that princeſs, who had retired to her father's court. Lewis found great difficulty in bringing this point to bear, on account of the implacable and rancorous animoſity that prevailed between the two parties; but at length, their enmity giving way to their intereſt, a ſeeming accommodation took place, and it was reſolved to unite heartily in raiſing the houſe of Lancaſter from its miſery, and in reſtoring Henry to his throne. It was agreed between Lewis and the earl of Warwick, that the former ſhould fit out all the ſhips he could raiſe, and that theſe, joining with the earl's ſquadron, ſhould be entirely under his direction. Queen Margaret, on her part, promiſed that her ſon, prince Edward, ſhould marry Anne, the younger daughter of the earl of Warwick, and, on Henry's being re-enthroned, declared his immediate ſucceſſor; and in default of iſſue, the crown was to devolve upon the duke of Clarence, who, with the earl of Warwick, his father-in-law, were to be regents of England till Edward came of age. The duke of Clarence, being but one-and-twenty years of age, was entirely under the government of Warwick, and ſwore to this agreement; yet, young as he was, he could not but ſee that his hopes of an immediate poſſeſſion of the crown were defeated, and his pretenſions to it not only poſtponed, but made dependent on a mere contingency, which the marriage of Edward and Anne, now ſolemnized with great pomp, rendered unlikely to happen: nevertheleſs, the duke found himſelf too deeply engaged to be able to retreat, and was obliged to give himſelf up to the guidance of his father-in-law. Hence we may readily account for his being diſſatisfied with the earl of Warwick, and for the reaſons which induced him to abandon that party, and join with his brother Edward, againſt whom he had hitherto acted with all the keenneſs of inveterate rebellion. This, I ſay, may be accounted for, without having recourſe to the anecdote, which moſt of our hiſtorians have been ſo fond of relating after Philip de Commines, who has carried a lady from England, who outwitted Vauclere, governor of Calais, who had ſecret propoſals to communicate from Edward to Clarence, which, according to him, induced that duke to make his peace with his brother, and promiſe to ſerve him on his return to England. We cannot help pointing out one extraordinary circumſtance which happened in conſequence of this agreement of Amboiſe. By the marriage of prince Edward, Henry VI's ſon, with the daughter of the earl of Warwick, the duke of Clarence, Edward's brother, became brother-in-law to the young prince of the houſe of Lancaſter; and the earl of Warwick equally related to the two rival families.

Nothing now remained but for the earl of Warwick to paſs over to England with the fleet, which the French king had gotten ready for his ſervice; and the daily accounts received from England, by a crowd of refugees, of the diſpoſitions of the people to favour his cauſe, made the earl extremely urgent to depart. It ſeems that Edward, though he had been apprized by the duke of Burgundy of the agreement made at Amboiſe, had paid very little regard to that intimation, relying upon very uncertain principles, namely, the attachment of his ſubjects to his perſon and government, and Warwick's want of credit and influence; ſo that he neglected to take the neceſſary precautions for his own defence, and abandoned himſelf to a ſcandalous ſenſuality; but what is more amazing, at the time that he ſtood moſt in need of the good-will and affections of his people, he ſuffered them to be oppreſſed by every act of cruelty and malice that his miniſters choſe to exerciſe againſt thoſe who were obnoxious to them: of theſe acts none gave ſo much horror as the execution of ſir John Clapham, one of Warwick's officers, and about twenty other gentlemen of Henry's party, who, being taken on board a ſhip at Southampton, were, by the earl of Worceſter (Tiptoft), lately made high-conſtable of England, ordered to be hanged, then fixed to the gallows by their legs, and afterwards impaled upon the highways. Theſe inſtances of barbarity, inſtead of filling the ſpectators with fear and apprehenſion, inſpired them with the moſt implacable hatred and indignation againſt the authors of the horrid ſcene. Numbers of reputable perſonages of the Lancaſtrian party fled over to France, among whom was John de Vere, earl of Oxford; who giving Warwick an account of the temper and ſtate of the nation, and the certainty of his being ſtrongly ſupported on his arrival, that nobleman drew the moſt favourable omen of ſucceſs to his expedition: but he was for ſome time prevented from ſailing by the proceedings of the duke of Burgundy.

This prince, as we have elſewhere remarked, eſpouſed the intereſts of Edward; not ſo much out of regard to his alliance with him by the marriage of his ſiſter, or any perſonal regard for him or liking to his cauſe, as out of hatred to Lewis; this conſtant motive of all his actions had put him upon joining Edward in preſſing the parliament of Paris to ſend Warwick out of France; and he even carried his inſolence ſo far as to threaten, if he was not ſent away, to come with an army and ſeize him wherever he was concealed. This rhodomontade was treated with the contempt it deſerved: however Charles prepared to put his threats in execution, and, having fitted out a ſtrong fleet, compoſed of large Flemiſh and Dutch veſſels, he ſent his admiral, la Vire, to block up the mouth of the Seine, where Warwick lay with his own ſhips and thoſe which the admiral of France had provided, ready to ſail for England; but a violent ſtorm ariſing, drove the Burgundian ſhips from their ſtation, and gave the earl of Warwick, with his fleet, an opportunity of ſailing for England, where they landed at Dartmouth about the middle of September, and immediately declared for king Henry.

It is almoſt incredible in how ſhort a time the wiſhed-for news of Warwick's arrival ſpread through the kingdom, and by what numbers he was joined. No event more clearly ſhews than this, the facility of bringing about a revolution in England, when the hearts of the people favour the attempt, and the government hath loſt its reputation: though, indeed, we ſhall have numberleſs examples to ſhew, that no people in the world are ſo liable as the Engliſh to the infection of plauſible pretexts; the art is to raiſe the cry of the multitude, and to follow it becomes the faſhion. Warwick was well acquainted with this diſpoſition of his countrymen, and made a proper uſe of it by iſſuing a proclamation for all who were capable of bearing arms, between ſixteen and ſixty, to enter immediately into the ſervice of their lawful ſovereign, Henry VI. The earl had not been landed ſix days before he ſaw himſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand men, all ready to draw their ſwords, and ſacrifice their lives, for the late deſpicable, diſtreſſed, deſpairing houſe of Lancaſter.

So unexpected an event opened Edward's eyes, and ſhewed him the folly of his expectations. He was then on a progreſs into the North, to quell an inſurrection raiſed in Yorkſhire by the lord Fitz Hugh, who had married Alice, ſiſter to the earl of Warwick; but hearing of the ſucceſs of the latter, he immediately turned back towards London, and had advanced on his way as far as Nottingham: but Warwick, being reſolved to engage him before he ſhould reach that capital, where he knew he was very popular, overtook him within three miles of Nottingham, and prepared to give him battle. Edward was ſo weak as to depend upon the fidelity of the marquis of Montagu, though the brother of his adverſary, and a nobleman whom he was ſenſible thought himſelf injured by being deprived of the great eſtate and honour of Northumberland. He had raiſed ſix thouſand men, with whom he followed the king at ſome diſtance, as if his intention had been to reinforce the royal army; but his real aim was to join his brother, and he had already concerted the affair with his officers; when he therefore underſtood that Warwick was ſo near the king's camp, he quickened his march in order to fall upon the rear of Edward, who had no intimation of his deſign, till the traitor was within two miles of his camp, and the air reſounded with the cry of "God bleſs king Henry!"

In this emergency Edward called a council of war, in which the lord Haſtings (who had married a ſiſter of Warwick, and who was the faithful companion of Edward in all his fortunes) gave it as his opinion, that great part of the army would revolt to the earl of Warwick; or that, even ſhould they do their duty, they would not be able to cope with the rebels, ſince this defection of Montagu: the duke of Gloceſter, Edward's brother, with the earls of Rivers and Northumberland, joined in the ſame opinion, and it was agreed that they had nothing to truſt to but flight, and that the king ſhould immediately make the beſt of his way, attended by the chief of his followers, towards Lynn, in Norfolk, where ſome Dutch ſhips were at that time lying, on board of which they propoſed to embark. Accordingly Edward ſet out, but without baggage or money, and got on board, on the third of October, and inſtantly put to ſea, with his brother Gloceſter, the lord Haſtings, and ſome other friends; and, after having narrowly eſcaped a fleet of Eaſterlings, a ſet of freebooters then at war with both France and England, landed ſafely at Alkmar, leaving Warwick entire maſter of the kingdom, without a blow; and, what may appear ſtill more ſurprizing, within the ſhort ſpace of eleven days after his landing at Dartmouth; for, on the morning of Edward's retreat, his army ſubmitted to the victorious earl, who forthwith directed his march to London, which he entered in triumph on the ſixth of October, accompanied by the duke of Clarence and other noblemen, when they once more led Henry from his priſon to his palace.

Edward's unfortunate queen, ſeeing this reverſe of fortune, though big with child, took refuge in Weſtminſter abbey, to which ſhe went privately by water from the Tower, and where, on the fourth of November, ſhe was delivered of an heir to the crown of England, afterwards Edward V. She thus ſaved herſelf from violence and inſult, for the whole city of London appeared now as extravagantly zealous for Henry as ever they had been for Edward.

Clarence and Warwick now aſſumed the government in Henry's name, and diſpoſed of all poſts: the judges, ſheriffs, and coroners were changed all over the kingdom: Langſtrother, prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, was made treaſurer; the archbiſhop of York, Warwick's brother, chancellor; the earl of Warwick himſelf, lord high-admiral of England; and the duke of Clarence, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. On this occaſion no perſon was put to death but John Tiptoft, earl of Worceſter, who ſeems to have fallen a ſacrifice to the public hatred. He was a corrupt and avaricious miniſter, and ſuch a monſter of cruelty that he was commonly ſtigmatized by the name of John the Butcher. Being taken concealed in a tree in the foreſt of Wavelring, in Huntingdonſhire, he was conveyed to London, tried in Weſtminſter Hall, found guilty of high-treaſon, condemned, and executed upon Tower Hill.

Writs were now iſſued for ſummoning the great aſſembly of the nation, which met on the twenty-ſixth of November; and as parliaments in ſuch a juncture are always compoſed of perſons obſequious to the will of the ruling party, this proceeded in all points agreeable to Warwick's directions. Edward was declared a traitor to his country, and an uſurper of the throne; the paternal eſtate of York was forfeited; and the crown of England, in default of male heirs from Henry, ſettled upon the duke of Clarence and his deſcendants, according to the treaty of Amboiſe: and even Henry's perſonal government was ſet aſide by this parliament, who declared the duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick governors of the kingdom. They next proceeded to reverſe ſeveral attainders, particularly thoſe of the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, and of John de Vere, earl of Oxford; and the duke of Clarence, to keep him firm in his preſent party, had a gift of the York eſtate: the marquis of Montagu was reſtored to his favourite poſt of warden of the Eaſt Marches of Scotland. A long truce was concluded with France, and all imaginable precautions were taken to guard againſt any invaſion. But it is now time to ſee what became of the fugitive Edward.

He had, on his arrival at Alkmar, a ſea-port town on the coaſt of Holland, been hoſpitably received by de Bruges, lord of Gruythuſe, governor of Holland under the duke of Burgundy, who provided the diſtreſſed king and his attendants whatever was ſuitable to their quality: and, conducting them to the Hague, he ſent to notify their arrival to his maſter, the duke of Burgundy, who was not a little perplexed when he heard of this event, as apprehending he might embroil himſelf with the new government in England, by giving this luckleſs exile an aſylum; and he had reaſons to dread the conſequences of a rupture with that court in the preſent juncture, being already attacked by Lewis XI. who had declared war againſt him, and taken poſſeſſion of St. Quintin and Amiens; but the obligations of alliance, the ties of blood, and above all their connections by being brethren of the ſame orders, fixed him to give Edward leave to come to his court of St. Paul.

Willing, however, to be aſſured in the part he had to act, he diſpatched his ſecretary, Philip de Commines (the hiſtorian) to Calais, to ſee what Vauclere would do in this ſudden change of affairs, and to take meaſures for preventing a rupture with England. Philip found the governor, the garriſon, and all the inhabitants of Calais dreſſed in Warwick's livery and wearing his badges, which they had aſſumed on the firſt news of his ſucceſs, and was aſſured the earl was ſending over four thouſand men to begin hoſtilities in the duke of Burgundy's dominions, who, as the protector of Edward, had been adjudged the enemy of England. Commines, though ſtartled at this intimation, put the beſt face upon the matter, and inſiſted that his maſter's treaty being made with the kingdom as well as the king of England, it was ſtill obligatory; and that the duke of Burgundy conceived himſelf bound to maintain it, the change of a king's name from Edward to Henry making no alteration. Theſe arguments, however would have had little weight had they not been ſupported by the (ſtaple) merchants of London and Calais, who were then perſons of great authority and influence upon the affairs of the nation, and who were afraid of loſing their commerce by a war. At their inſtances, therefore, the earl of Warwick put a ſtop to all hoſtilities, and it was agreed that the treaty with Burgundy ſhould continue in force*; and that duke even went ſo far in his complaiſance for the new government of England, as to order all his ſubjects to give Edward no aſſiſtance, though at the ſame time, with a double-dealing too common among princes, who think themſelves ſuperior to all the vulgar conſiderations which bind inferior perſons, he gave him underhand fifty thouſand florins, with four large ſhips, which were equipped in the Iſle of Walkeren, in Zealand, where there was a free port, and ſecretly hired fourteen Eaſterling ſhips for his ſervice. When all theſe ſhips were ready, Edward ſuddenly diſappearing, the duke immediately ordered a freſh proclamation to be iſſued, that none of his ſubjects ſhould preſume to aſſiſt him, directly or indirectly, upon pain of death.

Warwick, however, was too diſcerning and active a politician to be the dupe of this diſſimulation: he applied himſelf to every meaſure that he thought moſt likely to diſappoint the attempt of his enemy; the ſea-ports were ſtrictly guarded, and it appears in the Collection of Public Acts, that in the month of January, 1471, the duke of Clarence was commiſſioned to raiſe an army to oppoſe the deſigns of Edward, in caſe he ſhould return into the kingdom; and, on the tenth of February, the prior of St. John of Jeruſalem received a commiſſion to paſs over to the continent, and bring back to England queen Margaret, and her ſon the prince of Wales.

Mean while Edward, who had got every thing ready for his expedition, put to ſea from the port of Fluſhing, in Zealand, with the lords Haſtings and Say, and about two thouſand men, partly Engliſh and partly Flemings. On the twelfth of March he came before Cromer, in Norfolk, where he ſent on ſhore ſir Robert Chamberlain, ſir Gilbert Debenham, and others, to diſcover how the people ſtood affected. Theſe truſty meſſengers ſoon found, that, by the vigilance of John de Vere, earl of Oxford, and the great preparations he had made, it was unſafe to land in thoſe parts; wherefore it was reſolved to ſtand to the northward, and a ſtorm ariſing in the night, they be at about at ſea till the fourteenth, when they were obliged to run with their ſhips into Ravenſpur, in Yorkſhire, where Henry IV. had formerly landed, when he came to wreſt the crown from Richard II. and whoſe policy Edward copied on this occaſion; for finding, to his great aſtoniſhment and mortification, that, inſtead of being received with open arms, there was a general deſpondency and coldneſs in the people to his cauſe, he reſolved upon a total alteration of his meaſures, and publicly gave out that he came not to reclaim the crown, but his paternal eſtates, which, he ſaid, had been, againſt all law and right, given away, through the earl of Warwick's intereſt, by the late parliament.

It is incredible, ſays one of our old Engliſh hiſtorians †, what effect this politic diſſimulation had upon the people: compaſſion now ſupplying the place of affection, numbers flocked to join him, deceived by his humble pretenſions; and even the nobility ſhewed themſelves willing to have him for a fellow-ſubject, though not for a king. On the ſixteenth of March, the ſecond day after his landing, he marched directly for York, in the neighbourhood of which he arrived on the nineteenth, and found the inhabitants univerſally diſpoſed to aſſiſt him as duke of York, in recovering his paternal eſtates, though not as king of England. To quiet their minds in this reſpect, he heſitated not to take a ſolemn oath in the cathedral, never to renew his pretenſions to the crown; to uſe the city in a gentle and courteous manner; and laſtly, to be a true and faithful ſubject to his lawful king, Henry: an oath which he ſoon ſhewed he had no intention to keep; however, the better to ſupport his perjury, he went ſo far as to put on the oſtrich-feather, the badge of Henry's ſon.

During his ſhort ſtay at York (where he borrowed ſome money of the citizens, and in return bridled them with a garriſon) his army was prodigiouſly encreaſed; he would not however, have ventured to march towards London, had he not received advice from his brother Clarence, whoſe eyes were now opened to his true intereſt, and who privately applied for a reconciliation with his brother, that he might ſafely approach, and that he would join him with all his troops the firſt convenient opportunity. He therefore began his march for the capital; but, inſtead of going through Pontefract, where the marquis of Montagu lay encamped with a ſtrong body of troops, he took a compaſs of about four miles, and came to Nottingham, a county well-affected to his perſon and family, and was there joined by ſir William Stanley with four hundred men, by the lord Haſtings, by ſir William Parr, ſir Thomas Burgh, ſir William Norris, ſir James Harrington, and other gentlemen. This encouraged him to lay aſide the humble guiſe he had hitherto worn, and to make an open claim of the crown, and his numbers ſtill increaſed as he approached nearer the centre of the kingdom.

In the mean time Warwick, having aſſembled a body of forces, proceeded to Leiceſter, in order to join his brother, the marquis of Montagu; and hearing that Edward had taken the road to Coventry, he directed his march thither, with a view to give him battle: but juſt as the two armies came in ſight of each other, the earl received a letter from the duke of Clarence, giving him to underſtand that he was on the march to join him, and deſiring he would not hazard a battle with Edward until he ſhould arrive with his forces. Warwick, who never ſuſpected any private correſpondence between Clarence and Edward, gave into the ſnare and ſuffered the latter to paſs him in his way to London, thinking that he ſhould by that means have him between two fires, that of his own army and that of Clarence, which was approaching. But while he was indulging himſelf in this expectation, and that Edward would ſoon be in his power, he heard of his reconciliation at Banbury with the duke of Clarence, and that this prince had joined him with his whole army.

This defection, which would have diſcouraged any other man, only animated the earl of Warwick to new efforts. The duke of Clarence, imagining it would be ſome kind of excuſe for the treacherous part he had acted, if he could mediate between his brother and father-in-law, accordingly ſent the latter a meſſage, with the offer and aſſurance in Edward's name of any terms he ſhould chuſe to demand; but Warwick, rightly judging that ſuch a mediator, who had ſo openly betrayed him, was not to be truſted, anſwered with great indignation, "That he had rather be conſiſtent with himſelf, than to follow the example of a perfidious duke; and that he was determined not to put up his ſword till he had either gained his point, or loſt his life."

Preſently after the junction of the two brothers, it was debated, whether they ſhould attack the earl of Warwick in his entrenchments, or march directly for London, and Edward aſſume the royal authority, which would give him infinite advantage over his adverſaries. The latter counſel was very prudently embraced, and the king ſet forward on his march to London, leaving Warwick behind him; though, it muſt be confeſſed, that Edward ran great riſques of being ruined in caſe the Londoners had kept their gates ſhut againſt him; but that unſtable people, ever leaning to the ſide of prejudice or intereſt, hearing of the reconciliation of the two brothers, and that Edward was in full march for his capital, gave the earl of Warwick over for loſt; and thinking they had nothing more to hope from the Lancaſtrian party, and every thing to dread from the reſentment of an incenſed and victorious ſovereign, without waiting for a confirmation of Warwick's defeat, which they took for granted, on the ninth of April the lord-mayor and his aldermen demanded and received the cuſtody of the Tower of London for king Edward's uſe; and on Thurſday the eleventh of April, Edward once more triumphantly entered his capital, while Henry, who had not found means to eſcape, nor perhaps ſo much as thought of it, was again conducted to his confinement in the Tower, from whence he had been taken only ſeven months before, to remount the throne.

Edward's firſt care, after having ſecured the perſon of his rival, was to viſit his queen, who ſtill remained ſhut up in the ſanctuary, from whence he now took her, and returned the ſame night to London, whoſe citizens ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of loyalty and affection. He had, however, but ſhort time for reſpite, for the next day (the twelfth), being Good Friday, he held a great council upon the news that the earl of Warwick, having left Coventry, had advanced by Northampton to St. Alban's. Upon this it was determined that the king ſhould immediately put himſelf at the head of his army, which was quartered about London, and march againſt this formidable adverſary.

The earl of Warwick, unfortunate in his beſt-laid ſchemes, now took a ſtep which completed his ruin: he had not, without good ſhew of reaſon, depended upon the Londoners keeping Edward out of their city for at leaſt two or three days: with this view he had marched from Coventry with a fine train of artillery, purpoſing to ſhut Edward up between his own army and the walls of London; but when he came to St. Alban's, which was on the thirteenth of April, he learned, to his infinite ſurprize and mortification, that the variable Londoners had admitted the king into their city, and that he was actually within a few miles of him, with an army much ſuperior to his own. Edward pitched his camp to the north of Barnet, very near the earl's army, which lay upon a moor called Gladeſmere Heath, between Barnet and St. Alban's.

Warwick now repented his having left Coventry; Margaret of Anjou was expected every hour to land, with a large reinforcement of troops from France; and, in any other ſituation, the earl would in all probability have declined a battle: but he was ſeveral days march from a place of ſafety, and too far advanced to make a retreat; the attempt, in the face of a ſuperior enemy, flushed with ſucceſs, was certain ruin; beſides, his intrepid heart being a ſtranger to fear, he reſolved to venture an engagement,

Early

Early next morning, which was Eaſter-day, the fourteenth of April, both armies drew out in order of battle †. Edward's van-guard was commanded by the duke of Gloceſter; his main battle by himſelf, having with him the unfortunate king Henry and the duke of Clarence, who that day ſerved as a volunteer; and the rear was led by the lord Haſtings. In Warwick's army the right wing was commanded by the marquis of Montagu and John de Vere, earl of Oxford; the left by the earl of Warwick himſelf, and John Holland, duke of Exeter; and a body of archers, which was poſted in the centre, by Edmund Beaufort, duke of Somerſet.

The battle began by four in the morning, and laſted till noon; and never was field diſputed with more bloody obſtinacy. The troops of Warwick, though inferior to thoſe of Edward in number, fought with deſperate reſolution, determined, after the example of their general, to conquer or die on the ſpot; and ſuch was the impetuoſity of their charge, that the earl of Oxford's diviſion broke the main body of Edward's army, but the victorious corps purſuing the fugitives with too ſanguine an eagerneſs, Warwick's main body was by that means left defenceleſs: Edward upon this brought up a ſtrong corps de reſerve, with which he attacked this weak part of Warwick's diviſion; but the earl of Oxford, recollecting his miſtake in following the Yorkiſts to ſuch a diſtance, wheeled about in order to recover his former ſtation; and that movement occaſioned the loſs of the battle: for his diviſion, in which the men wore ſtars for their badges *, returning from the purſuit, and paſſing by the duke of Exeter's wing, the latter, miſtaking their ſtars for ſuns, the badge which Edward gave (occaſioned, as ſome ſay, by a miſt that fell during the fight), furiouſly charged theſe ſquadrons as they were returning to their poſt, and put them to rout before the miſtake could be diſcovered. This gave an opportunity for Edward's routed wing to rally, and now the battle was no longer equal; the late unfortunate accident had begot a ſuſpicion of treachery in Warwick's ranks, and ſeeing the earl of Oxford's men fly, they imagined they had been charged in rear, and of conſequence that they themſelves were ſurrounded, they were inſtantly ſeized with terror and conſternation; the panic ſpread from rank to rank, and univerſal diſorder and confuſion enſued. Edward, improving this opportunity, made a freſh charge, more dreadful than ever, and Warwick in vain exerted his utmoſt efforts to rally and encourage his diſpirited forces; they reeled, they drooped, they ſhrunk from the charge, though they did not fly; at length, after having performed every thing that could be expected from the moſt conſummate general and the moſt undaunted hero in vain, the noble Warwick, diſdaining life when victory was gone, ruſhed into the middle of Edward's ranks, where he quickly fell, covered with wounds: his brother, the marquis of Montagu, deſirous to reſcue him, periſhed in the attempt a few moments after him. Their deaths completed the defeat of their army, in which about three thouſand of the earl's men fell, and about two thouſand of the king's, on whoſe ſide were ſlain the lord Cromwell, the lord Say, ſir Humphrey Bourchier, and the lord Mountjoy's eldeſt ſon. It is ſaid, Edward, who in all his other battles was accuſtomed to order that the common ſoldiers ſhould be ſpared, and the officers put to the ſword, had ordered now that no quarter ſhould be given. The earl of Oxford and the duke of Somerſet fled into Wales, to the earl of Pembroke, who was levying troops for the earl of Warwick; the duke of Exeter was wounded, ſtripped, and left for dead in the field, where he lay till the evening, when, coming to himſelf, he made a ſhift to crawl to the houſe of one Rutland, where his wounds were cured; but he was afterwards ſeized, and committed to the Tower.

This battle was no ſooner over than Edward poſted to London, and entering into St. Paul's at evening ſervice, with his royal captive, he there offered his own and his enemies ſtandards; and, to prevent any doubt of the death of the earl of Warwick and his brother, he cauſed their naked bodies to be expoſed to public view for three days ſucceſſively, in the cathedral of St. Paul, after which they were carried to Biſham, in Berkſhire, to be interred in the priory founded by their anceſtors of the houſe of Montacute.

Edward imagined, that by the death of the earl of Warwick he had eſtabliſhed his throne on a ſolid foundation; but he ſoon received freſh proofs that the war was far from being ended with this battle: for, on Tueſday in Eaſter-week, queen Margaret, the brand of the war, and no leſs terrible to Edward than Warwick, had landed at Weymouth, in Dorſetſhire, attended by her ſon the prince of Wales, the counteſs of Warwick, the prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, the lord Wenlock, many other perſons of diſtinction, and a body of French troops, in ſeveral ſhips. She had ſcarce time to repoſe herſelf after the fatigue of a very tempeſtuous paſſage, when ſhe received the fatal tidings of Warwick's defeat and death, and of her huſband being again a captive in the hands of his rival. Diſaſters like theſe were more than ſufficient to ſtrike the boldeſt with diſmay: Margaret's former courage and magnanimity gave way to the ſhock; ſhe was overwhelmed with grief and deſpair, and knowing not what other courſe to take, ſhe retired to the abbey of Beaulieu, in Hampſhire, where ſhe regiſtered herſelf, her ſon, and her followers as perſons claiming ſanctuary. But her drooping ſpirits were ſoon cheared, and her deſpair partly baniſhed by the appearance of the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Devonſhire, the viſcount Beaumont, ſir Thomas Fulford, ſir John Forteſcue, ſir Thomas Seymour, and many other gentlemen, who, on the firſt news of her landing, immediately repaired to her with their vaſſals and dependents, who all offered to ſtand by her with their lives and fortunes.

Encouraged with this ſhew of affection, and the aſſurances that numbers were ready to join her as ſoon as ſhe ſhould take the field, ſhe left her ſanctuary, and, putting herſelf and ſon at the head of the few troops ſhe had with her, began her march, paſſing through the counties of Devon and Somerſet, where her troops were continually increaſed by the coming in of the inhabitants, until they amounted to a very conſiderable army. At length ſhe reached Tewkeſbury, in Gloceſterſhire, on the twenty-ninth of April, having that day performed an incredible march of thirty-ſix miles, through very bad roads: here Margaret propoſed to reſt her wearied troops for a few days, and then proceed towards Wales, to join the earl of Pembroke, who had gotten together a conſiderable body of archers from the counties of Cheſter and Lancaſter, famous for breeding that kind of ſoldiers, and was on the march to meet her.

In the mean time Edward, who, on the firſt notice of the queen's landing, had proſcribed her and all her adherents by proclamation, immediately ſet out at the head of his army, in order to attack her before ſhe could join the earl of Pembroke; but as he had with him a great train of artillery, it was impoſſible for him to march with ſo much expedition as the Lancaſtrians; he however made greater diſpatch than could be expected, and, after a very painful and fatiguing march, he, on the third of May, encamped within three miles of the enemy.

The queen and her generals hereupon held a council of war, to deliberate what meaſures were the moſt proper to be taken. Their firſt intention was to have paſſed the Severn about Gloceſter; but that city having refuſed to open its gates, ſhe could not croſs the river from her preſent ſituation, without expoſing her rear to certain ruin; it was therefore determined that the queen's forces ſhould entrench themſelves in a park adjoining to the town of Tewkeſbury, where they were flanked on both ſides with hollow ways, ditches, hedges, and almoſt impaſſable grounds, with the town and abbey behind, and a ſtrong entrenchment was to be thrown up in their front; and in this poſition, which, if fully effected, would have been impregnable, they were to wait the coming up of the earl of Pembroke with his forces.

But the execution of this ſcheme was prevented by the vigilance, courage, and activity of Edward, who determined to attack them in their entrenchments before they could farther fortify them. With this view, he, the next day, May 4, drew forth his army in two lines, one conducted by his brother, the duke of Gloceſter, while himſelf, with his other brother, Clarence, aſſiſted by the lord Haſtings, commanded the ſecond. On the ſide of the Lancaſtrians, the duke of Somerſet, with his brother, lord John Beaufort, commanded the firſt line; the lord Wenlock, under the prince of Wales, who was conſidered as the commander in chief, the ſecond; and Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, the third.

The attack was begun by the duke of Gloceſter with great fury; but Somerſet's men, who guarded the front of the entrenchments, ſtood their ground with great bravery, and it is more than probable that Edward would have been baffled in his attempt this day, had not one of thoſe accidents ſo frequent in engagements turned the ſcale of victory: it ſeems the duke of Gloceſter before the battle, had received inſtructions from Edward to uſe all poſſible means to draw the duke of Somerſet's diviſion out of the trenches; Gloceſter purſued theſe inſtructions with equal punctuality and ſucceſs. Finding himſelf ſo warmly received by the van of the Lancaſtrian forces, he began a ſham retreat, in ſuch ſeeming hurry and confuſion, that the duke of Somerſet, naturally of an impetuous diſpoſition, imagining they fled, ordered the ſecond and third lines to ſupport him, and began his march in purſuit of the runaways, through the defiles which led out of the trenches, and a deſperate fight enſued; for the Yorkiſts facing ſuddenly about, recovered their former ranks, and fell upon the Lancaſtrians with the utmoſt fury; at the ſame time a detachment of two hundred horſe, ſent off by Edward, attacked Somerſet's diviſion in flank, and diſordered him ſo much, that he was obliged to fall back through the defiles to his former ſtation; but in doing this he was ſo hotly purſued, that moſt of his line were cut in pieces. The duke of Somerſet, amazed at his not being ſupported by the lord Wenlock, found that nobleman coolly ſtanding at the head of his diviſion, without having advanced a ſingle ſtep to ſuſtain the firſt line: the fiery duke was ſo enraged at this treachery as he thought it, that, riding up, he clove the lord Wenlock through the brains with his battle-ax.

By this time the duke of Gloceſter had followed the enemy ſo cloſe that he was actually within their entrenchments, and was ſoon followed by his royal brother, with the ſecond line. Every thing in the queen's camp was now in confuſion; the firſt diviſion of her army was already defeated with great ſlaughter, and the ſecond and third lines betook themſelves to flight after a very faint reſiſtance. In ſhort, Edward gained the moſt complete victory perhaps that any hiſtory recounts; for, though not above three thouſand of the Lancaſtrians fell in the fight, yet ſcarce a man of note of the queen's party eſcaped death or captivity. Among the ſlain were the earl of Devonſhire, the lord John Beaufort, the duke of Somerſet's brother, ſir John Delves, ſir Edward Hamden, ſir Robert Whittingham, and ſir John Luckner. The duke of Somerſet, the great-prior of St. John, and about twenty other gentlemen, took refuge in the abbey church, as a place of ſanctuary; but they ſoon found themſelves deceived, for they were taken thence the next day, and executed. Margaret of Anjou herſelf was diſcovered, with her ſon, in another religious houſe, to which they had fled for ſhelter, and were brought to Edward, who ordered the queen to cloſe cuſtody in the Tower, where ſhe continued four years, till the king of France thought proper to ranſom her for the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns. But a more pitiable fate awaited the young prince; for, being brought into Edward's preſence, and that king aſking him "how he durſt preſume to invade his kingdom, with banners diſplayed?" the noble youth replied with an unſeaſonable vivacity, "that he came to recover his father's crown, and his own natural inheritance:" a reply which ſo ſtung Edward, that he ſtruck the prince on the face with his gauntlet; this ſerved as a ſignal to the king's remorſeleſs friends, Haſtings and the lord Thomas Grey (afterwards marquis of Dorſet), who forthwith dragged the gallant youth out of the apartment, and plunged their daggers in his breaſt.

The battle of Tewkeſbury, fought eighteen days after that of Barnet, was the twelfth ſince the beginning of the quarrel between the two houſes of York and Lancaſter; but it was not the laſt, though followed by no other during this reign: and though the event of this field ſeemed to have extinguiſhed the hopes of the houſe of Lancaſter, yet there was ſtill a ſmall army in the field, under the command of the earl of Pembroke; but this diſperſed of its own accord, on hearing of Edward's late victory, and the earl, leaving the defence of Pembroke to ſir John Scudamore, fled into Brittany, taking with him his nephew Henry, the young earl of Richmond. This young nobleman, ſo illuſtrious afterwards as king Henry VII. was eldeſt ſon to Edmund, earl of Richmond, who was himſelf the eldeſt ſon of Owen Tudor and queen Catherine, his father having been married to Margaret, ſole daughter of John Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, grand-ſon to John of Ghent; ſo that, after the extinction of Henry's race, he had very high pretenſions to be the head of the houſe of Lancaſter. He and his uncle were received with great affection and tenderneſs by Francis II. duke of Brittany, at whoſe court we ſhall now leave them, to trace the remaining events of this year.

Whilſt Edward was employed in the Weſt, a commotion happened in the interior part of the kingdom, which threatened him with the loſs of his capital, and even of his crown. Thomas Neville, a natural ſon of the late William, lord Fauconbridge, earl of Kent, had been, by the late earl of Warwick, appointed vice-admiral of the Channel, but loſt his employment after the death of that nobleman; upon which he withdrew, with the ſhips under his command, and for ſome time he and his crews led a life of piracy, aſſiſted by a party of three hundred men from the garriſon of Calais; and, tempted by the opportunity which the king's abſence afforded, he ventured to make a deſcent with his forces at Sandwich, and was admitted into Canterbury by Nicholas Faunte, the mayor. The country flocking in to him, he began his march for London, at the head of ſeventeen thouſand men, and on the fourteenth of May, entered the ſuburbs of Southwark, from whence he propoſed to gain admittance into the city, over London bridge; but the news of the king's victory arriving about the ſame time, the citizens were ſo encouraged thereby, that they reſolutely oppoſed his entrance; and though he made a deſperate attempt to carry the bridge by ſtorm, he was forced to deſiſt, with ſome loſs, notwithſtanding that he ſent part of his army croſs the river to aſſault the the city in another quarter; at the ſame time one part of his detachment actually made their way into the city through Aldgate, but were driven out again, by the valour of alderman Robert Baſſet and the citizens.

The baſtard of Fauconbridge (for by that name this adventurer was known) finding himſelf thus baffled, and that his men, defeated of their hopes of plunder, began to deſert him, embarked on board his ſhips, which lay at Blackwall, in the river Thames, and ſailed round to Sandwich, whither king Edward, who, upon the advice of this diſturbance, had returned in great haſte, with a party of three thouſand men, to London, purſued him, and, reducing the town, took the baſtard priſoner, whom he cauſed to be immediately executed: and thus an end was put to the laſt enterprize of the Lancaſtrian party for recovering the crown of England.

All the legitimate male iſſue of that houſe now became extinct in the perſon of the hapleſs Henry VI. who, on the twentieth of June this year, died ſuddenly in his priſon of the Tower. Though he was wholly given up to devotion, and ſeemed utterly inſenſible to the cares of ambition, yet he could not but ſenſibly feel the heavy afflictions that now fell upon him at once, particularly the inhuman butchery of his only ſon, and the captivity of his queen; his feeble frame ſunk beneath the weight of ſo many calamities, and he died overwhelmed with grief, which probably brought on an apoplexy, for he was found dead in his bed between eleven and twelve at night. It has been induſtriouſly handed down by a number of hiſtorians, particularly thoſe of the Lancaſtrian faction, that the duke of Gloceſter ſlew him with his own hand; but that prince's memory has been loaded with this crime without any ſufficient authority; and if an act of that kind was really perpetrated, it ſeems much more reaſonable to impute it to the bloody jealouſy of Edward, who had now little about him of a man beſides his form and his follies, and who, from the late inſurrection under the baſtard of Fauconbridge, might ſuppoſe that he could never be ſafe on the throne while Henry was alive. But the truth is, no authority can be found to prove that Henry died a violent death; on the contrary, it is on all hands allowed that his corpſe was conveyed to St. Paul's church, and from thence to Black-friars, at both which places it lay for ſome time expoſed to public view; a circumſtance which ill agrees with a private murder. His remains were afterwards depoſited in the abbey of Chertſey, from whence they were removed by Richard III. and interred in a more pompous manner at Windſor.

Edward, now ſeeing himſelf in firm poſſeſſion of the crown of England, which had coſt him ſo much perjury, diſſimulation, and bloodſhed to acquire, thought proper to create his ſon Edward prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, which he did on the twenty-ſixth of June this year; and, though he had ſeen ſufficiently, by his own practice and that of others, how weak an influence oaths have upon the actions of mankind, when forced upon them, yet he thought it no unneceſſary precaution to aſſemble, on the third day of July, ten biſhops, five dukes, ſix earls, fourteen barons, ſir William Courtney, and ten other of the moſt conſiderable among the knights, in the Parliament-chamber at Weſtminſter, where they ſwore to maintain and ſupport the ſucceſſion of the crown in his family, and took the oath of eventual allegiance to his ſon Edward, prince of Wales.

Shortly after, Edward granted a pardon to William of Wanefleet, biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſeven other prelates, who had adhered to the houſe of Lancaſter. From the beginning of his reign to the end he always carried it fair with the clergy; however, George Neville, archbiſhop of York, was ſent by him into exile, and impriſoned in the caſtle of Guiſnes, near Calais, for ſeveral years, during which time Edward enjoyed the revenues of his ſee, after having ſeized all his other effects. The dignity of great-chamberlain of England, vacant by the death of Warwick, was conferred on the duke of Gloceſter, who afterwards reſigned it to his brother Clarence, on being appointed conſtable. The government of Calais was beſtowed upon Anthony Woodville, earl Rivers, the queen's brother; but the garriſon refuſed to admit any perſon in that quality except the lord Haſtings, who was therefore appointed governor, and ſir John Howard was nominated his deputy.

The

The remaining part of the year was employed in negociations with different potentates, of which we ſhall proceed to give a curſory account. The firſt was with James III. king of Scotland. During the troubles in England, the truce between the Engliſh and Scots had been frequently violated, contrary to the intention of the two kings: after Edward's reſtoration, James ſent ambaſſadors to propoſe a congreſs, and it was agreed that one ſhould be held at Alnwick, in Northumberland, on the twenty-fourth of September, for a mutual reparation of the outrages committed by the two nations upon one another. The two kings were equally deſirous to preſerve the truce, and even to conclude a final peace; this negociation, however, was not ended till the year 1473. It appears in the Collection of Public Acts, that Edward empowered his ambaſſadors to propoſe a marriage between the king of Scotland and one of his daughters: but more of this in the ſequel.

On the thirtieth of September he renewed a treaty of commerce and truce for thirty years with Francis II. duke of Brittany. This confirmation was neceſſary, as the truce made during the earl of Warwick's adminiſtration had been often violated.

Lewis XI. was very ſenſible Edward had no reaſon to be pleaſed with him: but, however, he made him propoſals of a truce, as that made with Henry VI. was of no force now Edward was reſtored. In the preſent ſituation of the Engliſh affairs, it was by no means proper for Edward to renew the war with France: his kingdom was too much exhauſted to think ſo early of ſuch an undertaking; therefore, without much entreaty, he agreed to continue the truce from the firſt of September this year, to the firſt of May following.

Edward, however, did not place ſo much dependence on theſe truces as to neglect the neceſſary means either for defending his realm, or attacking his enemies; and a parliament meeting on Tueſday the ſixth of October, at Weſtminſter, he obtained from the commons a ſupply of fourteen thouſand archers; and from the lords ſpiritual and temporal, a grant of the tenth of their rents and the profit of their eſtates. The thirtieth of November the houſe was adjourned to February following.

The years 1472 and 1473 were neither of them diſtinguiſhed by ſo many great and important events as the laſt; they were wholly ſpent in negociations tending to ſettle the tranquility of the king and kingdom, by truces or alliances with foreign princes. Edward was particularly careful to prevent every poſſible cauſe of diſcontent with the duke of Burgundy's ſubjects; for this purpoſe he appointed commiſſioners for ſettling all commercial differences, and to conclude a final peace with the Hanſe towns *. A congreſs was accordingly held at Utrecht; but it was not till the year 1474 that all difficulties were adjuſted. Edward alſo, by his letters patent, confirmed the ancient alliance between Richard II. and John, king of Portugal, for them and their ſucceſſors.

But while Edward was thus providing for his ſecurity abroad, his peace at home was interrupted by the arrival of John de Vere, earl of Oxford, in England. Of all the noblemen whom his cruelty had made his enemies, none were more determined than Oxford: this earl, who was a zealous favourer of the houſe of Lancaſter, had retired into France after the battle of Tewkeſbury; but as he met with a cold reception from Lewis XI. who did not chuſe to quarrel with Edward, he reſolved to return to his native country, and maintain his ground to the laſt drop of his blood. With this view he ſhut himſelf up, with only ſeventy followers, within St. Michael's Mount, in Cornwall. Edward, ever fearful that the leaſt ſpark of reſiſtance left unextinguiſhed, might rekindle the flame which had threatened the deſtruction of his houſe, loſt not an inſtant in providing againſt it: he ordered Forteſcue, one of his favourites, to march immediately with ſome troops into the Weſt, and beſiege the earl in his ſtrong hold. Though Vere had no chance of either eſcaping or of holding the place out for any time, he boldly ſtood a ſiege; but being at length obliged to ſurrender, through a ſcarcity of proviſions, he was ſent priſoner, with two of his brothers, the lord Beaumont, and ſir Thomas Clifford, to London, where the regard which all ranks of people had for the earl, prevented Edward's accuſtomed cruelty from taking place. The earl and his two brothers had their lives ſpared; but the former had his eſtate confiſcated, without any proviſion being left for himſelf or counteſs, even the common neceſſaries of life; and the earl himſelf was ſent priſoner to the caſtle of Guiſnes, where he remained as long as Edward lived.

But John Holland, duke of Exeter, who had been in confinement ever ſince the battle of Barnet, had entreated his wife, who was Edward's ſiſter, to employ her good offices for his releaſe; but that princeſs preferring her affection for her brother to that for her huſband, abandoned the latter in his diſtreſs, and received from Edward a ſeparate allowance. Upon this the duke found means to get out of his priſon, and no one knew what was become of him, till he was found dead, ſome months after, on the ſea-ſhore in the county of Kent.

This nobleman was the laſt branch of the houſe of Lancaſter that could give Edward any diſturbance, except the earl of Richmond, who reſided at the court of Brittany, with his uncle Jaſper, earl of Pembroke; and although theſe were in no condition to interrupt the quiet of his reign, he eagerly deſired to have the young earl in his power: he accordingly ſent over an embaſſy to the duke of Brittany, preſſing him to deliver up theſe noblemen; but that duke pleading the protection he had granted, and the ties of blood, excuſed himſelf from complying with this requeſt; though, at the ſame time, he gave Edward the moſt ſolemn aſſurances, that he would keep them in ſuch a manner that they ſhould never diſturb his government.

The parliament, which had, by different prorogations, ſat almoſt two years, paſſed an act, on the

* Theſe are certain towns in Germany, confederate for the benefit of trade. They are ſo called from the word Hanſe, ſignifying Alliance. Bremen, in Lower Saxony, is ſaid to have been founder of this confederacy, about the year 1164. How many towns were aſſociated at firſt is not known: but the deſign ſo viſibly proſpered, that moſt of the chief trading places in Europe, to the number of ſeventy-two, entered into the confederacy. In the flouriſhing times of their alliance, theſe Hanſe towns had four general ſtaples viz. London, Bruges in Flanders, Bergen in Normandy, and Novogrod in Ruſſia. At preſent the Hanſe Towns are in a manner reduced to theſe ſix, Lubeck, Hamburgh, Bremen, Roſtock, Dantzick, and Cologne.

ſixth of October, 1473, for the reſumption of all grants of lands and offices, in order to improve the royal revenues. The king of Portugal this year demanded the reſtitution of ſome veſſels, which had been taken by the Engliſh from his ſubjects; but as it appeared, in the courſe of the inquiry, that they had been pillaged by the baſtard of Fauconbridge, during his rebellion, the king of Portugal deſiſted from his demand. In this parliament the earl of Northumberland was reſtored to the honours and eſtates of his family; and Edward, willing to teſtify his gratitude to Lewis de Burges, lord of Gruytheuſe, by whom he had been ſo hoſpitably entertained in Holland, created him a peer of England, by the title of earl of Wincheſter; and afterwards, by letters patent, allowed him to bear the arms of England in his eſcutcheon. We now come to the year 1474, which will afford us a greater plenty of matter.

Notwithſtanding the cold reception which the duke of Burgundy had given Edward during his exile, the political intereſts of the two nations were ſo cloſely connected, that the Engliſh monarch was ſtill obliged to maintain a friendly correſpondence with that duke, and this correſpondence now became more frequent than ever; for the duke of Burgundy having continual reaſons to be diſguſted with Lewis XI. whoſe reſtleſs and turbulent diſpoſition would not ſuffer any of his neighbours to be at peace, ſaw no other way to free himſelf from the perſecutions of his enemy, than to engage the king of England to make a powerful diverſion in France; and, in order to effect this purpoſe, he ſent ambaſſadors to England in the beginning of the year 1474, furniſhed with very ample powers for concluding a treaty for undertaking the conqueſt of France jointly with the king of England. The duke of Brittany was in the ſecret of this negociation, and it was ſo privately carried on that Lewis, notwithſtanding the good intelligence he generally had, got his firſt information of it from the court of Scotland, the king of which at that time was in treaty of marriage with Edward, for his ſon James with the princeſs Cicely, Edward's youngeſt daughter. Lewis thereupon ſent one of his miniſters to Scotland, to thank James for his intelligence, and to endeavour to keep him firm to the ancient treaties between the two crowns.

It was the twenty-firſt of July this year, before matters could be adjuſted, for the great undertaking of the conqueſt of France, between Edward and the duke of Burgundy. On that day is dated the duke's convention for aſſiſtance to Edward: in the preamble of this act, the government of France is loaded with the moſt horrible imputations; Lewis is termed its uſurper, and Edward its lawful king. This convention, which is mutual, ſtipulates,

"I. That before, or about, the firſt day of July 1475, Edward ſhould be in readineſs, with an army of upwards of ten thouſand men, to land in France, for the recovery of the duchies of Normandy and Guienne in particular, and the kingdom of France in general.

"II. The duke of Burgundy engages to aſſiſt him in perſon with all his force, towards the ſaid recovery, againſt Lewis and all others.

"III. The third article propounds that Edward ſhall liſten to no propoſitions, nor ſo much as admit any meſſages, or letters, without conſent of the duke, from Lewis or any poſſeſſing the crown of France. This article is mutual.

"IV. Both powers, as ſoon as they ſhould declare war, were, throughout their dominions, to proclaim Lewis as their common enemy, and to diſtreſs him in all convenient places, ſo as to be within reach of one another's aſſiſtance.

"V. By the fifth article, both parties, and their lieutenants, are obliged to march to one another's aſſiſtance in all places of neceſſity or danger.

"VI. The ſixth article provides, that neither prince ſhall give over the war while the other is willing to continue it; and that if either is abſent from the army, his lieutenant ſhall be bound to obey the prince that is preſent; and that both ſhall agree in their winter-quarters, and in finiſhing their campaign: nay even after both parties were retired to winter-quarters, if either prince thought fit again to take the field, with all, or part of his army, the other prince, or his lieutenant, was obliged to do in like manner."

Next follows what the records call "a letter of agreement between the two contracting parties," but it is only in general terms, and Edward by it promiſes to relieve France from the hardſhips ſhe ſuffered under the government of Lewis, and to reſtore baniſhed juſtice; he likewiſe renews his former engagements with the duke of Burgundy. Then follow what they call "explanation of the articles concerning the mutual quotas of troops."

"It is agreed, that when either party make the requiſition of ſix thouſand men (which either party might do of the other), the party ſo required was obliged to pay three thouſand ſix hundred of them out of his own pocket, in caſe the other party was engaged in a war for his own defence; while the remainder was to be paid by the party requiring: but if the war was undertaken from other motives than ſelf-defence, then the requiring party was to be at the expence of all the ſix thouſand. This treaty was held to be perpetual."

The next article ſtipulates, "That the duke of Burgundy ſhould, in conſideration of the aſſiſtance he was to give Edward, have the dutchy of Barr, the earldoms of Champaign, Nevers, Retel, Eu, and Guiſe; the barony of Ducie, and the lordſhip of Tournay, the city and lordſhip of Linghen, the town and caſtle of Pequigney, all the towns with their lordſhips on each ſide of the Somme, and all the eſtates of the earl of St. Paul, not holding of tht duchies of Normandy and Guienne; all which he was to hold without any reſort, independent of Edward, or any of his ſucceſſors; as he was to do all the reſt of his dominions, which he then held of the crown of France."

We have next a more particular convention between Edward and the duke, by which the latter obliges himſelf "to furniſh to the former any number of men not under ten thouſand, nor above twenty, whenever he ſhould be required; the wages and particular proviſions for theſe men are likewiſe ſtipulated." Edward next promiſes to pay thoſe troops regularly; and in caſe he was a year in arrear, that the duke ſhould not be obliged to furniſh him the next year. He then ſtipulates, "That, notwithſtanding any convention between him and the duke, he ſhould be crowned at Rheims*."

* Rymer, vol. xi. p. 806, 807, 808, 809, &c.

These treaties being ratified and approved by the parliament, now in the fifth session, which granted the necessary supplies, the king began to issue commissions for levying troops, and in the mean time sent ambassadors to the different courts of Europe, to form new alliances, or at least to prevent the union of the several powers with his enemy; and he secured the commerce of his subjects, and his realm from invasion during his absence, by renewing the truce with Scotland, which having, ten years before, been agreed on till October 31, 1479, was now renewed for four years longer. This was farther cemented by a contract for a mariage between the princess Cecily, Edward's youngest daughter, not yet five years old, and James, eldest son and heir of James III. king of Scotland, not yet three years of age; and in case either of the parties died, his or her place was to be supplied by another of the same sex respectively. A jointure was settled; the sum of twenty thousand marks fixed for the young princess's portion, to be paid by stipulated sums at different times; but to be refunded if the marriage was not completed when the parties came to be of a fit age, or, through any accident, did not take effect: the two kings engaged mutually to assist each other in suppressing all rebellions, and to give neither countenance, aid, or protection to any rebels whatever.

On the first of February, 1475, Edward directed his letters to almost all the sheriffs and magistrates in England, for a rendezvous of his troops by the twenty sixth of May, at Portsmouth, in the county of Southampton. The army accordingly assembled to the number of thirty thousand; and, what is very extraordinary, those all of them Englishmen, a circumstance which was peculiar to this Edward, his great predecessors Edward III. and Henry V. having under them, in all their expeditions, great numbers of French and foreigners.

On the twelfth of June, the lords Audley and Duras had a commission to command three thousand auxiliaries, in the duke of Brittany's service: and on the twentieth of that month, the army being embarked, Edward, after leaving his son, the prince of Wales, not yet five years old, guardian of England, sailed over to Calais; and his troops, mindful of the great conquests which their ancestors had made in the French dominions, flattered themselves with the prospect of the same good fortune.

But all their sanguine hopes were blasted, when they saw themselves joined by the duke of Burgundy with no more than his ordinary equipages, and not a soldier attending him. That prince, transported by the violence of his temper, had carried his armies to a great distance, and employed them in wars on the frontiers of Germany and against the duke of Lorraine: when Edward justly reproved him with his remissness in executing his part of the convention between them, he excused himself by pretending that his army would soon be reassembled, and by putting into the king's hand a letter from the count St. de Pol, constable of France, promising to deliver up St. Quintin immediately to the English. Edward appeared somewhat satisfied upon reading this letter; and, in full confidence of its contents, he advanced towards Peronne, and sent off a detachment to take possession of St. Quintin. Being arrived at Peronne, he was acquainted that his detachment had not only been refused admittance into St. Quintin, but lost some men by a sally from the garrison. The duke of Burgundy in vain laboured to reinspire the English with confidence, after this instance of dissimulation; and beginning to be apprehensive about the safety of his own person, the next morning, under pretext of setting out for his army, he took his leave of Edward, without giving any orders for the subsistence or accommodation of his allies.

Edward perceiving that there was no dependence to be placed on so thoughtless and treacherous an ally, resolved to depend upon his own strength for making conquests. He had brought with him as fine an army as had ever entered France from this country, was attended by all the considerable noblemen of his kingdom, and his forces were provided with all necessaries, and qualified in every respect to force its way from one end of France to the other.

Lewis saw this, and trembled; more influenced by political considerations than the vain punctilios of honour, he thought no submissions too mean, which could deliver him from enemies who had proved so formidable to his predecessors, and who again threatened to involve the kingdom in the like calamities which it had suffered by their victorious arms. Edward, upon his landing at Calais, had sent an herald with a letter to Lewis, demanding the crown of France, and giving him defiance in case of refusal. Lewis received the letter with great moderation, and was so far from treating this bravado with that contempt and indignation which a prince of less prudence would have discovered, that he replied in a very mild and gentle manner, and even made the herald a handsome present: this so won upon the latter, that he gave Lewis a hint, that the lords Howard and Stanley, who had Edward's ear, would not be inaccessible to any application from Lewis. The French king took the hint, and it afterwards did him great service.

For hearing that Edward was now preparing to enter Artois, he took an occasion to send an herald to the English camp, and gave him directions to apply to the lords Stanley and Howard, who, he was informed, were inclined to a peace, and whose good offices he earnestly solicited towards effecting an accommodation. The two lords interested themselves warmly in this project; and Edward himself being equally dissatisfied with the duke of Burgundy, for failing in his engagements, and with the constable of St. Pol for his treachery, was the more disposed to hearken to Lewis's proposals: in fine, the matter being debated in the cabinet-council, it was resolved to agree to a treaty for free commerce with France, and a truce for seven years, on the following terms.

"That Lewis should pay seventy-five thousand crowns to indemnify Edward for the expence of the expedition, on receipt of which the king of England should immediately retire with his forces. That Lewis should likewise grant him an annuity of fifty thousand crowns for their joint lives, by two equal half-yearly payments, the first to commence at Easter next following. That the dauphin of France should espouse Elizabeth, daughter of Edward, and settle sixty thousand livres a year upon her, as a jointure. And that neither party should encourage civil wars in the other's kingdom; but that both parties should assist each other in suppressing the insurrection of their subjects."

We

We know of no manner of objection made on the part of the French king againſt theſe preliminary demands, which being accepted, an interview was agreed upon between the two kings at Pecquigny, after a ſeven years truce was propoſed and agreed upon. The lord Howard and John Cheney, eſq. were pledges from Edward for his performance.

The duke of Burgundy no ſooner heard what had paſſed between Edward and the king of France, than he poſted to the Engliſh camp, and ſeverely upbraided Edward with his breach of the alliance ſubſiſting between them: but the latter ſet his own conduct before him in ſo ſtrong a light, that the duke had little left to ſay: in a word, neither his oppoſition, nor that of the duke of Gloceſter, Edward's brother, who, enraged to ſee the fine proſpects he had formed by the conqueſt of France, now about to vaniſh, could divert Edward from his reſolution of giving Lewis the meeting. This interview was held between the two kings on the twenty-ninth of Auguſt, near Pecquigny, on a bridge built quite acroſs the Somme: in the middle of the bridge was a box, which was divided into two by a lattice, the openings of which were but juſt large enough for thruſting a man's head through them; and on each ſide the lattice was a room for twelve perſons. A ſhort compliment paſſed between the two monarchs, and the articles that had been agreed upon being produced, both kings ſwore to obſerve them: after this, the attendants being ordered to withdraw, they had a private conference, the reſult of which was, that if the duke of Burgundy and the conſtable de St. Pol ſhould refuſe to take the benefit of the treaty, the king of France was left at full liberty to treat them in what manner he pleaſed; but as to the duke of Brittany, Edward gratefully declined abandoning him; and Lewis finding this, inſiſted no longer upon it: but by another circumſtance of this agreement, Lewis gained an advantage which contributed greatly to the aggrandizing of the French monarchy; for on this occaſion he perſuaded Edward to releaſe Margaret of Anjou, for the ranſom of fifty thouſand crowns: to this Edward conſented, though not till Lewis had engaged to get a full diſcharge from Margaret of all her claims upon the crown of England for her dower. This unfortunate princeſs was releaſed the November following, and Lewis punctually paid the money. Full of gratitude to her deliverer, Margaret, the following year, ſigned a conveyance of all her right of ſucceſſion to Provence and Anjou to Lewis and his heirs, and confirmed it afterwards by her will at her death, which happened in 1482. Thus Lewis became the ſole heir of all thoſe dominions, which by this means became united to the crown of France.

This interview being ended, the two kings parted extremely well ſatisfied with each other. Lewis, however, appears to have been ſtruck with terror at the ſight of the Engliſh army: he was of that genius, that he bought peace if he could at any rate; but if forced upon a war, no prince acted with greater reſolution, and few had better fortune. Commines, who was an eye and ear-witneſs of all theſe tranſactions, tells us that Lewis dreaded nothing ſo much as Edward's taking a liking to France; and wiſhed above all things, that he would return to his own kingdom†. And he was ſo much afraid of the other's breaking his engagements, that he beſtowed conſiderable penſions upon the principal members of Edward's council*, that they might exert their endeavours in perſuading their maſter to adhere to the treaty.

If we candidly examine all the circumſtances of this treaty, we cannot give our aſſent to the repreſentations of thoſe hiſtorians, who, without foundation, have magnified the wiſdom of Lewis on this occaſion, and pretend that the Engliſh were his dupes. It is plain, that the French king did not diſpute any one article preſcribed him by Edward; and though it was afterwards diſputed between the French and Engliſh, whether the annual payment of fifty thouſand crowns was to be ſtyled a penſion or a tribute, the former being willing to conſider it in the firſt light, and the other in the latter, yet I think we may with the ſtrongeſt reaſon give the name of tribute to this annuity: this ſeems to be implied by the word "Cenſus," put in the title of acquittances and other inſtruments relating to the payment, though all words expreſſing either, ſeem to be induſtriouſly avoided in all ſuch inſtruments: again, as the court of France never granted a penſion to any foreign prince, without receiving for it an oath of fealty and an act of homage (neither whereof were required in this caſe); and as Edward in the treaty ſtyles Lewis only his couſin of France, this annuity ſeems to be a ſort of tributary compenſation for Edward's delaying his claim upon the crown of France, occaſioned by this truce: and the following circumſtance, given us by Commines, ſtrongly proves that the French court dreaded nothing ſo much as an altercation on this point.

"One of the Engliſh (ſays that hiſtorian) told me, that had the duke of Burgundy joined them with his army, perhaps the peace had not been concluded. The viſcount of Narbonne over-hearing him, replied, "Could you be ſo weak as to believe the duke of Burgundy wanted a great number of good ſoldiers? he had only put them into quarters of refreſhment; and you were in ſuch haſte to be at home again, that ſix hundred pipes of wine, and a penſion from our king ſent you back into England." The Engliſhman was in a paſſion, and anſwered with much warmth, "Do you call the money your king gave us, a penſion? It is a tribute: and, by St. George! you may prate ſo much as will bring us back again to prove it." I interrupted them (adds Commines) and turned it into a jeſt; but the Engliſhman would not underſtand it ſo. When I informed the king of it afterwards, he was highly offended with the viſcount

† The interview being ended, Lewis repaired to Amiens, attended by the lord Howard, who was left as an hoſtage for Edward's performance of the articles of the treaty; and while the king was waſhing his hands, after ſupper, this nobleman whiſpered in his ear that Edward might eaſily be perſuaded to take a journey to Paris: Lewis made no anſwer to this hint until it was repeated, and then he ſaid, that the war which he was carrying on with the duke of Burgundy would not allow him to go to Paris, and therefore he was very ſorry he could not have the honour of receiving the viſit of the Engliſh monarch. "Edward (ſaid he privately to Commines) is a very handſome and amorous prince; ſome ladies at Paris may be as fond of him as he ſhall be of them, and may invite him to return in another manner." Commines, liv. iv. chap. 10.

* The lords Haſtings and Howard, the biſhop of Lincoln, the maſter of the rolls, the marquis of Dorſet, ſir Anthony St. Leger, with ſix or eight more of Edward's chief counſellors, all received yearly ſtipends from the French court; and all but the lord Haſtings gave acquittances for the ſame. of of Narbonne." Commines could ſpeak of theſe things with certainty, ſince he was in Lewis's ſervice and confidence. At length, however, Lewis was rid of all his fears by the departure of the Engliſh, who returned to their own country extremely well pleaſed with the reliſh of the French wine, and the goodneſs of the French money.

The duke of Burgundy, at parting with Edward at his laſt interview, had ſworn that he diſdained the mediation of England ſo much, that he would not be comprehended in the truce, nor enter into any negociation with Lewis until three months after the Engliſh army had arrived in their own country; but he ſoon found reaſon to retract his declaration, and within a very few days, viz. on the thirteenth of September, he made a truce for nine years with Lewis. As to the conſtable St. Pol, who had deceived the three princes, and been the principal author of their diviſion, he ſaw himſelf forſaken in the end by all, and forced to retire into the duke of Burgundy's dominions, upon the faith of a ſafe conduct; but, notwithſtanding that ſecurity, he was delivered up by the duke to Lewis, who commanded his head to be ſtruck off; a juſt retaliation upon a perſon who had ſo ſcandalouſly juggled with both parties.

Edward being now at peace with all his neighbours, and having no inſurrection to dread at home, applied himſelf to the adminiſtration of juſtice, and filling his coffers. The diſbanding of the army, lately returned from France, had filled all the roads with robbers, and nobody could travel without danger of loſing their lives or effects: to remedy this grievance, the king, early in the ſpring of 1476, made a circuit with his judges through the kingdom, and exerted himſelf on this occaſion with ſuch vigour and impartiality, that he reſtored the public peace, that had been ſo greatly injured. The nation had ſhewn itſelf ſo diſcontented with the miſcarriage of the late expedition, from which it had entertained ſuch ſanguine expectations, that Edward was deterred from aſking any farther ſupplies from parliament, and therefore had recourſe to other methods of accumulating treaſure: he engaged in commerce, which he carried on to a great extent as a private merchant; he ſold the profits of vacant prelacies; he demanded fines for the reſtitution of temporalities; he ranſacked old records to find defective titles, and obliged the proprietors to pay large ſums for their confirmation; and he impoſed exorbitant taxes upon the clergy. By theſe methods he amaſſed large ſums, the vice of avarice growing ſtronger as his wealth increaſed and his age advanced: the time not employed in theſe cares, he chiefly paſſed in female converſation and amuſements; and his court, from the example of its head, became a ſcene of luſt and lewdneſs.

In this ceſſation of every manly employment, the reader is to expect very little buſineſs: the ancient treaties, however, with the king of Denmark were now renewed; as alſo thoſe with the Hanſe Towns, in Germany, and with the court of Caſtile. The open demonſtration of friendſhip which Edward had given towards the duke of Brittany, made him imagine that duke would readily embrace an opportunity of ſhewing his acknowlegement; he therefore ſent ambaſſadors to him, under colour of renewing their truce; but the true end of their commiſſion was to propoſe the delivering up of the earl of Richmond, pretending that Edward, deſirous of reconciling the jarring factions of York and Lancaſter, propoſed to marry young Henry to one of his own daughters. The duke of Brittany, a good prince, judging of others by himſelf, agreed to deliver up Richmond and his uncle, the earl of Pembroke: and the ambaſſadors having got them into their hands, carried them with all ſpeed to St. Malo's, there to embark; but the duke's miniſters repreſenting to him how infamous it would make him appear in the eye of the world, ſhould the two princes fall victims of Edward's jealouſy, which was moſt probable, he, upon recollection, confeſſed the juſtneſs of the remonſtrance, and forthwith diſpatched his favourite, Landois, poſt to prevent their embarkation. Landois arrived juſt time enough; the earl and his uncle were on the point of embarking, but Landois found means to draw them aſide, and gave them intimation of his errand; thereupon they inſtantly took refuge in a church, from whence Landois told the Engliſh ambaſſadors they could not be taken, and thoſe latter were forced to depart without their prey; and when they came to England, their failure brought them into diſgrace, and embittered all Edward's enjoyments. Thus, by a ſort of miracle, Henry, earl of Richmond, eſcaped the danger to which he was expoſed, Providence having preſerved him on this occaſion, in order to place him one day on the throne of England. The reſt of the year 1476 affords nothing remarkable concerning the affairs of England, except the death of the duke of Burgundy. This prince poſſeſſed the ambition as well as the courage and intrepidity of a conqueror; but being deſtitute of policy and prudence, qualities no leſs neceſſary, he was unſucceſsful in all his enterprizes, and periſhed at laſt in a battle againſt the Swiſs, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, leaving behind him an only daughter, Mary, who, as ſhe was heireſs of his extenſive dominions, was earneſtly courted by all the potentates of Europe.

The death of the duke of Burgundy afforded Lewis an opportunity of procuring this match for the dauphin, and by that means of adding to the crown of France all the provinces of the Low Countries, together with Burgundy, Artois, and Picardy; but Lewis had conceived ſuch a violent and implacable hatred againſt the houſe of Burgundy, that he determined to reduce the young ducheſs by force of arms; and entering her dominions with his troops, in the ſpring of 1477, he made himſelf maſter of the duchy of Burgundy, and of that part of Picardy which had been yielded to Philip the Good by the treaty of Arras: but the ſtates of the Netherlands were ſo incenſed at his baſe and ungenerous proceedings, that they beſtowed their ſovereign on Maximilian of Auſtria, ſon of the emperor Frederic, from whom they hoped for relief in their preſent diſtreſs. Thus was France deprived of the opportunity, which ſhe could never after regain, of enlarging her dominions by the addition of thoſe fertile and beautiful provinces; and the marriage of the ducheſs with Maximilian not only changed the face of affairs, but introduced a new ſyſtem of politics into Europe: nay it may be ſaid to be the firſt and principal ſource of moſt of the wars wherewith we have been troubled ever ſince. But it is now time to take a view of affairs in England.

It appears, that the adminiſtration was wholly engroſſed by the queen and her relations, who were now become extremely unpopular, not only by their continually graſping at all power, but alſo by the haughtineſs of their demeanor, and the pride they ſeemed to take in oppoſing, on all occaſions, the king's brothers. Richard duke of Gloceſter, who was naturally cloſe, reſerved, and deliberate, managed ſo with them as not to come to an open breach; but George, duke of Clarence, a weak prince, of great pride, ambition, and impetuoſity, could not ſuppreſs his indignation, which was continually breaking out into threats and invectives.

This behaviour, doubtleſs, increaſed the averſion of the queen and her family to Clarence; and an event which happened about this time, contributed to heighten the animoſity between them, and ſeems to have laid the firſt foundation for the duke's untimely fate: George having loſt his wife Iſabel, daughter of the late earl of Warwick, a ſhort time before the death of Charles, duke of Burgundy, applied to his ſiſter Margaret, ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, who loved him above all her brothers, for employing her good offices to bring about a match between him and her ſtep-daughter, Mary, the heireſs of Burgundy. It was the moſt deſirable alliance for England that could be formed; and Margaret uſed her utmoſt endeavours to effect it: but Edward, king of England, having gotten intelligence of this negociation, by means of Lewis XI. (who ſtrove all in his power to keep the Engliſh court in good humour), and being jealous of his brother's elevation to ſo great a ſovereignty, or biaſſed by the queen, who wanted to ſecure this match for her own brother, Anthony Woodville, earl Rivers, threw ſuch obſtacles in the way, as allowed time and means for the emperor Frederic to ſucceed in behalf of his ſon Maximilian.

It is natural to ſuppoſe that ſuch treatment would not fail to exaſperate the mind of Clarence, who ſhewed his reſentment by coming leſs frequent to court, by ſaying little or nothing in the privy-council, and carefully avoiding ſeeing his brother Edward in private. This behaviour occaſioned a coldneſs and reſerve in the king towards Clarence, who now complained of the meaſures of the court with greater vehemence than ever. This inconſiderate conduct ſerved only to facilitate the deſigns of his enemies, every motion of his being watched, every peeviſh expreſſion aggravated, and every action miſrepreſented, or wreſted to render him ſuſpected. In this his brother Richard, duke of Gloceſter, is ſaid to have had a principal hand, who having already formed a deſign to ſeize the crown at the death of their elder brother, whoſe ſpirits and health were daily waſted by his exceſſive indulgence in pleaſure, thought the only means to ſecure ſucceſs to his enterprize, would be to remove Clarence out of the way, who ſtood between him and the ſucceſſion, and therefore determined to accompliſh his ruin. With this view he artfully inflamed the hatred of that duke againſt the king, until he wrung from him ſuch expreſſions as, being afterwards related to Edward, made that barbarous brother, who held no blood dear, if his jealouſly was alarmed, gave orders for ſeizing Clarence, on ſuſpicion of treaſon againſt his crown and life; and he was committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower.

A parliament was ordered to meet on Friday the ſixteenth of January, 1478, at Weſtminſter; and Henry, duke of Buckingham, was appointed high-ſteward of England, to preſide at the trial of Clarence, whoſe accuſation was laid in the following articles.

I. For having reflected on the king for putting to death one Burdett, a retainer or vaſſal of the duke's; and that he, the ſaid duke, had induſtriouſly propagated this accuſation againſt his ſovereign.

II. That he had accuſed the king of practiſing necromantic arts to take off ſuch of his ſubjects whom he could not reach by law.

III. That he had openly ſaid king Edward was a baſtard, and not begotten by Richard, duke of York.

IV. That the ſaid duke had compelled his vaſſals to take an oath of fealty to him and his heirs.

V. That he had ſlanderouſly alleged the king did him wrong, and that he had uſed witchcraft to deprive him, the ſaid duke, of his life.

VI. Laſtly, that he had attempted to avail himſelf of the act of parliament, by which he and heirs were declared ſucceſſors to the crown of England, failing the male iſſue of Henry VI.

The duke denied every part of the charge, and it is certain it would have been very difficult for his enemies to have proved all theſe articles of impeachment: they ſeem to have been too ſenſible of this; and all our hiſtorians agree, that he was ſecretly put to death in the Tower, a few days before his trial was to have come on; and that the duke of Gloceſter aſſiſted in this inhuman office, by helping to thruſt his head into a butt of malmſey, by which he was ſuffocated.

The death of the duke of Clarence raiſed ſuch an outcry among the people, that the court began to grow apprehenſive for the conſequences; and, to quiet their diſcontents, gave out that he died of an immoderate debauch of drinking, to which he had taken out of grief for his confinement; but this artifice was not capable of amuſing the public, who could not without horror reflect upon a prince of the blood thus dying a priſoner in private, and in the power of his declared enemies. The duke left behind him one ſon, named Edward, who inherited from his grand-father, by the mother's ſide, the title of earl of Warwick; and a daughter called Margaret, who was afterwards counteſs of Saliſbury; both of them following their father by a violent death, from the cruel unrelenting ſuſpicion of their kindred kings.

It has been pretended by an old writer (Hall), that Edward was afterwards greatly grieved for the death of his brother, inſomuch that when any one ſued to him for the pardon of a condemned malefactor, he would break out into this exclamation, "Oh, unfortunate brother Clarence! for whoſe life not one creature would make interceſſion!" And yet we find this penitent prince chuſing the very time of his brother's untimely fate, to redouble the revels of his court by inveſting his eldeſt ſon, Edward (afterwards Edward V.) with the principality of Wales, the earldom of Cheſter, and his other eſtates; and creating his ſecond ſon, Richard, duke of York; and, though not above two years and a half old, marrying him to Anne, only daughter of John Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, and heireſs to that title and eſtate, then about ſix years old, and her fortune, in caſe of death, was ſettled upon the young duke. The rejoicings of Edward and his court on this occaſion ſeemed not ſo much on account of the two princes promotions, as their ſatisfaction to ſee the project of the duke of Clarence's ruin effected; and their indecent conduct ſerved only heighten the murmurs of the people.

During theſe tranſactions in England, Maximilian, who had married the young ducheſs of Burgundy, reſolved to wreſt from Lewis the French king the places he had taken in his bride's country; and he met with ſuch ſucceſs in his endeavours, on account of the affection of the inhabitants for the houſe of Burgundy, that, in all probability, he would have recovered the whole duchy, had he been ſupported by his father, the moſt covetous, or Edward, the moſt voluptuous prince of his age: but both of them failed him; the one being loth to part with his money, and the other wholly under the influence of his queen, who reſented the refuſal her brother Anthony, earl of Rivers, had met with in his pretenſions to the young ducheſs of Burgundy: add to this, that Edward ſuffered himſelf to be amuſed from time to time by Lewis, with flattering promiſes, that the other never intended to perform; nor had any thing been adjuſted all this time relating to the treaty of Amiens. But this year Lewis ſent over ambaſſadors, to offer that both the truce and the payment of the annuity ſhould be continued for one hundred years after the death of each of the kings. To this Edward agreed; but, at the ſame, time he put the French ambaſſadors in mind, that his daughter Elizabeth was now twelve years of age, therefore capable of matrimony: and that, though the dauphin was yet too young for conſummation, yet that was no reaſon why ſhe ſhould not be betrothed to him, and immediately enter on poſſeſſion of the ſixty thouſand livres a year, agreed upon as her appointment, as ſoon as ſhe came to a matrimonial age. All this was digeſted into inſtructions to Edward's reſidents at the French court, who had orders to make the demand, and betroth the princeſs to the dauphin.

But Lewis, who had another match in view for his ſon, put them off, from time to time, with a dilatory anſwer; and finding that money was the means to prolong Edward's lethargy, he paid off, the remainder of the ranſom of Margaret of Anjou, and ſent over the biſhop of Elna, in February of the following year, 1479, to offer ſecurity for the payment of fifty thouſand crowns annuity for the long term to which it and the truce were now extended. The ſecurity which the prelate offered, was the oath of Lewis, together with the bonds of the bank of Medicis, and letters patent confirmed by the eſtates of France, and the papal authority denouncing excommunication in caſe of failure. This ſecurity effectually quieted Edward's ſcruples: indeed, the Engliſh monarch was grown too indolent to undertake any enterprize that required perſonal activity, and all that we know of Edward's proceedings this year (1479), was that he entered into a treaty with the duke and ducheſs of Burgundy, by a marriage between his daughter Anne and their ſon, a child ſcarcely a year old; as alſo another treaty between the prince of Caſtile and his daughter Catherine, to the ſame purpoſe; that he confirmed his alliance with the court of Denmark; and made his infant ſon Richard, duke of York, lord-lieutenant of Ireland *.

Thus ſtood matters in England till May, 1480, when Edward, beginning to be uneaſy at the ſhuffling of Lewis, ſent over John, lord Howard, to treat with that king, about the ſpeedy celebration of the marriage between the dauphin and Elizabeth, and to adjuſt the time and place for that princeſs's coming over to France and taking poſſeſſion of her dowry; but Lewis was ſo far from giving any ſatisfaction on theſe heads, that, having gained the principal point he had at heart, namely, the preventing Edward from acting offenſively on the continent, he no longer thought it neceſſary to keep meaſures with the Engliſh court, and entered into a treaty with Maximilian of Auſtria, and Mary, heireſs of Burgundy, for marrying the dauphin to their daughter Margaret, an infant of two years of age.

Not contented with this notorious breach of faith, or, perhaps, fearful, that Edward's eyes being opened to his perfidy and diſſimulation, he might be tempted, indolent as he was, to take revenge for ſuch indignity, the French monarch, whoſe prudence was equal to his falſhood, endeavoured to avert the impending danger; and, by a proper diſtribution of preſents in the court of Scotland, he prevailed on James III. to break off the marriage which had been ſtipulated between his eldeſt ſon and Cecily, Edward's ſecond daughter, though the Scottiſh prince had actually received a great part of her portion, and to commence hoſtilities againſt England, notwithſtanding a truce ſubſiſted at that time between the two nations for forty years to come.

James III. king of Scotland retained all his family affection for the houſe of Valois: though he had hitherto continued in good correſpondence with the court of England, yet it was only by the permiſſion and direction of the king of France. He was governed by a ſet of low, worthleſs, and corrupt miniſters, at whoſe inſtigation he had thrown his brother Alexander, duke of Albany, into priſon; but this prince having made his eſcape, took refuge at the court of England, where James, earl of Douglas, had long found protection: and the Scottiſh monarch and his favourites making this an handle, it was reſolved in his worthleſs cabinet that England ſhould be invaded. Accordingly, having gotten together an army, they entered the borders; but the Scottiſh authors and records give us a very blind account of the proceedings of this army: thus much is certain, they did nothing of any moment, probably owing to the diſappointments James met with in the ſupplies he expected from France, and that the duke of Albany and the earl of Douglas had a powerful party attached to their intereſts among the great men in Scotland; and to diſtract that kingdom the more, endeavours were uſed to draw the earl of Roſs, lord of the Iſles, into their meaſures.

Edward, who now began to rouſe from his lethargy, was equally aſtoniſhed and incenſed at Lewis for the unpardonable affront that monarch had put upon his family in the perſon of his daughter Elizabeth, who had for ſome time been diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of dauphineſs, in which ſhe was now ſupplanted by an infant. Liſtening to the ſuggeſtions of his revenge only, without conſidering that Lewis, on this occaſion, had done nothing more than retort his own behaviour in the caſe of the lady Bona, and that his own finances were in a bad ſtate for ſupporting a war, he reſolved to carry fire and ſword into the heart of France. But as it was neceſſary to end his quarrel with Scotland before he embarked in a foreign expedition, he, in the beginning of the year 1481, declared his reſolution of marching in perſon againſt the Scots, and gave orders for the neceſſary preparations towards a great expedition.

In the mean time, in order to ſecure his intereſt in the continent of France, he renewed his alliance with the duke of Brittany; and, on the twenty-ſecond of June this year, we find him concluding a peace with that prince, which was cemented by a marriage between Edward's ſon the prince of Wales and the duke's eldeſt daughter Anne, preſumptive heireſs of the duchy. Neither of the parties were yet of an age fit for marriage; it was therefore provided by the articles, that if either of them died before conſummation, their places ſhould be ſupplied by brother or ſiſter ſo long as Edward and Francis ſhould have any children remaining alive of the reſpective ſexes. The dower of Anne was ſettled at twenty thouſand crowns a year, and her fortune at two hundred thouſand crowns, if Francis ſhould leave a ſon to ſucceed him in the duchy, who in that caſe was to marry one of Edward's daughters; but if the princeſs of Brittany inherited her father's territories, a moiety of this fortune was to be remitted: it was farther provided, that in caſe two ſons were born of this intended marriage, the younger ſhould bear the arms of Brittany, be brought up in that country, and ſucceed his mother in the dutchy: the other articles of the treaty provide that each power ſhould furniſh to the other, if attacked by France, three thouſand archers, to be maintained three months at the expence of the furniſhing party*.

On the twentieth of January, 1482, Edward called a parliament at Weſtminſter, in order to obtain a ſupply for carrying on the war with Scotland; and, on the fifteenth of February, the commons, by the aſſent of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, granted him ſuch an aid as they thought proportioned to his neceſſities, by the help of which he was enabled to raiſe a powerful army, in the mean time: but for ſome reaſons, inſtead of heading it in perſon, he gave the command to his brother Richard, duke of Gloceſter, with whom he joined Alexander, duke of Albany, younger brother to James III. whom he had engaged to aſſume the title of king of Scotland, and concluded with him a moſt infamous contract to depoſe his brother and uſurp his throne. A private treaty was alſo made between them, in which Alexander promiſed to do homage to Edward for his crown: he then engaged to break the ancient alliance between France and Scotland, and aſſociate with Edward againſt Lewis; to ſurrender Berwick to England; to eſpouſe Edward's daughter Cecily, already affianced to the prince of Scotland, provided he could get rid of his preſent wife, according to the laws of the church; or, ſhould that be found impracticable, to match his ſon with ſome princeſs of the royal family of England †.

This treaty being ratified, the duke of Gloceſter, accompanied by the duke of Albany, began his march for Scotland, about the latter end of May, and arrived at Alnwick in the beginning of July. The number of men in this army, with their chief commanders, are thus handed down to us by three of our old Engliſh hiſtorians ‡: the firſt column was led by Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland, under whom ſerved the lord Scroop of Bolton, ſir John Dukfield, and other perſons of diſtinction, with ſix thouſand ſeven hundred common men: the ſecond column was commanded by the dukes of Gloceſter and Albany, having under them the lords Lovel, and Greyſtock, ſir Edward Woodville, and others, with five thouſand eight hundred men: the lord Neville brought up the rear with three thouſand. Theſe three columns, which were all foot, were accompanied by two great bodies of horſe, to act as wings; the right of which was commanded by the lord Stanley, and conſiſted of four thouſand men of Lancaſhire and Cheſhire; and the left wing was led by the lord Fitz Hugh, aſſiſted by ſir William Parr and ſir James Harrington, conſiſting of two thouſand men; while a thouſand were appointed to guard and attend the ordnance. Beſides all theſe land forces, a fleet was likewiſe fitted out, under Robert Radcliffe, which was to tranſport the heavieſt of the artillery, and attend the motions of the army. In this order they marched, and formed the ſiege of Berwick, the town of which preſently ſurrendered, though the caſtle prepared for a vigorous defence: but the duke of Gloceſter having advice that the Scottiſh nobility, who generally hated James, had riſen on their march, murdered three of that prince's chief favourites, and afterwards diſbanded their troops, and that James himſelf had taken refuge in Edinburgh caſtle, he left the ſiege of the caſtle of Berwick to be carried on by the lord Stanley, ſir John Elrington, and ſir William Parr, with four thouſand men, and ſet out with the reſt of the army towards Edinburgh, waſting the country as they advanced; and as James was in no condition to make head againſt him, they entered Edinburgh in triumph. The duke of Gloceſter, unwilling to come to extremities, deſired a conference with the nobility at Haddington, a town between Edinburgh and Berwick; when, after ſome altercation on both ſides, it was agreed that the citizens of Edinburgh ſhould give ſecurity for the repayment of the ſums Edward had advanced as the fortune of his daughter Cicely with the eldeſt ſon of Scotland, in caſe that match ſhould miſcarry; that the caſtle of Berwick ſhould belong to the Engliſh; that the duke of Albany ſhould be appointed regent of Scotland, that duke promiſing to acknowlege James as his ſovereign; and the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, the biſhop of Dunkeld, the chancellor, and the earl of Argyll, obliging themſelves to procure a free pardon and ſafety for the duke's own perſon, and indemnification to his followers ‖. This agreement being ratified, the duke of Albany, to his great mortification, found himſelf obliged to lay aſide his late aſſumed title of king, and do homage anew to his brother James. That prince, however, could not forgive him the part he had acted, and reſolved to ſeize the firſt opportunity of being revenged: the duke, apprized of his intention, ſoon after retired to the caſtle of Dunbar, which he ſurrendered to the Engliſh, after having renewed his former treaty with Edward; but, upon that king's death, deſpairing of ſuccour from England, he repaired to the court of Lewis XI. where he was accidentally killed by a ſplinter of a lance, in a tournament with the duke of Orleans, afterwards Lewis XII.

The war with Scotland being thus terminated, though in a manner far from honourable or advantageous to Edward or his kingdom, the king then devoted his whole attention towards the proſecution of the revenge he had vowed againſt Lewis: but, as he was buſied in making preparations for this purpoſe, death put an end to his life and projects, on the ninth of April, 1483, in the forty-firſt year of his age, and twenty third of his reign. Some writers will have it, that he was carried off by a ſevere fit of a quartan ague; but it is moſt probable that his intemperance and incontinency had broke his conſtitution, and that an ill habit of body, contracted by exceſſes, terminated his life without any particular viſible diſtemper.

The hiſtory of this prince's reign, and what has been already ſaid of his perſon, his manners, and his political connections, leave little more to be added to his public or private character: we ſhall only obſerve, that ſome writers have ſhewn an unpardonable impartiality between this king and his brother the duke of Gloceſter, afterwards Richard III. and in the character they have given of them, have, at the expence of truth, blanched the memory of Edward, in order to blacken that of Richard. Certain it is, that Edward poſſeſſed many amiable qualifications; but they were all diſgraced by a daſtardly jealouſy, which made him ſeek to drown every riſing apprehenſion in torrents of blood, no matter how noble, or nearly allied to his own; and he could teach his face to wear the bewitching ſmile of affability, while his breaſt meditated perjury, revenge, and murder. But we ſhall forbear enlarging upon this ſubject, and proceed to cloſe the hiſtory of the fourth Edward with an account of his iſſue.

Edward his eldeſt ſon, and Richard duke of York, were all the male lawful iſſue that out-lived him; his ſon George, who was born at Shrewſbury, and created duke of Bedford, dying in his cradle.

His daughters were,

1. Elizabeth, born at Weſtminſter on the eleventh of February, 1466; promiſed in marriage to the dauphin of France; courted by her uncle Richard; and at laſt married to Henry VII.

2. Cicely, who had been betrothed to the prince of Scotland, but afterwards married to the lord Wells, and had iſſue two daughters, both of whom died childleſs. The ſecond huſband of this Cicely was one Kyme, of Lincolnſhire, by whom ſhe had no children. Her body lies buried in Quarenna, in the Iſle of Wight.

3. Anne of York, ducheſs of Norfolk, third daughter of Edward IV. was eſpouſed to Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, earl-marſhal and lord-treaſurer of England, by whom ſhe had a ſon, named Thomas Howard, who died young.

4. Bridget of York, his fourth daughter, was born at Eltham, in Kent, on St. Martin's eve, the tenth of November, 1480, in the twentieth year of his reign.

5. Mary of York, fifth daughter, was promiſed in marriage to the king of Denmark, but died before the conſummation thereof, at Greenwich, on the Thurſday before Whit-ſunday, 1482.

6. Margaret of York, ſixth daughter of Edward IV. was born the nineteenth of April, 1472, and died the eleventh of December following, and was buried in Weſtminſter abbey, in the king's chapel.

7. Catherine of York, who was married to William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire, and died the fifteenth of November, 1527, leaving iſſue one ſon, Henry Courtney.

His natural children, mentioned by writers, were,

1. Arthur Plantagenet, viſcount Liſle, begotten on Elizabeth Lucy. And,

2. Elizabeth Plantagenet, married to Thomas, lord Lumley.

They ſeem, from the name of Plantagenet, to have been owned by their father. But, beſides theſe, there was another, called,

3. Elizabeth (by Catherine, daughter of ſir Robert Clavenger, and widow of Thomas Petit), who was married to John ap William, ſerjeant at arms, and reduced at laſt to ſuch poverty, that Glover, Somerſet herald, who knew her, ſays ſhe was forced to ſue for relief.

There is ſtill another mentioned in a MS. of Thomas Wriotheſley, Garter king at arms, called Iſabel Mylbery, ſaid to be married to John Audley, eſq. brother to the lord Audley.

Remarkable Occurrences.

In the ſeventh year of this king's reign the people had an extravagant way of adorning their feet; they wore the beaks or piques of their ſhoes ſo long, that they encumbered them in walking, and were forced to tye them up to their knees; the fine gentlemen did it with chains of ſilver or ſilver gilt, and others with ſilk laces. This ridiculous faſhion was in vogue ever ſince the year 1382; but now it was prohibited on the forfeiture of twenty ſhillings, and pain of curſing by the clergy. The ſame year the king concluded a league with the king of Caſtile and Arragon, by which he allowed certain Cotſwold ſheep to be tranſported into Spain, where the breed ſo increaſed that their fine wool has ſince proved very detrimental to England.

In the eleventh year of his reign, 1471, William Caxton, a mercer of London, a lover of letters, and author of the Chronicle called Fractus Temporum, brought the art of printing into England, and practiſed it firſt in Weſtminſter abbey.

In his ſeventeenth year there was ſo dreadful a plague, that hiſtorians relate more people were deſtroyed by it than by fifteen years war before.

In his nineteenth year, Robert Byfield, one of the ſheriffs of London, was fined fifty pounds by the court of aldermen for affronting the lord mayor; which it ſeems was only kneeling too near him at prayers, at St. Paul's church.

In the year 1483, the laſt of this reign, was born Thomas Parr, a Shropſhire man, noted for his extraordinary great age. He lived till the year 1635, being then brought up to London by the earl of Arundel, as a great rarity; when he died, after having lived in the reigns of ten kings and queens, and to the age of one hundred and fifty-two years.

EDWARD. V.

EDWARD V. The ſecond King of ENGLAND of the Line of YORK. A. D. 1483.

EDWARD IV. was ſucceeded on the throne by his eldeſt ſon, of the ſame name, who was proclaimed the very day of his father's deceaſe, in London, by the name of Edward V. being then only twelve years, five months, and ſome days old. Before we enter into the hiſtory of this reign, in which the meaſure of England's guilt was full, it will be neceſſary to ſhew the ſtate of the court of England at the death of Edward IV.

Elizabeth Woodville (or Grey), who from a ſubject was raiſed to the dignity of queen, held the firſt rank at court, as well by the privileges common to all queens, as by her great credit. Edward, notwithſtanding his libertiniſm, could never get rid of that weakneſs for her perſon which firſt ſubdued him into marriage; hence, during his life-time, ſhe had prevailed on him to laviſh honours and preferments on all her relations; and hence, at his death, ſhe, by the ſame influence, got him to leave her and her family in actual poſſeſſion of all the executive power of the kingdom; nor do we find that either the duke of Gloceſter, or any of the old nobility, had any ſhare in the public councils.

It is natural to ſuppoſe that this diſpoſition of affairs ſat very uneaſy upon the latter, and that they could not look upon the queen and her family with any friendly eye: they had ſhewn it before Edward's death, by retiring from court. The principal members of this party, beſides the duke of Gloceſter, were Henry Stafford, duke of Buckingham; William, lord Haſtings; and Thomas, lord Stanley. The firſt of theſe was ſprung from a daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Gloceſter, and ſon of Edward III. and enjoyed the office of high-conſtable; the lord Haſtings was high-chamberlain, and poſſeſſed a large ſhare of the king's confidence, on account of the many eminent ſervices he had done him; and the lord Stanley was the repreſentative of an ancient family. Edward had not been able, during his life-time, to moderate the animoſity of the two rival parties; but fearing that, after his deceaſe, they would come to an open rupture, he on his death-bed, earneſtly recommended a reconciliation, to which they in appearance readily agreed: the queen undertook for her brother Rivers, who was abſent, and her eldeſt ſon, the marquis of Dorſet, embraced the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings, in the preſence of the dying king, with all the marks of the moſt cordial affection. The duke of Gloceſter, who was then in the North, on the affairs of the kingdom, was not preſent at this ceremony, which bade fair to ruin his deep-laid ſchemes of uſurpation, had not an inward animoſity ſtill remained between the parties.

This ſhewed itſelf almoſt as ſoon as the breath was departed from Edward's body; they forgot their mutual engagements, and each party endeavoured to gain the aſcendant over the other by ſecuring the perſon of the young king, whoſe name might ſerve to authorize all their proceedings.

Young Edward, at the time of his father's deceaſe, was keeping his court at Ludlow caſtle, in Shropſhire, under the tuition of Anthony Woodville, earl Rivers, his mother's brother, who had been appointed his governor; his uterine brother, ſir Richard Grey, poſſeſſed another very conſiderable place about his perſon; ſir Thomas Vaughan was his chamberlain, and all the other places in his houſhold were filled with the queen's creatures.

Upon the death of her huſband, ſhe diſpatched an expreſs to her brother, earl Rivers, to bring the young king up to London, attended by a large body of troops, in order to his coronation, which was fixed for the fourth of May. The intent of the queen and her party in this, was to have a ſufficient force at hand to over-awe their enemies, in caſe they ſhould attempt to obſtruct them in the full government of all affairs during the king's nonage.

On the other ſide, the duke of Buckingham and the lord Haſtings ſent an expreſs to the duke of Gloceſter, acquainting him with the king's death, and the queen's meaſures, preſſing him either to come immediately to town and take on him the protectorſhip, or to take Ludlow in his way, and aſſume the guardianſhip of the king's perſon. The duke of Gloceſter, during the life time of Edward IV. had been greatly embarraſſed between the two parties at court: he knew the only way to pleaſe the king was to affect a complaiſance for the queen; but, on the other hand, as he ſaw the aim of the latter was to engroſs the government, and her haughty treatment of the old nobility, he could not be attached to her without forfeiting the affections of the ancient families, of which he might one day ſtand in need. As he was naturally a great diſſembler, he reſolved to make his court publicly to the queen, but in private he joined with the duke of Buckingham, the lord Haſtings, and their party. On receiving the letters of the above noblemen, he ſent to deſire they would meet him at Northampton, in order to a conference: thither they accordingly repaired, with a great number of their vaſſals, and there, in a long and laboured harangue, they repreſented to Gloceſter the danger to which both himſelf and they would be expoſed, ſhould the queen continue to manage the reins of government; and concluded with deſiring him to get the king out of the hands of Rivers, and take the helm of ſtate into his own management. Richard required not much entreaty to gratify the favourite purpoſe of his ſoul; however, finding that Rivers had got the ſtart of him in point of ſtrength, he had recourſe to policy and diſſimulation: he cauſed his nephew to be proclaimed at York, and, taking the oath of allegiance to him, he obliged all the magiſtrates, with the nobility and gentry of the county, to follow his example: he wrote a letter of condolence to the queen, ſo full of deference, ſubmiſſion, and kindneſs, that Elizabeth, who knew little of men or things, fondly imagined that ſhe ſhould find as much obſequiouſneſs from the firſt prince of the blood, who alone could rival her in the government of her ſon, as ſhe had found from her late huſband.

In the mean time Haſtings returned to London, where he was very popular, and, coming to the council, preſented letters from the duke of Gloceſter, wherein, under pretence of keeping the peace of the nation, he adviſed them to prevail on the queen to countermand her late order to her brother Rivers, and that the number of troops deſtined to attend the young king to London, might not exceed two thouſand; "for (alledged the artful duke) the raiſing forces for the defence of the king, at a time when there is not the leaſt appearance of danger, may revive former jealouſies and ſuſpicions, and finally involve the kingdom in civil war and confuſion." The queen, very imprudently, followed the advice, of which ſhe perceived not the venom, and ſent orders to her brother Rivers to diſband his forces; with which he was the more readily induced to comply, as the crafty Gloceſter had taken care to write to him in much the ſame ſtyle as he had to the queen; his letters were filled with aſſurances of friendſhip to him, and with thoſe ſolemn profeſſions of duty and obedience to the king, which he affected to make upon all occaſions, and in all public places. Rivers was completely duped on this occaſion; he was weak enough to believe all that was wrote to him: diſmiſſing therefore his forces, he ſet forth with the young king and his ordinary attendants, and even ſuffered himſelf to be trepanned into fellowſhip, feaſting, and even familiarity with the dukes of Gloceſter and Buckingham at Northampton. It was ſo contrived that young Edward lay that night at Stoney Stratford; and as earl Rivers, with Buckingham and Gloceſter, were going thither the next morning, when they came almoſt to the entrance of the town, the earl and ſir Richard Grey, who had come forth from the king to meet them, were both ſeized; and Gloceſter haſtening to the houſe where the king lodged, took him into his own cuſtody, and ſecured his principal officers and attendants. It was in vain for the young monarch by his tears and intreaties to intercede for perſons ſo near to him in blood, ſo dear to his tender years; though no act of exterior reſpect, reverence, and tenderneſs were omitted by Gloceſter towards the king, yet he lent a deaf ear to his requeſt, and Edward was carried back to Northampton, while Rivers, Grey, and ſir Thomas Vaughan, were ſent priſoners to Pontefract caſtle.

The queen was no ſooner apprized of theſe proceedings, than ſhe at once conceived the whole deſign of the duke of Gloceſter, and, conſidering her brother and two ſons as totally loſt, fled for refuge in the middle of the night to the abbey of Weſtminſter, accompanied by the duke of York, who was about nine years of age, the marquis of Dorſet, and the reſt of her family. The lord Haſtings, then at London, though he hated the queen and her relations, had yet a ſincere affection for his late maſter, Edward IV. and was unalterably devoted to the young king and his brother: he had been in the ſecret of Gloceſter's taking Edward out of the hands of the earl of Rivers; and, as he had an high opinion of Gloceſter's virtue and loyalty, received the news of their deſign having taken effect with great pleaſure; he even wrote to Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, then lord-chancellor of England, deſiring him not to be alarmed at what had happened, as it would all turn out for the good of the nation: and making uſe of his popularity with the city of London, which began to ſhew ſome tumultuous inclinations upon hearing of their ſovereign being forcibly taken from his friends and relations, he took upon himſelf to anſwer for the duke of Gloceſter's conduct and loyalty: this pacified the majority of the people; and Gloceſter coming to London on the fourth of May, with the king, he carried him to the biſhop's palace, where he was attended by the lord-mayor, the magiſtracy, and a great number of lords. Gloceſter, on this occaſion, rode bare-headed before his royal nephew, bowing on each ſide popularly low, and ever and anon crying out to the gaping crowd, "Behold your king! behold your king!" This management, and the king's being lodged among the citizens, entirely removed the ſcruples they had began to entertain againſt Gloceſter, on account of the affair at Northampton.

The rejoicings for the king's ſafe arrival being over, it was neceſſary to ſettle the government during his minority, which was to laſt ſeven years. The great-ſeal was taken from the archbiſhop of York, and delivered to John Ruſſel, biſhop of Lincoln: the former of theſe prelates had given Gloceſter a very plauſible pretence to remove him; for when the queen fled to ſanctuary, he haſted thither before day-light, to give her all the conſolation in his power, and had even aſſured her, that if any ill fortune ſhould befal the king, he would immediately crown the duke of York, his brother; and, as an earneſt of his ſincerity and affection to his former maſter's family, he had left in her cuſtody the great-ſeal of England; he had, indeed, ſent for it again next morning, but this could not excuſe him in the eyes of the faction.

Gloceſter, finding no one dare to oppoſe his will, was, on the twenty-ſeventh of May, declared protector and defender of the kingdom. All theſe ſteps were very agreeable both to the ancient nobility and the common people, as well on account of their general hatred to the queen's family, as that the duke of Gloceſter was the only prince of the blood capable of holding the reins of government, and he had carefully concealed his true deſign from the eye of the world; but knowing that theſe could be but half completed, unleſs he could get the duke of York in his power as well as the king, ſince were the latter removed, the other muſt ſtand in his place, Richard therefore, in an artful ſpeech, addreſſed to the council, grievouſly complained of the diſtruſtful conduct of the queen, which, he ſaid, "reflected diſhonour on all the lords of the council, and would make foreigners expect to ſee troubles break out in the realm, when the king's brother ſhould ſeem under a neceſſity of taking refuge like a common felon in a ſanctuary, and that the king ſhould not be attended on his coronation-day (which he declared to be fixed for the twenty-ſecond of June) by his only brother:" in ſhort, he wrought ſo much upon the council by his plauſible arguments, or rather the members were by this time ſo moulded to his purpoſe, that the greater part concurred in his ſentiments, and it was now propoſed to take the young duke away from his aſylum by force. Here Gloceſter had a freſh opportunity of playing off his artillery of diſſimulation: he objected to the leaſt appearance of violence being uſed towards the young prince, and recommended that the archbiſhop of Canterbury might be ſent, at the head of a deputation from the lords, to make the queen ſenſible of the impropriety propriety of her conduct, and to requeſt that ſhe would deliver up the duke, "as the place he was then in was not only a ſcandalous ſhelter, but dangerous to his health, and very afflicting to the king, who pined for want of his brother's company *."

The deputation waiting upon the queen, a long conference paſſed between them, the reſult of which was, that Elizabeth, ſeeing, in caſe of her obſtinate refuſal, that ſhe ſhould be obliged to do that by force, which was now only reſpectfully deſired of her, and the archbiſhop pledging his ſacerdotal word that the duke of Gloceſter did not entertain the leaſt deſign injurious to the royal family (as indeed the good prelate truly thought), ſhe ſuddenly caught the young prince in her arms, and, taking a moſt affecting farewel of him, delivered his perſon to the lords of the deputation, by whom he was inſtantly carried to his uncle Gloceſter, then waiting for the event of the conference in the Star-chamber, who received the royal youth with diſſembled affection, ſaying, "Now welcome, my lord, even with all my heart." Then taking the child in his arms, he introduced him to the king his brother. This was done on the thirtieth of May, and the protector having now both the princes in his power, he removed them from the biſhop of London's palace to the Tower. This ſtep occaſioned the leſs ſuſpicion, as it was the conſtant practice for the kings of England to paſs ſome time there before their coronation, from whence they always went in cavalcade to Weſtminſter to go through that ceremony.

Now Gloceſter was drawing near the ſummit of his wiſhes: maſter of the perſons of the king and his next heir, all he required to crown his ambition was to get ſome of the leading perſons among the old nobility to favour and abet his views. Buckingham he had already made ſure of, by promiſing him the earldom of Hereford, which he claimed by a family-right; by his ſettling in his family the office of high-conſtable of England, and by laviſhing other gifts and preferments upon him even beyond the extent of his wiſhes: add to this, that he knew Buckingham mortally hated the queen and her family, becauſe it was through their means that the late king had refuſed to give him poſſeſſion of the Hereford title and eſtate. The lord John Howard was actuated by the ſame principles as Buckingham; a ſettled hatred to the Woodville family, by whom he had been diſobliged: of the lords Stanley and Haſtings, between whom there was a great intimacy, he was not yet ſo ſure, and therefore it behoved him to come at their ſentiments, thoſe of Haſtings in particular, as the leaſt miſtake might be fatal to his enterprize.

The protector would gladly have won over the lord Haſtings to his intereſt, both on account of that nobleman's great credit with the people, and a perſonal friendſhip he had for him; but finding by ſir William Cateſby, a tool, whom he had employed to ſound him, how inflexibly Haſtings was attached to his deceaſed maſter's family, and conſidering how eaſily his intereſt, with that of the lord Stanley, might diſconcert all his ſchemes, if once they had ſure grounds for believing he aimed at poſſeſſing himſelf of the crown, he reſolved upon the deſtruction of both thoſe lords. In the mean time, to amuſe thoſe he had the moſt reaſon to apprehend, Richard artfully named a committee to ſettle the form, manner, and pretenſions at the approaching coronation. This committee conſiſted of the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, Morton, biſhop of Ely, the lords Haſtings, Stanley, and others. Thus buſineſs enough was found for them to blind their vigilance, and give Gloceſter full ſcope for completing his treaſon; who, continuing his diſſimulation, iſſued out writs, on the fifth of June, to upwards of fifty noblemen and gentlemen, ſummoning them to take the degree of knighthood at the approaching coronation; and, between that and the thirteenth, ſuch pageants and preparations were made as inclined even the moſt diſtruſtful at laſt to believe that the protector was in earneſt; but the deceitfulneſs of theſe appearances ſoon became manifeſt.

The duke of Gloceſter, deſirous to rid his hands of the priſoners at Pontefract, as their death would deprive the royal family of their chief ſupport, now ſigned a warrant for the execution of the earl Rivers, ſir Richard Grey, and ſir Thomas Vaughan. The lord Haſtings had but too great a ſhare in this ſanguinary meaſure: the queen and her family had done him many ill offices with the late king, and were once very near worming him out of the royal favour; on this account he hated them mortally, and dreaded nothing ſo much as their getting again into power; but by concurring with the protector in their deſtruction, he unhappily furniſhed a precedent for his own.

Richard, as we have already obſerved, had taken a reſolution to remove him, if he could not be gained over to his intereſts; but he was ſtill willing to have him his friend if poſſible: he therefore commanded Cateſby to try him once more, and even to hint the ſcheme that was laid for the excluſion of his nephews. Cateſby, in this ſecond conference, found Haſtings more reſolved than ever to oppoſe any attempt that ſhould be made againſt the rights or lives of his maſter's children; which being reported to Richard, he determined to get rid of him without delay.

This reſolution being taken, he called a council at the Tower on the thirteenth of June, under colour of finiſhing the affair of the king's coronation: he came himſelf at nine o'clock in the morning, and his behaviour was remarkably affable and good-humoured; after a ſhort ſtay he went out, deſiring the lords of the council to continue their deliberations in his abſence. In about an hour after his departure, he returned with a furious aſpect, knitting his brows, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the marks of the moſt violent indignation: after a ſhort pauſe, "My lords (ſaid he), what puniſhment do thoſe deſerve who have plotted againſt my life?" He then proceeded in a long ſpeech to accuſe the queen and her adherents of having practiſed upon his health and life by necromancy, a pretence common enough in thoſe days, when men in power wanted to get rid of their enemies; and, to confirm the truth of his allegation, he bared his left arm, which was withered, and ſhewed it to the council, who all ſtared upon each other, as they knew his arm had always been in that ſhrivelled condition. The lord Haſtings was the firſt who broke ſilence, incenſed at this infamous piece of deceit in a man he had once ſo good an opinion of:

* Sir Thomas Moore.

"If

"If, my lord (ſaid that nobleman), they have been guilty of ſuch practices—" "How! (cried the protector, interrupting him in a fury), doſt thou anſwer with Ifs and Ands, as if I had forged the accuſation? I tell thee, they have conſpired againſt my life, and thou thyſelf art one of their accomplices!" ſo ſaying, he ſtruck the table with his hand, and immediately a number of armed men ruſhed into the council-chamber, and, at the protector's command, ſeized Haſtings and Stanley, with Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, and Morton, biſhop of Ely; the three laſt of whom were conducted to priſon; but the firſt, being allowed only half an hour for confeſſing to the firſt prieſt that offered, had his head chopped off on a log of timber, which was found on the green before the Tower chapel. His execution happened, as near as could be judged, about the very hour when the queen's unfortunate relations and friends were, by his advice, ſuffering the ſame fate at Pontefract caſtle.

Gloceſter being apprehenſive that the death of ſo diſtinguiſhed a nobleman and ſo very popular as Haſtings was, might, from the illegal and ſudden manner of it, occaſion a tumult in the city; to prevent it, ſent for the mayor and chief citizens, to acquaint them with the reaſons of the proceeding: they found him and his confident, Buckingham, caſed up in ruſty armour, haſtily put on over their cloaths, and affecting to be under the terror of an immediate inſurrection; the protector, taking the word, told them, "that the lord Haſtings, and ſome others, had formed a conſpiracy for killing them both that day in the council; that they had no certain information of it till ten o'clock in the morning, and had no time to provide for their defence, or to put on any armour but what came next to hand: that the ſuddenneſs of the execution, without a legal trial, was owing to the imminent danger of an inſurrection to reſcue him; and his guilt being evident, it was thought proper to inflict the deſerved puniſhment of his crimes immediately, to ſecure the peace of the nation:" he concluded with telling the mayor and his brethren, "that he had ſent for them to be witneſſes of the truth, that they might acquaint the people, and prevent or appeaſe the commotions which ill affected perſons might endeavour to excite in the city."

The mayor, Edmund Shaw, was a mere creature of the protector's, and of courſe was eaſily ſatisfied with any apology; and cauſing a proclamation to be made in the city, to the ſame effect as the ſpeech that had been addreſſed to him, interſperſed with many falſe and malicious aſperſions on the character of Haſtings, matters were ſo ordered, that no diſturbance enſued; and the next day ſir Richard Radcliffe, a creature of Gloceſter's, arriving in town with a body of troops from Yorkſhire, and others that Buckingham had ſent for from Wales, all apprehenſions of a forcible oppoſition vaniſhed, and Gloceſter now began to be leſs reſerved in declaring his purpoſe of dethroning his nephew. In the mean time, to give the more colour to his proceedings, he ordered the ſheriffs of London to arreſt Mrs. Jane Shore, who had been the favourite miſtreſs of the deceaſed Edward IV. and had, after his death, continued her unlawful commerce with the lord Haſtings. This lady too was charged with treaſon and witchcraft, and having conſpired, in concert with the laſt-mentioned nobleman, againſt the life of the protector; but not being able to fix either of thoſe charges upon her, ſhe was condemned to do penance through the ſtreets of London for incontinence, and it was by proclamation ordered that no one ſhould preſume to accommodate her with lodging, or even food. Notwithſtanding this ſeverity ſhe found ſupport, and was alive in the reign of Henry VIII. when ſir Thomas Moore, the hiſtorian knew her; but ſhe was then without any remains of her former beauty, for which ſhe had been ſo much renowned.

Theſe proceedings of the protector rather loſt than gained him the affection of the Londoners, who began to think the accuſation againſt Haſtings and the reſt of his friends was all a forgery, calculated to ſerve the worſt purpoſes. Gloceſter was therefore put to his laſt expedient, which was to endeavour to eſtabliſh a belief of the baſtardy of the of the young king and his brother. Pretences are never wanting on ſuch occaſions, and they were now furniſhed by the late king's inordinate paſſion for the fair ſex; it was ſaid that the late king Edward had promiſed marriage to ſeveral of his miſtreſſes, and that he had been actually joined in wedlock to the lady Eleanor Talbot, widow of ſir John Boteler, by which means all the poſterity of Edward's marriage with the lady Elizabeth Grey, the preſent queen dowager, became illegitimate. This ſtory was given to Dr. Ralph Shaw, the mayor's brother, an eminent preacher of thoſe days, to handle in ſuch a manner as ſhould be moſt likely to prepare the minds of the people for approving Richard's title to the crown. Shaw accordingly mounting the pulpit, on Sunday the twenty-ſecond of June, at St. Paul's croſs, preached a ſermon from theſe words, "Baſtard ſlips ſhall take no deep root," (Wiſd. of Solomon, chap. iv.) and after ſetting forth as above repreſented, he expatiated on the bleſſings which God uſually beſtowed on the fruits of the marriage-bed, and the calamities which on the contrary fell upon the children born out of wedlock. He ſupported his argument with a number of examples, as well from ſacred as prophane hiſtory: he then warmly aſſerted Richard's right to the crown, running into a thouſand exceſſive and ridiculous encomiums upon the perſon of the protector, who he ſaid carried in his air, his countenance, his diſpoſition, and in his whole behaviour, the expreſs image of his illuſtrious father, Richard, the late duke of York.

It was ſo contrived, that at the moment when his fulſome periods were cloſed, the protector and the duke of Buckingham came into the congregation, expecting no doubt peals of applauſe, and that the people would ſhout, God ſave king Richard! but they were diſappointed; the people hung their heads in ſullen ſilence, equally enraged at the impudence and the venality of the preacher, who loſt all his popularity by this ſhameful proſtitution of his talent.

The protector and his cabal finding the little impreſſion this ſermon had made on the audience, it was determined by them, that, on the Tueſday following, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and livery of the city of London, ſhould be aſſembled at Guildhall, whither the duke of Buckingham was to repair, and in direct terms to propoſe Richard to be king. Buckingham was univerſally eſteemed the fineſt ſpeaker of his age and country, and he exerted every nerve of elocution to carry his point; but when he had cloſed his oration, and waited for the

the cry of King Richard! ſo ſullen a ſilence enſued, that even the ſet of hirelings who had been planted to begin the cry, durſt not venture to open their venal throats. The duke, vexed to the ſoul at the ſtubbornneſs of the people, could not forbear hinting his diſappointment to the mayor, who, not knowing what elſe to ſay, anſwered, that perhaps the people were ſilent becauſe they uſed to be harangued only by the recorder, who was the mouth of the city; upon this he commanded that officer (Thomas Fitz Williams) to ſpeak to the people. He accordingly repeated the ſubſtance of the duke's harangue, but ſtill without effect. Upon this the duke, addreſſing himſelf again to the aſſembly, told them in plain terms, "that the lords in council, and the commons of the kingdom, had reſolved that no baſtard ſhould ever reign over them, and that the election of Richard was a thing reſolved on, whether they gave their concurrence or not; however, he deſired they would give their opinion, and anſwer whether they would have the protector for their king." This ſpeech, which was in the ſtyle of a menace, cauſed a general murmur through the crowd, when ſome of the duke's creatures, at the lower end of the hall, throwing up their caps, ſhouted, Long live king Richard! This acclamation was ſeconded by a few of the citizens, who had been previouſly bribed for the purpoſe, and re-echoed by the rabble and apprentices who ſtood without the gate. This the duke pretended to call an univerſal aſſent, and ordered the mayor, aldermen, and chief citizens to attend the next day at Croſby Place, where the protector reſided, to join with the lords and commons in an addreſs, that his highneſs would be pleaſed to aſcend the throne and manage the reins of government.

Richard and his junto had previouſly drawn up an act of ſucceſſion to the crown, which he got ſigned by ſeveral lords ſpiritual and temporal, and ſome principal men among the commons: this roll was the next day preſented to him in form, as from the three eſtates of the kingdom; the lord-mayor and aldermen, being introduced by the duke of Buckingham and other noblemen, joined their endeavours to perſuade him to accept of the crown. This matter was carried on with amazing grimace: the modeſt and loyal Richard pretended to be greatly ſurprized at the propoſal, which he abſolutely rejected, declaring that he loved his brother's children better than all the crowns upon earth. In this ſtrain he went on, till Buckingham, with a well-counterfeited reſentment at his obſtinacy, roundly told him, "that the people were firmly determined that none of Edward's children ſhould enjoy the throne of England; and that, if he refuſed to accept the crown, they muſt caſt their eyes on ſome other perſon." In this Buckingham ſeems to have copied after Mortimer and his faction, when they depoſed Edward II. and raiſed his ſon, Edward III. prematurely to the throne.

Richard affecting to be greatly moved with this ſolemn declaration, yielded with hypocritical reluctance to their deſires; and going, the day following, to Weſtminſter Hall, he placed himſelf in the royal ſeat, made an harangue to the audience, and gave the judges a ſtrict charge for the due adminiſtration of juſtice. He was the next morning, June 27, proclaimed king in London, and gave the great-ſeal to John Ruſſel, biſhop of Lincoln, declaring him chancellor: from that day all acts of royalty paſſed in Richard's name, and we muſt therefore here cloſe the ſhort reign of Edward V.

RICHARD III. commonly called CROOKBACK. The third King of ENGLAND of the Houſe of YORK, and laſt of the Race of PLANTAGENET. A. D. 1483.

THE firſt care of Richard, after his getting poſſeſſion of the regal power, was to reward thoſe who had aſſiſted him in his treaſonable attempt, and to gain others over to his intereſt by acts of munificence. The lord Howard, one of his chief favourites, was ſon to the daughter and coheireſs of Mowbray, duke of Norfolk and hereditary earl-marſhal of England; the Mowbray family being extinct in the male line by the death of John the late duke, Richard, the young duke of York, ſecond ſon to the deceaſed king Edward IV. had been married to his only daughter and heireſs *, and was made duke of Norfolk and earl-marſhal of England: but on this occaſion the uſurper Richard, by the plenitude of his power, without regarding the infant duke's rights, on the twenty-eighth of June, created the lord Howard duke of Norfolk, and appointed him earl-marſhal of England and high-conſtable, to act as ſuch for his coronation. This promotion was followed by ſeveral others: the duke of Norfolk's eldeſt ſon, Thomas Howard, was made earl of Surry and Warren; William Barclay (or Berkeley) was made earl of Nottingham (a title which had likewiſe been conferred by the late Edward upon his ſon the duke of York); the lord Lovel was made viſcount of that name; Thomas Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, was releaſed from priſon; and the lord Stanley was not only ſet at liberty, but even appointed ſteward of the houſhold, and made a knight of the Garter: this laſt promotion, however, ſeems to have been the effect of fear rather than of favour; for the lord Strange, Stanley's ſon, had began to raiſe forces in Lincolnſhire, and Richard thought this the moſt likely means of preventing the danger of a rebellion from that quarter.

But the flood-tide of his bounty was directed towards the duke of Buckingham, who ſo eſſentially ſerved him on the late occaſion: this nobleman received vaſt ſums of money from him by way of preſent, and was conſtituted governor of all the royal caſtles in Wales, and ſteward of all the royal manors in the counties of Salop and Hereford, and chamberlain of North and South Wales; and, beſides other poſts of profit and power, was made conſtable of England; he was likewiſe put in poſſeſſion of all the lands which he claimed as the next heir in blood to Humphrey de Bohun, laſt earl of Hereford.

The coronation of Richard and his conſort, Anne (daughter of Richard, earl of Warwick), was performed in Weſtminſter abbey, on the ſeventh of July, with the greateſt magnificence; the queen's train was borne up by Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, wife of lord Stanley and mother to the earl of Richmond, then in exile in Brittany. To give this ceremony a greater luſtre, ſeventeen knights of the Bath were made: in ſhort, no circumſtance of pomp or pageantry was omitted; as if the addition of theſe could ſupply the defect of right!

Richard, after his coronation, began to think of ſecuring himſelf on the throne, to which he had mounted by ſuch a ſeries of treachery and diſſimulation; and that he might ſtrengthen his power with foreign alliances, and prevent his enemies from receiving any aſſiſtance abroad, he, on the twelfth of July, appointed Bernard de la Force his ambaſſador to the court of Caſtile, with orders to renew the ancient alliance between that crown and England. The next day he gave the like commiſſion to Thomas Hutton, to treat of the prolongation of the truce with Francis II. duke of Brittany*; probably Hutton had ſecret inſtructions to endeavour to procure the earl of Richmond to be given up, or at leaſt to renew the treaty upon that ſubject between Edward IV. and Francis. On the ſixteenth of July Dr. Gunthorpe was made keeper of the privy-ſeal; and two days afterwards Richard appointed commiſſioners to treat with the court of France concerning ſome breaches of the truce, in order to have occaſion to confirm it. Lewis XI. of France was now drawing near his laſt moments, but ſtill retained his old maxims; the infirmities under which he laboured gave him a ſpecious pretence for ſhifting off any perſonal connections with the uſurper, nor does it appear that he ever entered into any connections with him. The duke of Brittany, though ready to renew the alliance with the crown of England, could not be prevailed on to violate the rights of hoſpitality, by giving up young Henry of Richmond; but the league with Caſtile (now governed by queen Iſabella and Ferdinand, king of Arragon, her huſband) was renewed.

Theſe public affairs being diſpatched, Richard reſolved upon a progreſs through ſome parts of England, and paſſing through Windſor, Oxford, Gloceſter, and Coventry, he at length ſtopped at York, where he appeared in all the pomp of royalty, with his queen and his ſon prince Edward (lately created prince of Wales, and knighted), and was crowned anew in the cathedral. It was during this progreſs that, according to all our hiſtorians, Richard contrived the making away with the late king's two ſons, Edward and Richard, duke of York, that their death happening in his abſence, he might be the leſs ſuſpected. This murderous commiſſion was given to one ſir James Tyrrel, a man fleſhed in the ways of blood, and who, having found acceſs to the Tower, is ſaid to have taken away the lives of the two innocent princes by the hands of two ruffians, Miles Foreſt and John John Dighton, who ſmothered them in their beds, and buried their bodies under the ſtair-caſe†. Various are the opinions of writers concerning this tragedy, ſome peremptorily charging the whole guilt of it upon Richard, others endeavouring to exculpate him from it. That Richard got the crown by the moſt infamous and villainous means, is moſt certain; but their murder ſeems inconſiſtent with Richard's cunning and diſſimulation; nor can we ſuppoſe him ſo weak a man as to give ſuch a bloody commiſſion under his hand, or put it in the officer's power to blaſt that reputation which he was ſo anxious to preſerve; beſides, it may be conſidered, that, after what had paſſed with regard to the illegitimacy of the young princes, it was ſcarcely worth Richard's while to remove them by murder. That the two princes either died or diſappeared about this time, is beyond all doubt, though no hiſtorian is abſolutely poſitive as to their fate.

Richard having finiſhed the buſineſs of his progreſs, and received the welcome tidings of the death or removal of his two nephews, he returned to London; but it was only to meet with an inveterate enemy where he thought he had a faſt friend; and though he thought his throne ſecure, as having been recognized king of England by the court of Spain, and the other courts of Europe, he found himſelf deceived.

We have already ſeen with what a laviſh hand Richard had beſtowed honours and riches on the duke of Buckingham, who had been his great friend and ſupport; it happened, however, that Buckingham, preſuming too far on his merit, had raiſed the jealouſy or indignation of Richard; and, while they were together at Gloceſter, the duke having made ſome demands which the king thought unreaſonable, he gave him ſuch an anſwer as plainly ſhewed he was highly diſpleaſed. Buckingham, who was haughty, violent, and avaricious, was ſo offended with the king's refuſal, that he deſired leave to quit the court to look after his private affairs: Richard, not imagining his denial had made ſo deep an impreſſion upon the duke, or perhaps deſpiſing the effects of his reſentment, gave him the leave he deſired, and Buckingham quitting Gloceſter, retired to his caſtle of Brecknock, where Morton, biſhop of Ely, who had been committed to his cuſtody by Richard, was confined. This prelate was an artful politician, and a zealous friend of the family of Lancaſter. As he was known to have great politeneſs and addreſs, the duke indulged himſelf in frequent converſations with him, in the courſe of which it was eaſy for the biſhop to perceive that his noble keeper was highly diſſatisfied with the court; he drew a favourable omen from this diſcovery, which he reſolved to improve

† In the time of ſir Thomas Chicheley maſter of the ordnance, great heaps of records of bills and anſwers lying in the Six Clerks Office, were removed to be repoſited in the White Tower; and a new pair of ſtairs were made into the chapel there, for the eaſier conveyance of them thither. The labourers in digging at the foot of the old ſtairs, came to a wooden cheſt, containing the bones of conſumed corps, covered with a heap of ſtones: which bones king Charles cauſed to be interred in Henry VIIth's chapel, near two other royal chidren, Mary and Sophia, daughters of James I. with a monument of white marble, and an inſcription on it in capital letters. to the advantage of that cauſe for which he was ſo warm a ſtickler: he plied the duke with that judicious flattery which is the key to almoſt every breaſt, how reſerved ſoever; he expatiated on the virtues of the duke; thought that ſervices like his were never to be forgotten; and diſtantly hinted, that the reigning king had been ſomewhat deficient in gratitude to the man to whom he owed his crown.

Buckingham took fire; he inveighed againſt Richard in ſuch terms, that emboldened Morton to talk to him more freely: in a word, without detaining our readers with the long converſations which have been recorded by Hall, Hollingſhed, and others of our hiſtorians, we ſhall only obſerve, that they ſoon came into a ſcheme for driving the tyrant Richard from the throne, and placing thereon the young earl of Richmond, who, by his mother Margaret, indiſputably inherited all the rights of the houſe of Lancaſter, on condition that the ſaid earl ſhould oblige himſelf upon oath to marry the princeſs Elizabeth, the eldeſt daughter of the deceaſed Edward IV. as this alliance would engage the two families of York and Lancaſter in his intereſt; an expedient which was at once conformable to juſtice and equity, and admirably well calculated to extinguiſh the flames of civil war, which had ſo long deſolated the kingdom.

In order to ſecure this alliance, which was the neceſſary preliminary to all their future proceedings, they determined to impart their ſcheme to Margaret, the old counteſs of Richmond, that ſhe might inform her ſon of their deſign, and endeavour to procure the conſent of the queen dowager. The biſhop being intimately acquainted with one Reginald Bray, a ſervant of the counteſs of Richmond, ſent for him to Brecknock, where he was charged with inſtructions to treat and ſettle theſe different points; and it appears from ſeveral authentic accounts, that this man had credit enough to draw in many of the moſt conſiderable perſonages in England to join in the ſcheme for recalling the earl of Richmond, and even to get them to appoint a general day of inſurrection.

His firſt ſtep was to gain the queen dowager's conſent, and that of the princeſs Elizabeth; this was done by the mediation of one Dr. Lewis, a Welſh phyſician, who being conſulted in that capacity by both the queen and the counteſs of Richmond, went between them without ſuſpicion; for as the counteſs and the queen were declared enemies to each other, a perſonal interview might have cauſed an alarm. She aſſured the doctor that ſhe was ready to concur in any deſign that tended to remove the barbarous uſurper; but ſhe inſiſted on the article of marriage between the earl of Richmond and her daughter as a ſine qua non. This great point of the queen's concurrence being ſettled, the counteſs of Richmond found means to raiſe a large ſum of money among her friends in London, and ſent it over to Brittany by ſir Hugh Conway, to enable her ſon to levy a body of troops, and provide ſhips, ſailors, and all other neceſſaries for his enterprize; at the ſame time ſhe diſpatched ſir Thomas Rain over to Calais, from whence he was to proceed with all haſte to Vannes, in Brittany, where the earl then reſided, to inform him of the diſpoſition of the nobility to join him, and with ſome inſtructions about the proper place for his landing. Both theſe meſſengers arrived ſafe in Brittany, and returned with the earl's conſent to the propoſed marriage. Bray, in the mean time, managed matters ſo well in different parts of England, that a reſpectable body of the nobility engaged to be ready for a riſing in their ſeveral counties on the eighteenth of October, when the duke of Buckingham was alſo to declare himſelf.

But while theſe things were tranſacting, the biſhop of Ely, with whom a regard for perſonal ſafety was more prevalent than any other conſideration, reflecting that the impetuoſity of the duke of Buckingham's temper might hurry him into ſome raſh attempt before their deſign could be brought to maturity, and thereby endanger the lives of all concerned therein, began to grow very uneaſy under his confinement; and being now indulged in greater liberty than he formerly had, he took an opportunity to eſcape in diſguiſe, and got over ſea to Flanders. His eſcape threw the duke of Buckingham into great conſternation, from which he was, however, ſomewhat relieved on receiving a letter from the prelate, excuſing the ſtep he had taken, and exhorting him to proceed in his enterprize, and aſſuring him that he could be of more ſervice to him on the continent, than in England.

The biſhop's ſuſpicion proved to be but too well grounded; for Buckingham having impoliticly forced great numbers into his ſervice, this made them his enemies; and Richard ſpared no money to get intelligence, and, to have it brought him the earlier, had eſtabliſhed ſtages of poſt-houſes, at twenty miles diſtance from each other, throughout the realm, a practice firſt introduced by his brother Edward during the late war with Scotland; he had likewiſe his ſpies and emiſſaries in all parts, and and we have an undoubted proof from the public records, that by the beginning of October he had full information of the conſpiracy againſt him; for at this time a proclamation was iſſued, directed to the ſheriffs of England, offering one thouſand pounds in money, or one hundred pounds per annum in land, for apprehending the duke of Buckingham, the biſhops of Ely and Saliſbury, or the marquis of Dorſet, who had it ſeems eſcaped out of ſanctuary; and five hundred marks each, for ſeveral other perſons, their accomplices, mentioned therein. We are told, that before this proclamation Richard had ſent ſeveral orders to the duke of Buckingham, commanding him to repair to court, but which he as often diſobeyed, returning for anſwer, that he did not think proper to expoſe his perſon by putting himſelf into the power of his mortal enemy, whom he neither loved nor would ſerve.

After this declaration Richard found that he muſt neceſſarily proceed to extremities. He accordingly collected his troops, and began his march towards the weſtern counties, where he was informed the earl of Richmond propoſed to land, and where ſeveral of his friends were already up in arms, expecting to be joined by Buckingham with his forces, a junction which if it had been effected, Richard's reign muſt have had yet a ſhorter date; but they were kept aſunder by a wonderful operation of nature, equally ſudden and unforeſeen.

The duke of Buckingham having advanced, by long and haſty marches, into the Foreſt of Deane, in order to croſs the Severn and join his weſtern friends at Saliſbury, found that the waters of that river had overflown their banks in ſuch a manner, as had not been known before in the memory of man; the inundation laſted ſix whole days, during which his army could neither paſs the river, nor ſubſiſt where they were. He now found it impracticable to keep his men together; his ſoldiers had a diſtaſte to his perſon, they were ſo ſtruck with the prodigy they beheld before their eyes *, and terrified with the proſpect of periſhing for want of proviſions, that they deſerted in ſuch numbers as to leave the duke in a few days with only one ſingle ſervant, who was faithful enough to attend his maſter in his diſtreſs. In this wretched condition he ſaw no other reſource than that of concealing himſelf until he ſhould be able to retrieve his ruined affairs; he therefore took refuge in the houſe of one Baniſter, who had been a dependent on him, and whom he had by his liberality raiſed to a comfortable eſtate near Shrewſbury; but this wretch, dead to all the feelings of honour and gratitude, and allured by the promiſed reward in the king's proclamation for ſeizing the duke, treacherouſly betrayed his maſter and benefactor to John Milton, the ſheriff of Shropſhire, who conducted him to Shrewſbury, at which place he, on the ſecond of November, loſt his head without any form or proceſs of trial. Upon the firſt news of this cataſtrophe, Buckingham's friends, who were ready in arms expecting him in the Weſt, diſperſed themſelves; ſome lurked among their friends, and others took refuge in ſanctuaries; but the greateſt part took ſhipping and went over to the earl of Richmond, perceiving there was no ſafety for them in the kingdom; the marquis of Dorſet was of this number.

In the mean time Henry, earl of Richmond, ſuppoſing that every thing was ready for his reception in England, embarked at St. Malo's about the latter end of October, with five thouſand men, on board of forty veſſels; but a violent ſtorm ariſing forced the greateſt part of his fleet on the coaſt of France, though the earl's ſhip, being ſtouter than the reſt, rode it ſo well out, that ſhe caſt anchor off Poole, in Dorſetſhire, where he ſaw the ſhore crowded with troops, with which Richard had lined all the coaſt, with orders to the officers of the ſeveral parties, that if the earl ſhould attempt to land he ſhould not be oppoſed; and that if he ſhould ſend on ſhore to make any enquiries, they ſhould pretend they belonged to the duke of Buckingham, and were ſtationed there to wait the arrival of the earl of Richmond. The earl, as the tyrant had foreſeen, ſending a boat with a meſſenger on ſhore, received this anſwer, which he miſtruſted, and made the beſt of his way back towards the coaſt of France.

Upon his return to the court of Brittany, he there found the marquis of Dorſet, the two Courtneys, the lord Wells, ſir John Bourchier, ſir Edward Woodville, ſir Robert Willoughby, ſir Giles Daubeney, ſir John Cheney and his two brothers, with ſeveral others who had fled from England: from theſe he learned the diſmaying news of Buckingham's overthrow, and their own diſperſion, which ſeemed totally to annihilate all future hopes of ſucceſs, and muſt have ſunk the ſpirit of any but a prince of Henry's deep ambition and true judgment, who conſidered the abhorrence in which Richard was held by the greateſt part of the Engliſh nation as a happy omen of future ſucceſs; and the duke of Brittany engaging to continue his aſſiſtance, he determined to make another attempt with all convenient diſpatch: mean while he bound himſelf by a ſolemn oath, in the cathedral of Bennes, that he would eſpouſe the princeſs Elizabeth, or, in caſe of her death, her younger ſiſter Cecily; upon which all the Engliſh who were there preſent did homage to him as king of England. But let us now return to England.

On the twenty-third of January, 1484, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, in conſequence of its ſummons, when an act of attainder was paſſed againſt the biſhops of Ely, Saliſbury, and Exeter, the earls of Oxford and Pembroke, and other ringleaders of the late inſurrection, who had fled the kingdom; and Richard was empowered by the two houſes to make grants of their forfeited eſtates. Among the perſons attainted were the earl of Richmond, and his mother, the counteſs dowager of Richmond; the eſtate of the latter, however, was given to her huſband the lord Stanley, whom the uſurper had lately created conſtable of England, and who became anſwerable to keep the counteſs from all illegal correſpondence for the future. Richard's title to the crown, as ſet forth in the addreſs of the three eſtates before-mentioned, was confirmed; and his ſon Edward being declared heir apparent, the lords ſpiritual and temporal ſoon after ſwore to maintain his ſucceſſion. The parliament then broke up, on the twentieth of February, after paſſing ſeveral excellent laws for the good of the people, for the ſecurity of their liberties and properties, for the redreſs of grievances, and for the adminiſtration of juſtice: in a word, if we will believe Richard's moſt bitter enemies, he exerciſed his ill-acquired power with a moderation and equity, which might have done honour to a better title.

Richard, however, was ſoon alarmed by the arrival of Dr. Hutton, a civilian, whom he had ſent as his ambaſſador to the court of Brittany, and who informed him that the duke had engaged to continue his aſſiſtance to the earl of Richmond; and that Henry and the refugees were actually planning another invaſion. Richard, on receiving this intelligence, thought it behoved him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to detach the duke from the intereſt of his rival; and an accident furniſhed him with a very favourable opportunity. The duke being old and infirm, was entirely guided by his treaſurer, Peter Landois, the ſon of a taylor, who behaved himſelf with ſo much inſolence, that he incurred the hatred of all the Bretons, inſomuch that in the courſe of this very year the nobility had entered into an aſſociation againſt him, and had even made an attempt to ſeize his perſon in the court; but miſcarrying in their project, they were, by the intereſt of the favourite, declared rebels and traitors, and obliged to fly the court. Landois dreading that the weight of popular reſentment might at length cruſh him, reſolved to ſtrengthen himſelf by foreign connections; and having learned by his intelligence that Richard was now become abſolute

* This inundation was ſo remarkable, that for a hundred years after it was called the Great Water, or Buckingham's Water. It is ſaid to laſt ten days, and that men, women, and children were carried away in their beds with the violence of it, and that the tops of the mountains were covered with the waters. Hall. fol. 39. maſter maſter over the Engliſh, he ſent ambaſſadors to him with certain propoſals, which the latter readily embraced. On the eighth of June an armiſtice was agreed on between Brittany and England; and by another private treaty the king agreed to ſend a thouſand archers, under the lord Grey of Powis †, for the ſupport of Landois, who, in conſideration of this, promiſed that the earl of Richmond ſhould be delivered up, and that his maſter and Richard ſhould oppoſe the regency of France with their joint forces. Richard, that he might omit no precaution neceſſary to maintain the crown he had uſurped, entered into ſeveral other negociations in the courſe of this year, either for making new alliances, or rivetting the old ones; he ſecured the courts of Caſtile and Portugal, and the friendſhip of Maximilian, archduke of Auſtria; and though he had no apparent occaſion to fear any thing from France under a minority, diſturbed with inteſtine diviſions, yet he ſent ambaſſadors to Charles VIII. to deſire a prolongation, or at leaſt confirmation of the truce. There remained now only Scotland that could give him any uneaſineſs. As James III. who held the ſceptre of that kingdom, was deſcended from a princeſs of the houſe of Somerſet, the king imagined that he might naturally be induced to countenance the deſigns of Richmond, and therefore that he ought to make himſelf ſecure from that quarter: to that end he negociated with James a truce, which was concluded in September this year, and which was to laſt to the ſame day of the year 1487. At the ſame time he gave his niece, Anne de la Pole, daughter of his beloved ſiſter Elizabeth and the duke of Suffolk, in marriage to James, duke of Rotheſay and prince of Scotland, the king of Scotland's eldeſt ſon; and, to deprive the earl of Richmond of all hopes of accompliſhing his deſigns, he laid hold of a melancholy incident which happened in his family by the death of his own ſon Edward, prince of Wales, and declared his nephew John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, and brother to the lady Anne above-mentioned, preſumptive heir to the crown, and propoſed to have this declaration confirmed by parliament.

Theſe ſeveral precautions appeared ſo juſt as to ſcreen Richard from all danger: but coming to the knowlege of that moſt material circumſtance of the plot which his enemies had formed againſt him, the union of the friends of the York family with the adherents of the houſe of Lancaſter, by means of the earl of Richmond's marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth, he determined if poſſible to defeat a match which might occaſion the ſubverſion of his throne; and he ſaw no method ſo effectual as that of making Elizabeth his own wife, a rank to which he had an opportunity of raiſing her by the death of the lady Anne, daughter of the famous earl of Warwick, and widow of Edward, eldeſt ſon of Henry VI. whom he had perſuaded, ſoon after the cruel murder of her huſband, to accept of his hand. And we wiſh that hiſtorical truth would allow us to ſay, that the alliance now propoſed was diſreliſhed by the queen dowager and the princeſs Elizabeth, with all the horror that was due to the uſurper of the rights of their family, the ſuppoſed murderer of both their huſbands, and the author of the infamous baſtardization of his brother's children; but the contrary is, unhappily for the memory of the fair, too notorious *: in ſhort, the fact is, that Richard knew the queen's weak ſide ſo well, that he found means to revive in her mind all her hatred towards the houſe of Lancaſter, and, by taking a ſolemn oath to her and her daughters, before an aſſembly of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, that he would never do her or hers the leaſt injury, or ſuffer any to be done, and by laviſh promiſes of taking her family and friends, the marquis of Dorſet particularly, into high favour, he made ſuch an impreſſion, that the queen was perſuaded to leave her ſanctuary, and to deliver up her five daughters; nay, ſo thoroughly ſatisfied does ſhe appear to have been with the uſurper, that ſhe ſent into France, to her ſon the marquis of Dorſet, preſſing him to quit the earl of Richmond, and return home to take poſſeſſion of the high honours that awaited him.

Mean while the earl of Richmond, having gotten intelligence of the treaty concluded between Richard and Landois, and knowing that miniſter to be a perſon capable of committing the vileſt acts for his own advantage, he reſolved to retire privately into France, and for that purpoſe ſent Chriſtopher Urſwick, one of his followers, ſecretly to king Charles for a paſſport, which was readily granted him, and he departed from Vannes in diſguiſe, attended by five perſons only, and with great difficulty eſcaped the ſpies Landois had ſet to watch his motions, who purſued him ſo hotly that he was obliged to ſtrike out of the high road, acroſs the country, and at length got to Angers, a town in the French dominions, from whence he went to Lanſy, where the French court then reſided, and where he was received with great politeneſs and friendſhip; but the affairs of the French regency being at this time in great confuſion, no prompt reſolution was taken for the earl's aſſiſtance: however, the appearance of Engliſh noblemen and gentlemen, who every day flocked to the French court, gave his cauſe a favourable turn.

Among others, he was joined by John de Vere, earl of Oxford, who, as we have already ſeen, had been ſhut up priſoner, by Edward IV. in the caſtle of Guiſnes, or, as the Engliſh called it, Hames. Having heard in priſon, that the earl of Richmond laid claim to the crown of England, he had perſuaded ſir John Blount, governor of the caſtle (in the room of the lord Mountjoy, then lying dangerouſly ill), to declare for the houſe of Lancaſter, and actually brought that officer with him to pay his reſpects to Henry. The regency began now to look more favourably upon the earl, and to take his affairs into ſerious conſideration, and it was reſolved to lend him three thouſand fighting men, a certain number of ſhips, and even to ſupply him with a ſum of money.

Richard had fitted out a large ſquadron of ſhips, to oppoſe any attempts Henry might make to land in England; but having notice of his flight from Brittany, and being aſſured from the court of France that they had very little inclination to aſſiſt

* There is a letter written with the princeſs Elizabeth's own hand, perſerved in the Arundel collection, expreſſing her impatience till her marriage with Richard took effect, and preſſing the duke of Norfolk to uſe all his intereſt for the concluſion of it, "as the king (ſhe ſays) was her only joy in the world." his enemy, he thought it needleſs to incur the expence of maintaining a fleet, and ordered it be laid up in the beginning of the ſummer of 1485. This ill-timed meaſure proved the uſurper's ruin; for the earl of Richmond, reſolving to embrace this opportunity, ſolicited the French miniſtry with ſuch importunity to put their laſt reſolves in his favour into execution, that they at laſt agreed to his requeſt, not from any belief that his enterprize would ſucceed, but as imagining it to be for the intereſt of France to ſtir up diſſentions in England: they, however, demanded hoſtages of him, as a ſecurity for the repayment of their expences; and the earl, who had ſome reaſon to ſuſpect the fidelity and attachment of the marquis of Dorſet, took an occaſion to leave him, together with ſir John Bourchier, as his hoſtages at the French court.

Every thing being nearly adjuſted, the earl ſet out for Rouen, that he might be nearer at hand for equipping his ſmall ſquadron. At length, having muſtered all his troops, both Engliſh and French, he put to ſea on the firſt day of Auguſt, from Harfleur, in Normandy, and landed, on the ſeventh day of that month, in Milford Haven, expecting to be there joined by the friends and followers of his uncle Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, and ſir Rice ap Thomas; but they not being in readineſs, he continued his march next day to Haverfordweſt, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants.

But it is more than probable that he would have met with inſuperable difficulties in his enterprize, had it not been for the unaccountable indolence and ſecurity of Richard. This prince, who, on all other occaſions, was the moſt active man in nature, did not think it worth his while to exert any great efforts againſt ſo deſpicable an enemy as Henry appeared to be; but contented himſelf with ſending orders to ſir Walter Herbert to raiſe the militia of the county, and drive out the invaders, which he imagined was a very eaſy matter: nor was it here alone, but almoſt in every ſtep that he afterwards took, that Richard appears to have contradicted the natural ſagacity for which he was before remarkable; he had, indeed, on news of the intended invaſion, marched to Nottingham, a place ſituated near the centre of the kingdom, and convenient enough as well for the rendezvous of his northern forces, as for diſpatching parties to any quarter where the enemy ſhould appear; but he betrayed ſuch ſtrong ſymptoms of his miſtruſting his principal officers, that ſir Thomas Bourchier and ſir Walter Hungerford, with ſeveral other perſons of rank, went over to the earl of Richmond, who was not without his diſquietudes.

He had no ſooner landed than he diſpatched meſſengers to his friends in the different parts of the country, deſiring them to join him on his march towards London, for which capital he intended to puſh with all haſte. Accordingly, making but a ſhort ſtay at Haverfordweſt, he ſet out for Shrewſbury, where he intended to croſs the Severn; while he was on the road, he was joined by ſir Richard Griffith, ſir Walter Herbert, and ſir Rice ap Thomas, who had gotten together a ſtrong body of troops, under pretence of oppoſing Henry of Richmond, thereby to blind the emiſſaries of Richard; and the whole country ſupplying him in his march with all neceſſaries, the earl arrived in a few days at Shrewſbury, where he was received without oppoſition. Here ſir Gilbert Talbot, with his ward the young earl of Shrewſbury, then a minor, joined him with two thouſand men, tenants of that nobleman.

But Henry's chief dependence was upon Thomas, lord Stanley, who had a very great intereſt in Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, as his ſon George Stanley, lord Strange, had in Shropſhire, and his brother, ſir William Stanley, chamberlain of North Wales, which was ſubject to his command. The lord Stanley enjoyed under Richard the great poſts of ſteward of the houſhold and conſtable of England; but having married Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, the young earl's mother, ſhe had even won him over to her ſon's party; and when Richard went to Nottingham, lord Stanley had aſked leave to viſit his houſe and family, from which he had long been abſent. As Richard had ſome jealouſy of him, on his wife's account, he inſiſted that he ſhould leave his ſon George at court, as hoſtage for his fidelity, and then gave him permiſſion to go into Lancaſhire.

Stanley employed the time of his ſtay there in levying a body of five thouſand men, on pretence of aſſiſting Richard, and marched with them to Lichfield, as if to oppoſe the invaders; but, upon notice of Henry's arrival at Shrewſbury, he ſent his brother William Stanley to him privately, to aſſure the earl that he would join him with all his forces, as ſoon as he could take ſuch a ſtep without too far riſquing the life of his ſon, the lord Strange, whom he had left in the uſurper's hands. Accordingly Stanley, not to give the tyrant any umbrage, marched to Atherſtone, while the earl went and took poſſeſſion of Lichfield.

Richard, finding that the earl of Richmond was daily joined by many noblemen, and other perſons of diſtinction, thought it was high time to ſet forward in perſon to oppoſe his progreſs: he accordingly ſent orders to the duke of Norfolk, his ſon the earl of Surry, and ſir Robert Brackenbury, to march immediately, with all their followers, and join him at Nottingham; and his whole army being aſſembled, to the number of twelve thouſand men, he ordered them to march for Leiceſter, putting himſelf at their head, and doing all the duties of an able general. Richmond, on the king's approach, quitted Lichfield, and, agreeable to meaſures concerted with the lord Stanley and his brother ſir William, directed his route to Leiceſter, where he reſolved to hazard a general engagement. Arriving the next morning at Tamworth, he was joined by ſir John Savage, ſir Brian Sandford, ſir Simon Digby, and many others; the ſame day he privately viſited the lord Stanley, at Atherſtone: and, on the morrow, being informed that Richard had marched from Leiceſter to give him battle, he reſolved to meet him half way. On the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt the two armies came in ſight of each other at Boſworth, a place rendered famous in hiſtory by the battle which terminated the diſpute between the houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Richard's army, as we have already obſerved, conſiſted of twelve thouſand men, well accoutered and trained to martial diſcipline: the command of the van he conferred on the duke of Norfolk, and he himſelf took poſt in the centre, with a crown upon his head, either as a mark of diſtinction, or as a challenge to his adverſary the earl of Richmond, who had not above five thouſand men. He drew up his army likewiſe in two lines, of which the the earl of Oxford headed the firſt, and himſelf the ſecond; ſir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and ſir John Savage the left: between the two armies was a moraſs, which the earl left on his right hand, to ſecure him on that ſide, and in ſo doing he had the ſun at his back and in the face of the enemy.

Whilſt the two armies were preparing for battle, the lord Stanley, who had till then continued at Atherſtone, came and poſted himſelf with four thouſand men, on a piece of ground fronting the interval between the two armies; while his brothe, ſir William Stanley, with three thouſand, ſtood facing him on the other ſide. Richard, ſuſpecting Stanley's deſign, ſent him orders to join his army: but the lord Stanley returning an equivocal anſwer, Richard, enraged at his treachery, would inſtantly have ſtruck off the head of his ſon, the lord Strange, had he not been diſſuaded from that reſolution by ſome of his beſt officers, who repreſented to him, that ſuch an act would be of no advantage to him, and might provoke Stanley and his brother to join the foe, though perhaps their intention might at preſent be to remain neuter, and declare for the victor. Richard gave way to this remonſtrance, though, as his apologiſt, Buck, obſerves, he certainly committed a capital error in leaving the two brothers to act as they ſhould think proper, his army being equal in number to that of Richmond and the two Stanleys put together; he ought to have poſted two bodies oppoſite to the brothers, with orders to attack them if they ſhould attempt to join the enemy, while he himſelf with the remainder of his forces might have given battle to Henry.

Every thing being now ready for the bloody conflict, both armies moved, and the battle began with a general diſcharge of arrows; after which they advanced to cloſe combat. The duke of Norfolk, extending his lines, made a motion to encloſe the left wing of the earl's army; to prevent which the earl of Oxford fell with great fury upon Norfolk's diviſion, but in ſo doing was very near being hemmed in himſelf; which being perceived by the lord Stanley, who had till then continued neuter, he advanced, and falling in with the earl of Oxford's line, ſecured his flank, and ſtood ready to receive the front of the king's firſt line. This motion cauſed the duke of Norfolk to halt, in order to cloſe his line, which occaſioned ſome moments of ceſſation in the fight; but Norfolk ſoon advanced to the charge again with more fury than ever, and would have found a great deal of bloody work for his adverſaries, had not ſir William Stanley at that very inſtant, with three thouſand men, flanked the right of the king's firſt line ſo critically, that they were driven back upon the main body; but the duke of Norfolk having ſtrengthened the ſecond ranks, a moſt terrible carnage enſued.

In the mean time Richard, finding himſelf thus deceived by the two Stanleys, collected all his force, and perceiving Henry at a ſmall diſtance, advanced eagerly, at the head of a choſen body of men, to attack him, in hopes of deciding by his death the fate of the battle and of empire; and ſuch were his ſpirits, activity, and addreſs, that nothing could withſtand his fury, and he quickly opened a way to his rival, after having with his own hands ſlain ſir William Brandon, Henry's ſtandard-bearer, and father to Charles Brandon, afterwards duke of Suffolk, and unhorſed ſir John Cheney, an officer diſtinguiſhed for his ſtrength and dexterity. Henry with all his reſolution was appalled at the ſight of Richard's ſuperior proweſs; he would gladly have declined encountering ſo formidable an adverſary, but there was now no retreating; Richard called aloud to him to pay the forfeit of his treaſon, and rebellious invaſion of his realm; he preſſed on him with a fury that added double terror to his words: all Henry could do, all he ſought to do, was to keep him at his ſword's point, till ſome of his followers coming up, preſerved him for a fairer fortune.

While Richard was thus nobly employed in the centre of the battle, the reſt of his troops, diſpirited at the conduct of the two Stanleys, and not knowing whom to truſt, ſtood in a ſtupid inactivity, blind to the example, and unanimated by the preſence, of their valiant leader. The earl of Northumberland's men, by their commander's orders, threw down their arms, and gave Richmond's ſoldiers leave to mow down whole ranks: in a word, the rout of Richard's army became general, while he, finding it in vain to attempt to rally his diſperſed troops, ſeeing the duke of Norfolk killed, and his ſon the earl of Surry a priſoner, the lord Ferrers of Chartley, ſir Richard Radcliffe, ſir Robert Brackenbury, ſir William Conyers, ſir Richard Clendon, and many of his braveſt officers dead upon the field, and either ſcorning to endure the diſgrace of an overthrow, or dreading the thought of falling alive into the hands of his enemy, ruſhed into the midſt of the battle, where he ſoon fell, overpowered with numbers, after having atchieved exploits that would have done eternal honour to his memory, if exerted in any other cauſe.

The death of the king put an end to the battle, which had laſted only two hours, during which time Richard's van alone bore the whole brunt of the action, ſo that there were not ſlain on the ſpot above two thouſand men on his ſide. The earl of Richmond's loſs did not exceed one hundred. Richard's body was expoſed to a thouſand indignities as it lay on the field; it was ſtripped by the brutal and revengeful ſoldiers of Henry's army, then thrown, naked as it was, acroſs an horſe, and ſent to Leiceſter, where it was buried, without any ceremony, in the Grey Friars church in that town. His crown, being found in the field, was brought to the lord Stanley, who placing it upon Richmond's brows, hailed him at the ſame time king, in preſence of all the army, who rent the air with repeated acclamations of Long live Henry VII. king of England!

Of Richard's ſurviving adherents, the earl of Northumberland ſurrendered himſelf to the conqueror, who eaſily forgave him; the earl of Surry was ſent priſoner to the Tower, from whence he was afterwards releaſed. Cateſby, the infamous tool of Richard's arts and ambition, being diſcovered in his hiding-place, was taken priſoner, and loſt his head next day at Leiceſter. The lord viſcount Lovel, with the two Staffords, Humphrey and Thomas, all of them hated becauſe of their attachment to Richard, eſcaped from the battle; and the earl of Richmond, with right policy, received into pardon, or to favour, all who ſubmitted.

What has been already exhibited of the character of Richard, in the hiſtory of this and the three preceding reigns, makes it almoſt impoſſible to add add to it without running into tautology: thus much, however, we may ſay of him as a king, that, abating his cruelties in the purſuit of the crown, and the unjuſt meaſures he uſed afterwards to keep it, he certainly ſhewed a diſpoſition for government not inferior to that of the moſt virtuous princes antiquity can boaſt. Lord Verulam ſays of him, that he was in military virtue approved, jealous of the honour of the Engliſh nation, and an excellent lawgiver; of this, indeed, many of his ſtatutes afford irrefragable proofs; they are, in general, full of equity and humanity, and though paſſed in all the confidence of power and pride of conqueſt, in a juncture too often employed by uſurpers to trample on the liberties of a nation, to gratify their revenge or avarice, they are evidently calculated for the public good, and excellently adapted to preſerve the eaſe, quiet, and rights of the ſubject. Upon the whole, we cannot uſe too much caution in giving our aſſent to what hiſtorians of the Lancaſtrian party have written againſt this prince, who, though undoubtedly bad, was not perhaps ſo deteſtable as has been repreſented; nor ſhould the calumnies with which his memory has been loaded (ſome of which we have attempted to diſprove in the courſe of theſe ſheets) by thoſe whoſe intereſt it was, under his ſucceſſors, to blacken his character to the utmoſt, efface the juſt praiſe due to Richard for his excellent laws, and his conſtant application to ſee juſtice impartially adminiſtered, and good order eſtabliſhed in all parts of his kingdom.

His perſonal character, like his political one, has been induſtriouſly handed down to us by writers, who choſe to court the favour of Henry and his poſterity, in as odious colours as poſſible. The ſurname of Crookback has been given him on account of his ſuppoſed deformity; and we are told that one of his arms was withered and uſeleſs; that he was born with long hair, with teeth; in a word, a ſpectre of a man: and yet there want not hiſtorians of undoubted veracity, who had opportunities of ſeeing him, and ancient pictures drawn of him, that ſhew the contrary, and that the whole of his deformity amounted to no more than that he was low of ſtature, and thick-ſet, like his father, whom he much reſembled in his face, which was comely, though ſtern and warlike.

Richard III. was the laſt of the Anjouvin race, ſurnamed Plantagenet, which had poſſeſſed the crown of England for the ſpace of three hundred and thirty years; but he was not the laſt male of that family in England, for the earl of Warwick, ſon to his brother Clarence, was ſtill alive, and the only remaining branch of the numerous poſterity of the third Edward, which had been almoſt totally extinguiſhed in the civil war; a war which had raged for thirty years, and was finally determined by the battle of Boſworth, after having coſt the lives of above one hundred thouſand Engliſhmen, including a great number of the princes of the houſes of York and Lancaſter.

Richard left but one natural ſon, ſurnamed John of Gloceſter, a minor, whom he had appointed governor of Calais, Guiſnes, and all the Marches of Picardy belonging to the crown of England; and a natural daughter, Catherine Plantagenet, who was contracted in marriage to William Herbert, earl of Huntingdon, but died before ſhe was of age for conſummation. Carte tells us, that there is preſerved in the family of the earls of Winchelſea an account of a natural ſon of Richard's (moſt probably John of Gloceſter above-mentioned), who lived at Eaſtwell, in Kent, a manor belonging to that family, in a private, auſtere, and devout manner, to a very great age, eſteemed by all, though unknown till a little before his death, when he ſatisfied the curioſity of the anceſtors of that noble family.

HENRY VII. Firſt King of ENGLAND of the Name of TUDOR, and Uniter of the two Houſes of YORK and LANCASTER. A. D. 1485.

BEFORE we can introduce the reader with advantage to the events which we are now to deſcribe, it is neceſſary that we ſhould collect the ſeveral parts of Henry of Richmond's genealogy, and his title in point of blood to the crown of England, in which we ſhall follow the moſt approved writers on this ſubject.

In the firſt place then it is to be obſerved, that the root of Henry's family was John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſon to Edward III. This prince was thrice married:

Firſt to Blanche of Lancaſter, by whom he had a daughter, Philippa, married to John I. king of Portugal; a ſecond daughter, named Elizabeth, married to John Holland, duke of Exeter; and a ſon, named Henry, afterwards the fourth of that name king of England, whoſe male deſcendants became extinct in the perſon of Henry VI.

The ſecond wife of John of Ghent was Conſtance, princeſs of Caſtile and Leon, who bore him Catherine, married to Henry III. king of Caſtile, who had a numerous iſſue, both male and female; and from this marriage it is ſuppoſed that Philip II. of Spain exhibited as being prior to the houſe of Somerſet from John of Ghent, the author of the Lancaſter family.

The laſt wife of John of Ghent was Catherine, widow of ſir Otter Swinford: this lady had lived in adultery with John of Ghent, and while in that ſtate bore him four children, John Beaufort, duke of Somerſet; Henry Beaufort, the cardinal; Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter; and Joan Beaufort, counteſs of Weſtmoreland. John Beaufort had iſſue John, duke of Somerſet, who left a daughter Margaret, who was married to Edmund Tudor, of Hadham, earl of Richmond, whoſe eldeſt ſon was Henry, earl of Richmond, whom we have juſt ſeen defeat and kill the tyrant Richard.

Whoever looks on this genealogical deduction with the ſlighteſt attention, muſt perceive two very ſtrong objections againſt any manner of right which Henry, earl of Richmond, could pretend, in point of blood, to the crown of England. The firſt was the allowed priority of right which was in the houſe of of York, and had been declared by repeated acts of the legiſlature: the ſecond was the illegitimacy of all the children born of John of Ghent's third marriage. The anſwers to thoſe objections were as follow.

Firſt, that though the right of blood next to Edward III. the common author of both families, was undoubtedly in the houſe of York, yet that the family of Lancaſter having, as well as that of York, been recognized on the throne by repeated acts of the legiſlature, which deprived the houſe of York of all right, both before and after that houſe put in its claim, therefore the parliamentary right of the houſe of Lancaſter was prior to, and ſtronger than, the houſe of York; eſpecially as the laſt houſe had been attainted, and, when reſtored, was reſtored only to a capacity of ſucceeding to its hereditary eſtates, without mention of the crown. As to the ſecond objection, that of illegitimacy, the favourers of the houſe of Lancaſter urged, that the illegitimacy of the family of Lancaſter, by dame Swinford, had been removed by letters patent from Richard II.

To thoſe anſwers it was replied, that Henry IV. and his deſcendants, who had been kings, were no other than uſurpers upon the rights of an unoffending family, as we have already ſeen in diſcuſſing the queſtion of the rights of the two houſes. It was likewiſe urged, that the parliamentary right was as ſtrongly eſtabliſhed for the houſe of York, both before and after the acceſſion of Edward IV. as it ever had been for the houſe of Lancaſter. The reply to the ſecond anſwer, viz. on the point of illegitimacy, was, as is true, that an expreſs exception was made in the charter of legitimation, which provided that the heirs of John of Ghent by dame Swinford might ſucceed to any eſtate or honours whatſoever, the regal dignity excepted.

This is the true ſtate of the caſe of Henry VII's famous hereditary right to the crown of England, a right which he himſelf thought ſo weak, that, as he had thought fit before his enterprize, to ſtrengthen his claim by a matrimonial union with the houſe of York, he now reſolved to imitate the precedent ſet him by Edward IV. and Richard III. in accepting the military and popular recognitions, by which he had been, in the field of battle, declared king, and to act as ſuch before any formal coronation. In the mean time he thought it neceſſary to take ſuch precautions as might defeat or prevent any oppoſition to his meaſures.

With this view he ordered ſir Robert Willoughby to convey Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, ſon and heir to George, duke of Clarence, an innocent young prince then only ten years of age, to the Tower, where he was kept a cloſe priſoner, and excluded from all intercourſe or correſpondence with others. The princeſs Elizabeth, who had likewiſe been detained in a kind of honourable confinement by Richard, in the caſtle of Sheriff Hutton, in Yorkſhire, was brought from thence to London, and lodged with her mother. The young lady ſeems to have been entirely paſſive, and indifferent whether ſhe was deſtined to the bed of Richard or Richmond.

Henry next, having given the neceſſary orders concerning the diſpoſition and march of his army, ſet out for London, which he entered on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, attended by the magiſtracy and the companies, who met him at Shoreditch: the citizens, however, were ſomewhat diſpleaſed at his paſſing through the ſtreets in a cloſe chariot, ſo that he could not be ſeen like their former kings, who always made their entrance on horſeback. He repaired directly to St. Paul's church, where he offered up the ſtandards he had taken, and ordered Te Deum to be ſung; after which he retired to his lodging at the biſhop's palace.

And now, to remove all umbrages, the very day after his arrival at London, he aſſembled the chief nobility at the biſhop's palace, and ſolemnly ſwore to marry the princeſs Elizabeth. This ſtep was the more neceſſary, as a report had been induſtriouſly ſpread, that he had entered into a contract of marriage with Anne, daughter and heireſs of Francis duke of Brittany; but, as he had an unconquerable averſion to the houſe of York, he could not bear the thought of reigning in right of his wife, deſcended from that family, and therefore, though he firmly reſolved to perform his engagement, yet his intention was to delay his marriage until after his coronation, that he might appear to reign by his own claim, and his marriage ſeem a meaſure taken to conciliate the affection of his ſubjects rather than a giving him any right to the crown.

But, leſt the people ſhould grow cool, and require the performance of this or ſome other obligations before his coronation, he hurried on that ceremony as faſt as poſſible. It was, however, delayed for ſome days by an epidemical diſorder, which broke out about the end of September, and was, from its ſymptoms, termed the ſweating ſickneſs. This diſeaſe, which was till then altogether unknown, threw the patients into a prodigious ſweat, and carried them off in four-and-twenty hours; thoſe that died not within that ſpace, were almoſt ſure of recovering: happily it laſted not above a month, but in that time it ſwept away an infinite number of perſons, before the manner of cure and attendance was known*. Hall tells us, that two mayors and ſix aldermen of London died of it within a week.

Henry employed the intermediate time in rewarding the ſervices of ſeveral of his faithful friends and adherents: John de Vere, earl of Oxford, was made conſtable of the Tower and keeper of the lions there; Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the king, and the tutor and guardian of his tender years, was created duke of Bedford; the lord Stanley, earl of Derby; ſir Edward Courtney, earl of Devonſhire; and the following gentlemen were made bannerets†, ſir Gilbert Talbot, ſir John

* The method of cure was to keep the patient neither too hot nor too cold, with temperate cordials, which, without too much increaſing the heat, aſſiſted nature in expelling the humours that cauſed this extraordinary ſweating. Bac. Comp. Hiſt.

† This was an ancient order of knights, or feudal lords, who poſſeſſing ſeveral large fees, led their vaſſals to battle under their own flag, when ſummoned thereto by the king.

This order is certainly moſt honourable, as it never was conferred but upon ſome heroic action performed in the field. Anciently there being but two kinds of knights, great and little, the firſt were called bannerets, the ſecond bachelors; the firſt compoſed of the upper, and the ſecond the middle nobility.

In France they are ſaid to tranſmit their degree to their poſterity: but in England it dies with them. We have had none of this order created in England ſince the time of king Charles I. ſo that this order is now become extinct among us.

The form of the banneret's creation was this; on a day of battle, the candidate preſented his flag to the king, or general, who cutting off the train, or ſkirt thereof, and making it a ſquare, returned it again; the proper banner of bannerets, who, from hence, are ſometimes called knights of the ſquare flag.

Cheney, ſir William Stonar, ſir William Troutback, ſir John Mortimer, ſir Richard Croſby, ſir John Forteſcue, ſir Edward Bedingfield, ſir Thomas Cookſey, ſir James Baſkerville, ſir Humphrey Stanley, and ſir Richard de la Bere. At the ſame time the office of high-ſteward, for the king's coronation, was put in commiſſion, and the commiſſioners for executing it were, Jaſper, duke of Bedford, the earls of Oxford, Derby, and Nottingham, the lord Fitz Walter, Thomas Maſon, maſter of the rolls, ſir Thomas Brian, chief-juſtice of the King's Bench, ſir Humphrey Hartley, chief-baron of the Exchequer, and ſir Richard Croft, treaſurer of the houſhold. Henry's next care was to iſſue a proclamation, importing that he had agreed to a truce for one year with the king of France, a circumſtance that greatly contributed to his intereſts in England; which was the more inclined to ſubmit to his government, as his title was owned by ſo powerful a court, even before it was acknowleged by the Engliſh parliament.

The late malady having ceaſed entirely towards the latter end of October, and the neceſſary preparations being made for the purpoſe, Henry was crowned, with great pomp and ſolemnity, on the thirtieth of October, by cardinal Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury. The ceremony of his coronation was attended with the exhibition of a pomp till then unknown in England; I mean a body-guard, which Henry then inſtituted: it conſiſted of fifty archers, called yeomen, under the command of a captain, to be in continual attendance upon his perſon; thus covering with the pretence of grandeur, a prudent precaution which in all likelihood he thought indiſpenſably neceſſary for his own ſafety: the utmoſt care, however, was taken that this inſtitution ſhould not be conſidered as perſonal to the king, but a compliment to his ſucceſſors, whoſe ſtate it was to enhance, and the unſuſpecting, or rather unthinking, people ſwallowed every plauſible pretext ‡.

Henry having thus ſeized not only the ſeat but the reins of government, now ventured upon a parliament, which met in his name (the higheſt act of authority which denominates a king of England) at Weſtminſter, on the ſeventh of November, which entailed the crown upon him; not by way of recognition, or ordinance, but in the manner of ſettlement, enacting, "That the inheritance of the crown ſhould reſt, remain, and abide in him and the heirs of his body:" and this ſtatute was afterwards confirmed by the pope's bull, in which at the ſame time the titles of deſcent and conqueſt were mentioned.

The act of ſettlement or ſucceſſion being paſſed, another point came under conſideration, which proved not a little embarraſſing: ſome of the moſt conſiderable members of the preſent aſſembly had been attainted, as well as Henry himſelf, in the reigns of Edward IV. and Richard III. and a motion being made for annulling the ſentences of attainder againſt Henry's adherents, it was alleged, that thoſe perſons could not, with any appearance of juſtice ſit as judges in their own cauſe. This point was therefore ſubmitted to the arbitration of the judges, who, ſupporting the authority of parliament and the legality of the acts of the houſe of York, gave it as their opinion, "That the knights and burgeſſes attainted by the courſe of law, ſhould forbear to come to the houſe till a law was made for a reverſal of their attainders *."

Another debate aroſe concerning the king himſelf, who had been denounced a traitor and rebel by an authentic act of parliament; this point being likewiſe referred to the ſame arbitration, the judges unanimouſly agreed, "That the crown takes away all defects and ſtops in blood, and that from the time the king did aſſume the crown, the fountain was cleared, and all attainders and corruption of blood diſcharged †." Thus Henry found himſelf ſtrengthened on the one ſide by a title de facto, and on the other by a title de jure. This matter being ſettled, an act paſſed for reverſing the attainder of one hundred and ſeven perſons ‖: this was followed by diſtinct bills in favour of particular perſons, reſtoring them in blood, and to the enjoyment of their eſtates.

But it is not eaſy to conceive by what law, or with what pretence of reaſon, thoſe who fought in Boſworth field on Richard's ſide, againſt the earl of Richmond, could be charged with high-treaſon; yet, beſides Richard himſelf, John Howard, duke of Norfolk, his ſon the earl of Surry, the lords Lovel, Zouch, and Ferrers of Chartley, ſir Walter and ſir James Harrington, ſir Humphrey Stafford, ſir William Berkeley, and twenty other gentlemen were attainted, and all their lands declared forfeited. This proceeding ſeemed little calculated to promote that union between the two houſes of York and Lancaſter, which was the principal thing propoſed in the marriage of Henry and Elizabeth: beſides, how are we to reconcile the attainder of Richard with the deciſion of the judges in the caſe of Henry, that the actual poſſeſſion of the crown took away all defaults, and diſcharged all attainders; unleſs we are to ſuppoſe ſuch attainder meant the forfeitures and treaſons by Richard committed before he was poſſeſſed of the crown?

Henry, having thus at once gratified his revenge and his avarice, for the money ariſing from the confiſcations amounted to ſuch an immenſe ſum, that he had no occaſion to aſk a ſupply this ſeſſion, thought proper to ſweeten the late act of ſeverity in the parliament, by an act of clemency in the prerogative, and publiſhed a general pardon in favour of all thoſe who had borne arms againſt him, provided they would ſubmit themſelves within a limited time; and immediately a great number left their ſanctuaries and took the oath of allegiance. Some other acts of royal favour paſſed likewiſe. About the ſame time the lord Chandois, a native of Brittany, and one of Henry's companions during his exile, was created earl of Bath; ſir Giles d'Aubeney was made a baron, by the title of lord d'Aubeney; and ſir Robert Willoughby was made lord Brooke; while Edward Stafford, ſon to the late duke of Buckingham, was reſtored to all his father's honours and eſtates, which had been confiſcated by the uſurper Richard.

On the tenth of December, the laſt day of the ſeſſion, the houſe of commons thought fit to addreſs the king as he ſat upon the throne, that he would be pleaſed to marry the princeſs Elizabeth without delay, that he might have heirs of his body. This addreſs was no ſooner heard by the lords ſpiritual and temporal, than, all riſing up from their ſeats, and making each a profound reverence before the throne, they made the ſame requeſt. Henry promiſed to gratify them in conſummating the marriage, and the two houſes were prorogued to the twenty-third of January next following, having firſt repealed the act 1 Richard III. for ſettling the crown upon that prince, and ordered the copy of it on record to be taken off the roll of parliament and burnt, the two houſes declaring by this method their utter deteſtation of that act, on account of its baſtardizing the children of Edward IV.

As ſoon as the parliament was diſſolved, Henry ſent into France Oliver King, archdeacon of Oxford, with money to repay king Charles what he had lent him, and his charges in fitting out the fleet which brought him to England; whereupon the marquis of Dorſet and ſir John Bourchier, left as hoſtages at Paris *, had leave to return home. At the ſame time Henry impowered his envoy to prolong the truce with France, if he found Charles and his council inclined to ſuch a meaſure.

In the beginning of the year 1486, Henry ſettled his privy-council, to which he called John Morton, biſhop of Ely, lately returned from Flanders, and Richard Fox †, of whoſe abilities and attachment he had long experience, particularly the former, whom he ſoon after advanced to the metropolitical dignity of Canterbury, and made him lord-chancellor of England; and the latter he made biſhop of Exeter, from whence he afterwards tranſlated him to the ſee of Wincheſter, the richeſt biſhopric in England. Theſe two prelates, with Urſwick the king's chaplain, were generally employed in the moſt important commiſſions, embaſſies, and negociations.

On the eighteenth of January Henry performed his engagement to the nation and to the houſe of York, by ſolemnly eſpouſing the princeſs Elizabeth, on which occaſion the people expreſſed the greateſt demonſtrations of joy.

Henry's firſt political meaſure this year, was to perfect what had been in part begun by his predeceſſor, the aboliſhing all liveries and retainers: for this purpoſe he appointed ſir Humphrey Starkey, ſir William Norris, and others, his commiſſioners for calling before them any man under the degree of a baron, and adminiſtering to them the following oath, which I ſhall inſert as it is to be found in the records, that the reader may form a ſuitable idea of the many abuſes which had ſo long diſturbed the inward peace of our country.

"Ye ſhall ſwear, that ye, from henceforth, ſhall not retain, aid, not comfort any excommunicate perſon, murderer, or felon, or perſon outlawed for felony, by you known ſo to be; nor any ſuch perſon lett [hinder] to be attached or taken therefore, by the order of the law; nor retain any man by indenture, or oath, or your livery, ſign, or token, contrary to the law; nor any maintenance, umbrance, riots, or unlawful aſſemblers make, or cauſe to be made, or aſſent thereto.

"Nor ſhall ye lett, nor cauſe to be letted, the execution of any of the king's writs or precepts, directed to ſuch lawful miniſters and officers as ought to have the execution of the ſame; nor let [admit] any man to bail or mainprize, knowing and deeming him to be a felon, upon your honour and worſhip. So God help you and all ſaints."

This was the firſt mortal blow which the feudal ſyſtem received, though it had been much abridged both of its ſtrength and ornaments.

As the northern counties were moſt of them warmly attached to the houſe of York, Henry, to conciliate the affections of the inhabitants to his government, ſet out, about Eaſter this year, on a progreſs into thoſe parts. During his ſtay at Lincoln he heard that the lord Lovel, the boſom-favourite of the deceaſed Richard, and his two brothers, Humphrey and Thomas Stafford, who had refuſed to accept of the general amneſty, had eſcaped out of Colcheſter abbey, where they had taken ſanctuary ever ſince the battle of Boſworth; that the two latter had gathered together a force, with which they propoſed to attack the city of Worceſter; and that the lord Lovel, at the head of three or four thouſand men, was advancing to ſurprize the city of York, in which place there was but too good reaſon to apprehend that he had correſpondents. Henry, upon receiving a confirmation of this news, wiſely judged that no time was to be loſt to cruſh this inſurrection in its infancy. Accordingly, having enliſted forces in the adjacent counties to the place of his reſidence, to the number of three thouſand, he gave the command of this haſtily raiſed and meanly armed corps to his uncle, the duke of Bedford, with a diſcretionary power to act as he ſhould ſee occaſion, either by proffers of mercy, or by force of arms: that nobleman executed his commiſſion ſo well, that in a very ſhort time the rebels under lord Lovel were reduced to obedience: their chief made his eſcape over ſea to the court of the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy; and the two Staffords hearing of this event, abandoned the ſiege of Worceſter, which they were warmly proſecuting, and, being forſaken by their followers, who accepted the offers of pardon made in the king's name for ſuch as would lay down their arms, took ſactuary in the church of Coldnham, near Abingdon; but the court of King's Bench declaring that the privilege of this place did not extend to traitors, they were dragged from thence; the elder brother, Humphrey, ſuffered at Tyburn; but the younger, as being ſuppoſed under the influence of his ſenior, had his life given him by Henry's moderation.

Nor was this the only inſtance Henry had of the great attachment of the Engliſh people to Edward IV. and his family; for on his return to London, about Midſummer, he found that the people murmured greatly at his poſtponing the coronation of Elizabeth his queen, the evident coldneſs and indifference with which he treated her, and his embracing every opportunity of humbling the friends of the houſe of York; nay, they went ſo far as ſecretly to whiſper about, that he had cauſed the earl of Warwick to be privately put to death in the Tower; and the emiſſaries of the houſe of York induſtriouſly propagated a report that Richard, ſecond ſon to Edward IV. had made his eſcape from the cruelty of his uncle, and was ſtill alive on the continent. The avidity with which theſe reports were ſwallowed by the populace, from the diſguſt they had taken to their new maſter, whoſe perſonal manners were far from being fitted to acquire the affections or gain the hearts of his ſubjects, encouraged Richard Simon, a prieſt of Oxford, to deviſe a ſcheme equally extravagant and enterpriſing. He had a pupil called Lambert Simnel ‡, a youth of uncommon vivacity and extraordinary perſonal accompliſhments, and him he reſolved to paſs upon the world as Richard, duke of York, the ſecond ſon of Edward IV. While he was employed in training up this impoſtor, it was rumoured that Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, had eſcaped from the ruffians ſent to murder him in the Tower, and was concealed ſomewhere in England. Upon this report Simon immediately changed his plan, and determined that his pupil ſhould perſonate this young nobleman; a ſcheme much more extravagant than the other, if we conſider that the ſon of the duke of Clarence had been, after his father's death, honourably maintained in the court of his uncle Edward, until he was eight years of age, and that therefore his perſon was well known to a great number of people. Notwithſtanding this obſtacle, Simon continued to inſtruct his pupil in his new part; and this ſeems to have taken up the whole year, for we hear nothing of him before the beginning of 1487. We ſhall therefore leave him to his inſtructions, and now take a view of the ſituation of the neighbouring princes of Europe, with whom Henry had connections or concerns, this being abſolutely neceſſary to give us a clear inſight into the motives of Henry's conduct, who in his time owed the chief figure he made in Europe to his policy rather than to his arms. We ſhall begin with the affairs of Brittany.

It has been elſewhere obſerved, that Peter Landois, favourite of the duke of Brittany, entirely governed that prince, who was old and infirm, and very much impaired in his underſtanding: ſeveral lords of Brittany had made a league againſt that miniſter, and intended to ſeize him; but, having miſcarried in their deſign, were expoſed to the vengeance of the favourite, who had cauſed them all to be condemned to die. In the beginning of the year 1485*, Landois, in the name of the duke his maſter, levied an army to executed the ſentence; and the lords, on their part, took up arms in their defence. While Brittany was thus divided, and the two parties ready to come to a battle, the condemned lords cauſed it to be repreſented to thoſe who ſerved Landois, that, in the preſent affair, the intereſt of the miniſter only was concerned, and not that of their common maſter, the duke; that it was unjuſt to ſhed the blood of their fellow-ſubjects in the quarrel of a man who had notoriouſly abuſed his maſter's confidence; that therefore, to appeaſe at once the troubles of their country, the more natural and readier way than that of arms, would be to rid themſelves of the miniſter, after which not a man would refuſe to render due obedience to their ſovereign. The lords of the duke's party deeming this expedient very reaſonable, were of opinion that it was for the intereſt of their country and the duke himſelf, that Landois, the ſole cauſe of the troubles, ſhould be ſacrificed to the public good. Landois hearing that the lords of the two armies were contriving ſomething againſt him, cauſed a declaration to be drawn, wherein the duke ordered that all perſons of his army who held intelligence with the proſcribed lords, ſhould be deemed traitors and rebels. But this only ſerved to haſten his ruin; the chancellor, who was in the confederacy againſt him, refuſed to ſeal the declaration, and informed the lords of it, who thereupon determined to carry their ſcheme into immediate execution: accordingly, without giving him time to take other meaſures, they went in a body to the palace, and ſeized Landois in the duke's own apartment, who was forced to deliver him up, on condition they would ſpare his life: but that was not their intention; on the contrary, they brought him to a ſpeedy trial, and, convicting him of a thouſand crimes, made him attone for them on the gallows, before the duke was informed of the ſentence. How much ſoever the duke was troubled at the death of his favourite, he could nor refuſe granting the lords of the two armies letters of pardon. Thus Brittany would have been reſtored to her former tranquility, had not the duke imprudently concerned himſelf with the troubles of the French court, which brought on the ruin of himſelf and his dukedom. This is what muſt now be ſhewn, ſince it was the occaſion of the war which broke out between Charles VIII. and the duke of Brittany, and in which Henry VII. was concerned.

Lewis XI. king of France, dying in the year 1482, left the government of the perſon of his ſon and ſucceſſor, Charles VIII. to his daughter Anne, wife of Peter de Bourbon, lord of Beaujeu. Charles was fourteen years old, and conſequently of age, according to the ordinance of Charles V. but as he had been ill educated, and was of a very infirm conſtitution, the king his father thought him incapable of governing. The moment Lewis XI. was in his grave, Lewis, duke of Orleans, firſt prince of the blood, refuſed to acknowlege Anne of Beaujeu for the king's governeſs, affirming that a woman had no right to meddle with the affairs of the kingdom. The ſtates being aſſembled at Tours, in January, 1484, ended the diſpute by their authority; they confirmed the late king's will, and appointed the duke of Orleans to be preſident of the council in the king's abſence.

Whilſt the ſtates of France were aſſembled, the lords of Brittany made their firſt attempt upon Landois before-mentioned, which proved unſucceſsful. The ſentence which was given againſt them creating a dread of the favourite's revenge, they applied to Anne of Beaujeu, to obtain the king her brother's protection. On the other hand, Landois, ſeeing his enemies had recourſe to the lady Anne, thought he could not do better than rely upon the aſſiſtance of the duke of Orleans: to that end he entreated him to come to the court of Brittany, putting him in hopes the duke would give him in marriage Anne, his eldeſt daughter and preſumptive heireſs. The duke of Orleans had eſpouſed, againſt his will, Joanna, daughter of Lewis XI. but had made againſt this forced marriage a ſecret proteſtation, which he meant to uſe in order to annul it at a more favourable juncture. So, pleaſed with the hopes Landois had inſpired him with, he came to Brittany, where he was extremely careſſed. But he could make no long ſtay there, being obliged to aſſiſt at the king's coronation, which was performed in June that year. Probably, whilſt he was in Brittany, he concerted meaſures with the duke and his favourite to diſturb the government of Anne of Beaujeu, who was become abſolute miſtreſs of the king her brother's perſon and affairs.

Shortly after, the duke of Orleans forming a league againſt the court, and retiring to Boiſgency, demanded that the ſtates of France might be aſſembled. He intended to annul the regulation with reſpect to the government of the king's perſon: but Anne of Beaujeu cauſed the king to march againſt him with ſuch expedition, that he was forced to accept ſuch terms as were preſcribed him, becauſe his friends were not yet ready to aſſiſt him. By the agreement, the count de Dunois and Longueville, who was conſidered as his chief adviſer, was baniſhed to Aſti, in Piedmont, a town belonging to the duke of Orleans, with a command not to ſtir from thence without the king's expreſs licence.

The duke of Orleans, being thus compelled to diſmiſs his troops, cauſed the greateſt part to liſt in the duke of Brittany's army againſt the condemned lords. On the other hand, Anne of Beaujeu ſent likewiſe to the barons part of the king's troops. The death of Landois, which happened ſoon after, was not capable of making the duke of Orleans deſiſt from his projects. He ſtood in need of the duke of Brittany to ſupport him againſt the court, and even hoped one day to marry his daughter. On the other ſide the duke of Brittany, having been greatly oppreſſed by Lewis XI. and knowing Anne of Beaujeu was of the ſame character, and followed the ſame maxims, believed he could not do better than reſt upon the aſſiſtance of the duke of Orleans; therefore, after ſome negociations, theſe two princes formed a league together, into which came John de Châlons, prince of Orange, nephew to the duke of Brittany, the duke of Bourbon, the count de Dunois, the duke of Lorraine, and ſeveral other princes and lords. Some time after, the count de Dunois returned into France without leave, and withdrew to his ſeat at Partenay, in Poictou. The king was yet ignorant of the duke of Orleans's deſigns; but the count de Dunois's return convincing him ſome plot was contriving in favour of that prince who was gone to Blois, he ſent him a poſitive order to repair to court. The duke obeyed upon the ſecond ſummons; but the next day, being informed ſome ill was intended him, feigned to go a hunting, and retired into Brittany, whither he was quickly followed by the prince of Orange and the count de Dunois. This was in the beginning of the year 1486. We muſt now ſee what paſſed in the Netherlands.

Since the death of Mary of Burgundy, Maximilian of Auſtria, her huſband, had been involved in troubles on account of the guardianſhip of her ſon Philip, who became ſovereign of the Low Countries upon the demiſe of the ducheſs his mother: Brabant, Holland, and Zealand had willingly received him for guardian; but Flanders and Hainault refuſed to obey him as ſuch.

The obſtinacy of the Flemings obliged Maximilian to make peace with Lewis upon the following terms: that the dauphin Charles, ſon of Lewis, ſhould marry Margaret, daughter of Maximilian, as ſoon as they attained a certain age: that Margaret ſhould have for dower Artois, Franche Compté, Maçon, and Auxerre, and be educated at the court of France. Purſuant to this treaty, Lewis kept thoſe provinces which he had already ſeized, and took Margaret home, till the marriage ſhould be conſummated.

In 1483, Maximilian ſucceſsfully made war upon the Liegeois. That ſame year Hainault owned him for guardian of his ſon Philip.

In the year 1484, the Flemings ſtill perſiſting in their refuſal to acknowlege Maximilian for guardian, appointed governors for Philip, of whom Adolphus de Cleves, lord of Ravenſtein, was the chief. This obſtinacy occaſioned a war between them and Maximilian, in which Charles VIII. took part by aſſiſting the Flemings.

This war ended in January, 1485, in a treaty, importing that the Flemings ſhould acknowlege Maximilian for guardian of his ſon, upon the expreſs condition that he ſhould not remove him from Flanders till of age. The treaty being ſigned, Maximilian made his entry into Ghent; where, a few days after, a ſedition was raiſed, but which was happily appeaſed. During the reſt of the year the Low Countries enjoyed a tranquility which afforded Maximilian time to take a journey into Germany, to be elected king of the Romans.

I ſhall cloſe this digreſſion with the affairs of Scotland. James III. king of Scotland, had been extremely complaiſant to Richard III. A truce had been agreed upon to laſt between the two kingdoms till the twenty-ninth of September, 1487; and a marriage, as we have already ſeen, was concluded between the duke of Rotheſay, prince of Scotland, and the duke of Suffolk's daughter *, which project fell with Richard's death. Upon the revolution in favour of Henry, the Scots took the opportunity of the unſettled ſtate of his affairs to beſiege and take the caſtle of Dunbar, which had been put into the hands of the Engliſh by the duke of Albany †. Henry's ſituation, and the important affairs which engaged his attention in the beginning of his reign, not permitting him to reſent this breach of the truce in a proper manner, by declaring war againſt the Scots, he thought proper to try the milder methods of negociating, and appointed ambaſſadors to treat with the biſhop of Aberdeen and other commiſſioners named by king James. As Henry was then under high obligations to the French court, the negociation met with no difficulty, and, on the third of July this year (1486), a ceſſation of arms was agreed upon, to laſt between the two kingdoms till the third of July, 1489.

Henry, during all theſe incidents abroad, took no other concern than that of keeping well with every power, without declaring openly for any: but the king's favourite plan ſeems to have been to take advantage of the jarring intereſts which prevailed on the continent, for improving the trade and commerce of England, as will be more particularly ſhewn when we come to conſider the ſtate of Commerce under this reign.

The lord Bacon, in his Life of Henry VII. has fixed the time of the birth of Henry's ſon Arthur to the twentieth of September this year; which, if true, ſuppoſes him to be born in the eighth month. As Henry affected to be the fountain of Britiſh as well as Engliſh royal blood, he gave the name of Arthur to the young prince in memory of the renowned Arthur, the Britiſh hero.

Cardinal Bourchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury, dying about this time, Henry promoted his favourite and chief miniſter, Morton, biſhop of Ely, to that ſee. In the courſe of this year alſo, Stanley, earl of Derby, was created lord high-conſtable of England, with a ſalary of one hundred pounds per annum; and the lord d'Aubeney was made governor of the town and caſtle of Guiſnes and the Marches thereof: and pope Innocent VIII. who was a great friend to Henry, ſent the cardinal Imola as his legate a latere into England, with a bull confirming the act of ſucceſſion, and declaring "the throne of England to belong to him both by right of war, by ſucceſſion, by the election of prelates, nobles, and people, by the decrees, ſtatutes, and ordinances of parliament;" and alſo granting a diſpenſation for his marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth, to whom Henry was related in the fourth degree of conſanguinity *, which, according to the rules of the canon law in thoſe days, was an impediment not to be removed without a papal diſpenſation: "ſentence of excommunication was alſo denounced againſt all rebels and diſturbers of the king or his peace, or any who ſhould preſume to raiſe any diſputes concerning the ſucceſſion to the throne."

It ſhould ſeem that Henry had ſolicited the interpoſition of the court of Rome in this caſe, a ſtep which is not only inexcuſable in him, on account of the meanneſs, but as it was a direct breach of the ſtatute of Præmunire, of which the Engliſh were ſo jealous; though Henry, apprehenſive of the reſentment of the people, had taken care to have it ſaid in the bull, that the pope granted it of his own pure motion, and without any previous requeſt; a clauſe evidently falſe: but we ſhall ſoon ſee that this bull was not capable of preventing the king's being frequently moleſted. The Engliſh were no longer, as formerly, ſuch bigots as to imagine the pope's authority could give Henry a title which he really had not, and which they conſidered as truly exiſting in the princeſs Elizabeth alone, and tranſmitted to him by his marriage with her.

In a word, all Henry's precautions could neither over awe nor ſooth the ſpirit of diſaffection to his government. The year 1487 was uſhered in with many commotions in different parts of the kingdom, which gave occaſion to the erection of the court of Star-chamber, of whoſe authority and powers the reader will find a ſuccinct account in the article of Laws, following this reign. But Henry's peace received a mortal wound by the tidings of the ſucceſs which Simon and his pupil Lambert had met with in the proſecution of their impoſture, which we ſhall now follow through its ſeveral ſteps. Simon, the inſtructor and preceptor of this young adventurer, knowing that Ireland had been long attached to the houſe of York through all its branches, determined (moſt probably too by the advice of the queen-mother, or thoſe who were in the ſecret of Simnel's impoſture) that he ſhould make his firſt appearance in that iſland, as earl of Warwick. Accordingly he carried him over thither, in the ſpring of this year, where he found the people diſpoſed to give him ſuch a reception as he could wiſh, the memory of Clarence, who had been their lord-lieutenant, being ſtill adored by them: the archbiſhops of Armagh and Dublin, and in ſhort almoſt the whole body of the Iriſh nobility, owned Lambert for the earl of Warwick, and he was with unanimous conſent brought to the caſtle of Dublin. We cannot pretend, at this diſtance, to account for the cauſe, but it is certain that Henry's title and perſon were ſo much diſreliſhed in Ireland, that all this was effected without the ſmalleſt oppoſition, the city of Waterford excepted. Henry, indeed, had not taken ſufficient precaution in the choice of his officers and adminiſtration in Ireland: he had appointed his uncle Jaſper, duke of Bedford, lord-lieutenant; but that nobleman had been prevented by ſome accident from paſſing over to take poſſeſſion of his charge, which was executed by Gerald Fitz Gerald, earl of Kildare, as his deputy, who, as well as his brother, the lord Thomas Fitz Gerald, then chancellor of Ireland, were avowed partizans of the houſe of York; and the earl not only ſuffered our young adventurer to be formally preſented to him, but even affected to believe his whole ſtory.

Nothing could give greater diſguſt to Henry than the news of this ſucceſsful impoſture: he ſent to the earl of Kildare, requiring him to come to England; but the earl excuſed himſelf. This confirmed Henry in the ſuſpicions he entertained of that nobleman: and, to add to his perplexity, he was aſſured from good authority, that Margaret, ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, ſiſter to Edward IV. ſupplied the pretender both with money and inſtructions; that the queen dowager herſelf was deeply in the plot; and that John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, who had been declared preſumptive heir to the crown by Richard III. was gone over to Flanders, where he had for ſome time kept a correſpondence with the lord Lovel, then at the ducheſs of Burgundy's court; and in fine, that the confederacy was ſpreading every where in England, by means of theſe perſons and their agents.

In this dilemma, Henry called a cabinet-council at Shene, to deliberate on the meaſures that were to be purſued. The reſult of this deliberation was the ſhutting up of the queen-mother in Bermondſey monaſtery, in Southwark, in order to hinder her from purſuing her intrigues; and the bringing the real earl of Warwick from the Tower, to expoſe him through all the principal ſtreets of London, as well to invalidate the malicious reports of his having been murdered there, as to convince the many, who perſonally knew him, of the falſhood of the pretender's aſſertions. This ſtep, my lord Bacon obſerves, had the deſired effect in England; but the Iriſh, infatuated with their idol, maintained that Henry had ſubſtituted a counterfeit, and that the true earl of Warwick was abſolutely with them. Another reſolution of Henry's council, and which, indeed, proved the moſt ſalutary of all, was to iſſue a general pardon to all offenders, even thoſe guilty of treaſon not excepted. At the ſame time orders were given for ſtrictly guarding the ſea-coaſts towards Flanders and Ireland.

In the mean time the abettors of Simnel's impoſture were not idle: the earl of Lincoln and the duchess of Burgundy having concerted measures with the disaffected nobles of Ireland, it was resolved that Margaret should send over a body of two thousand Germans, all veteran troops, under the command of Martin Schwartz, a brave and experienced officer; and that the earl of Lincoln in person should assist in the expedition: they accordingly took shipping in the month of May, and, after a safe and quick passage, arrived at Dublin. The Irish now imagined themselves so sure of success, that the great officers of state came to a resolution of solemnly crowning Lambert: accordingly a crown was taken from a statue of the Virgin Mary, and placed with great ceremony on the head of the impostor, in the cathedral church of Dublin, who was then proclaimed king, by the name of Edward VI. and it was resolved immediately to carry the war into England, where they imagined they should be assisted by all the friends of the house of York, so as to be able to dethrone the usurper without the least difficulty.

As soon as Henry certainly knew the intention of the rebels, he assembled two armies, the command of which he gave to the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford, in order to secure both sides of the island against a descent; and during the winter he made a tour through the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, where he had most reason to fear an invasion, on account of their neighbourhood to the Low Countries. While he was making some stay at St. Edmundsbury, he heard that the marquis of Dorset was on his way to visit him, in order to clear himself of some aspersions that had been cast upon his character; but Henry, not chusing to have any personal interview with him, which was likely to produce only disagreeable reflections on his late conduct towards the queen-mother, sent the earl of Oxford to meet and convey him to the Tower, there to remain till the present danger was over.

Henry had no sooner returned from his northern progress, than he learned, that, notwithstanding all his precautions, the rebels, with their auxiliaries, had found means to land in Lancashire, and that they were commanded by the earls of Lincoln and Kildare, the lord Lovel, and Martin Schwartz. Upon this intelligence he ordered a general rendezvous of his forces at Coventry, which lies in the centre of the kingdom. Thither Henry repaired in person, accompanied by the duke of Bedford and the earl of Oxford, determined to be ready to encounter any attempts of the enemy. The rebels, on their part, with their mock prince, directed their march towards York, in hopes of being joined in their progress by all the enemies of the present government; but, notwithstanding their sanguine hopes, not an Englishman was added to their standard, except a few under sir Thomas Broughton: this was owing as well to the many wise precautions Henry had taken to strengthen himself against the impending storm, as to the people's conviction of Lambert's being an impostor, and their indignation at beholding their vassals the Irish presuming to place a king on the throne of England. The earl of Lincoln, alarmed at this coldness, and apprehending that his army, amounting to eight thousand men, would rather diminish than increase, determined to venture a battle with the first opportunity.

The same reasons that determined the earl, determined Henry also; and, leaving Coventry, he proceeded as far as Nottingham, where being reinforced by six thousand men, under the command of the earl of Shrewsbury and the lord Strange, he advanced, on the sixteenth of June, to Stoke, a village near Newark, where the earl of Lincoln lay encamped on a rising ground, and offered the enemy battle. The earl, in his present situation, could not decline, and therefore readily accepted the challenge; and marching down the hill with great resolution, began a furious conflict, which was maintained with equal valour on both sides for three hours, though the ranks of the Irish were thinned continually by the shot of the English archers, against which they had no defence, being entirely unprovided with any armour of defence: the English under the earl of Lincoln and the lord Lovel, and the Germans under Schwartz, made so noble a resistance, that the greatest part of Henry's vanguard were cut in pieces; but at last the valour of Henry's troops bore down all before it. The Germans, with their brave leader Schwartz, were all slain fighting on the very spot they occupied; a frightful slaughter was made of the Irish, of whom four thousand, with their commander Fitz Gerald, a brother to the earl of Kildare, were killed; the earl of Kildare, with most of Broughton's English likewise fell in the field, as did the earl of Lincoln: the lord Lovel was never more heard of*; but sir Thomas Broughton escaped to his own estate of Witherslack, in Westmoreland, where he afterwards lived and died in obscurity.

Lambert Simnel and his tutor were taken prisoners; and the latter being committed close prisoner to the Tower, was never heard of more. The former, either as being too young to be arraigned and executed, or because Henry was willing to leave him a living testimony of an imposture, in case he might have occasion to deal with any future claimant of the crown, was employed in the servile office of scullion in the king's kitchen, carrying wood, and doing other menial duties; in which it seems he acquitted himself so well, that he was afterwards raised to be one of the king's falconers: an instance of Henry's deep policy, who by this means deprived his rival even of the smallest degree of consequence in the opinion of any thinking person.

Immediately after the battle, the king marched to Lincoln, from whence he proceeded to York; and in this progress severely punished all who had assisted the rebels, or were convicted of having in any wise favoured them. The delinquents were tried partly by commissioners and partly by martial law; but the punishment fell upon their estates only, the king being satisfied with filling his coffers by fines and confiscations. When he had, as he thought, sufficiently fleeced his enemies, he

* The lord Lovel is by some supposed to have been drowned, in attempting to ford the Trent, after the action; others allege that he lost his life in the battle; and a third set pretend that he passed the remainder of his days in a vault or cavern. This last opinion is strengthened by a discovery made, about sixty years ago, at this nobleman's seat at Minster Lovel, near Witney, in Oxfordshire. The workmen, in repairing the house, found, in a subterraneous room, the figure of a venerable old man, sitting in a great chair, resting one of his elbows on a table, and leaning his head on the palm of his hand; but when touched, the body fell into dust. procured a bull from the pope, Innocent VIII. impowering the archbiſhop of Canterbury to abſolve them of the excommunication they had incurred by violating the former bull of ſettlement; as if he had been tenderly ſolicitous about the ſalvation of even thoſe who had ſought his downfal.

While Henry reſided at York, deputies arrived from Scotland, to terminate ſome differences concerning the fiſhery of the river Eſk; and the king took this occaſion to begin a negociation with James III. the Scottiſh monarch, to whoſe court he ſent Fox, biſhop of Exeter, and ſir Richard Edgcombe, to treat of a tripple alliance. The treaty was projected and agreed to by the Scots, on the following terms:

"I. That the high and mighty prince, James Stuart, marquis of Ormond, earl of Roſs, and lord Brechin, ſecond ſon to king James, ſhould marry the right noble lady Catherine, third daughter of Edward IV. late king of England, and ſiſter to the princeſs Elizabeth, now queen of England.

"II. That the ſaid James, king of Scotland, ſhould marry Elizabeth, late wife to the ſaid king Edward IV.

"III. That James, prince of Scotland, duke of Rotheſay, earl of Carrick, &c. ſhould marry another of the daughters of Edward IV.

"IV. That the king of England ſhould cede, for ever, the town and caſtle of Berwick to the Scots.

"V. That, in order to ſettle the articles and conditions of the three marriages, a congreſs ſhould be held at Edinburgh on the twenty-fourth of January enſuing, another in May, and an interview between the two kings ſome time in July.

"VI. and laſtly, That the truce ſubſiſting between the two crowns ſhould be prolonged for thirteen months."

This indenture and convention was ſo ill reliſhed by the Scottiſh nobility, that in the enſuing year they formed a conſpiracy againſt their ſovereign, and at laſt fought, defeated, and murdered him in the field.

The king, in his progreſs through the North, had frequent opportunities to find that his viſible partiality againſt the houſe of York was the chief root of diſaffection to his government, and that the ſtrongeſt ſymptom of his partiality was held to be his refuſing to admit the queen to be crowned; therefore he determined to remove this ſubject of complaint, and, on his return to London, cauſed all the neceſſary preparations to be made for that purpoſe: he conſtituted the duke of Bedford high-ſteward for the coronation of the queen, which was performed, with the uſual ſolemnity, on the twenty-fifth of November, being then in the twenty-firſt year of her age, and about two years after her marriage. The marquis of Dorſet was at the ſame time releaſed, without examination or trial; and, towards the end of the year ſent, on a ſolemn embaſſy to the pope, with advice of the king's marriage, the coronation of the queen, and offers of ſervice and ſpiritual obedience. Thus Henry endeavoured to make a coalition of all parties, for ſupporting his government; and it was this conduct that chiefly contributed to give him the great figure he now made in the eyes of foreign princes, whoſe affairs it is proper we ſhould once more review.

The war ſtill continued in the Low Countries, where the troops of Charles VIII. ſurprized St. Omer's and Terouenne; and the inhabitants of Ghent were incited by a nobleman, called Ruffingham, to revolt againſt Maximilian. By this time Francis II. duke of Brittany, now very old and infirm, having no ſons, with the conſent of his eſtates ſettled the ſucceſſion upon his two daughters, Anne and Iſabel, the laſt of which dying before her father, Anne became ſole heireſs of Brittany. Charles VIII. propoſed to unite that duchy with France, by marrying this princeſs; but his ſcheme was traverſed by Lewis, duke of Orleans, to whom, as we have already obſerved, the duke of Brittany had given an aſylum at his court, together with the count de Dunois, and others of that party; and the lords of Brittany, on their ſides, entered into a negociation with Charles, though their motives were very different from thoſe by which the French king was actuated. When he concluded the alliance, he thought the treaty would furniſh him with an opportuninity to make a complete conqueſt of Brittany, while they hoped his protection would ſcreen them from the reſentment and arbitrary deſigns of their own ſovereign. In purſuance of this treaty, Charles, about May, 1487, marched ſeveral numerous bodies of forces towards the frontiers of Brittany, and, after reducing Ploermel, Vannes, and Dinant, laid ſiege to Nantes; but, after the French had lain before it for the ſpace of ſix weeks, they were compelled to abandon their enterprize by the count de Dunois, who found means to throw into the city a ſtrong body of troops, which had been ſent to the aſſiſtance of Francis by Maximilian, king of the Romans, who had views of eſpouſing his daughter.

The gaining of the battle of Stoke had given Henry of England ſo conſiderable a figure, that the court of France ſent a formal embaſſy to congratulate him on his ſucceſs, and beſpeak his friendſhip or at leaſt neutrality between them and the court of Brittany. Henry for ſome time amuſed the French ambaſſadors with promiſes of mediating between them and the duke, alleging that, as he had been under ſtrong obligations both to the king their maſter and to Francis, gratitude would not permit him openly to ſide with either againſt the other. In the mean time, however, he laid the affair before his parliament, who, on taking the matter into deliberation, and perceiving that the true aim of the French court was to annex the duchy of Brittany to their crown, which could not fail of being very injurious to the Engliſh intereſt on the continent, it was reſolved that the duke of Brittany ſhould be aſſiſted, and a ſubſidy was voted for that purpoſe; but Henry, who had only aſked his parliament's advice on that ſubject in order to get money from them, and having effected his deſign, never troubled himſelf about the affairs of Brittany any otherwiſe than by multiplying embaſſies, which he well knew would come to nothing.

However, in the ſpring of the enſuing year, 1488, at the earneſt requeſt of the lord Woodville, the queen's uncle, governor of the Iſle of Wight, he gave him a tacit permiſſion of tranſporting a body of four hundred men to the duke's aſſiſtance; and he had even the meanneſs to diſavow his knowlege of this tranſaction, when Charles ſent deputies to make complaint of it.

Lewis de la Tremouille, one of the French generals, had at that time invaded Brittany with an army of twelve thouſand French, and taken Chateau Briant and Ancennis; he afterwards reduced Fougeres, one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes on the frontiers of that country, and inveſted St. Aubin du Cormier. The Bretons advancing to the relief of that place, the two armies came to a general engagement, on the twenty-eighth of July, and the French gained the day by the advantage of their cavalry, in which they were much ſuperior: Woodville, with all his Engliſh, and about five thouſand Bretons, were killed on the ſpot; the duke of Orleans and the prince of Orange were taken priſoners. This victory was followed by the ſurrender of St. Aubin; Dinant ſubmitted without reſiſtance, and St. Malo's capitulated after a ſlight defence.

The duke, being now left without any army to oppoſe the enemy, was obliged to accept ſuch terms as Charles thought fit to impoſe: theſe were, that he ſhould diſmiſs all his foreign auxiliaries, and ſolemnly promiſe never to admit any into his country for the future; that the French ſhould retain all the places they had in their poſſeſſion; and that the duke ſhould not diſpoſe of his daughter in marriage without the conſent of the French monarch. This treaty was concluded at Sablé, on the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, 1488; and about ten days afterwards the duke of Brittany himſelf died, leaving his daughter Anne heireſs of his dominions. She had, it is true, an excellent council appointed her by her father; but being without troops or money, ſhe was in no condition to reſiſt the French; for Charles, to make good his pretenſions, either by force or marriage, upon that duchy, immediately entered it with a ſtronger army than ever, and, towards the end of this year, made himſelf maſter of almoſt all the Lower Brittany.

As for Maximilian, inſtead of being in a condition to ſuccour his future father-in-law, he was himſelf impriſoned at Bruges, and remained in confinement until his father, Frederic the emperor, marched into the Low Countries, at the head of a numerous army, to his relief. He was ſo intent upon fortifying himſelf againſt the mutinous ſpirit of the Flemings, that, forgetting all his engagements with the duke of Brittany, he ſent an envoy to Spain, to demand of Ferdinand and his queen Iſabella, their daughter Iſabella for himſelf, and the younger infanta, Jane, for his ſon Philip. Mean while Philip de Cleves, lord of Ravenſtein, being choſen general of the inhabitants of Ghent, ſurprized the city of Bruſſels, and Maximilian retired to Germany, leaving Albert, duke of Saxony, to command for his ſon Philip in the Low Countries: and thus was the duke of Brittany totally abandoned by this ally, on whom he had placed ſo great confidence, and left to ſue for peace in the humble manner we have already deſcribed. It is now time to attend the domeſtic affairs of our own country.

In the latter end of the year 1487, Henry ſummoned a parliament at Weſtminſter, which continued ſitting far into the year 1488, and ſeveral excellent regulations were enacted therein, all which will be found under their proper heads, and will give the reader an idea of the firſt ſteps taken towards eſtabliſhing the preſent excellent form of government now exiſting, which we hope will be as permanent as is natural order or moral obligation. It was in this parliament that the king had a grant of a ſubſidy towards enabling him to aſſiſt the duke of Brittany effectually: it conſiſted of two fifteenths, beſides a poll-tax upon aliens, and an act of reſumption; but the rigorous manner in which theſe aids were levied, occaſioned great murmuring, particularly among the inhabitants of Yorkſhire and the biſhopric of Durham, who, as old partizans of the houſe of York, hated Henry, and refuſed to comply with the conditions of the tax, which, they ſaid, was a grievous oppreſſion, eſpecially the tenth penny laid upon every man's lands and goods.

At length theſe diſcontents were blown into open rebellion, by the inſtigation of one John a Chambre, of Yorkſhire, a fellow who delighted in ſedition and turbulency, and who ſoon got together a number of diſſolute people, ready for any enterprize into which their factious leader choſe to carry them. The moſt immediate object of their rage was the earl of Northumberland, who was lord-lieutenant in thoſe parts, and to whom they had ineffectually applied for a mitigation of the impoſt, and who had, indeed, made himſelf particularly odious to the Yorkiſts by his behaviour at the battle of Boſworth: in ſhort, the inſurgents got to ſuch an height, that they broke into the earl's houſe at Cockſedge, near Thirſk, about eighteen miles from York, and, after rifling the dwelling, dragged the earl out into the open fields, where, after making him go through a thouſand barbarous indignities, they completed their revenge by knocking out his brains. Then, putting one ſir John Egremont, a factious knight, at their head, they formed a kind of an army, and openly declared that they would march to London, and give battle to Henry.

The king was no ſooner informed of this diſturbance, than he ſent a body of troops againſt the rebels, under the command of the earl of Surry, whom he had lately releaſed out of the Tower and taken into his favour. That nobleman attacking the inſurgents, defeated them at the firſt onſet, and took John a Chambre priſoner, but ſir John Egremont made his eſcape, and fled for refuge to the court of the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, the aſſured aſylum to all who declared themſelves enemies to Henry Tudor. As a reward for his ſervices, Henry made the earl of Surry his lieutenant in thoſe parts, in the room of the late earl of Northumberland, and ſir Richard Tunſtal to be firſt commiſſioner for collecting the ſubſidy, which was done without the abatement of one penny.

We will now purſue Henry's great concern on the continent. The guardians of the young ducheſs of Brittany dreading leſt their ſovereign and her dominions ſhould fall a prey to the ambitious views of the French monarch, ſolicited without ceaſing the court of England to interpoſe its ſuccour. At length Henry began to perceive that he had continued his pacific plan too long. The uniting of the duchy of Brittany to the crown of France was an event which the Engliſh had great reaſon to dread; it would deprive them of an ancient and uſeful ally; it would increaſe the power of their moſt formidable enemy; it would raiſe the maritime power of France to ſuch an height, as in the ſequel might prove extremely dangerous; and it would add to the French dominions a country of large extent, abounding with brave ſoldiers and hardy ſeamen, and very conveniently ſituated either for diſtreſſing their trade, or keeping them in continual fear of an invaſion.

Influenced by theſe and the like conſiderations, Henry determined in good earneſt to oppoſe the deſigns of the French monarch, and ſupport the ducheſs of Brittany in the poſſeſſion of her lawful rights. With this view he appointed ſir Richard Edgcombe, comptroller of his houſhold, and Dr. Ainſworth, ſecondary of the privy-ſeal, his ambaſſadors to the ducheſs of Brittany; and they were ſo aſſiduous in executing their commiſſion, that, on the tenth of February, 1489, they concluded a treaty offenſive and defenſive between Henry and that princeſs, the principal articles of which were as follow.

I. If the king of England, or his ſucceſſors, ſhould attempt the recovery of Normandy, Guienne, or any other territory, parcel of the kingdom of France, that then the ducheſs was to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of her power. This article was recited on the part of the ducheſs, in caſe that ſhe, for the like reaſons, ſhould carry the war into France.

II. That Henry ſhall, at his own expence, ſend ſix thouſand armed men to the defence of the ducheſs, of whom not more than five hundred were to be employed by him in garriſoning the cautionary towns to be yielded by this treaty, and thoſe troops to ſerve till the firſt of November enſuing.

III. That the ducheſs ſhall find ſhips and victualling for tranſporting the ſaid troops into England; and that ſhe ſhall repay, in England, the money expended by Henry upon the ſaid ſix thouſand auxiliaries, which were to be embarked at Portſmouth towards the middle of February next enſuing.

IV. That, as ſoon as the ſaid auxiliaries are landed, the ſaid ducheſs ſhall deliver to Henry, or his deputies, two of the following places, and all their revenues, as cautionary for the repayment of the ſaid ſum, till it is repaid, viz. Tonclurom near Hennebon, Auray, Vannes, Guerrande: in like manner it is provided, that whatever ſuccours the ſaid ducheſs ſhould afford to Henry, in his proſecution of a war with France, they ſhould be by him paid, or their expences deducted from thoſe of the auxiliaries furniſhed by him to her. This condition is reciprocal.

V. That the ducheſs ſhall ſwear, and the marſhal of Brittany with three others of the principal noblemen to be bound in the ſame oath, that ſhe will not reclaim any of the ſaid cautionary towns, before the repayment of her whole debt contracted to Henry, which is to be liquidated by commiſſioners appointed on both ſides.

VI. That the ducheſs ſhall give to Henry ſixteen hoſtages, to remain on board the Engliſh ſhips until ſuch time two of the fore-mentioned places, well provided in victuals and artillery, are delivered, according to the king of England's option.

VII. That the ducheſs, the marſhal of Brittany, and three or four of her principal noblemen, ſhall ſwear that ſhe will contract no marriage with any perſon, without the conſent and approbation of the ſaid king of England, the ſaid noblemen engaging themſelves to make good this article.

VIII. That the ſaid ducheſs ſhall not agree to any peace, or other alliance or intelligence, with any prince, the kings of the Romans and of Spain excepted, nor with them unleſs that he (Henry) is included in any treaty made with them by her; and likewiſe, that ſhe ſhall agree upon no truce or armiſtice for more than two months, but as above; nor for that neither without comprehending the king of England in the ſame. The latter part of this article is likewiſe reciprocal.

Such were the principal articles of the treaty of Rhedon, ſo called from the name of the place where it was concluded. It is eaſy to perceive, that in making this treaty Henry had three different views; firſt, to prevent Charles VIII. from becoming maſter of Brittany; ſecondly, to frighten that monarch into a compliance, by the ſending over to Brittany a ſtrong body of forces; his third and chief aim, was to ſecure the reimburſement of ſuch ſums as he might advance for the maintenance of ſix thouſand men for eight months; in all which Henry, agreeable to his eſtabliſhed maxim, made his own intereſt take place of every other conſideration: at the ſame time, in order to ſtrengthen himſelf more effectually, he concluded a treaty of alliance and commerce with young Philip, duke of Burgundy, ſon of Maximilian, king of the Romans; another for reviving the ancient alliances with Portugal, and for making that king (John II.) a knight of the Garter; a third, for removing all differences with the king of the Romans; and a fourth, for treating of a marriage between his ſon Arthur, prince of Wales, and Catherine of Arragon, daughter to Ferdinand, king of Caſtile, and for reviving the alliances with that court. To give the greater weight to theſe negociations, an army was raiſed by the advice of the parliament, which met again in the beginning of this year, for the ſupport of Brittany, and it was to be commanded by the lord Brooke and ſir John Halwell.

The French regency, alarmed at theſe reſolutions of the court of England, ſent over the archbiſhop of Sens, to expoſtulate with Henry on the part he was about to act; but the latter, with his uſual caution and policy, pretended that he was only an inſtrument in the hands of his parliament, in taking part with the ducheſs of Brittany, as it was far from being his own intention or deſire to act againſt a court, to which he owed ſo many obligations as he did to that of France. The archbiſhop, however, was not to be ſo eaſily impoſed upon; he ſaw into, and gave his court advice of, the true deſigns of Henry, which they found confirmed by the arrival of the Engliſh auxiliaries in March, who landed, to the number of eight thouſand, at Guerande, under the command of the lord Willoughby, ſir John Cheney, ſir John Middleton, Haletown, Corbet, Lighton, Cornwall, and others: they were readily received into Guerande, but refuſed admittance into Hennebon.

The French, however, by their prudent caution, preſerved all the footing they had gained in Brittany; diſtributed in garriſons through almoſt all the great towns, they over-ran the neighbourhood without oppoſition; the ducheſs had neither forces to check their excurſions, nor money to levy and maintain an army, nor even intereſt enough to procure her new allies, the Engliſh, the poſſeſſion of the places ſtipulated in the treaty of Rhedon; and theſe latter were too weak to undertake the ſiege of large and populous cities; the noblemen of Brittany were reſolute in refuſing them admittance into any of their caſtles. On the other hand, the French, fully ſenſible of what Engliſh courage was able to effect, if dared to exertion, prudently declined hazarding a general engagement, and kept themſelves within their ſtrong holds, waiting for every opportunity of making ſucceſsful ſallies, ſallies, and ſurprize the detached parties of the enemy.

In theſe ſlight and trivial ſkirmiſhes the ſummer was ſpent without any action of importance; and the Engliſh, ſeeing nothing but diſcord and diſſention in the court of Brittany, returned to their own country, in the month of November, the term of their ſervice being then fully expired. But, in order to have a clear view of Henry's ſituation at this juncture, we muſt take a cloſer view of the hiſtory of the Breton court, and that of France, ſince the death of the duke of Brittany *.

Francis had left the guardianſhip of his daughter to the marſhal de Rieux and the counts de Comminges and Dunois, and committed the principal care of her perſon to Philip de Montauban, chancellor of the duchy, who, with the prince of Orange, couſin to the young ducheſs, compoſed the ruling part of the council, and engroſſed the direction of public affairs. Theſe noblemen were greatly divided in their ſentiments about the diſpoſal of their young ward in marriage.

The duke of Brittany had, in purſuance of the common practices of that time, amuſed ſeveral ſuitors with the hopes of marrying his daughter; he had even given a poſitive promiſe to Allain, lord d'Albret, who was upwards of forty years of age, while that of the princeſs was not above eleven. The marſhal de Rieux was bent upon giving her to this nobleman: the chancellor Montauban and the count de Comminges obſerved a neutrality, contented with having the perſon of the princeſs in their hands: while the young duke of Orleans made warm pretenſions to the lady, which was favoured by the ſolicitations of the count de Dunois, ſtill at the Breton court.

Whilſt cabals were carrying on at the court of Brittany, for the intereſts of theſe rivals, a treaty was made at Francfort, on the twenty-ſecond of July, between Maximilian and the king of France, in which a ſtipulation was made for the latter's putting St. Malo's, and other places he poſſeſſed in that province, into the hands of the duke of Bourbon and the prince of Orange (as ſequeſtrators, to preſerve them in a neutrality till the right of the duchy was judicially determined), as ſoon as the Engliſh were ſent out of Brittany. This treaty was ratified by both parties, and now Maximilian puſhing his addreſſes with more vigour than ever, and having gained the chancellor Montauban and the count de Comminges over to his intereſt, he, towards the end of this year, was married to the young ducheſs, by the count de Naſſau, his proxy, who, by way of conſummation, put his naked leg under the eſpouſal ſheets, while the ducheſs was in bed, a ceremony firſt invented on this occaſion.

The treaty between Charles and Maximilian was executed with great punctuality in ſuch articles as particularly concerned themſelves; but in thoſe relating to Brittany, the French ſtarted difficulties, and refuſed to reſign the places they poſſeſſed, on pretence that the province was not entirely cleared of Engliſh forces. In this ſituation were the affairs of the continent during the year 1489, while Henry was at home purſuing his great plan of aboliſhing the feodal law, and thereby making room for the ſafety of government, the exerciſe of induſtry, and the influx of commerce †.

The parliament of England, which had been prorogued laſt year from the twenty-third of February to the fourteenth of October, and, after having ſat till the fourth of December, been again prorogued to Monday the twenty-fifth of January, 1490, met on this laſt-mentioned day, for the uſual buſineſs of granting ſupplies, and for the more extraordinary one of attainting ſome perſons on account of a conſpiracy, about a month before, for delivering an innocent youth out of priſon.

Theſe perſons were John, abbot of Abingdon, John Maine and Chriſtopher Swanne, of the ſame place, Edward Frank and Thomas Rothwell, prieſt, of London; and they were charged, the three firſt with deſigning to go abroad the New Year's day 1487, to the earl of Lincoln, then in Flanders, and to have concerted a ſcheme for getting Edward, earl of Warwick, out of the king's ward, in order, as was ſurmiſed, to excite an inſurrection. The four laſt had conſulted once about it, at the houſe of one Henry Davy, in London, and another time at Abingdon; the abbot had been at neither of theſe meetings, nor ſpoken to any of the conſpirators except Maine; but, approving the ſcheme, had furniſhed them with money to aſſiſt in the execution of it. The young earl was kept ſo cloſe a priſoner, that no one knew for certain where he was, and the deſign miſcarried from the conſpirators miſtaking the place of his concealment or impriſonment; and the affair being diſcovered, all their lands and goods were declared forfeited, except ſuch as belonged to the monaſtery: but this ſentence was not to bar the king's prerogative from inflicting ſuch farther puniſhment on the abbot as he ſhould ſee fit; however, Henry contented himſelf with having ſwept all the wealth of the parties into his own coffers; and, not caring to revive the murmurs of the people by too frequent exertions of revenge on the Yorkiſts, dropped any farther proſecution. The parliament having granted a conſiderable ſubſidy on the twenty-ſeventh of February, was then diſſolved.

The diſpute with the court of France and that of Brittany, about the evacuation of places agreeable to the late treaty of Francfort, occaſioned a renewal of hoſtilities; and the lord d'Albret, chagrined at the marriage of the ducheſs with Maximilian, ſurprized Nantes, and delivered it into the hands of the French. In this dilemma, Anne, whoſe marriage with Maximilian had been kept a profound ſecret, as well from Charles of France as Henry of England, ſent the chancellor Montauban, and other envoys, to demand ſuccours of Henry, and even engaged never to marry without his knowlege and conſent, and to deliver the town and caſtle of Morlaix, as a ſecurity into Henry's hands for the money he had lent her. The ambaſſadors arrived in the month of February, but it was September before Henry could be brought to take any definitive meaſures in her favour: about that time he gave orders to ſir Thomas Lovel and Dr. Ainſworth, to meet with the ambaſſadors of Maximilian, and to enter into concert with them for making war upon the king of France, for the recovery of the towns "which the ſaid king (to uſe the words of the record, Rymer, vol. xii. p. 397), againſt all equity of law, villainouſly uſurped, and unjuſtly detained by force and fraud, from the ſaid Maximilian, or his ſon Philip, duke of Burgundy, or the ducheſs of Brittany." The emperor of Germany, the king and queen of Spain, the kings of Denmark and Portugal, were invited to accede to this treaty, together with the electors and princes of the empire. The king and queen of Spain immediately acceded to the ſame, and their acceſſion was notified by public proclamation throughout all England. But beſides this, Henry made a ſeparate treaty with the court of Spain for attacking France, unleſs ſhe would deliver up the county of Rouſſillon to the Spaniards, and likewiſe for renewing the treaty of marriage between prince Arthur and the princeſs Catherine of Spain; it was even agreed upon, that the marriage ſhould be celebrated as ſoon as the prince attained the age of fourteen and the princeſs that of twelve; and that ſhe ſhould have for her portion two hundred thouſand crowns, each crown to be valued at four ſhillings and two pence ſterling. This treaty was concluded on the part of Henry by Dr. Savage and ſir Richard Naufan.

Great effects might probably have ariſen from this formidable alliance againſt France, could Henry have been perſuaded to part with his money; but his fondneſs for that made him ſlight every other conſideration, and, inſtead of acting vigorouſly, he agreed to open conferences, at the ſolicitation of Charles, who dreaded his junction with the ducheſs, and ſent ambaſſadors to France, to endeavour to mediate between that court and the ducheſs and Maximilian. Charles, in the mean time, amuſed the Engliſh ambaſſadors with evaſive profeſſions, in order to gain time, that he might be able to terminate the war to his own advantage, without referring the diſpute to Henry, whoſe arbitration he had no mind to adopt.

During theſe negociations the duke of Saxony, who commanded in the Low Countries, in the name of Maximilian, publiſhed an edict touching the coin, to which the inhabitants of Bruges refuſed to ſubmit, and thoſe of Ghent joined in their revolt. The king of France, whoſe conſtant aim was to foment domeſtic troubles in the dominions of his neighbours, ſent ſuccours to the rebels, under the command of marſhal Deſguardes, governor of Picardy; and on the other hand Maximilian ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, to crave his aſſiſtance. The king of England, piqued at the manner in which Charles had ſhuffled with his ambaſſadors, and unwilling to ſee the archduke oppreſſed by his own ſubjects, ſent the lords d'Aubeney, Willoughby, and Morley to his aſſiſtance, with a body of three thouſand men; theſe, joining with a body of Maximilian's German troops, threw themſelves, unperceived by the enemy into Dixmude, which the Flemings, with the aſſiſtance of the French, had inveſted, after having taken Ypres and Sluys. D'Aubeney, who had the chief command of the Engliſh and Germans, ſallying forth the next morning by daybreak, came unawares upon the enemy, who were lying in full ſecurity in their camp, and falling upon them ſword in hand, routed them entirely, no leſs than eight thouſand French and Flemings being that day cut in pieces; and of the Engliſh, beſides the lord Morley, who fell in the beginning of the action, not above one hundred. The ſmall force d'Aubeney had with him not permitting the proſecution of even ſo conſiderable a victory, he contented himſelf with burning to the ground the town of Oſtend, which was then in poſſeſſion of the French, and immediately after marched the Engliſh troops into Nieuport, with all the cannon they had taken from the enemy, and ſo rich a booty that moſt of the common ſoldiers were now poſſeſſed of fine horſes and rich cloathing.

Theſe advantages which Maximilian got on the ſide of Picardy, and the reſolution Henry ſeemed now to have taken, of ſupporting his new allies, made Charles reſolve to ſend an embaſſy into England, to learn what he had to hope or fear from the Engliſh monarch, and, if poſſible, to detach him from the intereſt of the ducheſs of Brittany. For this purpoſe he choſe Francis de Luxembourg viſcount of Martigues, Valeran de Sannes, and Robert de Gaguin, general of the order of the Trinity. Henry, by an unaccountable ſpirit of dallying and prolonging the evil hour of parting with his money, agreed to open the conferences, and appointed Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter; the earl of Ormond; Gunthorpe, dean of Wells; the prior of Chriſt church, in Canterbury; ſir John Bourne; ſir Robert Tuberville, treaſurer of Calais; and Robert Roſs, purveyor of the ſame, to treat with the French concerning a final determination of all differences between the two crowns. Nothing material was tranſacted at theſe conferences, which paſſed chiefly in idle claims and uſeleſs altercations on both ſides. Morton, Henry's chancellor, indeed affected to talk in a very loſty ſtyle, and even told the French ambaſſadors, that the king his maſter expected the continuance or renewal of the payment of the appointment or tribute ſtipulated to Edward IV. by the treaty of Amiens; and when the French ambaſſadors declared they had no inſtructions on that head, he peremptorily told them "that the king their maſter muſt not be ſurprized, if, in caſe of a refuſal, king Henry ſhould aſſert his right, not only to the duchies of Normandy, Guienne, and Anjou, but even to the crown of France itſelf, as his lawful inheritance *."

The French ambaſſadors were ſurprized at this declaration; they behaved, however, with great ſpirit, and replied, that they made no doubt but the king their ſovereign's ſword would be able to maintain his ſceptre, adding, "that though they had no inſtructions upon the point ſtarted by the court of England; yet they could venture to ſay, that their maſter would never conſent to diſmember from his crown any part of its rights and poſſeſſions." This appearance of reſolution made Henry fear he had gone too far; he ordered Morton to ſound the ambaſſadors upon the following queſtion, "Whether Charles would accept the diſpoſal of the ducheſs of Brittany in marriage, with the excluſive condition that he ſhould not marry her himſelf?" To this queſtion the ambaſſadors replied, that their king was ſo far from entertaining any thought of eſpouſing the ducheſs, that he had given them no inſtructions on the ſubject: ſoon after they took their leave. Henry, upon this occaſion, ſpun his politics too fine; his intention was to intimidate Charles, and for that purpoſe he made uſe of a rhodomontade, which produced a contrary effect. The French king knew he was too wiſe to embark in ſuch a chimerical project as the conqueſt of France; and therefore interpreted his menaces into an artifice for deterring him from the conqueſt of Brittany, which he reſolved to proſecute without farther heſitation: he was ſtrengthened in this reſolution when his ambaſſadors, on their return home, told him that Henry had notified to them, before their departure, that he was to ſend an embaſſy immediately to France, to treat of all differences.

In February, 1491, Henry ſent ambaſſadors into France according to his promiſe*. Their commiſſion was "to treat of all his differences with king Charles, and in particular of a certain ſum due to him from that prince (doubtleſs meaning the tribute), as alſo of the affair between Charles and the ducheſs of Brittany†." Theſe inſtructions alone, ſays a modern hiſtorian, are a clear evidence that Henry had no deſign to puſh his pretenſions to the realm of France, or at leaſt to Guienne and Normandy, with any vigour; for is it probable that he would have comprized under the general word Differences, his claim to all France, or to two of the richeſt provinces, and have ſpecified a debt of one hundred and twenty five thouſand crowns, if the firſt had been his principal point in view? It is therefore manifeſt he ſtill perſiſted in his deſire to end the affair of Brittany without war, and to ſecure the ſums he had advanced.

About the ſame time, viz. the beginning of the year 1491, he appointed commiſſioners to treat with the ambaſſadors lately arrived from Brittany. Then it was, probably that the ducheſs's marriage with Maximilian was imparted to him; or perhaps it was known to him before, though he pretended ignorance of it, as not having been notified to him in form. Theſe ambaſſadors, who were the lord of Maupertuis and Peter Cajalu, had alſo in charge to ſolicit Henry to beſtir himſelf more effectually in behalf of the ducheſs, who had received certain advice that the court of France was meditating an invaſion againſt her dominions, which muſt fall into their hands, if not timely ſuccoured. Henry gave them the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that, if the preſent negociations in which he was engaged with Charles, did not take the deſired effect, he would immediately unſheathe the ſword in behalf of their miſtreſs, and protect her with all his power againſt the deſigns of her enemies. The ambaſſadors were obliged to put up with theſe promiſes, and we ſhall leave them at the court of England, to take a view of what paſſed on the continent.

No ſooner was Charles informed of the marriage of the ducheſs Anne with Maximilian, and the promiſes made to the Breton ambaſſadors by Henry, than he at once perceived that he ſhould never be able by force of arms to accompliſh his deſigns upon the duchy of Brittany, and therefore determined to have recourſe to the only expedient that could inſure ſucceſs, namely, eſpouſing the ducheſs himſelf, by which means he ſhould, by an eaſy and natural conſequence, complete his deſign upon her dominions; and he found no ſmall encouragement in the diſpoſitions of the lord d'Albret and the marſhal de Rieux, eſpecially the former, who, by the contract of the ducheſs with Maximilian, had loſt all hopes of becoming her huſband: that party therefore cloſed with the propoſition, privately communicated to them by the French miniſtry, who made no ſecret of their maſter's intention to reannex the duchy of Brittany to his own crown, either by arms or marriage. And Charles, making his intereſt take the lead of every other conſideration, and beginning to diſlike the conduct of the ducheſs of Bourbon, went himſelf and took the duke of Orleans out of the tower of Bourges, where he had been confined ever ſince the battle of St. Aubin. This generous proceeding united the court and the kingdom of France; and the duke of Orleans ſo far loſt his love in his politics, that he not only reſigned all pretenſions to the ducheſs, but had a principal ſhare in contriving and conducting the whole negociation of her marriage with the king of France.

This ſcheme, however, was attended with ſome difficulties, which to a prince of a leſs enterprizing genius than Charles would have appeared altogether unſurmountable. He himſelf was under an engagement, by the treaty of Arras, A. D. 1482, to marry Margaret of Auſtria, daughter to Maximilian, who had been near ſeven years at the French court, conſidered as queen, and waiting only the proper age to be ſo declared upon her marriage. The ducheſs of Brittany had been bred with a high contempt of his perſon, which was mean and deformed; ſhe thought herſelf already married to Maximilian, and ſhe had for ſome time taken the title of queen of the Romans; ſhe had juſt received freſh aſſurances from Henry of his readineſs to march to her aſſiſtance; and ſhe had declared herſelf reſolved to make the moſt vigorous reſiſtance: but all theſe impediments were too weak barriers to check the ambitious career of the French monarch. He gained over the count de Dunois and the prince of Orange, and they uſed all the art they were maſters of to diſpoſe the minds of the Bretons to peace: though at the ſame time they pretended to enter into all the meaſures of the ducheſs for calling in the Engliſh to her aſſiſtance; They ſoon found means to perſuade the noblemen of Brittany to eſpouſe the cauſe of Charles: the chancellor Montauban was won over by the marſhal de Rieux and the lord d'Albret.

Theſe all joined their efforts to bring the young ducheſs to conſent to a match with Charles; but her affection for Maximilian, the frequent attempts which the former had made to deprive her of her inheritance, and the conſtant regard which the latter had expreſſed for her intereſt, the contract of the French monarch with Margaret of Auſtria, her hereditary hatred to the French nation, her treaties with the kings of England and Caſtile, and eſpecially her marriage with Maximilian, all concurred to make her reſolve not to hearken to any remonſtrances on the ſubject; and ſhe ſtood the attacks of her nobility, all won with French gold, with a ſteadineſs which was wonderful in ſo young a princeſs: and the count de Dunois, finding her inflexible, ſent word to the king of France, that if he meant to accompliſh his purpoſe, he muſt enter Brittany immediately with a numerous army, and force the refractory princeſs to a compliance, before the arrival of the Engliſh ſuccours.

Charles followed this advice, without loſing a moment; and, while he was amuſing Henry's ambaſſadors with negociations, all on a ſudden he duke of Burgundy, or the ducheſs of Brittany." The emperor of Germany, the king and queen of Spain, the kings of Denmark and Portugal, were invited to accede to this treaty, together with the electors and princes of the empire. The king and queen of Spain immediately acceded to the ſame, and their acceſſion was notified by public proclamation throughout all England. But beſides this, Henry made a ſeparate treaty with the court of Spain for attacking France, unleſs ſhe would deliver up the county of Rouſſillon to the Spaniards, and likewiſe for renewing the treaty of marriage between prince Arthur and the princeſs Catherine of Spain; it was even agreed upon, that the marriage ſhould be celebrated as ſoon as the prince attained the age of fourteen and the princeſs that of twelve; and that ſhe ſhould have for her portion two hundred thouſand crowns, each crown to be valued at four ſhillings and two pence ſterling. This treaty was concluded on the part of Henry by Dr. Savage and ſir Richard Naufan.

Great effects might probably have ariſen from this formidable alliance againſt France, could Henry have been perſuaded to part with his money; but his fondneſs for that made him ſlight every other conſideration, and, inſtead of acting vigorouſly, he agreed to open conferences, at the ſolicitation of Charles, who dreaded his junction with the ducheſs, and ſent ambaſſadors to France, to endeavour to mediate between that court and the ducheſs and Maximilian. Charles, in the mean time, amuſed the Engliſh ambaſſadors with evaſive profeſſions, in order to gain time, that he might be able to terminate the war to his own advantage, without referring the diſpute to Henry, whoſe arbitration he had no mind to adopt.

During theſe negociations the duke of Saxony, who commanded in the Low Countries, in the name of Maximilian, publiſhed an edict touching the coin, to which the inhabitants of Bruges refuſed to ſubmit, and thoſe of Ghent joined in their revolt. The king of France, whoſe conſtant aim was to foment domeſtic troubles in the dominions of his neighbours, ſent ſuccours to the rebels, under the command of marſhal Deſguardes, governor of Picardy; and on the other hand Maximilian ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, to crave his aſſiſtance. The king of England, piqued at the manner in which Charles had ſhuffled with his ambaſſadors, and unwilling to ſee the archduke oppreſſed by his own ſubjects, ſent the lords d'Aubeney, Willoughby, and Morley to his aſſiſtance, with a body of three thouſand men; theſe, joining with a body of Maximilian's German troops, threw themſelves, unperceived by the enemy into Dixmude, which the Flemings, with the aſſiſtance of the French, had inveſted, after having taken Ypres and Sluys. D'Aubeney, who had the chief command of the Engliſh and Germans, ſallying forth the next morning by day-break, came unawares upon the enemy, who were lying in full ſecurity in their camp, and falling upon them ſword in hand, routed them entirely, no leſs than eight thouſand French and Flemings being that day cut in pieces; and of the Engliſh, beſides the lord Morley, who fell in the beginning of the action, not above one hundred. The ſmall force d'Aubeney had with him not permitting the proſecution of even ſo conſiderable a victory, he contented himſelf with burning to the ground the town of Oſtend, which was then in poſſeſſion of the French, and immediately after marched the Engliſh troops into Nieuport, with all the cannon they had taken from the enemy, and ſo rich a booty that moſt of the common ſoldiers were now poſſeſſed of fine horſes and rich cloathing.

Theſe advantages which Maximilian got on the ſide of Picardy, and the reſolution Henry ſeemed now to have taken, of ſupporting his new allies, made Charles reſolve to ſend an embaſſy into England, to learn what he had to hope or fear from the Engliſh monarch, and, if poſſible, to detach him from the intereſt of the ducheſs of Brittany. For this purpoſe he choſe Francis de Luxembourg viſcount of Martigues, Valeran de Sannes, and Robert de Gaguin, general of the order of the Trinity. Henry, by an unaccountable ſpirit of dallying and prolonging the evil hour of parting with his money, agreed to open the conferences, and appointed Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter; the earl of Ormond; Gunthorpe, dean of Wells; the prior of Chriſt church, in Canterbury; ſir John Bourne; ſir Robert Tuberville, treaſurer of Calais; and Robert Roſs, purveyor of the ſame, to treat with the French concerning a final determination of all differences between the two crowns. Nothing material was tranſacted at theſe conferences, which paſſed chiefly in idle claims and uſeleſs altercations on both ſides. Morton, Henry's chancellor, indeed affected to talk in a very loſty ſtyle, and even told the French ambaſſadors, that the king his maſter expected the continuance or renewal of the payment of the appointment or tribute ſtipulated to Edward IV. by the treaty of Amiens; and when the French ambaſſadors declared they had no inſtructions on that head, he peremptorily told them "that the king their maſter muſt not be ſurprized, if, in caſe of a refuſal, king Henry ſhould aſſert his right, not only to the duchies of Normandy, Guienne, and Anjou, but even to the crown of France itſelf, as his lawful inheritance *."

The French ambaſſadors were ſurprized at this declaration; they behaved, however, with great ſpirit, and replied, that they made no doubt but the king their ſovereign's ſword would be able to maintain his ſceptre, adding, "that though they had no inſtructions upon the point ſtarted by the court of England; yet they could venture to ſay, that their maſter would never conſent to diſmember from his crown any part of its rights and poſſeſſions." This appearance of reſolution made Henry fear he had gone too far; he ordered Morton to ſound the ambaſſadors upon the following queſtion, "Whether Charles would accept the diſpoſal of the ducheſs of Brittany in marriage, with the excluſive condition that he ſhould not marry her himſelf?" To this queſtion the ambaſſadors replied, that their king was ſo far from entertaining any thought of eſpouſing the ducheſs, that he had given them no inſtructions on the ſubject: ſoon after they took their leave. Henry, upon this occaſion, ſpun his politics too fine; his intention was to intimidate Charles, and for that purpoſe he made uſe of a rhodomontade, which produced a contrary effect. The French king knew he was too wiſe to embark in ſuch a chimerical project as the conqueſt of France; and therefore interpreted his menaces into an artifice for deterring him from the conqueſt of Brittany, which he reſolved to proſecute without farther heſitation: he was ſtrengthened in this reſolution when his ambaſſadors, on their return home, told him that Henry had notified to them, before their departure, that he was to ſend an embaſſy immediately to France, to treat of all differences.

In February, 1491, Henry ſent ambaſſadors into France according to his promiſe*. Their commiſſion was "to treat of all his differences with king Charles, and in particular of a certain ſum due to him from that prince (doubtleſs meaning the tribute), as alſo of the affair between Charles and the ducheſs of Brittany †." Theſe inſtructions alone, ſays a modern hiſtorian, are a clear evidence that Henry had no deſign to puſh his pretenſions to the realm of France, or at leaſt to Guienne and Normandy, with any vigour; for is it probable that he would have comprized under the general word Differences, his claim to all France, or to two of the richeſt provinces, and have ſpecified a debt of one hundred and twenty five thouſand crowns, if the firſt had been his principal point in view? marched a great army into Brittany, and encamped within a league of Rennes, where the ducheſs then reſided. This ſudden irruption, and the danger ſhe was in ſeemed at firſt to have no effect on the ducheſs; ſhe declared herſelf ready to fall beneath the ruins of her ſtate, rather than give her hand to the baſe invader of them: but Charles at length laying ſiege to her capital, and having nobody about her but a council ſhe could not truſt, all her nobility being profeſſedly in the intereſt of the French king, and no proſpect of relief being at hand, ſhe found herſelf at length conſtrained to yield to what the exigency of her circumſtances and the importunities of her faithleſs miniſters, taking advantage of that exigence, demanded of her: ſhe waved her objections, and her compliance was ſignified to Charles; hoſtilities ceaſed, the contract of marriage was drawn up, and the princeſs, being carried to Lagny, in Touraine, was, on the ſixteenth day of December, 1491, married to Charles, and ſoon after crowned at St. Denis.

As to the king of the Romans, this proceeding of Charles and the French court exaſperated him beyond all meaſure; he breathed nothing but revenge when he heard that he was robbed of his wife in ſuch a cruel and outrageous manner, and peremptorily inſiſted that his daughter Margaret, who had been affianced to Charles, and, as we have have already obſerved, had reſided ſo long in France, ſhould be ſent back to his own court: in a word, he filled all Europe with complaints and remonſtrances, but without any hope of being either redreſſed or revenged. He had, moreover, the mortification of reflecting, that his own negligence had not a little contributed to the diſgrace and diſappointment with which he now ſmarted; for had he been ſo prudent to conſummate his marriage with the ducheſs in perſon, inſtead of doing it by proxy only, it would have been impoſſible for Charles to have diſſolved the ſacred union; but as he had neglected to take this neceſſary precaution, the other politicly availed himſelf of ſuch an impolitic omiſſion.

Nothing could be more unexpected or unacceptable to Henry, than was the marriage of the French king with the ducheſs of Brittany: he ſaw, not without confuſion, that he had been the dupe of his own avaricious policy, of which he had now loſt all the fruits, not only as Brittany was entirely gone, but as the reimburſement of the ſums he had advanced for its defence was more precarious than ever. In the firſt emotions of his reſentment and vexation, he publicly declared a reſolution of heading his army in perſon againſt France; he iſſued out orders to levy forces, and prepare tranſports, and put on a determined air of acting with vigour.

His next ſtep was to aſſemble a parliament, which met on Thurſday the ſixth of January, 1492, when, in a ſet ſpeech, he acquainted the two houſes with the king of France's ſeizing the duchy of Brittany, while he amuſed him with a ſham treaty, and declared his reſolution to recover the kingdom of France, as the inheritance of his anceſtors: he reminded the members of the victories of Creſſy, Poictiers, and Agincourt; mentioned the different powers that were ready to co-operate with his meaſures in attacking that kingdom; demanded a ſupply ſuitable to the greatneſs of the occaſion, exhorting the commons to ſpare the purſes of the poor, and let the burthen of the tax fall upon the wealthy. Though the commons had very little reaſon to grant a ſupply, conſidering how the laſt had been imbezzled: the conqueſt of France was ſuch a temptation as they could not reſiſt; they not only adviſed him to engage in the enterprize, which in truth he had no mind to undertake, but they ſupplied him with uncommon alacrity, and, according to his deſire, impowered him to renew the unpopular Benevolences, which his predeceſſor Richard, bad as he was, no leſs prudently than juſtly aboliſhed.

Henry now appeared extremely intent upon his French expedition; and judging it proper to be ſecure from any diverſions the Scots might make in his abſence, ſent ambaſſadors to Coldſtream, upon the river Tweed, to confer with others ſent by James IV. who had ſucceeded to the throne of Scotland upon the murder of his father James III. by his own nobility, who had taken up arms againſt him. The conferences were not long, both kings being equally deſirous of each other's friendſhip, ſo that a five years truce was concluded, viz. from the twenty-firſt of December, 1491, to the ſame day, 1496. By this treaty the town of Berwick, with its territory, was to be declared a neutral town; and the lordſhip of Lorn, in Scotland, and the little iſland of Lundy belonging to England, were excepted out of the truce. Henry ratified the treaty on the ninth of January, 1492; but the king of Scotland, whether bribed by France, or from ſome other motive, refuſed to confirm it; he agreed, however, to a much ſhorter truce, on the twentieth of February following, which was to laſt only eleven months.

His next ſtep was to ſend ambaſſadors to ſummon Maximilian and Ferdinand of Spain to aſſiſt him in invading France, according to treaty; but, notwithſtanding the high and lofty ſtrain in which Henry affected to talk to his parliament, it is pretty evident he had no intention to puſh the war with vigour; for, at the very time we are now ſpeaking of, viz. the months of February and March, when the flame of his reſentment ſeemed to blaze higheſt, we find him opening a negociation with two agents from his couſin of France*.

On the third of May, however, the ſtaff-officers and purveyors of the army were appointed; ſir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter, being made pay-maſter of the troops. On the ninth of the ſame month, Henry entered into an indenture with his principal officers for their quotas of men, which were to ſerve in the enſuing campaign, at the rate of eighteen pence for every man at arms, with a ſervant and page; and ſixpence for every archer on foot or horſeback †. As we have but imperfect accounts of the art of war in thoſe days, it is not eaſy to ſay in what manner theſe troops were formed and diſciplined; it is not unlikely that every contractor acted as colonel of the men whom he had indentured to raiſe; and that the whole, being divided into van-guard, centre, and rearward, flanked by the horſe in two bodies, as wings, were commanded by the general officers, who, upon this occaſion, were the king himſelf, the duke of Bedford, and the earl of Oxford. Mention is alſo made of the marquis of Dorſet, the earls of Kent,

Devonſhire,

Devonſhire, Surry, Arundel, Derby, Shrewſbury, Suffolk, Eſſex, and Ormond; the lords Latimer, Powis, Barnes, Grey, Scroope of Bolton, Scroope of Upſal, Audley, and Strange; the viſcount Wells; ſir Reginald Bray, ſir Charles Somerſet, ſir Roger Cotton, ſir Richard Holt, ſir William Courtney, ſir Richard Corbet, ſir William Stanley, ſir John St. John, ſir Walter Hungerford, with ſeveral other gentlemen, all of them contractors for furniſhing men and arms, and alſo a brave body of Welſh troops under the command of Richard Thomas *.

The rendezvous of the whole army was appointed to be held near London, and upon a review it appeared to amount to the number of twenty-five thouſand foot and ſixteen hundred horſe, or men at arms, which, allowing two ſervants to each man at arms, make in the whole an army of about twenty-nine thouſand eight hundred fighting men †. But before this army could be got together, and through Henry's affected delays, the ſeaſon for fighting was over. It was the twentieth of September before Henry got to Canterbury, where he made ſir Robert Nanfan judge-advocate of the navy, with a power of puniſhing capitally all offences committed in the ſame; and ſir Robert Willoughby de Brooke (as he is called in his commiſſion) marſhal of the army, with the like powers ‡.

On the ſecond of October, Henry, being ready to embark at Dover, appointed his ſon Arthur, prince of Wales, guardian of the realm. On the ſixth of the ſame month he embarked with his army, and next day landed at Calais.

Henry had ſcarcely landed on the continent when the ambaſſadors he had ſent to the king of the Romans arrived, and told him that Maximilian was wholly unprepared to enter France, as he had promiſed; this news was immediately made known to the whole army. Some days after, he received from his ambaſſadors in Spain, letters, which were likewiſe made public, importing that Ferdinand had concluded a peace with the king of France, upon that monarch's promiſing to reſtore to the crown of Caſtile the province of Rouſſillon, without receiving the three hundred thouſand crowns, which Lewis XI. had lent upon that county. We ſhall not venture to affirm with ſome hiſtorians, that Henry knew all this before, but had ſo ordered, that theſe advices might come together after his arrival in France, that he might appear forced to make a peace, which he had before privately concerted with the court of France, and that all his vigorous preparations were only made to ſave appearances with his ſubjects. Setting aſide all bold and ill-grounded conjecture, we ſhall ſtick to facts, and leave our readers to judge for themſelves.

It is, however, certain, that the public began to entertain ſome ſuſpicions not greatly to his advantage, when Deſguardes, who had juſt received from Charles VIII. a marſhal's baton, appeared openly at the head of an embaſſy, and produced his powers for making up all differences between the two kings, and that Henry ordered the biſhop of Bath and Wells and William, lord d'Aubeney, governor of Calais, to hold conferences with the marſhal at Eſtaples, a few leagues diſtant from that garriſon. Henry was no ſtranger to the murmurs of his ſoldiers on this occaſion; and, to make a ſhew of doing ſomething, he, on the nineteenth of October, advanced to inveſt Boulogne, after demoliſhing the ſmall towns of Ardres and Moulery: but the army were but too well acquainted that a peace was upon the carpet, which was no ſmall mortification to the gentlemen who had ſold or mortgaged their eſtates that they might come with the greater number of followers to reconquer that kingdom which their anceſtors had more than once ſubdued before.

But Henry VII. was a very different prince from either Henry V. or Edward III. glory was their paſſion, money was his: he had promiſed his parliament that he would make the war pay itſelf, and he took care it ſhould. His commiſſioners and thoſe of France ſeem to have underſtood one another ſo perfectly, that little remained to be diſcuſſed, and with ſuch celerity were the negociations carried on at Eſtaples, that on the thirtieth of October, Henry produced in public a paper, which had been drawn up by the plenipotentiaries on both ſides, as preliminaries for a peace: the articles were as follow.

"That Henry ſhould be reimburſed the expences he had been at in aſſiſting the ducheſs of Brittany, which, according to the Engliſh ambaſſador's account, amounted to an hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds; and alſo twenty-five thouſand pounds as arrears for the tribute due to the crown of England in conſequence of the treaty of Pequigny between Edward IV. and Lewis XI. The ſaid ſums to be paid to Henry at the rate of fifty thouſand franks a year, and Charles giving him for the ſaid payments the like ſecurity as king Lewis had given king Edward upon the concluſion of the ſaid treaty.

"II. The particulars of the ſaid expences were, within a reaſonable time, to be verified by the Engliſh before commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe by the king of France: and the allies of both kings were to have four months after the concluſion of the treaty, for determining whether they ſhould be included in the ſame.

"III. If, after Maximilian and his ſon Philip ſhould declare themſelves as included in the ſaid treaty, the king of France ſhould act hoſtilely againſt them, or their poſſeſſions, the king of England ſhall be at liberty in that and no other caſe to give them aſſiſtance. Proper hoſtages to be given for the performance of the whole ‖."

Such were the conditions of this ſcandalous treaty; ſuch were Henry's exploits in an expedition, from which, out of a ridiculous vanity, or to flatter theirs, he had encouraged his ſubjects to expect no leſs than the conqueſt of France. Conſcious of the diſcontent this bargain (as lord Bacon ſtyles it) rather than treaty, would give the whole Engliſh nation, and foreſeeing the ſtorm to which he might be afterwards expoſed from the reſentment of a people whom he had plucked to feather himſelf, by trepanning the commons into a grant of exorbitant taxes on falſe pretences, he thought proper to get the marquis of Dorſet and twenty-three others, either noblemen, privy-counſellors, or chief officers of his army, who were all of them his creatures, and entirely guided by him, to petition him to accept of the propoſed preliminaries. Accordingly they preſented him with a long memorial, under all their hands, ſetting forth their reaſons for deſiring him to conclude a peace, the principal of which were,

"The late ſeaſon of the year and the approach of winter, which would expoſe their king's and the ſoldiers lives to danger, and render the paſſage of proviſions by ſea from Calais uncertain: the ſtrength of the fortifications and garriſon of Boulogne: the ſecurity Calais would receive from Sluys being lately reduced by the duke of Saxony to Maximilian's obedience: the ſaving the Engliſh nation from the expence of a war: Henry's diſappointment in not being reinforced by his allies: and the different ſituation in affairs now, from what there was in the time of Edward IV. who, having the duke of Burgundy and all Picardy on his ſide, might have ſafely advanced with his army into the very neighbourhood of Paris: but what they imagined rendered it a peace truly honourable, was that France was to pay a greater ſum of money than ſhe ever paid or granted before *."

But the moſt remarkable part of this addreſs is towards its concluſion, where the petitioners bound themſelves to ſtand and fall by Henry's perſon and government, ſhould any diſcontent or murmurs ariſe upon the ſaid peace being accepted: they farther declare that they were willing to have it believed that the peace was concluded upon their requeſt †.

Henry, feigning to be determined by theſe reaſons to accept of a peace, the treaty was drawn up in form, and ſigned at Eſtaples on the third of November; Charles, who was then at Tours, ratified it on the eighth of the ſame month: after the ratification there was another article added, on the thirteenth of December, by which the contracting parties obliged themſelves not to ſhew favour, nor give advice nor aſſiſtance to any of each other's rebellious ſubjects that ſhould take refuge in their territories; and it was provided, that the whole treaty ſhould, within three years, be ratified by the eſtates of both kingdoms. Henry then raiſed the ſiege of Boulogne, and retired to Calais, from whence he took ſhipping for England, and arrived at London on the ſeventeenth of December, undiſturbed at the murmurs of an abuſed people, which he was enabled to diſregard by the payment of ſeven hundred and forty-five thouſand ducats for the expence of his armament, and the promiſe of twenty-five thouſand crowns yearly, which were punctually remitted in the ſequel, and was called a continuance of the tribute paid to England by his father Lewis XI.

Such were the tranſactions of this buſy year, 1492; others of a more private nature we ſhall now throw together. On the twenty-ſecond of June, Henry had a ſecond ſon, afterwards the famous Henry VIII. born to him at Greenwich. Juſts and tournaments were particularly encouraged by Henry, as the moſt effectual means to introduce that degeneracy and luxury which he wanted to eſtabliſh amongſt his nobility: in one of theſe ſir James Parker was killed by one Vaughan, a domeſtic belonging to the court. But what diſtinguiſhed this year above all tranſactions was the attempt made by Chriſtopher Columbus to diſcover a new world. This fortunate adventurer was the ſon of a mechanic in Genoa, a wool-comber it is ſaid: he firſt offered his ſervices to our Henry, but this monarch's frugal caution, and the multiplicity of affairs he had at this time on his hands, prevented his entering into any engagements with Columbus, who, deſpairing of ſucceſs in England, repaired to the court of Spain: but for a more particular account of this great man and his brother Bartholomew, with the ſeveral diſcoveries they made, we ſhall refer our readers to the article of Commerce, at the end of this reign.

We are now to enter upon an event of a moſt intricate nature, which has puzzled all our hiſtorians properly to account for, and which has been repreſented in as many different lights as paſſion, prejudice, or vague conjecture in the ſeveral writers led them to furniſh; as to ourſelves, we ſhall, without blindly adopting the ſentiments partiality might inſpire on either ſide, relate in a ſimple order the facts as hiſtory has furniſhed them to us.

Towards the beginning of the year 1492, a young man, whom all his enemies allow to have poſſeſſed a very elegant figure and a bewitching addreſs, appeared in Ireland, a country devoted to the houſe of York, and wrote letters to the earls of Kildare and Deſmond, requiring them to acknowlege him as the rightful heir to the crown of England, he being Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, the ſecond ſurviving ſon of Edward IV. Theſe two noblemen either not giving credit to his allegations, or ſtill ſmarting from their unſucceſsful attempt in favour of the impoſtor Simnel, diſregarded his application, and he was forced to throw himſelf for protection upon John Waters, an eminent merchant, and then mayor of Corke, who warmly eſpouſed his cauſe: and his appearance and claim being bruited about, the common people flocked to him from all parts, offering hearty but unavailing vows for his ſucceſs. At this time the court of France was under expectation of a viſit from Henry of England, and, according to its conſtant practice of taking pretenders to the crown of England by the hand as often as it has any difference with Engliſh kings, one Frion (who had been ſecretary to Henry VII. but had left his ſervice for that of Charles) was ſent into Ireland, to enquire about the matter, and, if there appeared any feaſibility in his ſtory, to invite the young claimant (whom we muſt hereafter call by the name of Perkin Warbeck, which all writers have fixed upon him) over to France. Frion, who, we are told, was a penetrating, ſenſible, and active man, either convinced, or pretending to be convinced, that this was the real duke of York, carried him over to Paris, where Charles acted as if he certainly believed the ſame, and continued ſo to do, even after a good underſtanding was reſtored between him and Henry.

No ſooner was Perkin arrived at the court of France than ſir George Neville, ſir John Taylor, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, to the number of one hundred, came to ſee him, and, after ſeveral long converſations with him, declared themſelves entirely convinced that he was Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, eſcaped, as he himſelf ſaid, from the Tower, where he had been confined, and by every one thought to have been murdered by order of the uſurper Richard. Charles, upon theſe teſtimonies in his favour, ordered him an appointment ſuitable to the character he aſſumed, with a guard to attend his perſon. In this manner he lived at Charles's court till the concluſion of the peace of Eſtaples, when that monarch and his mi-niſtry could no longer with decency entertain him; which Perkin wiſely perceived, and, without waiting to be told to retire, withdrew from Paris privately, and going into Burgundy about the beginning of the year 1493, applied to the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, ſiſter of Edward IV. and the declared enemy of the Lancaſter family.

This princeſs, though ſhe had ſeen him received by Charles of France, and owned by all the Engliſh at that court as the duke of York, not only received him as a mere ſtranger, but even affected to treat him as an impoſtor: ſhe quoted the recent caſe of Lambert Simnel, as an inſtance how far eaſy credulity might be impoſed upon, and even went ſo far as to threaten Perkin with impriſonment. To this rebuff he oppoſed only a graceful modeſty, accompanied with that decent aſſurance which is uſually ſeen to wait on truth. This firſt ſtartled the ducheſs: ſhe now put a thouſand queſtions to him in public, to try whether he was the real duke of York or not; but all his anſwers were ſo appoſite and ready, and his behaviour had in it ſo much dignity and ſweetneſs, that he was generally believed, as well by the principal perſonages of the Burgundian court as thoſe of inferior rank, to be the true duke Richard; the ducheſs herſelf at length ſeemed to be ſo convinced of his being no impoſtor, that ſhe aſſigned him a guard of thirty halberdiers, and diſtinguiſhed him by the name of the White Roſe of England *; and all the court, Flemings, Dutch, and ſtrangers, ſhewed him the ſame reſpect as to one of the blood royal.

The news flew like lightning into England, that the duke of York was certainly alive (the name of Perkin Warbeck not being yet come to light); that he had been entertained in Ireland, countenanced in France, and was now publicly avowed and greatly honoured in Flanders. It muſt be admitted, that, whether Perkin was a counterfeit or not, he appeared at a time when Henry's conduct had added many to the enemies he had before. Thus much was in favour of Perkin; but, at the ſame time, the minds of the people were ſtill poſſeſſed with the impudent attempt and ridiculous fall of Lambert Simnel, and therefore moſt people were very cautious and backward in giving credit to the like tales or appearances. As to Henry, he affected to treat the whole affair as a ſcheme of that reſtleſs woman, the ducheſs of Burgundy; and, whatever he might really think, appeared wholly unconcerned, leſt his fears ſhould encourage his enemies; or, perhaps, becauſe he thought it would make Perkin too conſiderable, ſhould he take any public meaſures to deſtroy him.

In the beginning of March, Henry ſent the order of the Garter to Alphonſo duke of Calabria, eldeſt ſon of Ferdinand king of Naples. Alphonſo had been extremely deſirous of this honour, to inſinuate to the princes of Italy, that he had in the king of England a protector who would not ſuffer him to be oppreſſed. He would have thereby induced them to league with the king his father, againſt Charles VIII. who was going to undertake the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples.

A few days after, Henry concluded at London a treaty of perpetual peace and amity wtih Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Caſtile and Arragon. This alliance, which was a reciprocal engagement of mutual aſſiſtance upon all occaſions, was particular in that it extended not to all the kings of England and Spain without diſtinction, but only to all their ſucceſſors deſcended from them. In the treaty, the marriage-articles between prince Arthur and Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, were confirmed and renewed.

In the mean time, however, the people of England began to ſhew more and more their diſguſt againſt the king, who was now become extremely unpopular: they ſcrupled not to tax him with avarice and extortion, in fleecing his ſubjects for the ſupport of a war undertaken merely with a view to fill his own coffers, and terminated by a diſhonourable and diſadvantageous peace; with behaving to his queen rather with the rigour of a tyrant, than the tenderneſs of a huſband; and with embracing every opportunity of oppreſſing the friends and adherents to the houſe of York, to a princeſs of which he was alone indebted for his title to the crown he wore: and as a perſon of that houſe now appeared, who had a prior right to that of Henry's wife, they looked upon their relation and allegiance to him as virtually diſſolved.

In this ſituation of ſentiments, encouraged by the many concurrent circumſtances in favour of the youth who aſſumed the character of duke of York, and increaſed by Henry's avaricious temper, which had alienated ſeveral of the firmeſt friends to his perſon and the houſe of Lancaſter, it is no wonder that many in England began to reflect and reaſon within themſelves, and next to debate and cabal with others. Sir William Stanley, to whom, and his brother, Henry owed his ſucceſs at Boſworth, and conſequently in part his crown; John Radcliffe, lord Fitz Walter; ſir Robert Clifford, ſir Thomas Thwaites, and others, entered into a ſecret confederacy to eſpouſe the cauſe of the young adventurer, and deputed ſir Robert Clifford, ſon of the lord Clifford, and William Borley, a gentleman of fortune of Aldeburgh, in Hertfordſhire, to go to the court of the ducheſs of Burgundy, to enquire minutely into the merits of the youth's identity, and, on receiving ſatisfaction therein, to concert with that princeſs the means of reſtoring him to his lawful inheritance.

After ſir Robert Clifford had been ſome time at Margaret's court, and after having ſeveral converſations with Perkin, he wrote over to the conſpirators in England, that he knew the youth's perſon as well as that of his own ſon, and that he was ſure he was no impoſtor, but the real duke of York. This report worked the conſpirators almoſt into certainty; and Henry, who by this time was no ſtranger to the diſcontents of the people, and plainly foreſaw the ſtorm that was ready to fall upon his head, thought the matter too ſerious to be neglected any longer. He had already received a confuſed account of the conſpiracy being hatching, and that emiſſaries were paſſing between the court of Burgundy and ſome of his own ſubjects; he therefore ſent certain officers, with a band of ſoldiers, into every port, to keep the ſhores and ſea-coaſts, that no one might come in or go out of the kingdom without being ſearched and examined. His next, and indeed principal buſineſs was to undeceive the people, by proving the murder of the two young princes.

* The badge by which, in the courſe of the civil wars, the houſe of York was diſtinguiſhed; as the family of Lancaſter was by that of the red.

This could only be done by diſcoveries made by the murderers, of whom two were ſtill alive, ſir James Tyrrel, ordered by Richard III. to put the princes to death, and John Dighton, one of thoſe employed by Tyrrel to commit the fact; Miles Forreſt, the third, being dead ſome time before. Sir James Tyrrel was then a man in very high reputation; he had been employed by Henry in moſt of his important tranſactions with the courts of France and Burgundy, and was then governor of Guiſnes: we ſhall forbear to remark the infamy which attended Henry's countenancing ſuch a perſon, or indeed ſuffering him to live, and proceed in our narrative.

Tyrrel and Dighton were apprehended by the king's order, and ſent to priſon, where they underwent a private examination; after which it was given out, that they agreed in their depoſitions; namely, "That Dighton and Forreſt ſmothered the two princes in their bed, and ſhewed their dead bodies to Tyrrel, and that a prieſt afterwards buried them under a ſtair-caſe; that ſoon after king Richard ordered them to be removed elſewhere, by the ſame prieſt, who was ſince dead, without diſcovering where he had laid them." It is probable, however, that Tyrrel's depoſition was not ſo favourable to Henry's purpoſe as Dighton's, ſince he was detained in priſon, whereas Dighton was releaſed, to ſpread abroad his own evidence; but we find no diſcovery that he made reduced into any form of a record; and, indeed, the whole of this tranſaction, relating to the evidence of the murder of the young princes, leaves a ſtrong ſuſpicion that the vulgar ſtory of that fact muſt be falſe; though this may not perhaps be a ſufficient proof of the truth of Perkin's pretenſions.

Lord Bacon, who has dreſſed the whole ſtory of Perkin in the beſt form it will admit, as writing his adventure under a government who was deeply concerned to repreſent him as an impoſtor, informs us that Henry was ſo extremely ſolicitous in coming at the bottom of this whole impoſture, that he filled all the continent of Europe with his ſpies and emiſſaries, well furniſhed with money, to trace Perkin from his original. The effect of this was, that they publiſhed the following account, which we ſhall tranſcribe, in the very words of the noble author.

"That there was at Tournay one John (or, as ſome ſay, Peter) Oſbecke, a converted Jew, who had borne an office in that town, and married Catherine de Faro, whoſe buſineſs drew him to live for a time, with his wife, at London, in king Edward IV's days, during which time he had a ſon by her; and being known at court, the king, either out of a religious nobleneſs becauſe he was a convert, or upon ſome private acquaintance, did him the honour of being god father to his child, and named him Peter; but afterwards, proving a dainty and effeminate youth, he was commonly called by the diminutive of his name, Peterkin or Perkin: as for the name of Warbeck, when it was given him they did but gueſs at, before examinations had been taken; but he had been ſo much talked of by that name, that it ſtuck by him after his true name of Oſbecke was known. While he was a young child, his parents returned with him to Tournay: then he was placed in the houſe of a kinſman of his, called John Stenbeck, at Antwerp; and ſo roved up and down between Antwerp and Tournay and other towns of Flanders, for a good time, living much in Engliſh company, and having the Engliſh tongue perfect: in which time being grown a comely youth, he was brought by ſome of Margaret's ſpies to her preſence, who, viewing him well, and ſeeing he had a comely face and perſonage that would bear a noble fortune, and finding him otherwiſe of a fine ſpirit and winning behaviour, thought ſhe had now found a curious piece of marble to carve out an image of a duke of York; ſhe kept him with her a great while, but with extreme ſecrecy, inſtructing him the while by many cabinet conferences."

We muſt not forget to obſerve, from the above author, that Henry, in order to procure the better credit to his ſpies with the contrary ſide, uſed to have them excommunicated (as they paſſed one after another over to the continent) every Sunday at St. Paul's, in virtue of the bull of Innocent VIII. enforcing the act of ſucceſſion.

Henry having now received what he called a perfect information of every thing relating to Perkin Warbeck, diſpatched ſir Edward Poynings and Dr. Warham, afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, to the court of young Philip, archduke of Auſtria, ſon to Maximilian, and ſovereign of the eſtates of the ducheſs of Burgundy, to remonſtrate againſt the conduct of Margaret, who was the author of this impoſture, and to inſiſt that the archduke would deliver Perkin into his hands: "pirates and impoſtors of this ſort (ſaith Dr. Warham, in the cloſe of his ſpeech) being fit to be accounted the enemies of mankind, and no way to be protected by the law of nations*."

The Flemiſh miniſters, however, ſeem to have looked upon the affair in a very different light to that in which Henry's ambaſſadors repreſented it; for, after ſome deliberations on the king's demand, they returned for anſwer, in their maſter's name (the archduke being then a minor), "That, for the love of king Henry, the ſaid archduke would in no ſort aid or aſſiſt the pretended duke (of York), but in all things conſerve the amity he had with the king: but for the ducheſs dowager, ſhe was abſolute in the lands of her dowry, and that he could not lett (prevent or refuſe) her to diſpoſe of her own, nor controul her conduct in what ſhe ſhould ſee fit to act towards any perſon †." This anſwer, being founded on an aſſertion falſe in fact, viz. that the ducheſs was abſolute in the lands of her dowry, nettled Henry ſo much, that, to humble the Flemings, he publiſhed a proclamation, ordering all of that country to depart out of England, forbade all commerce with Flanders, recalled all the Engliſh merchants from thence, and removed the mart of cloth from Antwerp to Calais: the archduke's council in return ordered all the Engliſh to quit his dominions. We muſt now attend Henry's other tranſactions with reſpect to connections foreign and domeſtic.

The truce with Scotland had, it ſeems, been ſo ill obſerved, that there was a neceſſity for renewing it: accordingly, on the ſeventeenth of June this year, conferences were held at Edinburgh, between the commiſſioners of both kings, and, on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month, a truce was concluded, to hold till the laſt day of April, 1501, and Henry paid the king of Scotland a thouſand marks by way of compenſation for the injuries that nation had received from the other, before the concluſion of the truce†.

and

On the firſt of November, Henry wrote to the king of France, deſiring to be included in the peace of Senlis, made between Philip, archduke of Auſtria, and Charles VIII. on the third of May this year, according to the tenor of the treaty. On the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, he notified to him the ſame thing from Ferdinand, king of Naples, and Alphonſo, duke of Calabria, his ſon, who were expreſly included in the treaty of Senlis, on the part of the emperor and the archduke; but nevertheleſs king Charles ſtill perſiſted in his project of conquering Naples.

About the beginning of the year 1494, Henry's emiſſaries in Flanders made a great acquiſition for their maſter's intereſt, by gaining over ſir Robert Clifford, who was intruſted with all the ſecrets of Perkin and his protectreſs the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, and who now diſcovered all he knew of Perkin's party, though nothing of his perſon. The firſt effect of theſe diſcoveries was the apprehending and ſeizing of John Radcliff, lord Fitz Walter, ſir Simon Montfort, ſir Thomas Thwaites, William d'Aubeney, Robert Radcliff, Thomas Creſſener, and Thomas Aſhwood, who were all taken on the ſame day, tried, convicted of holding treaſonable correſpondence with Perkin, and condemned to die the death of traiors. The lord Fitz Walter was conveyed to Calais, with hopes in time he might obtain his pardon; but his impatience of confinement prompting him to attempt an eſcape, on being diſcovered he loſt his head. Montfort, Radcliff, and d'Aubeney ſuffered the rigour of the law; but all the reſt were pardoned; and many others, of the clergy as well as of the laity, arreſted on the ſame ſuſpicion, were diſcharged without trial.

As Clifford had informed the king of the application which Perkin had made to the earls of Kildare and Deſmond, and they not having diſcovered the ſame to him, Henry juſtly thought that they only waited for an opportunity to declare themſelves enemies to his government; he therefore reſolved to take care of that iſland, which had been hitherto much neglected. With this view he, on the eleventh of September this year, iſſued letters patent, creating his ſecond ſon Henry, then but two years of age, lieutenant or governor of Ireland, appointing for his deputy ſir Edward Poynings, a man well verſed in affairs, and whom he had ſucceſsfully employed in ſeveral important embaſſies. He gave him a very extenſive power, as well over the military as the civil government, that he might be the better able to put the iſland upon a good footing: he aſſociated with him Henry Deane, lately made biſhop of Bangor, and now appointed chancellor of Ireland; and gave him a body of a thouſand veteran troops to enforce his authority.

The firſt ſtep Poynings took after his arrival in Ireland was to ſecure the perſons of Maurice and Gerald Fitz Gerald, the former earl of Deſmond, the other of Kildare: Deſmond, however, found means to elude his vigilance and eſcape; but Kildare was ſeized, and ſent priſoner to England; from whence, Henry ſent him back again, loaded with favours, on his promiſe to exert all his great intereſt to Henry's advantage.

Poynings next called a parliament, which rendered itſelf famous for the ſtatutes it enacted to the advantage of the crown and of the Engliſh ſettled in that iſland. He had found, on his beginning to exerciſe his authority, great difficulty, without hazarding a general rebellion, to bring any of the rebels againſt the Engliſh government who reſided in Ireland, to juſtice by the courſe of law. This was owing to the management of Richard, duke of York, father to Edward IV. who, when he was lord-lieutenant there, had rendered it a ſanctuary to all rebels, by an act which he paſſed, "That Ireland ſhould be a ſanctuary for refugees; and that it ſhould be treaſon to diſturb any body there by any writ, privy-ſeal, or other matter from England." An act therefore was now made under Poynings, "annulling all preſcriptions which traitors and rebels claimed in Ireland, and all receivers and maintainers of traitors were made guilty of treaſon; and obedience was commanded to be paid to the great-ſeal and privy-ſeal of England, and to letters miſſive under the king's ſignet‡." The famous ſtatute called Poynings's Act was alſo now enacted, the ſubſtance of which was, "that the parliament of Ireland ſhould not be aſſembled before the lord-lieutenant and council had acquainted the king with the reaſons, and obtained the royal licence under the great ſeal." It was alſo enacted, "that all the ſtatutes of England concerning the public ſhould be obſerved in Ireland." Theſe two ſtatutes are ſtill in force to this day*.

While theſe things were tranſacting, in Ireland, ſir Robert Clifford arrived in England, and repaired privately to Henry, who was then keeping his court in the Tower, and, according to ſecret inſtructions he had received, appeared before the council, and, falling on his knees, implored the king's mercy, which he ſaid he would merit by diſcovering all he knew of the plot. Pardon being promiſed him on that condition, he made his great diſcovery, which was that ſir William Stanley, who was lord-chamberlain, was one of the abettors of Perkin. Henry affected to be almoſt petrified with aſtoniſhment at this declaration; he ſat for ſome time buried in a thoughtful ſilence; at length, in a ſevere tone of voice, he charged Clifford to be ſure of what he advanced, vowing that if he failed in the leaſt tittle of his charge, his life ſhould pay the forfeit of the injury done to the character of the man he held foremoſt in the rank of his friends. Clifford, with a well acted reſolution, ſtaked his head upon the truth of his allegation, upon which the lord-chamberlain was ordered not to ſtir from his lodgings in the Tower; and ſhortly after he was arraigned of high-treaſon, when Clifford ſwearing that he had declared to him, in private converſation, "that if he thought the young man (Perkin) was really the ſon of Edward IV. he would never bear arms againſt him;" and Stanley confeſſing that he had ſpoken thoſe words, or others to the like purport, the judges, who knew no will but Henry's, and whoſe venality was equal to their abilities, thought this a ſufficient ground for his condemnation, and he was accordingly beheaded on Tower-hill, the ſixteenth of February, 1495.

Thus, by an infamous judgment, for no one overt-act appeared in the courſe of the trial that could convict him of treaſon, Stanley fell a victim to Henry's jealouſy, ambition, and avarice. His poſt of chamberlain was beſtowed on Giles, lord d'Aubeney, a nobleman of great valour and capacity. Beſides an eſtate of three thouſand pounds a year, which fell to Henry by the forfeiture of his eſtates, there were likewiſe found in Stanley's caſtle of Holt forty thouſand marks in money and plate, together with jewels, furniture, and effects to an immenſe value; with theſe Henry conſoled himſelf for the ſecret curſes and imprecations of the people, who not only deteſted his avarice and ingratitude, but likewiſe trembled for their own ſafety, as the chamberlain had ſuffered for a crime from which very few Engliſhmen were free, namely, the preferring the title of the houſe of York to that of the family of Lancaſter.

This execution, and ſeveral ſubſequent acts of infamous rapacity, in which Henry neither conſidered honour nor juſtice ſo he could fill his coffers, ſo much increaſed his unpopularity, as to give new life to Warbeck's faction, which was rather checked than ſuppreſſed. His party in the North began to be in motion; and it appears that in the beginning of this year 1495, ſome foreigner had landed there, and had endeavoured to ſtir up the Scottiſh borderers; for there is, in the Collection of Public Acts, a commiſſion iſſued out to the earl of Surry, warden of the Scottiſh Marches, and biſhop Fox, whom he had lately tranſlated to the ſee of Durham, on the twenty-ſecond of March, to array all within their juriſdiction capable of bearing arms, to oppoſe any invaſion from the northward: at the ſame time the neceſſary meaſures were taken to guard the ſea-coaſts againſt a foreign invaſion.

In the ſummer Henry, in order to convince the world that the proceedings againſt ſir William Stanley had not at all diminiſhed his regard for his brother, the earl of Derby, who had married his mother, the counteſs of Richmond, made an excurſion to the earl's houſe at Latham, near Lancaſter, where he ſtaid three days, and ſeemed very well pleaſed with his entertainment. Much about the ſame time the king created his ſecond ſon, Henry, duke of York ‡, and appointed him warden of the Scottiſh Marches, in the room of the earl of Surry, who, on account of ſome impolitic ſeverities, was now entirely removed from that government: Henry alſo entered into a new negociation with James IV. king of Scotland. On his return to London, he graced a call of ſerjeants, at Ely-houſe, with his preſence and that of his queen; a diſtinction which he was ready to pay, becauſe, as lord Bacon juſtly obſerves, "as he governed his ſubjects by his laws, ſo he governed his laws by his lawyers."

Hitherto Perkin Warbeck had not ventured to make any attempt in England, knowing that the king was informed of all his correſpondence; but as the ducheſs of Burgundy could not think of relinquiſhing her hopes of gaining ſome advantage over Henry by means of this young adventurer, ſhe reſolved at length to ſend him into England, and in the beginnning of July Perkin ſailed from Flanders, and arrived off Sandwich, on the coaſt of Kent; which gives ſome reaſon to believe that it had been concerted between the party in the North and in the South to make an inſurrection in both places at the ſame time: however that might be, the Kentiſhmen, who were to a man in Henry's intereſt, were ſo well prepared to receive the invaders, that it ſeemed as if Henry had made a progreſs into the North with no other view than to tempt his rival to land in a county which he had taken a particular care to ſecure by a ſtronger force than any other. Perkin, miſtruſting ſomething of this kind, landed a ſmall party only, to ſound the diſpoſition of the Kentiſhmen, and prepare the way for his landing in perſon with the reſt of his forces, which were indeed only a crew of undiſciplined foreigners, and their chiefs either unknown, or of little conſideration.

The Kentiſhmen gave this party, conſiſting of about one hundred and ſeventy perſons, the moſt friendly reception, in hopes through their means to decoy the whole armament into their power; but finding that Perkin and his friends on board ſtill heſitated, and were not to be inveigled aſhore, they took all the party priſoners, and ſent them up to London, chained two and two, by ſir John Peachy, ſheriff of Kent; and no leſs than one hundred and fifty of them were, by Henry's orders, executed at Tyburn, and their bodies hung upon gibbets along the ſea-coaſts of Kent, Eſſex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. Perkin, upon this miſcarriage of his attempt, ſailed for Corke in Ireland, where he expected a different reception, but found affairs were altered in that country, by the prudent manner in which Poynings had ſettled the government there; but the moſt eſſential ſervice he did, was the fixing Maurice Fitz Gerald, earl of Deſmond, and Gerald Fitz Gerald, earl of Kildare, in Henry's intereſt, inſomuch that Perkin, diſcouraged by the evident coolneſs he ſaw in the behaviour of his former friends, quitted Ireland and ſailed for Scotland.

Henry, ſucceſsful over this effort of his rival and of the ducheſs of Burgundy, the ever plotting enemy of his family, called a parliament on the thirteenth of October, who ſecured to him the forfeitures of ſuch as had been put to death, or had taken refuge in ſanctuaries and been outlawed upon non-appearance, all of which were now attainted, together with ſir George Neville, and ſome other gentlemen of Perkin's party, taken by the Kentiſhmen. Henry found his revenues greatly encreaſed by theſe forfeitures; but, ever thirſting after money, he now procured all the offices in Wales to be voided; he got the wardſhip of the eſtate of the lord viſcount Beaumont, who was lately become a lunatic; and alſo made a reſumption of the grants which had been made by Edward III. and Richard II. to Edmund of Langley, duke of York: he likewiſe got the parliament to countenance his illegal exaction of the late benevolence, by ordering the arrears of what people had compounded for, to be levied, which brought immenſe ſums into the king's coffers, as great part of the tax remained unpaid, on account of the ſhort duration of the French war. This ſeſſion, however, paſſed ſeveral laws, which tended greatly to the eaſe and advantage of the ſubject †.

In the courſe of this year pope Alexander VI. ſent into Ireland a bull, impowering all the archbiſhops and biſhops of that kingdom, whom the king ſhould require, and none other, to abſolve all rebels in Ireland; a prudent precaution of Henry, to prevent his rival being joined by perſons out of deſpair of living under the preſent government, on account of their paſt offences.

On the thirty-firſt of May this year died, in a very advanced age, Cicely, relict of Richard, duke of York, and daughter of Ralph, earl of Weſtmoreland, at the caſtle of Berkhamſtead, in Hertfordſhire, and was buried at Fotheringham caſtle, in Northamptonſhire. By her huſband ſhe was mother of Edward IV. and Richard III. through the long courſe of her life ſhe had ſeen her huſband murdered in the field, three princes of her body crowned, and four murdered.

This year likewiſe is famous for the conqueſt of Naples by Charles VIII. king of France. As this tranſaction has a connection with the hiſtory of the reign we have now under conſideration, it will be neceſſary to give a brief account of its riſe and principal events.

The poſterity of Charles of Anjou, firſt king of Sicily of the houſe of France, were divided into two branches, whereof one reigned in Naples, and the other in Hungary. After ſundry revolutions, the crown of Naples fell at length to Joan, the firſt of that name; but, in 1380, Charles de Durazzo, of the branch of Hungary, pretending to the ſame crown, and repairing into Italy, attacked queen Joan, who finding herſelf preſſed, adopted Lewis I. duke of Anjou, uncle to Charles VI. king of France. From that time there was a continual war between the two houſes of Anjou. At laſt, Charles de Durazzo remained in poſſeſſion of Naples, and was ſucceeded by Ladiſlaus his ſon, who dying in 1414, left the crown of Naples to Joan II. his ſiſter. Mean time Lewis I. duke of Anjou, and Lewis II. his ſon, always ſtyled themſelves kings of Sicily, and preſerved their pretenſions to Sicily on this ſide the Pharo, or the kingdom of Naples. Lewis II. who died in 1417, left three ſons, namely, Lewis III. Renè, and Charles.

The latter dying in 1481, left Lewis XI. king of France his ſole heir. By virtue of which will Charles VIII. ſon of Lewis XI. pretended the kingdom of Naples was fallen to him.

In purſuance of this claim, in which he was ſupported by the papal chair, Charles had, with an unprecedented career of ſucceſs, entered into Italy the year before; but growing ſo formidable, even the pope himſelf, who was Alexander VI. and the family of Medicis declared againſt him. Notwithſtanding all thoſe diſcouragements, he ſurmounted infinite difficulties; he entered the ſtate of Florence, and obliged Peter de Medicis, its duke, to ſubmit, and the ſtate of Sienna to receive a garriſon. Afterwards he approached and entered Rome with his army, while the pope ſhut himſelf up in the caſtle of St. Angelo. At laſt Charles inveſted the kingdom of Naples, of which, with its capital, he made himſelf maſter; while Alphonſo of Arragon, putting the crown of Naples upon the head of his ſon, the duke of Calabria, went on board his galleys, and took refuge in Sicily. But Charles had entered upon this expedition like a young man: he had no money to pay his troops, but that which he took up at extravagant intereſt; the continual ſucceſs of his arms rendered his ſoldiers and generals exceſſively haughty and odious to the Italians; he had not men to ſpare for garriſoning and keeping the places that had ſubmitted; he could not truſt the natives; and, when maſter of his ambition, he neither knew how to retain or how to diſpoſe of his conqueſts: to crown his miſconduct, he fell at variance with Ludovic Sforza, duke of Milan, who had brought him into Italy to ſupport himſelf againſt the league formed by the pope, the king of Naples, and Peter de Medicis, to keep him out of his duchy of Milan.

At laſt Charles, after taking the uſual oaths as king of Naples, thought of returning to France, and that too without uſing any precautions for maintaining his conqueſts, farther than the oaths and aſſurances the natives afforded. In the mean while all the ſtates and princes of Italy were alarmed at his progreſs, and a league was forming at Venice to ſtrip him of his conqueſts, and cut off his retreat to France. The parties in this league were the pope, the emperor Maximilian, who had already ſucceeded his father Ferdinand in the empire, the kings of Spain and Naples, the archduke of Auſtria, Maximilian's ſon, the duke of Milan, and the republic of Venice. This formidable league, according to our Engliſh hiſtorians, Henry had no ſmall hand in forming (though in what reſpect does not appear, nor is it probable he had any hand it), from which he rather eſcaped than retreated; but before he returned to France, he fought the battle of Fornova, and won it againſt the forces of the allies, which were treble the number of his army, through the treachery chiefly of the Italian generals *.

The emperor Maximilian now reſigned the government of the Low Countries to his ſon Philip, archduke of Auſtria, though he was ſtill a minor; and ſoon after this young prince diſpatched an embaſſy to Henry, in order to renew the treaty of commerce between his dominions and England. Henry was too wiſe a politician ever to retain a reſentment, where it was his intereſt to forget an affront, and therefore ſeeming to have forgot the rebuff his ambaſſadors had met with at the prince's court, he readily embraced a propoſal that promiſed no leſs advantage to the Engliſh than the Flemings, and, on the twenty-fourth of February, 1496 (as I always ſuppoſe the year to commence on the firſt of January), a treaty of peace and perpetual amity was concluded between the two ſovereigns, and the laws of commerce were ſettled to the entire ſatisfaction of both nations ‡. The archduke alſo

* It appears from cardinal Bembo, and other Italian authors, that the king of France retired, after this battle, in the utmoſt hurry; and that Ludovico Sforza, and Franciſco Gonzaga, the Italian generals, favoured his eſcape. As their forces were much ſuperior to thoſe of the French king, they might eaſily have cut off his retreat, if they had not acted treacherouſly, as it is undeniably plain they did. See card. Bemb. by one of the articles of the treaty, engaged to hinder the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy from harbouring or aſſiſting the enemies of the king, and "that if ſhe does, he ſhall ſtrip her of all the places which ſhe holds by dowry, or otherwiſe."

We have already obſerved, that the claimant Perkin, on meeting with a very cold reception in Ireland, had gone over to the court of James IV. king of Scotland. That monarch treated him with great kindneſs and hoſpitality, owned him as the ſon of Edward IV. and appeared ſo perfectly convinced of his being the true duke of York, that he rejected the proffered alliance of Henry, who this very year ſent the biſhop of Carliſle, the earl of Surry, the lords Neville and Dacres, and ſir William Tyler, to ſettle the fortune which James was to have with the princeſs Margaret, Henry's eldeſt daughter, and alſo gave the young adventurer in marriage his own kinſwoman, the lady Catherine Gordon, daughter of the earl of Huntly, one of the moſt beautiful and accompliſhed young ladies of the age, and publicly declared that he would aſſiſt him with all his might in recovering the inheritance of his anceſtors; and it was agreed by the Scottiſh council to put this reſolution of their monarch into immediate execution. A numerous army being aſſembled, James, about the middle of this ſummer, led it in perſon into Northumberland, attended by the young adventurer, who there publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he inveighed againſt Henry as an uſurper, tyrant, and murderer, and promiſed great honours and rewards to thoſe who ſhould join him, their lawful prince, and help to deſtroy the robber who had uſurped his throne *.

This proclamation, though drawn up with great ſpirit and preciſion, produced little or no effect; the truth is, that this claimant of the crown could not come in worſe company than he did; the Scots were odious to the Engliſh nation; the animoſity againſt them ran higher in the North, the uſual ſcene of their depredations, than in any other part of England: James therefore, ſeeing no proſpect of receiving any aſſiſtance from the Engliſh in that part of the country, and not chuſing that his ſoldiers ſhould loſe their labour, ravaged the whole county of Northumberland in a miſerable manner: Richard in vain complained in a moving manner of ſo ruinous a method of making war, proteſting he would rather renounce the crown, than purchaſe it by the deſolation of his country; the Scots were too fond of plunder to refrain: but hearing that Henry was ſending a ſuperior force againſt them, they retreated to their own kingdom. We muſt now attend to the other tranſactions of this year.

Henry, it ſeems, had ſome intimation that the court of France underhand aſſiſted Perkin; for we find that, on the twenty-third of September, he approved and ratified the Venetian league, but excuſed himſelf from furniſhing any quota of men, becauſe of the great diſtance between England and Italy †.

On the fifth of March this year, we find in our records ‡, that the king granted a patent to John Cabot, a Venetian, and his three ſons, for diſcovering new lands under the Engliſh flag, on condition that, after all the expences ſhould be deducted, he ſhould receive one fifth of the profit.

The Scottiſh invaſion furniſhed Henry with an opportunity to make money out of the misfortunes of his people ‖, that he reſolved not to let ſlip; accordingly, having convoked a parliament on the ſixteenth of January, 1497, he opened it by a ſevere ſpeech againſt the perfidy of the Scots, whoſe barbarities, he ſaid, went even beyond their moſt barbarous proceedings in former times; and concluded with telling them, his honour and the protection he owed his people, would not ſuffer him to let theſe wrongs paſs unrevenged. The parliament, who perfectly well underſtood his meaning, granted him a ſupply of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, beſides two fifteenths; and as ſoon as he had obtained this ſupply, he diſſolved the aſſembly. As he did not like delays where money was to come in, he ſet his aſſeſſors and collectors to work immediately, who proceeded in their buſineſs with ſuch inhuman rigour, that he was obliged to recal the lord d'Aubeney, then on his march towards Scotland, to ſuppreſs an inſurrection of a very ſerious nature at home.

Of all the inhabitants of England, the Corniſhmen were at this time the moſt ſturdy in their inclinations, and the ſtouteſt in their perſons: their manner of living and their language were different from thoſe of the reſt of England; and in ſhort the crown itſelf treated them, both at this time and ſome time after, as an independent people. They had particular reaſons for being diſaffected at this juncture; for Brittany being now annexed to the crown of France, they were abridged of their commerce and intercourſe with that coaſt and people, who uſed the ſame language with themſelves.

It was no wonder if ſo many circumſtances concurring, and backed by the demand of a heavy taxation, exaſperated the Corniſhmen to a high degree: they complained loudly, that what they earned by the ſweat of their brows and hard labour in the tin mines, ſhould be exacted from them by exorbitant taxes. Theſe murmurs were encouraged by one Michael Joſeph, a popular and factious blackſmith, of Bodmyn, and Thomas Flammock, a lawyer of like turbulent diſpoſition. Theſe two incendiaries, who ſeem to have been underhand encouraged by perſons of greater conſequence, friends to young Perkin and his claim, beſtirred themſelves ſo effectually among the ignorant populace, that they worked them up to a belief that all ſubſidies of any kind were illegal and oppreſſive, and that the nation never could be happy till archbiſhop Morton and ſir Reginald Bray, whom they accuſed of being the principal adviſers of the late heavy impoſts, were removed from the king's councils; and the flame of diſcontent was ſoon blown to ſuch an height, that, each taking the arms that fury adminiſtered, they formed a conſiderable body, headed by the two demagogues, and marched, to the number of ſixteen thouſand, from Cornwall, through Devonſhire, to Taunton, in Somerſetſhire, where they killed one of the king's collectors of the ſubſidy; from whence they proceeded to Wells, where James Touchet, lord Audley, who had a principal ſhare in ſetting Flammock and the blackſmith to work, put himſelf at their head.

This nobleman, by his authority, kept the male-contents from committing the leaſt violences or diſorders during their march, which they now proſecuted till they came to Wincheſter, in Hampſhire, when, inſtead of marching directly to London, as common prudence would have directed, and agreeable to their original deſign declared in their progreſs, they took it into their heads to turn ſhort and march into Kent, from a ridiculous prepoſſeſſion, that the people of that county, who had on all occaſions ſhewn themſelves zealous for the liberties of the ſubject, would join them in great numbers; but ſo far were they from finding their expectation anſwered, that their numbers, inſtead of increaſing, daily diminiſhed, ſcarcely one Kentiſhman declaring in their favour. Proceeding however in their march, they advanced as far as Blackheath, where they encamped between Greenwich and Eltham, to the no ſmall terror of the citizens of London, who dreaded that their wealth might tempt the inſurgents to plunder the city.

Fortunately, however, for them and for Henry, the army, which he had provided and ſent againſt the Scots, returned by his orders on the firſt news of this inſurrection, and were now ready to act: Henry accordingly ordered it to the field, and divided it into three bodies, one commanded by the earl of Oxford, another by himſelf, and the third by the lord d'Aubeney, a general in whom the troops had great confidence.

The earl of Oxford, who had with him Henry Bourchier, earl of Eſſex, Edmund de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, ſir Rice ap Thomas, and ſir Humphrey Stanley ‡, was ordered to take poſt with the left wing of his diviſion near Lewiſham, and to extend his right ſouth-eaſt towards Foot's Cray, ſo as to ſecure all the defiles and roads by which the rebels could eſcape that way.

The lord d'Aubeney was ordered to front the rebels, ſo that his right wing ſhould form as it were an angle with the earl of Oxford's left.

Henry himſelf encamped in St. George's Fields, with a ſtrong body in the nature of a reſerve.

By this excellent diſpoſition it was impoſſible for any of the rebels to eſcape; as they had no ſhipping, the river Thames hemmed them in towards the north; the earl of Oxford's diviſion cut off their retreat either by the ſouth or the eaſt; and in their front, towards the weſt, they had two armies.

Henry, by giving out that he intended to attack them on the Monday following, whereas he really intended to give them battle on the Saturday, which of all days in the week he fancied to be moſt fortunate to him, drew the rebels into a capital miſtake; for while their main body lay encamped almoſt within the heath on Woolwich Common, between Woolwich and Shooter's Hill, their advanced guard lay at Deptford Bridge, without any intermediate line upon the brow of the hill between them and the main body.

On the afternoon of Saturday the twenty ſecond of June, the lord d'Aubeney made a ſudden motion, and attacked the rebels advanced body at Deptford Bridge, whom, after a ſtout reſiſtance, he drove from their poſt, and followed them up the hill in cloſe purſuit. The alarm by this time had reached the main body of the rebels, and they were preparing to put themſelves in order, when the lord d'Aubeney and all his diviſion appeared upon the top of the hill, from whence advancing to the middle of the heath, they fell upon the Corniſhmen with great fury, who received the attack with as great intrepidity: the lord d'Aubeney, charging at the head of his men, was taken priſoner, and the fate of the day might have been favourable to the Corniſhmen, had they not been attacked at the ſame time in the rear by the earl of Oxford with his diviſion; but being charged on all ſides, ill-armed, ill-conducted, without either horſe or artillery, and much inferior in number, they were ſoon broken by the king's cavalry, and fifteen hundred or two thouſand of them cut in pieces, moſt of the reſt being taken priſoners, with their leaders. As to the royal army, it loſt about three hundred men, moſt of them ſhot dead with arrows of the length of a taylor's yard, proofs of the amazing ſtrength of the old Corniſh! but we read of no perſon of note killed.

Among the priſoners were the lord Audley, with the two incendiaries Flammock and Joſeph; the former was beheaded on Tower-hill *, and the two latter executed at Tyburn †; the reſt, being ordinary labourers, were diſarmed and ſent home, Henry hoping to obliterate the remembrance of former ſeverities by this inſtance of unuſual lenity.

The king of Scotland took advantage of this commotion in England, to make a ſecond inroad upon the northern counties, where he laid ſiege to Norham caſtle. The earl of Surry had been ordered by Henry to take the command of the few forces in thoſe counties; and, after the ſuppreſſion of the Corniſh rebellion, the king ſent the beſt of his troops to join that nobleman in Yorkſhire, who, being thus reinforced, advanced againſt the Scots, and obliged them to raiſe the ſiege; but they retired with ſuch precipitation, that the earl could not overtake them: he however continued his purſuit, and took the ſtrong caſtle of Ayton, ſituated between Berwick and Edinburgh. And thus the campaign was finiſhed with very little loſs or gain on either ſide.

Henry however, willing at all events to keep this troubleſome neighbour quiet, and, if poſſible, draw off James from his connection with his competitor, propoſed a freſh negociation with the Scots, by means of Peter d'Ayala, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Henry's court, who, upon ſounding James, found him ſo well inclined towards a pacification, that in a ſhort time it was agreed that both kings ſhould ſend plenipotentiaries to Ayton, to treat of a peace, d'Ayala performing the office of mediator by the joint conſent of both parties, who obliged themſelves to ſtand by his award. A truce was propoſed to be made for ſeven years, the allies of both crowns were included in the ſame, and it was to be prolonged during the life-time of both kings, and a full year after the deceaſe of the longeſt liver ‖. The greateſt difficulty in the negociation was concerning Perkin Warbeck, the Engliſh ambaſſadors inſiſting warmly that the perſon of that pretender ſhould be delivered into their maſter's hands; but James was firm in his refuſal, and all that either d'Ayala or the Engliſh miniſters could obtain of him, was to ſend Perkin, in an honourable manner, out of Scotland. Accordingly James, furniſhing him with every thing that befitted royal rank, and, putting him and his family and retinue on board three ſhips, he arrived at Corke in Ireland, on the twenty-firſt of July; and no farther obſtacles remaining, the truce was ſigned on all ſides, at Ayton, on the thirtieth of September.

Before we conclude the tranſactions of this year, it will not be impertinent to take a curſory view of Henry's ſituation with regard to the princes of Europe, among whom he had connections.

Philip, archduke of Auſtria, governor of the Low Countries, not only confirmed the treaty of commerce made with England, but deſiſted from his demand of one florin for every-piece of broadcloth ſold within his dominions by Engliſh merchants.

After the treaty of Eſtaples, there was neither war nor difference between France and England during the reſt of Henry VII's reign. Charles and Henry ſtood in awe of each other. Charles, who at firſt had formed vaſt projects, perceived the king of England was the only prince that could lay obſtacles in his way. Afterwards, when he had deſiſted from the war of Italy, and indulged his pleaſures, he always feared that a war with Henry would diſturb his tranquility. Henry on his part dreaded all foreign wars, and particularly with France, by reaſon of his domeſtic enemies. Thus the two monarchs having the ſame intereſt, lived in peace till Charles's death, on the ſixth of April 1498. The duke of Orleans, who ſucceeded him by the name of Lewis XII. was no leſs careful to preſerve a good underſtanding with England. As he turned his thoughts to Italy, it highly concerned him to keep fair with Henry, who would have it in his power to overthrow all his projects by a diverſion in Picardy. As ſoon as Lewis was on the throne, he cauſed his marriage with Jane, daughter of Lewis XI. to be annulled, in order to eſpouſe Anne of Brittany, his predeceſſor's widow. Otherwiſe he would have run the riſk of ſeeing that duchy once more ſevered from France, and in the hands of a foreign houſe.

As to the king and queen of Spain, who now made a great figure in Europe, they continued to cultivate a ſtrict friendſhip with Henry, which was greatly cemented by the contract of marriage between the princeſs Catherine and the prince of Wales.

Maximilian, emperor of Germany, continued in the ſame jealouſy of France, and had now the ſame good diſpoſition with regard to England as before: while the northern crowns had all concluded treaties with Henry. And, towards the cloſe of this year,

Pope Alexander VI. ſent him a preſent of an hallowed ſword and a cap of maintenance, which were delivered to him by his holineſs's nuncio, with great ſolemnity, in St. Paul's cathedral.

But though Henry was thus happy in his ſituation abroad, he ſtill found great uneaſineſſes in the untoward diſpoſition of his own ſubjects; for the Corniſh rebels, rather hardened than gained over by Henry's late clemency to them, boaſted, on their return home, that he had pardoned them only becauſe he was afraid that their deaths or puniſhment would have rouzed the whole nation, who were in general of the ſame way of thinking, to take up arms againſt the government. Theſe diſcourſes making their friends and neighbours believe the whole kingdom was ready to riſe, they began to flock together, and ſhew they were not diſcouraged by the battle of Blackheath: at length, ſome of the moſt fiery of them hearing that Perkin was in Ireland, propoſed to ſend for him, and ſet him at their head.

Perkin had found a very cool reception in Ireland, and in a ſhort time ſaw himſelf deſtitute of friends, money, and ſupport; the principal of his abettors now remaining about his perſon was one Hern a broken mercer, Skelton a taylor, and Aſtley a ſcrivener; for Henry had found means to take Frion off. When the propoſal of the Corniſhmen therefore came to be laid before Perkin and his council, they readily and joyfully embraced it; and, picking up as many followers as he could, amounting, according to lord Bacon, to about one hundred and twenty, embarked on board four ſmall veſſels, and landed, on the ſeventh of September this year 1498, in Whitſand Bay, on the coaſt of Cornwall. As ſoon as he had landed his little troop, he repaired to Bodmyn, the blackſmith's town who was hanged after the battle of Blackheath. There he quickly got together three thouſand men, and iſſued out a proclamation, in which he aſſumed the title of king of England, by the name of Richard IV.

Elated with the hopes of victory, where there was no force to oppoſe them, the hot-headed undiſciplined rabble that compoſed the young claimant's army, reſolved to march and lay ſiege to the city of Exeter, of which they promiſed themſelves an eaſy conqueſt. This wild project they put in execution; but being deſtitute of artillery, and almoſt every other requiſite to form a regular ſiege, and the inhabitants of Exeter acting like men of ſpirit, the aſſailants were, after a vain attempt to ſcale the walls, repulſed on all ſides. In the mean time, ſeveral lords and gentlemen of Devonſhire and the neighbouring parts, aſſociated in defence of Henry's government, and, drawing forces together, put themſelves under arms. The king alſo, on receiving the news of Perkin's invaſion and the ſteps he was taking, diſpatched the lord d'Aubeney, with four thouſand men, to the relief of Exeter, ſpreading a report that he himſelf was following with a more numerous army.

All this being made known for certain to Perkin, he raiſed the ſiege, and drew his men off to Taunton. His army, when at the ſtrongeſt, was about ſeven thouſand men; but many of thoſe having joined him through hopes of plunder, left him upon breaking up the ſiege: and here Perkin ſeems for the firſt time to have given the lye to his pretenſions; the blood of York had never ran in the veins of a coward, which, if we are to credit our hiſtorians, Perkin proved himſelf to be on this occaſion; for, after he had rendezvouſed his army, and made all the neceſſary diſpoſitions to fight, when the lord d'Aubeney advanced to attack him, he fled, with threeſcore horſe to the monaſtery of Beaulieu, in the New Foreſt, where he and his retinue regiſtered themſelves as perſons entitled to the benefit of ſanctuary.

The lord d'Aubeney hearing of his retreat, detached a party of three hundred horſe in purſuit of him; him; but finding him already in the ſanctuary, they ſurrounded the houſe until they ſhould receive farther inſtructions. Mean while the rebels, finding themſelves deſerted by their chief, laid down their arms, and ſubmitted to the mercy of the king, who, with a politic moderation, pardoned them all, except a very few of the moſt irreclaimable and deſperate, whom he captially puniſhed in terror to others.

The king, who, before Perkin's flight, was lying between Taunton and Exeter with a body of reſerve, in caſe of a battle, now entered Exeter in triumph, and preſented the ſword which he wore by his ſide, to the mayor, to whom and his ſucceſſors he gave the liberty to have it carried before them on all public occaſions: he likewiſe gave them a right to uſe a cap of maintenance, and beſtowed the greateſt commendations on the citizens for their courage and loyalty.

But Henry could not think himſelf in ſafety till he was maſter of the pretender's perſon; he thought if he could once compaſs this point, that he might be able to ſatisfy the world, by the methods he ſhould then be in a condition of taking, about an impoſture of which it was impoſſible to convince them otherwiſe. With this view promiſes of life and pardon, with other fair means, were uſed to perſuade Perkin to quit his ſanctuary, and being deſtitute of all hopes, knowing no country where he could be received, and apprehending that force would be employed if he did not yield with a good grace, he came out, and was ſent under a ſtrong guard to London, whither Henry had gone ſome days before, and where the unhappy youth was expoſed to the inſults of an hireling mob as he was carried through the ſtreets to the Tower. Henry, who ſaw Lambert Simnel every day, could not, it ſeems, bear the preſence of Perkin; but, to gratify his curioſity, it was contrived that he ſhould ſee him out of a window.

Though Perkin had obtained a pardon, he was ſtill retained in cuſtody, till, weary of confinement and deſirous of liberty, he broke looſe from his guard, and eſcaping to the monaſtery of Shene, which had the privilege of a ſanctuary, he implored the prior's interceſſion for Henry's pardon. The good prior undertook the office, and Henry was prevailed upon to promiſe the pretender his life; but, in order to render him truly contemptible, he obliged him to ſit whole days before Weſtminſter Hall gate, and the moſt public parts of the city, in the ſtocks, and to read a paper which he owned to be his confeſſion, and was as follows †.

"It is firſt to be known, that I was born in the town of Tournay, in Flanders, and my father's name is John Oſbeck; which ſaid John Oſbeck was comptroller of the ſaid town of Tournay; and my mother's name is Catherine de Farro; and one of my grand-ſires, upon my father's ſide, was named Dorich Oſbeck, who died; after whoſe death my grand-mother was married unto Peter Flamin, who was receiver of the fore-named town of Tournay and dean of the boatmen that row upon the water or river named le Scheld: and my grand-ſire on my mother's ſide was Peter de Farro, who had in his keeping the keys of the gate of St. John's, within the ſame town of Tournay: alſo I had an uncle, called John Stalin, dwelling in the pariſh of St. Pias, within the ſame town, who had married my father's ſiſter, whoſe name was Joan, or Jeane, with whom I lived a certain ſeaſon; and after was led by my mother to Antwerp, to learn Flemiſh in the houſe of a couſin of mine, an officer of the ſaid town, called John Steinbeck, with whom I was the ſpace of half a year. After I returned again to Tournay, by reaſon of the wars that were in Flanders, and within a year following, I was ſent, with a merchant of the ſaid town of Tournay, named Barlow, to the mart of Antwerp, where I fell ſick, which ſickneſs continued upon me five months: and the ſaid Barlow ſet me to board in a ſkinner's houſe, that dwelt beſide the houſe of the Engliſh nation; and by him I was from thence carried to Barrow market, and I lodged at the ſign of the Old Man, where I abode for the ſpace of two months. After this, the ſaid Barlow ſet me with a merchant of Middleburgh to ſervice, to learn the language, whoſe name was John Strow, with whom I dwelt from Chriſtmas to Eaſter; and then I went into Portugal, in company with ſir Edward Brampton's wife, in a ſhip which was called the Queen's Ship. And when I was come thither, then was I put in ſervice to a knight that dwelt in Liſbon, who was called Peter Vaiz de Cogna, with whom I dwelt a whole year; which ſaid knight had but one eye. And becauſe I had a mind to ſee other countries, I took licence of him, and then put myſelf in ſervice of a Breton, Pregent Meno, who brought me with him into Ireland. Now when we were arrived in the town of Corke, they of the town (becauſe I was arrayed with ſome cloaths of ſilk of my ſaid maſter's) came unto me, and threatened upon me, that I ſhould be the duke of Clarence's ſon, that was before time at Dublin.

"But inſomuch as I denied, there were brought unto me the holy Evangeliſts and the croſs, by the mayor of the town, who was called John Llewellyn, and there, in the preſence of him and others, I took mine oath (as the truth was), that I was not the aforeſaid duke's ſon, nor none of his blood. After this came unto me an Engliſhman, whoſe name was Stephen Poiton, and one John Water, and laid to me, in ſwearing great oaths, that they knew I was king Richard's baſtard ſon; to whom I anſwered, with like oaths, I was not. They then adviſed me not to be afraid, but that I ſhould take it upon me boldly; and if I would ſo do, they would aid and aſſiſt me with all their power againſt the king of England; and not only they, but they were well aſſured that the earls of Deſmond and Kildare would do the ſame; for they cared not what part they took, ſo that they might be revenged upon the king of England: and ſo, againſt my will, made me learn Engliſh, and taught me what I ſhould do and ſay; and after this they called me duke of York, ſecond ſon to king Edward IV. becauſe king Richard's baſtard ſon was in the hands of the king of England. Upon this the ſaid Water, Stephen Poiton, John Tyler, Hubert Burgh, with many others, did aſſemble themſelves, and the French king ſent an ambaſſador to Ireland, whoſe name was Loit Lucus, and Mr. Stephen Frion, to advertiſe me to come into France; thence I went into France, thence into Flanders, from Flanders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and ſo into England."

Lord Bacon obſerves of this confeſſion (which ſome writers will have to be extorted from the young man by the rack ), "That the king, in what he did now, did himſelf no right; for (proceeds this noble author) as there was a laboured tale of particulars of Perkin's father and mother, grand-ſire and grand-mother, uncles and couſins, by names and ſurnames, and from what places he travelled up and down, ſo there was little or nothing to purpoſe of any thing concerning his deſigns, or any practices that had been held with him, nor was the ducheſs of Burgundy herſelf (whom all the world knew to be the perſon that had put life and being into the whole buſineſs) ſo much as named or pointed at; ſo that men miſſing what they looked for, looked for they knew not what, and were in more doubt than before." Some, however, believed the king was thus ſilent out of complaiſance to the king of France, the emperor, the archduke, his aunt the ducheſs of Burgundy, and the king of Scotland, all of whom had abetted the impoſture, if it was one; and that there were even ſome Engliſh lords engaged in the plot, againſt whom, on account of their great credit and popularity, Henry did not think proper to proceed. But now, leaving Perkin to his ſufferings, and Henry to his triumph, we will notice the other principal tranſactions of this year.

I have already obſerved, that in the years 1495 and 1496, Henry empowered his ambaſſadors to treat of a marriage between Margaret, his daughter, and the king of Scotland: this affair was again brought on the carpet this year, in an interview which James had with Fox, biſhop of Durham, at Melroſs, to ſettle ſome diſpute which had ariſen between the two nations, on account of mutual depredations committed by the borderers on both ſides; and here it was that the articles were propoſed of that marriage, which afterwards effected the union of both kingdoms under one head. This affair, however, was not finiſhed till January, 1502, owing to a ſtrong oppoſition in Henry's council at this time, who would by no means hearken to an alliance, which, in caſe of the extinction of Henry's male iſſue, might bring the kingdom of England under the government of a king of Scotland.

Great part of this year was ſpent in negociations between Henry and Lewis XII of France, which latter not only renewed all the family and national treaties between them, but alſo engaged to continue the payment of the yearly ſum of fifty thouſand livres. Henry likewiſe concluded a new marine treaty, for preventing all piracies and depredations between the ſubjects of the two kingdoms by ſea; and a ſeparate article paſſed between the two kings, that the one ſhould give no ſhelter or ſupport to the rebels of the other†.

The year 1498 ended with an accident which gave the king no ſmall concern. Whilſt he was at his palace of Shene, in Surry, a fire broke out, on the twenty-ninth of December, with that violence that in a few hours the building was entirely conſumed, with all the rich furniture. As Henry was very fond of that palace, he cauſed it to be rebuilt from the ground in a more magnificent manner, and gave it the name of Richmond, from his title whilſt earl, which name it retains to this day.

In the beginning of the year 1499, one Patrick, an Auguſtine friar, finding a diſciple, the ſon of a ſhoe-maker, by name Edward Wilford, fit for his purpoſe, tutored him into an earl of Warwick, who, he gave out, had eſcaped from the Tower. The friar had the impudence to preach publicly, about the county of Kent, that this was the true earl of Warwick, and to exhort the people to take up arms in his favour. Notwithſtanding the impudence of this impoſture, the actors would not have been without their followers, had not the government uſed great diligence in apprehending both the pupil and the preceptor, the former of whom was hanged, and the other condemned to perpetual impriſonment.

This attempt ſerved as a ſufficient excuſe for Henry to free himſelf at once from all his uneaſineſſes occaſioned by Perkin and the earl of Warwick; he was alſo furniſhed with a ſtill more plauſible pretext by the inconſiderate behaviour of Perkin himſelf, whoſe intriguing ſpirit led him into a plot which deprived him of his life. He had tampered ſo effectually with four ſervants belonging to ſir John Digby, lieutenant of the Tower, that they had actually engaged to aſſiſt him in making his eſcape; and, by their contrivance, he entered into a cloſe correſpondence with the earl of Warwick, who was confined in the ſame priſon of the Tower. That unhappy prince, who, from his earlieſt youth had been cut off from all ſocial intercourſe‡, had fallen into a ſimplicity that rendered him ſuſceptible of any impreſſion, and he agreed with Perkin to take the firſt opportunity of eſcaping, which they perceived could not be done without killing ſir John Digby. Perkin, however, undertook to conduct the whole enterprize.

This conſpiracy could not long eſcape the quick and penetrating eye of Henry; it has even been affirmed by ſome hiſtorians, that the ſcheme was contrived by himſelf, in order to draw Perkin and Warwick into the ſnare: however this might be, Henry ordered both the earl and Perkin to take their trials for their lives. Perkin, on the ſixteenth of November, was brought up to Weſtminſter Hall, before a commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, and tried as a foreigner, condemned, and ſentenced to be hanged, which ſentence he ſuffered at Tyburn, on the twenty-third of the ſame month, together with Waters, the mayor of Corke, who had been his conſtant companion in all his adventures. Such was the end of Perkin Warbeck, who had been acknowleged for lawful king, in Ireland, France, Flanders, England, and Scotland, and been the moth that for a long time had preyed on Henry's quiet. Perhaps he might have ſucceeded in his deſigns, had he been to deal with a leſs political prince: however, it is certain the public was never thoroughly ſatisfied of Perkin's being an impoſtor. As to his confeſſion which, if we may believe our hiſtorians, he read, declaring it to be true, it is upon the whole a looſe, unconnected, improbable narrative; whereas one might have expected, had he been ſincere, a very inſtructive and particular detail of a deep-laid and well-conducted conſpiracy. On the other hand, may we not, without ſinning againſt probability, ſuppoſe him to have been influenced by hopes given him of pardon even to the laſt moments of his life?

‡ Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, was four-and-twenty years old, and had been a priſoner fifteen years, and kept ſo from the company of men and beaſts, that he is ſaid not to have known a gooſe from a capon.

As

As to that unhappy prince the earl of Warwick, he was brought down to take his trial before the earl of Oxford, created lord high-ſteward of England for that purpoſe. He was accuſed, not of attempting his eſcape (for as he was not committed for any crime, an attempt of that nature was not arraignable), but of forming a deſign to diſturb the government, and raiſe an inſurrection in favour of Perkin, and to deſtroy the king. The poor earl, void of all knowlege of man's deceit, was perſuaded to confeſs his indictment, and thereupon received ſentence, which the unrelenting Henry ſuffered to be executed on him, on Tower Hill, on the twenty-eighth of November, 1499, and in him periſhed the laſt heir male of the houſe of York. The ſhedding of this innocent blood cried aloud for vengeance; in vain did Henry endeavour to leſſen the odium of the crime, by dividing it with his ally Ferdinand, king of Spain, who, he ſaid, refuſed to give his daughter in marriage to Arthur, while one prince of the family of York remained alive; the people held the Spaniſh cruelty and inflexibility as no excuſe: the prince of Wales and the princeſs Catherine had been actually married the May before by proxy †, Dr. de Puebla, a Spaniſh lawyer, repreſenting the princeſs.

Lewis XII. had ſolemnly ratified and ſworn to the peace of Eſtaples a little after his acceſſion to the crown; but being deſirous to ſhew Henry he really intended to keep it, he cauſed it to be approved and ratified by the ſtates general, aſſembled at Nantes in the beginning of the year: then he ſent ambaſſadors to the pope, to pray him to confirm it by his authority. The pope, ſeeing no farther obſtacle from France, iſſued out a bull of excommunication againſt whoever of the two kings ſhould not obſerve the treaty.

Having thus ſecured the friendſhip of Henry, Lewis put himſelf at the head of his army, entered Italy, and, after taking ſeveral places, forced the duke of Milan, Ludovico Sforza, to fly to Inſpruck, after loſing all his duchy except the caſtle of Milan.

The year 1500 was uſhered in with a dreadful plague, which ſwept off upwards of thirty thouſand people within the city of London only, among whom was cardinal Morton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of great experience in buſineſs, a ſupple tool to Henry's will, and a man of whom we find not the leaſt veſtige upon record that he poſſeſſed any one virtue of humanity; accordingly his death furniſhed a ſubject of the higheſt exultation to all the kingdom, eſpecially the poor and middling families, whoſe faces he had long ground by his diabolical knack at inventing the moſt oppreſſive taxes, and inforcing the payment of them by the moſt cruel methods. He was ſucceeded in the ſee of Canterbury by Henry Deane, biſhop of Saliſbury.

As this year was the beginning of a new century, the ſee of Rome, ever watchful of opportunities to fleece or to delude the people, now publiſhed a jubilee; thoſe who lived at a great diſtance from Rome were allowed to purchaſe, for a certain ſum, the privileges of the jubilee without being obliged to repair to Rome, according to the received cuſtom. In order to levy the money ariſing from this indulgence, Alexander diſpatched commiſſioners into all the ſtates of Chriſtendom, and appointed a Spaniard, by name Gaſpar Pons, as his agent in England, who collected large ſums for the uſe of the papal ſee: but when he applied to Henry, in his holineſs's name, to make one in a cruſade which had been planned againſt the Turks, and in which each prince of Europe had his particular department allotted him, Henry, who, from the known character of pope Alexander, concluded that his only aim was to amaſs money by contributions for this enterprize, and having ſeveral things depending at the pope's court at this time, did not think fit to diſoblige his holineſs, returned an anſwer very vague, but very reſpectful; he excuſed himſelf from attending on the expedition in perſon, but offered to contribute a large ſum of money; but then this promiſe was made on condition that ſome good towns on the coaſt of Italy might be put into his hands, as a ſecurity for the ſums he might advance.

Though it is evident from the whole of this anſwer (which is to be found in lord Bacon's Life of Henry VII.) that Henry at that time both declined and deſpiſed the propoſal, yet his pompous profeſſions of zeal for the intereſt of religion wrought ſo much in his favour abroad, that the knights of Rhodes choſe him protector of their order. Alexander having pretty well ſtored his coffers, the affair of the cruſade vaniſhed into air.

The plague continuing to rage in England, Henry, about the middle of May this year, thought fit to remove with his court to Calais, in the neighbourhood of which place he had a conference with Philip, archduke of Auſtria, in which they diſcuſſed the means of improving the good underſtanding between their two people. It is ſaid they had likewiſe ſome converſation about a cloſer alliance, by the intermarriage of the king of England's ſecond ſon, Henry, with the archduke's ſiſter; and between the princeſs Mary, Henry's ſecond daughter, and the archduke's ſon Charles; but the parties being all too young, the matter went no farther than a propoſal, and the marriage never took effect*.

Soon after the king's return to London, two bulls arrived from the pope, the one ſubjecting the perſon of Lewis XII. of France to an excommunication, and his kingdom to an interdict, if he ſhould ever fail in paying Henry the fifty thouſand crowns agreed upon by the treaty of Eſtaples; and another of diſpenſation for the marriage between James IV. king of Scotland, and Margaret, the eldeſt daughter of Henry, which had, by ſeveral negociations in the courſe of this and the preceding year, been brought pretty nearly to a concluſion; the young lady, who was but ten years and ſix months old, was within the fourth degree of conſanguinity to king James.

Henry's thoughts, however, were not ſo taken up by theſe alliances as to make him forget any means of filling his coffers: he was already poſſeſſed of more perſonal riches than any ſovereign in Europe; but his avarice ſeemed to increaſe in proportion as it was gratified. He now iſſued out commiſſions for impoſing fines and redemptions upon all perſons in the counties of Wilts, Dorſet, Somerſet, ſet, and Devon, that ſhould be found to have favoured in any reſpect the Corniſhmen, when they roſe, three years before, under Perkin Warbeck or the lord Audley. With the like view of fleecing the ſubject, he, about the ſame time, iſſued orders to all the ſheriffs throughout England to ſummon all gentlemen having forty pounds a year in land, to come before the next Candlemas, and receive knighthood. Never was king of England more hated by his ſubjects, though this hatred was mingled with fear, produced by his uninterrupted ſucceſs, and the opinion of his great abilities, both as a monarch and politician. All the powers upon the continent courted his alliance, and all the malecoutents of England, were over-awed into a peaceful acquieſcence.

Notwithſtanding this felicity, the buſy, reſtleſs, furious paſſion of jealouſy ſtill encroached upon his repoſe. Henry was of a diſpoſition never to be eaſy under the ſmalleſt ground of apprehenſion, and an accident happened towards the cloſe of this year, which not a little diſturbed him. Edmund de la Pole, ſecond ſon of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, eldeſt ſiſter of Edward IV. was, on the death of his elder brother, John earl of Lincoln, who was ſlain in the battle of Stokefield, deemed the next lineal heir to the crown, whenever the lines of Edward or of George, duke of Clarence, ſhould become extinct: the proſpect was remote, but Henry's hatred and fears of the houſe of York made him look with a jealous eye even upon the remoteſt branches of that family. Upon the death of John, duke of Suffolk, in 1491, Edmund claimed inheritance of his title and eſtates; but Henry had obliged him to compromiſe, by giving up the title of duke, a dignity he, by his extravagance, was in no condition to ſupport, and, in conſideration of this ceſſion, he was allowed to retain the lands of the earldom, with the dignity of earl of Suffolk.

The earl was a nobleman of tried courage, but immoderately paſſionate: he had, about this time, the misfortune to kill a man in one of his furious ſallies; and, though he was a branch of the houſe of York, the king did conſent to indulge him with a pardon, but, in order to leave a ſtigma upon his character, he obliged him to appear at the bar of the King's Bench court, and plead the royal pardon like a common felon. This touched the earl's pride ſo ſenſibly, that he fled over to Flanders, and reſided at the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy's court. Henry was not a little alarmed at his retreat; he thought he ſaw a new pretender ready to diſpute with him his throne; and, in order to anticipate any deſigns he might hatch to his prejudice, he ſent over emiſſaries, who, by dint of promiſes and profeſſions, perſuaded him to return and be reconciled to the government. The earl accepted of the invitation, and came back to England, where he plunged into all his former exceſſes, to the ruin of his character and fortune. Before we cloſe this year, it will be neceſſary briefly to mention what paſſed in Italy.

After Lewis XII. was become maſter of the duchy of Milan, he turned his thoughts to the conqueſt of Naples. Though probably he might alone have conquered that kingdom, he made however an alliance with the king of Arragon, whereby they agreed to join their forces, and ſhare the conqueſt between them: Ferdinand was to have Apulia and Calabria; and Lewis the city of Naples, Abruzzo, and Terra di Lavaro. The treaty being ſigned, Ferdinand ſent an army into Italy, under the command of the famous Gonzalvo, commonly called the Great Captain. Lewis gave the conduct of his army to d'Aubigni, the earl of Galazzo, and Cæſar Borgia, the pope's baſtard, who, having quitted the cardinalate, was become duke of Valentinois. The French fleet was commanded by Philip of Cleves, lord of Ravenſtein. In a very ſhort ſpace, each of the two kings became maſter of the portion aſſigned him by the treaty; and the unfortunate Frederick, king of Naples, was forced to caſt himſelf upon the mercy of Lewis XII. who ſent him to live in France, with a penſion of thirty thouſand crowns.

The year 1501 produces nothing remarkable for hiſtory to tranſmit, ſave the marriage of Arthur, prince of Wales, with the princeſs Catherine of Spain. According to Stowe, that princeſs arrived at Plymouth on the ſecond day of October, and the nuptials were celebrated at London, with great pomp and ſolemnity on the fourteenth of November, the prince being then turned of fifteen, and the lady about the age of eighteen. Her dower amounted to two hundred thouſand ducats, in money, jewels, and plate; and the third part of the principality of Wales, dukedom of Cornwall, and earldom of Cheſter, was aſſigned to her as a jointure, provided her huſband ſhould die before his acceſſion to the throne †.

This year we find the firſt mention upon our records of the famous Thomas, afterwards cardinal Woolſey, who was then rector of the pariſh-church of Limington, in Hampſhire, and maſter of arts, and had now a bull from the pope for enjoying of two livings *.

The marriage of prince Arthur was ſucceeded by the contract of another match between the king of Scotland and Henry's daughter Margaret, her father having over-ruled all oppoſition of his council, by convincing them that even if the crown of England ſhould devolve to the king of Scotland, in default of his (Henry's) male iſſue, that in ſuch caſe Scotland would become an acceſſion to England, as the ſmaller would always be ſwallowed up in the greater dominion; a political prediction which we have found fully verified.

All matters being adjuſted between the plenipotentiaries on both ſides on the twelfth of February, 1502, the marriage articles between the king of Scotland and the princeſs Margaret were engroſſed. As this was, perhaps, in its conſequences, the moſt remarkable tranſaction of Henry's reign, we ſhall here give an abſtract of the articles, which will ſhew the depth of Henry's policy, and the ſoundneſs of his judgment.

"I. That James, king of Scotland, ſhall, at Candlemas next, in perſon or by his proxy, marry the princeſs Margaret (who, on the laſt day of November by-paſt, had attained the full age of twelve years), and that no exceptions ſhall be made againſt their conſanguinity or affinity, both having been beforehand diſpenſed with by the ſovereign pontiff.

† The magnificence of Henry's court, and the profuſeneſs of this marriage ceremony, muſt be ſurpriſing even to a modern reader, who will have ſome idea of the manners and improved luxury of this age, by Stowe's account of this ceremony, p. 482, 483. of his Annals.

* Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xii. p. 783.

"II. That

" II. That the ſaid princeſs ſhall be conveyed, at the charges of the ſaid king her father, and delivered to her ſaid huſband, or to any impowered by him to receive her, at Lamberton Kirk, about the beginning of September, 1503, and not till then.

" III. That, before the firſt day of July, 1503, the ſaid princeſs be legally infeoffed and ſeiſed in all the lands, caſtles, &c. which the queens dowager of Scotland uſually enjoy; and if all theſe lands, &c. be not found to yield the yearly revenue of two thouſand pounds Engliſh, or, which was then the ſame, ſix thouſand pounds Scots money, that her ſaid huſband ſhall aſſign her as many other lands as will make up the deficiency.

" IV. That the ſaid princeſs ſhall be allowed always by her at leaſt twenty-four ſervants of the Engliſh nation, men or women, as ſhe ſhall incline, over and above her Scottiſh domeſtics; and that all theſe ſhall be maintained at the charges of the king her huſband, who ſhall give her every year the ſum of one thouſand pounds Scots, or five hundred marks ſterling, by equal proportions, at the feaſts of Eaſter and Michaelmas, to be diſpoſed of at her pleaſure.

" V. That, in caſe of the death of the ſaid king her huſband, ſhe ſhall be allowed to reſide within or without the kingdom of Scotland, as ſhe ſhall think fit; and although ſhe ſhould think fit to reſide without the kingdom, yet her whole jointure, amounting to the aforeſaid ſum of two thouſand pounds ſterling, or ſix thouſand pounds Scots, ſhall be faithfully paid.

" VI. That the king her father ſhall pay for her portion, to the ſaid king James her huſband, thirty thouſand pieces of gold called angel-nobles, or the equivalent in the current coin of England; whereof ten thouſand to be paid at Edinburgh, eight days after the conſummation of the marriage; other ten thouſand on the ſame day of the enſuing year, 1504, at Coldingham; and the laſt ten thouſand towards the end of the year 1505.

" VII. That in caſe the ſaid princeſs ſhall chance to die without iſſue before the complete payment of her portion, the remainder unpaid ſhall be no more due; but if ſhe ſhould chance to leave iſſue behind, then the whole ſhall be faithfully paid, as if ſhe was alive *."

At the ſame time a peace was concluded between both kingdoms, upon the following terms:

" I. That, in all times to come, there ſhall be a ſincere, complete, and inviolable peace, friendſhip, and league between the moſt illuſtrious and excellent princes, James, king of Scotland, and Henry, king of England, their heirs and lawful hereditary ſucceſſors, their kingdoms, and ſubjects, whether eccleſiaſtic or laic, &c.

" II. That neither of the ſaid kings ſhall favour the rebellious ſubjects of the other, directly or indirectly, but ſhall, on the contrary, commit them to priſon as ſoon as they are known to be ſuch.

" III. That all ſafe-conducts granted, or promiſes made, to any of the Engliſh rebels by king James, ſhall be recalled, and never renewed; and vice verſa.

" IV. If either of the ſaid kings ſhall be attacked by another emperor, king, prince, &c. that the king who is not attacked ſhall aſſiſt him who is, and with as many forces as ſhall be required, provided that theſe forces be maintained at the charges of that king to whoſe aſſiſtance they ſhall be ſent.

" V. That the king of Scotland ſhall not moleſt or beſiege the town or caſtle of Berwick; nor ſhall the inhabitants thereof give any diſturbance to the ſubjects of the ſaid king of Scotland.

" VI. That the fiſh garth of Eſk ſhall be equally free to the ſubjects of both kingdoms, ſo that either the Scots or Engliſh may break or repair without being quarrelled by either of the kings.

" V. That the allies of both kings ſhall be comprehended in the treaty, namely, the king of the Romans; Lewis, king of the French; the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Denmark; the archduke of Auſtria; the dukes of Venice, Ferrara, and Savoy; and the Hanſe Towns of Germany, on the part of king Henry: and on that of king James; Lewis, king of France; John, king of Denmark; the king of Spain, the king of the Romans, the archduke of Auſtria, the dukes of Gueldres, Alſace, and Cleves, and the marquis of Brandenburgh: that all theſe ſhall be informed of the treaty, and be invited to come into it, within eight months; and if they do not accept of the offer, they are in that caſe to be conſidered as unconcerned: as alſo, that if the king of England ſhall chance to make war with any of the ſaid allies of the king of Scotland, the ſaid king of Scotland may aſſiſt his ſaid ally with auxiliary forces, to be ſent to his aſſiſtance and defence; but ſhall not offer to make a diverſion on his behalf by attempting any thing againſt England itſelf; & vice verſa: ſo that the peace between the two kingdoms ſhall remain inviolable, as before.

" VIII. In caſe, which God forbid, that the ſaid king James, or princeſs Margaret, ſhould die before the conſummation of their marriage, the peace ſhall nevertheleſs continue, unleſs either of the kings, their heirs or ſucceſſors, do make known to the other, within two months after the deceaſe of the ſaid king or princeſs, that he will not adhere to the treaty. And,

" IX. In that caſe, that is to ſay although the peace ſhould not take effect, by reaſon of the death of either of the parties, or non-delivery of the princeſs at the time appointed, yet the truce formerly concluded ſhall continue during the life of both the ſaid kings, and one year longer.

" X. That both kings ſhall obtain a ratification of the preſent treaty from the pope, before the firſt day of July, 1503; and that the party breaking ſhall ſubmit himſelf to the ſentence of excommunication, and be actually excommunicated †.

Henry had carried a great point in this treaty, by re-annexing Berwick for ever to the crown of England; but, not contented with that, he uſed every method of flattery and entreaty that he could deviſe, in order to detach James from any of his engagements with the court of France: James went ſo far in his complaiſance to his future father-in-law, as to promiſe him all that he deſired. Henry, on his part, ſhewed ſo great an earneſtneſs to preſerve a good underſtanding with his right dear and entirely beloved ſon, as he calls him, that he gave the biſhop of Murray, the Scottiſh ambaſſador at his court, a liſt of the names of thoſe who were to attend his daughter to Scotland; but the conſum-mation of the marriage was, on account of the tender years of the princeſs, deferred till the enſuing year.

But the joy occaſioned by this union was too quickly damped by the death of Arthur, prince of Wales, who expired at Ludlow caſtle, where he reſided, on the ſecond day of April, about five months after his nuptials. His fate was deeply lamented by the people of England, who flattered themſelves with the proſpect of a happy reign under a prince of his accompliſhments; and in about ſix months after his deceaſe, his brother Henry was, in the twelfth year of his age, created prince of Wales and earl Cheſter.

About this period the king received an embaſſy from the emperor Maximilian, propoſing a league againſt the Turks, and deſiring the loan of ten thouſand pounds ſterling, to be employed in reducing the rebels; which Henry granted, and at the ſame time concluded a treaty of commerce, friendſhip, and alliance with him, to remain in force for one year after the death of the longeſt liver: he alſo ſent ſir Thomas Brandon and Dr. Weſt as his commiſſioners to inveſt Maximilian with the order of the Garter.

And now the ſpirit of faction being entirely quelled among the Engliſh, and Henry's throne and family eſtabliſhed by every ſucceſs and precaution that can give duration to empire, he had it in his power to have rendered himſelf the moſt amiable, as he was the moſt fortunate, of monarchs; but his avarice, which was inſatiable, encreaſed with his years, and was continually prompting him to try new methods to amaſs riches, which he ſeems to have coveted merely for the ſake of poſſeſſing them and not to uſe them, ſince few perſons were ever better œconomiſts than himſelf. Morton was dead, and he now choſe for the agents of his rapaciouſneſs ſir Richard Empſon and Edward Dudley. Empſon was the ſon of a ſieve-maker, and by the boldneſs of his meaſures endeavoured to conceal the meanneſs of his birth. Dudley was a man of fortune and family, as well as of great abilities, all which render his memory, if poſſible, more execrable than that of his fellow-labourer in iniquity. Empſon ſerved as the ſaw (ſays a modern hiſtorian), Dudley as the razor of oppreſſion in the hands of Henry: ſuch was the inſolence of theſe two infamous miniſters, that they did not even obſerve the common forms of juſtice, but proceeded with the moſt arbitrary licentiouſneſs to fleece the ſubject; and ſuch who would not tamely yield up their property were impriſoned, fined, and ſome even executed in conſequence of private trial, without fair examination or verdict of jury. Henry, who ſhared the fruits of this oppreſſion, covered the authors with the ægis of his authority: informers, promoters, queſt-mongers, and the like vermin, ſwarmed over the face of the land; while Henry was deaf and inſenſible to the groans of the oppreſſed and the reproaches of his people. The two following anecdotes, as handed down to us by the lord Bacon, will ſerve to ſhew us, that as Henry let ſlip no opportunity for amaſſing money, however baſe or ungrateful it might be, he was alſo meanly mechanical in the purſuit of oppreſſion, and even affected to obſerve a conſcientiouſneſs in the methods of injuſtice.

To the family of Vere the houſe of Lancaſter owed more than it did to any in the kingdom: the earl of Oxford, the head of that family, and one who had been the moſt ſtrenuous in the cauſe of Henry, having one day magnificently entertained his ſovereign at his caſtle of Henningham, upon the king's taking his leave the earl's ſervants, wearing their maſter's livery and badges, were ordered to form a long row on each ſide of the hall through which Henry paſſed, who, perceiving a greater number of domeſtics in livery than the law againſt retainers allowed the earl to maintain, ſaid to him, "My lord, I have heard much of your hoſpitality, but it exceeds all report: are all theſe gentlemen and yeomen your menial ſervants?" Oxford anſwering, that he had retained them only on that occaſion, to do his highneſs the more honour, Henry was mean enough to make him this reply, "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for my good cheer; but I may not endure to have my laws broken in my ſight; my attorney muſt ſpeak to you." The earl was afterwards put to ſo much trouble for this unſeaſonable magnificence, that he was obliged to compound for his offence, by paying a fine of fifteen thouſand marks.

The noble author juſt quoted informs us likewiſe, that he had ſeen a book of accompts of Empſon's, that had the king's hand ſubſcribed in almoſt every leaf: among other articles he found the following, "Item, received of (ſuch a one) five marks for a pardon, which if it do not paſs, the money to be repaid, or the party otherwiſe ſatisfied:" oppoſite to this memorandum was another, in the king's own hand, in theſe words, "Otherwiſe ſatisfied."

Nothing extraordinary paſſed in England the reſt of this year, except the following events, which we ſhall curſorily note.

James and Henry were employed in confirming and ratifying their late treaties, and ſwearing to obſerve them. We find in the Collection of Public Acts*, that James obſerving that the title of king of France, given to Henry, had ſlipped into his oath, he ordered a public inſtrument to be drawn up, to diſclaim giving Henry that title, and to have the ſame eraſed; but James at the ſame time expreſſed his readineſs of renewing his oath as often as Henry ſhould think proper.

On the fifth of Auguſt, this year, died ſir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter, often mentioned in theſe pages, of whom Hall† gives the following character, "He was the very father of his country, a ſage and grave perſon, and a fervent lover of juſtice, who would often admoniſh the king, when he did any thing contrary to juſtice or equity." About the ſame time likewiſe died Henry Deane, who had ſucceeded Morton as archbiſhop of Canterbury, and was himſelf ſucceeded by Dr. Warham, biſhop of Lincoln, a very great politician and an able negociator, who was often employed by Henry in treaties of the greateſt conſequence.

On the ninth of December, this year, Henry gave a patent to James Elliot and Thomas Aſhurſt, merchants of Briſtol, to John Gonzalez and Francis Fernandez, natives of Portugal, to go with Engliſh colours in queſt of unknown countries, upon certain terms expreſſed in the patent, which

About this time (according to Stowe the annaliſt †) were brought to court three men, taken in the new-found iſlands by Sebaſtian Cabot, the Venetian. They were cloathed in the ſkins of beaſts, and ſpoke a language unknown. Two of them were ſeen two years after at the king's court at Weſtminſter, dreſſed like Engliſhmen, neither could they be diſtinguiſhed from ſuch.

In the beginning of the year 1503 ‡, Henry, to complete the meaſure of his happineſs, loſt his wife Elizabeth, whom he had endured for the ſake of decency to remain the partner of his bed and ſtate: ſhe died in child-bed, within the Tower, and the child died ſoon after. Henry's hatred to the houſe of York was extended to this princeſs, nor could all her virtues, her beauty, or her merit, ever conquer that innate averſion to her family: the concern he gave her by confining the queen her mother in a convent, and confiſcating all her eſtate, is ſaid by ſome to have haſtened her death.

The conduct of the king and his miniſters had by this time rendered them extremely odious to the people, who murmured inceſſantly againſt the government, and ſo loudly that it came to Henry's ears, who was not a little alarmed thereat, and his apprehenſions were farther encreaſed by the following event.

The vaſt profuſion of money in dreſs and equipage on account of the wedding of the late prince Arthur and the princeſs Catherine of Spain, had run ſeveral noblemen in debt, and among the reſt Edmund, earl of Suffolk, of whom we have already ſpoken. He had borrowed large ſums for that purpoſe, and, either preſſed by his debts, or having reaſon to apprehend his life in danger from Henry, who had, ever ſince his return from Flanders, ſet ſpies about his perſon, and whoſe jealouſy he knew to be equally fatal and incurable, the earl fled again, in February, or the beginning of March, this year, over into Flanders, with his brother Richard, whoſe fine accompliſhments and great merit had recommended him to the poſt of firſt gentleman of the bed-chamber to prince Arthur.

The king, alarmed at the earl's going off, and ſuſpecting that he was engaged in practices againſt his crown and ſtate before his departure, and had his accomplices, was eager to know his ſcheme, and the names of thoſe who had favoured his flight or correſponded with him during his retreat; and, to ſatisfy himſelf in theſe points, repeated the expedient he had ſo ſucceſsfully uſed in the caſe of Perkin Warbeck, and privately employed a ſpy, one ſir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes, near Calais, who, being properly inſtructed, abandoned his charge on pretence of diſaffection to the government, and retired to Flanders, where he offered his ſervice to the earl of Suffolk, then at the court of the old ducheſs dowager of Burgundy.

The earl, not ſuſpecting his deſign, admitted him into his intimacy, and, without reſerve, diſcloſed to him the names of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, who were his correſpondents, and who, in their letters, which he ſhewed to this treacherous confident, had ſpoken pretty freely of their diſlike to the king's meaſures; all which the knight punctually communicated to Henry. The reſult of this was, that all the earl's correſpondents were immediately ſeized; and, among others, the lord Courtney, ſon and heir to the earl of Devonſhire, and huſband to the lady Catherine, daughter to Edward IV. ſir James Tyrrel, ſir John Wyndham, the lord Abergavenny, and ſir Thomas Green; but the two latter were diſcharged. Of the others, ſir John Wyndham and ſir James Tyrrel only were beheaded, while the reſt were hanged. As to ſir James Tyrrel, there is the ſtrongeſt reaſon for believing that he died without giving any account that was ſatisfactory to the government, concerning the death of Edward IV's two ſons, becauſe if he had, it would undoubtedly have been publiſhed.

Henry was not yet ſatisfied; he was deſirous to get at the bottom of that plot he ſuſpected was hatching againſt him: he therefore ordered Curſon to continue his correſpondence, and fell upon the following extraordinary method to give that informer a high degree of credit with the earl of Suffolk; he cauſed Innocent VIII's bull of excommunication to be publiſhed at St. Paul's Croſs againſt all perſons that ſhould diſturb him in poſſeſſion of the throne, and ordered the names of the earl of Suffolk and ſir Robert Curſon to be particularly mentioned therein: but as ſoon as the latter had, by the help of this trick, wormed every thing out of Suffolk that he thought neceſſary for the ſervice of his employer, he was ordered over to England, where Henry received him into particular favour. The earl, finding by this that he was betrayed, and receiving but ſmall encouragement from the ducheſs of Burgundy, who was probably tired of being the continual ſcreen to the diſaffected Engliſh, without any hopes of prejudicing the poſſeſſor of that throne, he led for ſome time a vagrant life in Germany, and at length threw himſelf upon the protection of Philip, archduke of Auſtria, who received him, notwithſtanding his treaties with Henry, who, knowing that the earl had not a party in England to ſupport him, ſhewed no farther uneaſineſs about him for the preſent.

On the ſixteenth of June, this year, all the neceſſary preparations, which were extremely magnificent, being accompliſhed, the princeſs Margaret was ſent to Scotland; the king her father conducting her from Richmond, in Surry, as far as Yorkſhire, where he took leave of her, after ordering the earls of Northumberland and Surry, with a very pompous retinue of noble perſonages, to attend her to Edinburgh, where the marriage was celebrated with extraordinary magnificence on the eighth of Auguſt.

Henry, prince of Wales, was now about thirteen years of age, of pregnant parts, and of a robuſt conſtitution. His father had deſigned him for the church, and therefore he had received a more liberal education than had been given to his elder brother. By the death of this latter, however, he was now become apparent heir to the crown; and the king ſaw, with infinite regret, that he ſhould be obliged to refund the fortune which he had received for his late ſon with the princeſs Catherine, unleſs he could fall on ſome means to elude the treaty on that head. As nothing carried with it the appearance of diſhoneſty that tended to the getting or ſaving of money, in the eye of this avaricious monarch, he bethought himſelf of the expedient of bringing about a marriage between young Henry and the widow of his late brother, on pretence that the former marriage had never been conſummated by the parties; and accordingly he cauſed the propoſal to be made to the king and queen of Spain. Ferdinand and Iſabella, having as little delicacy in matters of intereſt as Henry himſelf, lent a ready ear to the overture, and quickly agreed to the match, provided the pope's diſpenſation could be obtained. This agreement we find in the Collection of Public Acts, dated June 23, 1503 *.

Alexander VI. dying in the ſummer of this year, was ſucceeded by Pius III. who himſelf not outliving the eighteenth of October, Julius II. was elected, on the firſt of November, into the papal chair, and it was to him that the two courts applied for the diſpenſation. This pontiff, who was a mortal enemy to the French king, was very fond of an opportunity to oblige Henry, and thereby bring him into his intereſt. Accordingly, on the twenty-ſixth of December, he granted a bull for diſpenſing with the marriage of Henry, prince of Wales with Catherine, the widow of his deceaſed brother. This bull, as we find it quoted in biſhop Burnet's Hiſtory of the Reformation †, was to the following effect:

"That he (the pope), in the fullneſs of his authority, having received a petition from prince Henry and the princeſs Catherine, bearing, that whereas the princeſs was lawfully married to prince Arthur, who was dead without iſſue, though the ſaid marriage was perhaps conſummated by carnal copulation, but they being deſirous to marry, for preſerving the peace between the crowns of England and Spain, did petition his holineſs for his diſpenſation; therefore the pope, out of his care to maintain peace among all catholic kings, did abſolve them from all cenſures under which they might lie, and diſpenſed with the impediment of their affinity, notwithſtanding any apoſtolical conſtitutions or ordinances to the contrary, and gave them leave to marry; or, if they were already married, he, confirming it, required their confeſſor to enjoin them ſome healthful penance for their having married before the diſpenſation was obtained."

It was neceſſary to give ſo much of this bull, on account of the important conſequences this affair produced in the following reign.

Towards the cloſe of this year, Henry beſtowed the office of lord high-ſteward of England on the earl of Surry, for trying the lord Dudley, who had been indicted for a felony committed in Staffordſhire.

As to foreign affairs, we have to obſerve, that Philip, archduke of Auſtria, having been on a viſit to the king and queen of Spain, returned this year into Flanders. As he paſſed through France, he endeavoured to adjuſt a difference between king Ferdinand, his father-in-law, and Lewis XII. concerning the kingdom of Naples; he even took upon him to conclude, in Ferdinand's name, a treaty which was afterwards diſclaimed. Had he been concerned with a prince of leſs goodneſs and equity than Lewis XII. that diſclaiming might have thrown him into great trouble; but Lewis was too generous to take the advantage. The occaſion, in ſhort, of the rupture between the two monarchs was this:

They had, as hath been obſerved divided the kingdom of Naples, after conquering it. It was hardly poſſible that theſe two princes ſhould long poſſeſs the portion fallen to each, without ſome occaſion of quarrel; accordingly a diſpute aroſe concerning the province of Capitanata, which each would have to be in his diviſion: whereupon the French and Spaniards came to blows. At firſt the French had the advantage, but afterwards loſt two battles, one near St. Severina, in Calabria, on the twenty-firſt of April, the other on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, at Cerignoles, where the duke de Nemours, their general, was ſlain. After theſe two victories, Gonzalvo, who commanded Ferdinand's troops, became maſter of the whole kingdom of Naples. Lewis, deſirous to repair his loſſes, ſent a powerful army into Italy, which was, by ſundry unforeſeen accidents, rendered unſerviceable.

Henry was not fond of parliaments, yet he held them when he found any tolerable proſpect of getting a ſupply; with this view he aſſembled the two houſes on Thurſday, January 25, 1504, in order to obtain an equivalent for two ancient aids due to the crown, on account of the knighthood of the king's eldeſt ſon and the marriage of his eldeſt daughter. Nothing can afford a ſtronger proof of the almoſt abſolute power of the king, than his getting the commons to chuſe Edward Dudley (one of his infamous miniſters, and the moſt odious man in the kingdom) their ſpeaker. Beſides the many emoluments that accrued to Henry from this ſeſſion (which, together with the ſeveral laws enacted therein, will be found under their proper heads), he got a conſiderable ſum by the confiſcation of the eſtates of a number of perſons, going as far back as the beginning of his reign to ſearch for ſuch as had offended, who were accordingly, upon his complaint, attainted of high-treaſon: yet, not content with this acquiſition of riches, he iſſued out commiſſions for a general benevolence, though he had no war upon his hands, nor any appearance of one. Among other inſtances of rapaciouſneſs and oppreſſion, he obliged the city of London to give him five thouſand marks for a confirmation of their liberties; and a vaſt ſum was alſo paid into the royal coffers by the nation upon a recoinage.

In order to make ſome ſort of atonement for theſe extortions, and do ſomething that might recommend him to the friends of the houſe of Lancaſter, he ordered the body of Henry VI. to be removed from Windſor to Weſtminſter, where it was interred with great pomp; and he applied to the pope for a bull to canonize that monarch; but the miracles attributed to the deceaſed after his death were ſo ill aſſerted, that his holineſs would not admit him to a place among the ſaints, without ſuch a pecuniary conſideration as Henry did not think proper to advance, and therefore the deſign was laid aſide. A foreign event now fell out, which gave Henry no little uneaſineſs.

On the twenty-ſixth of November, this year, Ferdinand, king of Spain, notified the death of his queen Iſabella, by a letter to Henry, and that ſhe had left him adminiſtrator of the kingdoms of Caſtile, Leon, and Grenada, for their daughter

Juana

Juanna, wife of Philip, archduke of Auſtria, who immediately aſſumed the title of king of Spain; but being then engaged in a war with the duke of Guelderland, he was not at leiſure to go and take poſſeſſion of his new inheritance, and therefore was obliged for the preſent to leave the adminiſtration in the hands of his father-in-law, but determined to deprive him of it the firſt favourable opportunity.

Ferdinand, however, claimed a right to the government during his life, on pretence that no particular time was fixed by Iſabella's laſt will. It was of the utmoſt conſequence for Henry to ſupport Ferdinand in this matter againſt the archduke; he was ſenſible that the greater part of his ſubjects conſidered his late conſort, the princeſs Elizabeth, as the rightful queen of England, and that her right had now of courſe deſcended to the prince of Wales, her heir and lawful ſucceſſor, who might one day be encouraged to ſupplant him in the throne; he therefore regarded the iſſue of the diſpute between Ferdinand and Philip as a precedent either for or againſt his own title, and he actually took part with ſuch of the Spaniards who adviſed Ferdinand to break through his wife's entail, and declare himſelf king of Caſtile, Leon, and Grenada in his own right. But Ferdinand, though far from wanting ambition, declined this point, as too difficult to attempt, and contented himſelf with fixing Henry in his intereſt by putting the finiſhing hand to the marriage between his daughter Catherine, princeſs dowager of Wales, and Henry, prince of Wales, which was celebrated in the ſpring of the enſuing year, 1505.

In the beginning of this ſame year Henry entered upon a treaty of marriage for himſelf: he had caſt his eyes upon the queen dowager of Naples for a wife, in order to enjoy the large dower aſſigned her in that kingdom. Perhaps he had alſo another view in this match, namely, the becoming umpire of the differences between Lewis XII. and Ferdinand, concerning the kingdom of Naples. However, Henry's ardour was quickly damped on receiving information that the queen's great jointure in land had, ever ſince Ferdinand came into poſſeſſion of that kingdom, been converted into an annuity for life.

His advices from Spain were likewiſe of a diſagreeable nature; his agents there having informed him, that Ferdinand ſtill continued in the poſt of adminiſtrator, which he hoped to preſerve for life, partly by his intereſt with the archduke Philip's counſellors, ſome of whom he had engaged in his intereſt; and partly by threatening, that in caſe the archduke ſhould attempt to deprive him of the government, he would marry again and beget an heir to the kingdom of Arragon: but, at the ſame time, that the nobles and people of Spain were more ſtrongly attached to Philip, in right of his wife, than to Ferdinand, who had oppreſſed them with intolerable taxes. Theſe agents likewiſe wrote over, that there was actually a treaty of marriage on foot between Ferdinand and madame Germaine de Foix, niece to Lewis XII. which would certainly take effect, ſhould Philip preſume to diſpoſſeſs his father-in-law of the adminiſtration. They farther informed him, that Lewis XII. had determined to give his daughter, madame Claude, in marriage to the count d'Angoulême, his own preſumptive heir as king of France. At the ſame time they gave Henry to underſtand, that if Philip and his queen ſhould continue to reſide quietly in the Low Countries during Ferdinand's adminiſtratorſhip, that prince would endeavour to effect a match between the young prince of Auſtria and Mary; ſecond daughter of the king of England.

In the mean time, however, Philip and Juanna were proclaimed king and queen of Caſtile at Bruſſels, which ſhewed they did not intend to reſign the adminiſtratorſhip of that kingdom to Ferdinand for life, as he had flattered himſelf; though they were hindered from going to take poſſeſſion themſelves by the war of Guelderland, and the pregnancy of the queen, who was in a little time brought to bed of a daughter, named Mary, afterwards queen of Hungary: and ſome days after, Margaret of Auſtria, Philip's ſiſter (the ſame who had been contracted to Charles VIII. of France), loſt her huſband, the duke of Savoy, who died on the tenth of September.

This year was very barren of remarkable events with regard to England. Beſides what has been related, we find only a treaty of alliance between Henry and George, duke of Saxony, hereditary governor of Frietland, which was concluded on the thirtieth of December*.

Philip of Auſtria, having received repeated invitations from the nobility of Caſtile to come over and ſuperſede the adminiſtration of Ferdinand, and having happily finiſhed the war of Guelderland, and his queen being in a condition to travel, ſet ſail from Middleburgh, in Zealand, about the middle of January, 1506, with a fleet of fourſcore ſhips; but a furious ſtorm ariſing from the ſouth weſt, which continued for a week together, prevented him from clearing the Channel, and diſperſed his numerous fleet in ſuch a manner, that there were only two ſmall barks with him when he was driven, in his own battered veſſel, into Falmouth. Spent with a long courſe of fatigues, and the ſeverity of a continued ſea-ſickneſs, he reſolved to go aſhore to get a little reſt and refreſhment for himſelf and his conſort, contrary to the advice of his council.

Henry being apprized of their landing, ſent the earl of Arundel to compliment them in his name; to aſſure them he would, with all poſſible diſpatch, have the pleaſure of embracing them; and that, in the mean time, they might command in his dominions. Philip would have excuſed himſelf from waiting for an interview by the preſſing call there was for his preſence in Spain; but he ſoon found that he was not at liberty to deny, and therefore accepted the invitation made him with a good grace; and, in order to ſave time, ſet out immediately for the court, which was then at Windſor, where he and his conſort were received with all the marks of the moſt cordial friendſhip by Henry. But this intereſted prince, who never did a favour without views of advantage to himſelf therein, propoſed to Philip, during his ſtay, that as he had changed his condition, in being become king of Caſtile, the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries ſhould be renewed. That prince, comprehending perfectly well the delicate nature of his preſent ſituation, did not think proper to make any objections to this propoſal, and the treaty was renewed, with ſome alterations in favour of the Engliſh: among other things they ſuppreſſed that article of the former treaty, by which Philip's ſubjects were permitted to fiſh on the coaſt of England. Philip was, no doubt, ſenſible of the infinite difference which this made to his ſubjects, but found it neceſſary to temporize: on this account the Dutch and Flemings termed this treaty Intercurſus Malus, or the Bad Treaty, to diſtinguiſh it from that made in 1496, which, on account of the advantages it brought them, they had named Intercurſus Magnus, or the Noble Treaty.

The next buſineſs of importance propoſed by Henry to Philip, was a marriage between himſelf and Philip's ſiſter Margaret, widow of the duke of Savoy. The famous Thomas Wolſey, being then the king's chaplain, was employed in managing this affair, which was ended greatly to the advantage of Philip, as by this alliance he made a friend of Henry, and prevented him from traverſing his deſigns of depriving his father-in-law of the adminiſtration of Caſtile: accordingly the propoſal was readily accepted, and the king of Caſtile engaged to pay the ſum of three hundred thouſand French crowns, each crown worth four ſhillings ſterling (an exorbitant ſum!) together with an annuity of thirty thouſand eight hundred and fifty French crowns, as Margaret's fortune, during their wedlock. This treaty was ſigned by both parties, at Windſor, on the twentieth day of March. Henry however, who judged of mankind by himſelf, could not forbear expreſſing his uneaſineſs leſt Philip ſhould go from his bargain, when out of his power; but Dr. Wolſey, who had already began to diſplay thoſe able talents for negociating, for which he afterwards became ſo famous, fell upon an expedient for preventing all difficulties and quieting Henry's ſuſpicions; for, after the king of Caſtile had agreed to the matter, he had an article inſerted in the treaty, which obliged twelve of the principal lords in the Low Countries to ſwear they would uſe their utmoſt endeavours to procure the accompliſhment of the marriage.

Henry having thus ſettled his foreign concerns with the king of Caſtile, proceeded to a matter of great conſequence to his own quiet. It was Henry's peculiar misfortune to realize the phantoms of troubles, and find to himſelf matter of uneaſineſs where there were no grounds of apprehenſion. We have alſo remarked, that he underſtood no delicacy when intereſt was in queſtion; and on the following occaſion he broke through all the rules of decorum and hoſpitality, to compaſs a matter on which his future quiet depended.

The earl of Suffolk, who, as we have before related, had taken refuge in Philip's territories, was a perpetual object of Henry's outrageous jealouſy, nor could he be eaſy while that nobleman was at liberty, who had the unpardonable demerit of being of the blood of York. One day, therefore, he took the opportunity, when the king of Caſtile and himſelf were alone, to preſs him in a manner that ſhewed he would not be denied, to deliver up the earl. Philip was greatly ſtartled at the meanneſs and injuſtice of this requeſt; but ſeeing what hands he was fallen into, and impatient to depart for Spain, did not chuſe to affront Henry by a flat denial, but excuſed himſelf by ſaying, "Sir, this I cannot do, conſiſtent with my honour, and much leſs with your's, for you will be thought to have uſed me like a priſoner." But Henry preſently replied, "Then I will take all the diſhonour upon me." This anſwer convinced Philip that Henry was determined to make the moſt of that advantage which fortune had put in his power, and, after ſome heſitation agreed, but on condition that Henry ſhould ſwear that he would not take the earl's life. Henry ſubmitted to this reſtriction, and even condeſcended to ſend a letter under his own hand, aſſuring the unfortunate exile of good uſage; who, being over-perſuaded by theſe aſſurances, backed with others from Philip, ſurrendered himſelf to the king of England's officers at Calais, who ſent him over hither; but no ſooner was he landed in his native country, than he was ſent under a guard to the Tower of London, where we ſhall ſee him, in the next reign, inhumanly ſacrificed to the prevailing jealouſies of the ſtate.

The earl being thus ſecured, and Henry's apprehenſions lulled to ſleep, he permitted the king of Caſtile to reſume his voyage, after having detained him by a thouſand pretexts for upwards of three months, during which time he had created him knight of the Garter; and Philip, in return, a little before his departure, made Henry knight of the Golden Fleece: at laſt, on the twenty-third of April, Philip and his conſort ſet out for Spain, and, after a ſhort and pleaſant paſſage, landed ſafely at Corunna (now called the Groyne), in Galicia, before Ferdinand knew of their arrival. They were received with ſuch marks of univerſal love and affection, that Ferdinand did not think proper to inſiſt upon his right of adminiſtration, but withdrew to his own kingdom of Arragon. Within a few months, however, Philip was carried off by a ſurfeit, which he contracted by drinking plentifully of cold water when in a ſweat, and died on the twenty fifth of September following. His queen was ſo afflicted with his loſs, that ſhe fell into a deep melancholy, which at length turned to a phrenzy; and Ferdinand, having yet a powerful party in the council of Caſtile, was declared adminiſtrator of that kingdom during the non-age of Charles of Luxembourg, their orphan ſon, who afterwards proved the ſcourge and terror of France and all Europe, by the name of Charles V.

By a treaty made at Blois, two years before, between Lewis XII. and the emperor Maximilian and his ſon Philip, archduke of Auſtria, it had been agreed that this young prince Charles ſhould eſpouſe madame Claude, the king of France's only daughter by Anne of Brittany, on certain conditions therein ſpecified, which were to the laſt degree detrimental to the realm of France; but this year the general eſtates of that kingdom, held at Tours, remonſtrated againſt this fatal treaty, by which the king's council, with one ſtroke of a pen, had mutilated and deſtroyed the French monarchy. Lewis, either repenting what he had done, or overcome by the remonſtrances of the nation, agreed to annul that treaty: in fine, the heireſs of France and of Anne of Brittany was taken from the heir of Auſtria and Spain, as her mother had been from Maximilian; and, before the aſſembly broke up, was married to the count d'Angoulême, afterwards Francis I. and Brittany, which had been twice annexed to the crown of France, and was twice very near ſlipping through its hands, was now incorporated with it, and Burgundy likewiſe was ſtill preſerved *.

* Voltaire's Eſſay on General Hiſtory, chap. xci.

In the mean time the Flemings, who were left in a manner without a head, by the death of their archduke Philip, king of Spain, and the minority of his ſon, ſent to invite the emperor Maximilian to come into their country, and aſſume the adminiſtration of public affairs during the minority of his grandſon Charles. The emperor promiſed to accept the invitation; and, till he could paſs over himſelf, ſent his daughter Margaret, widow of the duke of Savoy, in the beginning of the ſummer of 1507, with the character of governante of the Low Countries: and that princeſs had no ſooner arrived at Bruſſels, than ſhe concluded with Henry a provi ſional treaty of commerce, until ſome differences between the ſubjects of the two princes could be amicably adjuſted. As to the marriage which was to have taken place between the princeſs and Henry, the death of her brother Philip gave it a contrary turn: beſides, Henry, about this time, began to feel his conſtitution impaired by a phthiſical diſorder, which gave him frequent intimations of his approaching diſſolution.

But no diſtemper, however violent, could call off Henry's attention to his two favourite objects, that of aggrandizing his family and heaping up riches; and he ſent orders to his ambaſſadors *, who had juſt concluded the treaty with the governante of the Netherlands, and were now aſſembled at Calais, to ſet on foot a negociation for a marriage between the infant Charles, archduke of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Low Countries and king of Caſtile, and his third daughter the princeſs Mary. After much time ſpent in this project, the finiſhing hand was put to the treaty, at Calais, on the twenty-firſt of December, 1507, and ratified by Maximilian the emperor, and by the ducheſs of Savoy. By the articles of this contract it was ſtipulated, that the marriage ſhould be conſummated as ſoon as Charles ſhould have attained his fourteenth year, and that Mary's dower ſhould be two hundred and fifty thouſand crowns of gold; in conſideration of which ſhe was to be entitled to the ſame jointure which was ſettled upon the ducheſs dowager of Burgundy, ſiſter to Edward IV †. At the ſame time Henry concluded an alliance with Maximilian, as tutor and guardian to the king of Spain, in which all the former treaties were confirmed.

All this while Henry went on in heaping up money; and Empſon and Dudley's oppreſſions were now more raging than ever. Sir William Capel, who had been lord-mayor of London, was proſecuted upon a frivolous charge of not puniſhing a perſon who had paid him falſe money in the time of his mayoralty, in the year 1503, and fined two thouſand pounds: upon his refuſal to pay ſo exorbitant a fine, he was clapped up in the Tower, where he remained all the reſt of this reign. Sir Laurence Aylmer, mayor of London, and his two ſheriffs, were in like manner proſecuted upon frivolous charges, and fined each one thouſand pounds: upon refuſing to pay, they were committed to the King's Bench priſon. Sir Thomas Kneſworth, who had beeen mayor in 1505, and both his ſheriffs, were committed to priſon on pretence of ſome irregularities which had happened during their magiſtracies, and obliged to pay fourteen hundred pounds for their releaſe ‡. While ſuch meaſures prevailed, we are not to be ſurprized that Henry amaſſed the prodigious ſum of one million eight hundred thouſand pounds. This year the ſweating-ſickneſs raged again in England, though not ſo violently as it did before; among others it carried off, was Giles, lord d'Aubeney, one of the greateſt ſtateſmen and generals that England had ſeen for many years.

The year 1508 affords us no one event worthy hiſtorical record, except the marriage of the princeſs Mary with the archduke Charles, king of Caſtile, to ſecure the accompliſhment of which Henry employed all his attention. At length, on the ſeventeenth of December, the young couple were affianced in a chamber of Henry's palace of Richmond, in "verba de præſenti," or words of the preſent tenſe; Charles by his proxy, John, marquis of Berghes, or Bergen op Zoom, and Mary in perſon, before the archbiſhop of Canterbury and a conſiderable number of the Engliſh nobility; the ceremony concluded with Charles's proxy kiſſing the young princeſs, in his name, as a token of the eſpouſal, and putting a gold ring on her middle finger. Henry was ſo delighted with this alliance, that he could not forbear boaſting, "that he had now built a wall of braſs round his kingdom," meaning the marriage of his daughters with the king of Scotland, and the prince of Spain, by which he had provided the beſt ſecurity that human prudence could deviſe for eſtabliſhing his family on the throne of England; but he did not live to ſee this laſt marriage completed, and it was at laſt broken off entirely.

About the time of performing this ceremony the marquis of Berghes borrowed from Henry, for the uſe of the archduke, the ſum of fifty thouſand pounds, for which he pawned a jewel belonging to that prince, called the rich Fleur de Lis, which weighed above two hundred and eleven ounces in gold and precious ſtones, and the emperor, as guardian and grand-father to Charles, approved the mortgage for the money, which he converted to his own uſe.

Though crowned with ſucceſs in all his undertakings, triumphant over all his enemies, his alliance courted by every foreign crown, and his power dreaded at home, yet Henry now found that neither riches, power, nor ſucceſs could ſecure him againſt the attacks of the thouſand ills incident to human nature: he had for ſome time laboured under a diſorder of the lungs, which had baffled all the art of medicine in behalf of a life that he was at once the moſt unwilling, and the leaſt prepared, of any man to part with. His diſorder at length became ſo violent, that he found his latter end could not be far off: we are told, that in this humiliating ſituation he entered ſomewhat into himſelf, and when he found that he could no longer continue in the practice of rapaciouſneſs and oppreſſion, and that the treaſures he had thus hatefully accumulated, were inſufficient to ſatisfy the demands of that ſtern creditor, death, he expreſſed ſome contrition for what he had made his ſubjects ſuffer, and determined to do ſomething that might recommend him to the mercy of Heaven and the forgiveneſs of men; he diſtributed large ſums in charity, and releaſed, at his own expence, all pri-ſoners that were confined for debt under forty ſhillings. He then made his will, in which he ſtrictly enjoined his heir and ſucceſſor to make reſtitution of all that thoſe infamous agents of his oppreſſive avarice had unjuſtly taken from the people; and on the twenty ſecond of April, 1509, expired, at his favourite palace of Richmond, after reigning twenty-three years and eight months, and in the fifty-third year of his age, leaving his ſon Henry the crown of England, together with one million eight hundred thouſand pounds ſterling in ready money, jewels, and plate, depoſited in the vaults of his palace.

If we conſider Henry either as a man or a king, we ſhall find him in many reſpects inferior to many of his predeceſſors, and even cotemporaries, in ſeveral important reſpects; but at the ſame time it muſt be confeſſed that few of them poſſeſſed ſo many excellencies as he did upon the whole. His reign was more advantageous to his people than honourable to himſelf. He put an end to the civil wars with which the kingdom had been ſo long diſtracted. He maintained order and regularity in the ſtate; he depreſſed the exorbitant power of the nobility; and, together with the friendſhip and alliance of ſome foreign princes, he acquired the eſteem and regard of all.

As he had known how to conquer, ſo he knew how to govern, and his reign ſomewhat humanized the manners of the Engliſh nation. His parliaments, with whom he always kept fair, enacted wiſe laws: juſtice, under him, reſumed her functions; and trade, which had begun firſt to flouriſh under the third Edward, and which had been almoſt annihilated during the civil wars, was again revived. Henry was, through inclination more than neceſſity, avaricious; had he been only ſaving, he would have ſhewn his prudence; but the ſordidneſs of his diſpoſition and his rapacious exactions have tarniſhed the glory of his reign: indeed he ſeems to have hated his ſubjects, and to have made it his buſineſs to keep them low, by loading them with taxes, and ſeizing all opportunities of ruining them by exceſſive fines. He was cool, cloſe, cunning, dark, diſtruſtful, and deſigning: he poſſeſſed in a peculiar manner the art of turning all his domeſtic troubles, and all his foreign diſputes, to his own advantage: and it is not a little remarkable, that one ſo fond of peace, ſhould be ſo fortunate in war; for his arms, whether employed within his own kingdom, or abroad, were always crowned with ſucceſs; and he hardly knew what ill fortune meant, but as he ſaw it in others. In his private diſpoſition he was rather inclined to be merciful, whenever the ſhewing of tenderneſs was compatible with his own intereſt, the regard for which was the ſtandard of all his actions: in a word, his ſoul ſeems to have been engroſſed by two ruling paſſions, the fear of loſing his crown, and the deſire of amaſſing riches; paſſions which, however baſe and ſordid in themſelves, were nevertheleſs productive of conſiderable advantages to the nation. He inherited a fund of good ſenſe, which was greatly improved by ſtudy and experience; and ſo high an opinion had the world conceived of his ſagacity and penetration, that he was commonly diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Engliſh Solomon; though many indifferent actions, which were the effect of pure chance, were generally aſcribed to his conſummate policy: as an inſtance of this we need only mention the marriage of his daughter Margaret with James IV. king of Scotland, which proved the means of uniting that realm to the crown of England, and in bringing about of which Henry's ſagacity and foreſight have been ſo greatly extolled by writers, who have been warped by intereſt or prepoſſeſſion; whereas nothing is more apparent, than that theſe nations owe that benefit to Perkin Warbeck, ſince it was to draw off James from giving him protection and aſſiſtance that this match was agreed upon and ſettled by d'Ayala, the Spaniſh mediator; and lord Bacon juſtly obſerves, that Henry was more dexterous in removing, than in foreſeeing or preventing dangers.

Henry was in ſtature ſomewhat above the middle ſize; his perſon was ſtraight and handſome, and his limbs elegant and well proportioned, though extremely delicate and tender; his countenance was grave and melancholy; his temper ſour and ſaturnine. He was difficult of acceſs, but affable when once engaged in converſation, and irreſiſtibly eloquent and perſuaſive when he had any favourite point to gain. We ſhall here take our leave of this great prince's character, and relate the honours paid by his ſucceſſor to his remains.

His body was brought into the great chamber, where reſting three days, a ſolemn maſs and dirge were ſung by a mitered biſhop: whence being removed into the hall, the ſame ſervice was performed there, the like ſpace of time; as alſo in the chapel three days longer: and in every place a hearſe, adorned with banners, eſcutcheons, and pennons, with mourners attending. From thence, on Wedneſday the ninth of May, it was put into a chariot, covered with cloth, black and gold, drawn by five great courſers, covered with black velvet, ornamented with eſcutcheons of fine gold; with his effigies, apparelled in rich robes, the crown on his head, and ſceptre and ball in the hands, laid on a cuſhion of gold, and environed with banners of arms of all his dominions, titles, and genealogies; a great number of prelates praying, with his ſervants and others in black, before the body; and nine mourners, with about ſix hundred torches, following. In this order it was attended to St. George's Fields, near Southwark, and there met by the religious of the ſeveral orders in or about the city, with the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons, in black; it was thence brought through London to St. Paul's, and placed in the choir, in a ſtately hearſe of wax; whence, after a ſolemn maſs, and a ſermon preached by the biſhop of Rocheſter, it was the next day, with the ſame ſtate, conveyed to Weſtminſter, ſir Edward Hayward, with the king's coat of arms, bearing his banner, on a courſer, trapped with the arms of the defunct; and there, by ſix lords, taken out of the chariot, and ſet under a moſt curious hearſe, full of lights, the effigies lying on the coffin, on a pall of gold; about which the mourners being ſat within the firſt rail, knights bearing banners within the ſecond, and officers of arms without the ſame, Garter, king of arms, cried aloud for the ſoul of the noble prince Henry VII. king of this realm; when the choir beginning with "Placebo," and ending with "Dirige," cloſed the ſolemnities of that day. The next day three maſſes were ſolemnly ſung by biſhops, at the laſt of which were offered the banner, courſer, coat of arms, ſword, target, and helmet, the nobility likewiſe offering their rich palls of cloth of gold and bodkins.

Then

Then when the choir had ſung "Libera me," the corpſe was interred, the treaſurer and comptroller breaking their ſtaves into the grave: when, Garter having cried with a loud voice, "Vive le roy Henrie le huiteſme, roy d'Angleterre & de France, ſyere d'Ireland," the mourners, with them of the houſhold, departed to the palace, where they had a ſumptuous feaſt; and thus the funeral ended.

By his queen Elizabeth Henry had iſſue as follow:

1. Arthur Tudor, born at Wincheſter, on the twentieth of September, 1486; was married, on the fourteenth of November, 1501, to the princeſs Catherine of Spain; and died ſoon after, at Ludlow, in Shropſhire, on the ſecond of April, 1502, and was buried in the cathedral of Worceſter.

2. Henry Tudor, his ſecond ſon, born at Greenwich, on the twenty-eighth of June, 1491, and ſucceeded by the name of Henry VIII.

3. Edmund Tudor, third and youngeſt ſon, born at Greenwich, on the twenty-firſt of February, 1498, who, dying ſoon after, was buried within the abbey of Weſtminſter.

1. Margaret Tudor, queen of Scotland, his eldeſt daughter, was born on the twenty-ninth of November, 1489. She was firſt married to James IV. king of Scotland, anno 1503; and next to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, in the year 1514, and had children by both.

2. Elizabeth, ſecond daughter, born the ſecond of July, 1492. She died at Eltham, on the fourteenth of September, 1495, and was buried at Weſtminſter.

3. Mary, born A. D. 1498; affianced to Charles, prince of Caſtile, afterwards emperor; married firſt to Lewis XII. king of France; and, after his deceaſe, to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

Remarkable Occurrences.

In the ſecond year of Henry VII. John Percival, the lord-mayor's carver was choſen one of the ſheriffs of London in this manner: ſir Henry Collet, the lord-mayor, took a cup of wine, and drank to John Percival, who then waited at his table, ſtanding bare-headed; the lord mayor drinking to him, and ſtyling him ſheriff of London for the enſuing year, ſo far made uſe of his privilege of election that way, as to cauſe Percival to put on his hat and ſit down at table; accordingly the carver ſat down, took on him the office of ſheriff, and was afterwards lord-mayor himſelf, and knighted.

In his ſeventh year, Robert Fabian was an alderman and ſheriff of London: he wrote a Hiſtory of England and France, from the creation of the world to the third year of the reign of Henry VIII.

In his ninth year, on the twenty-eighth of April, Joan Boughton, a widow, was burnt in Smithfield, for hereſy and profeſſing Wickliff's opinions.* This year wheat was ſold in London for four ſhillings a quarter; and Bourdeaux wine, or claret, for thirty ſhillings a hogſhead.

In the tenth year of his reign the body of one Alice Hackney, which had been buried one hundred and ſeventy-five years, ever ſince the beginning of the reign of Edward II. was accidentally dug up in the church of St. Mary Hill, London; the ſkin of the corpſe was whole, and the joints of the arms pliable.

In the ſeventeenth year of his reign, ſir John Shaw, then lord-mayor, firſt cauſed his brethren the aldermen to ride to the water-ſide, when he went to the Exchequer-bar to be ſworn: he was alſo the firſt that held the mayor's feaſt in Guildhall, which was before done at Mercers-hall, or Merchant-taylors-hall.

In the following year, on the eighteenth of January, the firſt ſtone of the chapel known by the name of Henry VII's Chapel, was laid, within the monaſtery of Weſtminſter, by John Iſlip, the abbot; ſir Reginald Bray, knight of the Garter; Dr. Barnes, maſter of the Rolls; ſir Edward Stanhope and others aſſiſting at the ceremony. The charge of this building amounted to no more than fourteen thouſand pounds, if we may believe the lord Bacon.

In the ſame year the king gave the title of Merchant Taylors to the company of Taylors, of which he himſelf was a member, as ſeveral of his predeceſſors had been before him.

The colleges founded in this reign were, Chriſt's college and St. John's, in Cambridge, by Margaret, counteſs of Richmond, the king's mother; Jeſus college, in the ſame univerſity, by John Alcock, biſhop of Ely: Corpus Chriſti, in Oxford, by Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Brazen Noſe college, by William Smith, biſhop of Lincoln.

It was likewiſe in the courſe of this reign that St. Paul's ſchool was founded by John Collet, dean of that cathedral.

Of RELIGION, and of the CHURCH.

WE have already given ſome account of the ſeverities exerciſed againſt the Lollards, in the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV*. The general perſecution raiſed againſt them had kept them, for ſome time, quiet; but in the beginning of the reign of Henry V. they began to appear with more aſſurance. The king had been remarkably attached to ſeveral of the ſect, when prince of Wales, and they now thought that they ſhould find in him a patron and protector; but they ſoon found themſelves miſerably deceived. Henry had already formed the great ſcheme of conquering France, and was ſenſible he could never effect this favourite project without a perfect good underſtanding between the crown and the church; he therefore reſolved not to interrupt the clergy in any matters pertaining to their juriſdiction: accordingly, in the very beginning of his reign, he delivered up ſir John Oldcaſtle to eccleſiaſtical cenſure. The ſeverities exerciſed againſt him have been already related; but it may not be amiſs here to mention ſome of the profeſſed tenets of that great man, and for which he ſuffered by the ſpiritual power.

Upon his examination before a convocation held by archbiſhop Arundel, at Black-friars, on the twenty-ſeventh of September, 1413, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and Bangor, when he was queſtioned concerning the euchariſt, he profeſſed his belief, "that, after conſecration, Chriſt's very body was preſent in form of bread, the ſame individual body that was born of the Virgin Mary." But being aſked by one of the divines preſent, to declare, without reſerve, "whether he did not hold the bread, after conſecration, to be material?" turning to the archbiſhop, he ſaid, "I believe it is Chriſt's body, in form of bread. Sir, believe you not this?" "Yea, marry, do I," replied the archbiſhop. "But (redemanded the doctors) think ye that any part of the bread remains after conſecration?" He replied, "It is both Chriſt's body and bread: for what ſaith St. Paul, 2 Cor. x. "The bread which we take, is it not the partaking of the body of Chriſt?" Now (added the knight) is it not plain that the ſubſtance is called bread?" As theſe anſwers were directly repugnant to the eſtabliſhed opinion of thoſe days, which held the bread, after conſecration, to be no longer material, but abſolutely changed into the very body of Chriſt, ſir John's enemies, who formed the great majority of the aſſembly, cried out that he had confeſſed hereſy; and Dr. Walden, a noted theologiſt of thoſe times, undertook to confute Oldcaſtle by argument; but both their reaſonings are miſerably lame and ſcurrilous. The behaviour of the latter on this occaſion was quite indefenſible; for, being warmed in his own defence, he compared the members of the court to Annas and Caiphas, who ſat in judgment upon Chriſt, and afterwards upon his apoſtles; launched forth into the moſt bitter and indecent reflections on the church of Rome, and thoſe of the Engliſh clergy who ſupported her cauſe; concluding his harangue thus: "Rome is the very neſt of Antichriſt, from whence came all his diſciples; prelates, prieſts, and monks are the body; and the ſhaven friars the tail, which covers the moſt filthy parts." Such obloquy could not fail to exaſperate the aſſembly, which being unanimous in finding him guilty, the archbiſhop pronounced ſentence of condemnation againſt him; and, though he made his eſcape from the Tower, he was afterwards apprehended, and ſuffered death both as a traitor and heretic, by being hanged and burned at Tyburn †.

But we are now to give an account of the famous council of Conſtance, in which the Engliſh made ſo great a figure. There were at this time no fewer than three popes; Peter of Candia, who took the name of Alexander V. Peter de Luna, who took the name of Benedict XIII. and Angeli Corrario, who called himſelf Gregory XII. The emperor Sigiſmund had been indefatigable in endeavouring to bring their ſeveral pretenſions under ſome compromiſe: in the mean time Alexander V. dying, his tiara was given to Balthazzar Corſa, who took the name of John XXIII. His holineſs was at this time highly diſtreſſed by Ladiſlaus (Charles Durazzo), king of Naples and Sicily, whoſe victorious troops had ſhut him up in Bologna; in this extremity he had recourſe to the emperor Sigiſmund, who was come into Italy to conclude a treaty with the Venetians.

Sigiſmund, as emperor, had an opportunity of exalting his own power, by the humiliation of the pope; but, on the other hand he was the mortal enemy of Ladiſlaus, the tyrant of Italy. John propoſed to him to form a league, and aſſemble a council; the one to expel the common enemy, and the other to confirm his own right to the pontificate.

A council was in fact neceſſary, that of Piſa ‡ having ordered one to be called at the end of three years: accordingly Sigiſmund and John iſſued their joint proclamation for the holding this council in the little city of Conſtance, ſeated on the weſtern bank of the lake of that name; but Ladiſlaus oppoſed his victorious army to theſe negociations, and nothing but an extraordinary turn of affairs could deliver the emperor and the pope from their critical ſituation; this happened by the death of Ladiſlaus in 1414, brought about, as was ſuſpected, by poiſon, a cuſtom in thoſe times but too prevalent.

John XXIII. thus delivered from his moſt implacable enemy, and having now only the emperor and the council to fear, wanted to put off the meeting of this high aſſembly, which may not improperly be ſtyled the ſenate of Europe, as having the power of judging over the ſupreme pontiffs themſelves; but, notwithſtanding all John's arts, the meeting was proclaimed, the emperor preſſed for its ſitting, and thoſe who had a right to aſſiſt at it were haſtening from all parts to take poſſeſſion of the auguſt title of arbitrators of Chriſtendom: John therefore was obliged to go to the council; but he made a ſecret convention with the duke of Auſtria, to protect his perſon againſt all attempts, and to aſſure him an open and ſafe retreat from Conſtance when he pleaſed: in ſhort, he omitted nothing that could ſecure his perſon and authority.

On the ſixteenth of November, 1414, the council met, and never had there been a more numerous convocation. Beſides the crowd of prelates and doctors who aſſiſted at this council, there were twenty-eight great vaſſals of the empire preſent, and the emperor himſelf conſtantly attended, as did the electors of Metz, Saxony, the Palatine, and Brandenburgh, with the dukes of Auſtria and Bavaria, and twenty-ſeven ambaſſadors from the ſeveral courts of Europe*. The bull for calling this council being read, it was declared to be convocated, not only to aboliſh the ſchiſm which ſtill continued in the church, but alſo to root out the hereſy of Wickliff, which had by this time made great progreſs abroad, and manifeſtly tended to the diſſolution of the papal dignity, which ſerved for the baſis and foundation to moſt of the privileges claimed by the clergy, and indeed to the hierarchy itſelf. The council next choſe its officers and ſervants, which were equally elected out of the four nations of which it was compoſed, viz. the Engliſh, Iralians, French, and Germans: but a queſtion of a very intereſting nature for the Engliſh now happened; it was ſtarted by Peter de Chiaco, cardinal de Camera, who was put upon it by the French. It was, "Whether the Engliſh ſhould ſit as a diſtinct nation in the council, or be conſidered as comprehended in that of Germany?" After much altercation on both ſides, the matter was at laſt decided in favour of the Engliſh, and it was agreed that the fathers of the council ſhould be ranged under five nations, viz. Italy, France, Germany, England, and Spain; and that the plurality of voices ſhould determine all matters propoſed.

On the twenty-third day of December the emperor appeared in council, which proceeded to buſineſs; and, after much debate, it was found abſolutely neceſſary towards the re-eſtabliſhment of peace and union in the church, that not only the antipopes, Gregory and Benedict, ſhould be diveſted of all authority, but even John XXIII. who was the only lawful pope (as having been elected and acknowleged by the cardinals of the council of Piſa, and ſucceeded to the pope choſen by the ſame council) ſhould abdicate his papal dignity. This laſt, conſcious of many enormities in his own conduct, for which he dreaded proſecution, ſeemingly agreed to the propoſal; but this conſent was the effect of diſſimulation, for he knew that Sigiſmund had made himſelf maſter of the council, by placing ſoldiers round the city of Conſtance, under the ſpecious pretext of providing for the ſafety of the fathers; ſo that the pontiff now found himſelf a priſoner in the midſt of the very council where he ſat as preſident.

He had now no reſource left but to make his eſcape. The emperor cauſed him to be narrowly watched; the duke of Auſtria, who was deſirous to favour the pope's flight, could not think of any better way than by giving the council the diverſion of a tournament; in the midſt of the hurry and confuſion uſual on theſe occaſions, the pope made his eſcape in the diſguiſe of a poſtilion, and the duke of Auſtria ſet out immediately after him: they both retired into a part of Switzerland which ſtill belonged to the houſe of Auſtria. The duke of Burgundy was likewiſe ready to protect the pope: this duke was very powerful, both on account of his great poſſeſſions and the authority he had in France Thus a new ſchiſm was on the point of being kindled; the heads of religious orders who were in the pope's intereſt, were already retiring from Conſtance, and the council by this turn of affairs might have become an aſſembly of rebels. Sigiſmund, who had been unfortunate on ſo many occaſions, proved ſucceſsful in this: he had, as we have already obſerved, a body of troops at hand, with theſe he made himſelf maſter of all the duke of Auſtria's territories in Alſace, Tyrol, and Switzerland. This brought the duke back to the council, where he aſked pardon on his knees of the emperor, and promiſed in the moſt ſolemn manner never for the future to undertake any thing contrary to his will, and reſigned all his dominions to him, to be diſpoſed of as he ſhould think proper, in caſe of infidelity. The emperor upon this gave the duke his hand, and pardoned him, upon condition that he would deliver up the perſon of the pope.

The fugitive pontiff was accordingly ſeized at Fribourg, and conveyed to a neighbouring caſtle.

* The deputies ſent to this council from England were, firſt, the biſhops of Saliſbury, Bath, and Hereford, the abbot of Weſtminſter, and the prior of Worceſter; but, upon the death of the biſhops of Saliſbury and Hereford, the Engliſh prelates underſtanding that other churches were repreſented by a more numerous delegation, ſent Clifford, biſhop of London, the chancellors of both univerſities, with twelve doctors, to this council. Walſingham, p. 387. The deputies mentioned in Rymer's Fœdera, are theſe: Nicholas, biſhop of Bath and Wells; Robert, biſhop of Saliſbury; John, biſhop of St. David's; William, abbot of Weſtminſter; John, prior of Worceſter; Thomas Spofford, abbot of St. Mary's at York; Richard, earl of Warwick; Henry Fitz Hugh, lord-chamberlain; ſir Walter Hungerford, ſir Ralph Rocheford, John Honyngham, doctor of laws. Vol. ix. p. 162, 167, 169.

Every one of the members of this council (ſays Mr. de Voltaire, in his Eſſay on General Hiſtory, vol. ii. chap. 60. from whence we have chiefly extracted the above account) vied with the other in luxury and magnificence; they brought in their train five hundred players on inſtruments, called in thoſe days minſtrels; ſeven hundred and eighteen courtezans, who were openly protected by the magiſtracy of Conſtance. They were obliged to build a great number of wooden huts, to lodge all the miniſters to luxury and incontinence which theſe lords, rather than fathers, of the council brought with them. No one was aſhamed of theſe practices, which were then as publicly authoriſed in every ſtate, as they had been formerly in moſt of the heathen nations. On this occaſion the church of France allowed every archbiſhop it ſent to the council ten franks a day (which is equal to fifty livres [about two guineas Engliſh] of our preſent currency), eight to a biſhop, five to an abbot, and three to a doctor.

In

In the the mean time the council proceeded to his trial: he was charged with having ſold benefices and reliques, with poiſoning the pope his predeceſſor, with having murdered a number of innocent perſons, in ſhort he was accuſed of the moſt impious licentiouſneſs, and of the higheſt exceſs of debauchery, even of ſodomy and blaſphemy; they however ſuppreſſed fifty-five articles of the verbal proceſs, which they thought too great an infamy on the pontifical character. At length, on the twenty-ninth of May, the ſentence of his depoſition was read, in the preſence of the emperor. This ſentence imported, that the council reſerved to itſelf the power of puniſhing the pope for his crimes, according to juſtice or mercy.

John XXIII. who had formerly given proofs of the greateſt courage, was all reſignation, when they came to read his ſentence to him in priſon. The emperor kept him priſoner three years at Manheim, where he treated him with ſuch ſeverity, that the public began to compaſſionate him more for his ſufferings than it had even hated him for his crimes. Thus far I have thought neceſſary to carry the tranſactions of this council, in relation to the ſettling the ſchiſm in the church; it now remains to give an account of the fires which were aftewards lighted up by the miſtaken religious zeal of this ſame aſſembly.

The fathers of this council did not originally meet about depoſing a pope, their principal view ſeemed to be the reformation of the church. The doctrines of Wickliff had been condemned by the univerſity of Oxford, and by the biſhops and clergy, but this did not hinder its ſpreading; his books, though obſcure and ill written, were every where circulated by mere dint of curioſity, which the ſubject of diſpute and the boldneſs of the author had raiſed in all degrees of people, and which received no little weight from his unſpotted manners and purity of life. His works made their way into Bohemia, a country newly riſen out of barbariſm, and which, from the groſſeſt ignorance, had arrived at another ſpecies of it, at that time called erudition.

The emperor Charles IV. the lawgiver of Germany and Bohemia, had founded the univerſity of Prague, on the ſame model as that at Paris. In this univerſity, which, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, contained no leſs than twenty thouſand ſtudents, the Germans had three voices in all deliberations, and the Bohemians only one: John Hus, a native of Bohemia, who had attained to the degree of a bachelor in that academy, and was confeſſor to the queen, Sophia of Bavaria, wife of Wenceſlaus, obtained of that princeſs, that, for the future, his countrymen ſhould have three votes, and the Germans only one. Theſe latter incenſed at this change, withdrew from the univerſity, and became ſo many irreconcileable enemies to John Hus. At the ſame time ſome of Wickliff's works had fallen into his hands; and, though he totally rejected the ſpeculative doctrine contained in them, he adopted the author's paſſionate invectives againſt the lives of the popes and biſhops; againſt the excommunications, thundered out with equal levity and fury; and, in fine, againſt all eccleſiaſtical power; in which neither he nor Wickliff had properly diſtinguiſhed between the rights and uſurpations. This ſtep made him many more enemies, but at the ſame time it procured him a number of protectors, eſpecially the queen, whoſe ſpiritual director he was. He was accuſed before John XXIII. and ſummoned to appear in the year 1411, which ſummons he did not obey. In the mean time the council of Conſtance aſſembled, which was to pronounce judgment upon the popes and the opinions of men: hither he was alſo ſummoned, the emperor himſelf writing to the court of Bohemia to deſire he might be ſent to give an account of his doctrine.

John Hus, full of confidence, repaired to the council, when both he and the pope ought to have kept away. He arrived there, accompanied by ſeveral Bohemian gentlemen and many of his diſciples; and, what is moſt remarkable, he came with the emperor's ſafe-conduct, dated the eighteenth of October, 1414, and drawn up in the fulleſt and moſt favourable terms; but no ſooner was he arrived, than he was committed to cloſe confinement, and the council proceeded to try him, at the ſame time with the pope. He, like the pope, made his eſcape; and, like him, was brought back again, and they were both confined for ſome time in the ſame priſon.

At length he appeared before the council, loaded with chains, and was examined concerning ſeveral paſſages in his writings. It is certain any man may be ruined by wreſting the meaning of his words: what teacher, what writer is ſure of life, if we condemn to the flames a perſon who ſays, "there is but one catholic church, which contains all the predeſtined in its boſom; that a reprobate is not a member of this church; that the temporal lords ought to oblige the prieſts to obſerve the law; and that a wicked pope is not a vicar of Jeſus Chriſt?" And yet theſe, and no others, were the propoſitions maintained by John Hus, and which he explained in ſuch a manner as might have acquitted him, had not the council put ſuch a ſenſe upon them as was found neceſſary to condemn him.

The fathers of the council were determined that Hus ſhould retract his opinion; and Hus, on his ſide, perſuaded he was in the right, would not acknowlege himſelf in an error. The emperor, moved with compaſſion, ſaid to him, "What harm is there in abjuring errors, falſely attributed to you? I am ready this moment to abjure all kind of errors, does it follow from thence that I have held them?" Hus, however, remained inflexible: he demonſtrated the difference between a general demonſtration of errors, and retracting an opinion as an error, and choſe rather to be burnt than acknowlege that he had been in the wrong.

The council were as obſtinate as himſelf; but his obſtinacy in ruſhing to certain death was ſomething heroic, whereas that of condemning him to the flames was an act of great cruelty. The emperor, notwithſtanding the ſafe-conduct he had granted, ordered the elector Palatine to ſee him carried to execution, and he was accordingly burnt alive in preſence of the elector, chanting out hymns of praiſe to the divinity till the flames ſtifled his voice. After his death, the duke of Bavaria ordered the executioner's ſervant to throw all the martyr's cloaths (for that title he certainly deſerved, if ever man did) into the flames; and his aſhes, being carefully collected, were caſt into the Rhine.

Some months after, the council exerciſed the ſame ſeverity againſt a diſciple and friend to John Hus, named Jerom, whom we commonly call Jerom rom of Prague. This man was greatly ſuperior in underſtanding and eloquence to Hus; he at firſt had ſubſcribed to the condemnation of his maſter's doctrine; but being informed with what greatneſs of ſoul he had encountered death, he was aſhamed to ſurvive him, and having made a public retraction, he was conſigned to the flames.

Poggio the Florentine, ſecretary to John XXIII. and one of the firſt reſtorers of letters, who was preſent at his examinations and execution, ſays that he never heard any thing that approached ſo nearly to the eloquence of the Greeks and Romans as the ſpeech which Jerom made to his judges: "He ſpoke (ſays he) like Socrates, and walked to the ſtake with as much chearfulneſs as that great philoſopher drank the cup of hemlock."

The council having depoſed the true pope in the manner we have already related, wanted the renunciations of thoſe who pretended to the pontificate. Corrario ſent them his; but the proud Spaniard, Luna, would never yield: the council found no difficulty in depoſing him, but it was an affair of greater importance to fix upon the choice of one to ſucceed him. The cardinals claimed the right of election as immediately veſted in themſelves; and the council, as repreſentatives of the whole Chriſtian church, pretended likewiſe to the ſame right. The preſent queſtion was about giving a head to the church and a ſovereign to Rome. It was but juſt that the cardinals, who conſtituted the privy-council of this ſovereign, and the fathers of the general council, who acted in conjunction with them, as repreſentatives of the church, ſhould with them enjoy an equal right of ſuffrage: thirty deputies of the council joined with the cardinals in electing Otho Colonna, of the ſame family who had been excommunicated by pope Boniface VIII. to the fifth generation. This pope, who, after his election, changed his illuſtrious name for that of Martin V. poſſeſſed all the qualities of a prince with the virtues of a biſhop.

Never had the inauguration of a pontiff been attended with greater pomp: he went in proceſſion to the church, mounted on a white palfrey, the emperor and the count Palatine on foot, leading it by the reins, a numerous croud of princes, and all the members of the council cloſed the train. When he arrived in the church, the tripple crown was put on his head, which the popes had worn for upwards of two centuries.

There had been great complaints made in this council, for above two years, againſt the annates or firſt-fruits, the exemptions, the reſervations, and the taxes impoſed by the popes on the clergy, for the profit of the holy ſee; and againſt the torrent of vice with which the church was at this time overflowed. But how did this ſo much deſired reformation end? Pope Martin declared, firſt, that no exemptions ought to be granted, without ſhewing juſt cauſe. Secondly, that an enquiry ſhould be made into the re-united benefices. Thirdly, that the revenues of vacant churches ſhould be diſpoſed of, according to common law. Fourthly, he made an ineffectual prohibition of ſimony. Fifthly, he ordered for the future, thoſe that had benefices ſhould be diſtinguiſhed by the tonſure. Sixthly, he forbad the celebration of maſs in a lay habit. Theſe were the laws promulgated by the moſt ſolemn aſſembly in the univerſe.

Gerſon, and the deputies of the univerſity of Paris, even found great difficulty in getting the two following propoſitions condemned, viz. "That in ſome caſes the aſſaſſination of a perſon might become a virtuous act: that it is more meritorious in a knight than in an eſquire, and far more in a prince than in a knight." This doctrine of aſſaſſination had been maintained in France by one John Petit, a doctor of the univerſity of Paris, upon the occaſion of the murder of the king's own brother. The council for a long time evaded Gerſon's petition, but at length it was obliged to condemn this doctrine of murder, though without mentioning the cordelier John Petit's name.

We cannot cloſe our account of this council, without noticing ſome tranſactions thereof, which were peculiarly honourable to the Engliſh nation.

In the nineteenth ſeſſion of this council, the queſtion of precedency between the Engliſh and the Arragoneſe, or Spaniards, was again revived, through the intrigues of the French deputies, and for a while by its violence cauſed a total ceſſation of all buſineſs; but the noble ſtand made by the Engliſh, and the great credit their nation was in at this time with all Europe, was ſuch, that, before the end of this council, an end was put to this affair entirely in their favour; and the queſtion running between the right of precedency of the univerſities of Oxford and Salamanca, the antiquity, privileges, and excellency of the former were defended by Henry de Abingdon, of Merton college, in Oxford, in a formal ſpeech, with ſo much glory and advantage, that the council gave the point entirely in favour of that univerſity.

On the twenty-ſecond of April, 1418, the council of Conſtance was diſſolved by the new pope, Martin V. after having been aſſembled four years and an half, viz. from the firſt of November, 1413, and after having rendered itſelf famous by the irretrievable blow it had inflicted upon the papal authority by the ſpirited decree paſſed in its fourth ſeſſion, by which a general council was declared above any pope, and that, "being gathered together in the Holy Ghoſt, and repreſenting the catholic church militant, it received a power immediately from Jeſus Chriſt, which perſons of all conditions, even popes themſelves, were obliged to obey in every thing which concerned the faith, the extirpation of ſchiſm, and reformation of the church in head and members." In ſhort, the authority of a general council was ultimately confirmed by the approbation of two unqueſtionable popes, John XXIII. and Martin V*.

In the mean time the Lollards underwent ſevere perſecutions in England. Preſentments of heretics were formally ordered by Henry Chicheley, archbiſhop of Canterbury (in the room of Arundel, who died in 1415), in a convocation held at London, July 1, 1416, enjoining every pariſh to give in the names of all perſons ſuſpected of hereſy within their reſpective diſtricts; and ordering that the dioceſans, upon ſuch informations, ſhould iſſue out proceſs againſt the accuſed perſons.

Theſe injunctions were carried into execution with a moſt fiery zeal, and the biſhops obliged all whom they ſuſpected, to ſwallow abjuration in the moſt copious terms. It was about this time that ſir John Oldcaſtle, lord Cobham, was taken by the lord Powis, and ſent up to London, where he ſuffered death in the manner related in the civil hiſtory *.

In the year 1418, a ſynod was called by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, at London, which granted two tenths as a ſupply for the war with France; and the duke of Bedford notified to the aſſembly the election of pope Martin V. whoſe elevation was celebrated with rejoicings and acts of devotion. The aſſembly then enacted a decree for regulating the graduations at the two univerſities, which decree met with great oppoſition at Oxford and Cambridge, though it was at laſt received by the interpoſition of king Henry V. who was himſelf a patron of learning.

The meek Martin V. proved as encroaching a pope upon the Engliſh church as any of his predeceſſors had ever been: he diſpoſed of biſhoprics by way of proviſion, and vacated the elections of the chapters. Henry V. in order to put a ſtop to this uſurpation, as alſo to reform a number of abuſes which had crept in among the clergy, ſent John Ketterick, biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield, to demand an expreſs concordat upon the abuſes ſo much complained of. The pope, who knew too much of Henry to think of dallying with him, on the ſeventeenth of April, 1419, eſtabliſhed the following concordat between the ſee of Rome and the church of England.

"That it was agreed by pope Martin V. for the reformation of the church of England, and of the dominions of Ireland and Wales, that the number of cardinals ſhould be ſo moderate that it might not be a burthen to the church, nor render the dignity mean and contemptible.

"That they ſhould be elected indifferently out of all the nations of Chriſtendom, and be created with the conſent of the college of cardinals, or the greateſt part of them.

"That ſince, on occaſion of indulgencies granted by the popes, and the great number of thoſe perſons who diſtributed them, which now abounded in England more than formerly, many encouraged themſelves in a bold licentiouſneſs; and, neglecting their proper cures and proper churches, flocked to make their confeſſions in thoſe places where the indulgencies were given out; it ſhould therefore be in the power of the diocеſan of the place to enquire into the quality of thoſe indulgencies, to ſuſpend thoſe which were ſcandalous, and to ſend notice to the pope that he might revoke them.

"That there ſhould be no appropriations of parochial churches, without the knowlege and conſent of the biſhop of that dioceſe.

"That all appropriations of perpetual vicarages in the pariſh churches, made during the late ſchiſm, ſhould be recalled; and perpetual vicars be ordained in them by the ordinaries of the place: and that in every parochial church there ſhould be one conſtant vicar to have the cure of ſouls, who ſhould be ſufficiently endowed to maintain hoſpitality, and to ſupport the charges of his function.

"That all the privileges of uſing the pontifical veſtments granted to inferior prelates ſince the death of Gregory XI. ſhould be revoked; but thoſe which had been obtained before, ſhould continue.

"That whereas the plurality of benefices was contrary to the canons, and no diſpenſations could be lawfully made in this caſe, unleſs in favour of perſons of noble birth or excellent learning, yet ſuch diſpenſations were now common; it was therefore ordained, that they ſhould not be granted for the future; though thoſe which had been, might continue in force, excepting only ſuch as were ſcandalous, of which the ordinary of the place ſhould take cognizance.

"That whereas the popes, in latter times, had given diſpenſations to perſons who had obtained benefices ſupplied with curates before, to enjoy them for a term of years, or for ever, to the great ſcandal of the church; it was therefore ordained that all thoſe diſpenſations ſhould be recalled, and the perſons be left to common law.

"And whereas diſpenſations granted by the popes for non-reſidence, or to give to the archdeacons licence of viſiting by their proctors, had cauſed not only a great neglect of the cure of ſouls, but a contempt of epiſcopal authority, it was therefore ordained, that no ſuch diſpenſations ſhould be made for the future, unleſs upon very great reaſons; and that all which had been, ſhould be revoked.

"That all letters of licence to obtain any eccleſiaſtical benefices, whether cures or ſine-cures, which had been given to monks and friars, and not yet put in execution, ſhould be revoked; and that there ſhould be no more of them for the time to come.

"That thoſe of the Engliſh who were fit for places or offices in the court of Rome, ſhould ſtand as fair to be elected as thoſe of other nations."

The pope, after paſſing an act ſo much in favour of the church of England, applied to Henry to have all thoſe laws which had been made to the prejudice of his authority, abrogated; but Henry ſoon gave his holineſs to underſtand that this was not in the power of the crown to grant. About this period another convocation was held in London, wherein one Richard Walker, a prieſt of Worceſter, was tried and convicted of witchcraft, which he ſolemnly renounced, and did public penance. Many people were likewiſe obliged to abjure Lollardiſm; and the aſſembly granted a large ſubſidy to the king, who ſuppreſſed French monaſteries in England, and granted their lands to other colleges of the learned. After Henry's marriage, a convocation, held at London, made the king a preſent of a tenth, but upon the following conditions, propoſed by the famous Lyndwood:

"Firſt, that the king's purveyors ſhould not over-reach upon the goods of churchmen.

"Secondly, That no clergyman ſhould be impriſoned, but for theft or murder; and that when proſecuted for other crimes, they ſhould be bailable†." It is pretended that theſe exceptions were confirmed by act of parliament, but no ſuch act is to be found upon the records.

Pope Martin V. having ſummoned a new council at Pavia, in the beginning of the year 1421, the archbiſhop of Canterbury held another convocation, for the election of delegates, the names of whom were returned to the king, whoſe prerogative it was to pitch upon what number he thought proper to repreſent the Engliſh clergy in the enſuing council: a ſum of money was likewiſe voted to the delegates who were to act on this occasion. At this convocation also several were punished for heresy and other crimes.

Archbishop Chicheley was famous for a great number of constitutions which he enacted, enjoining the celebration of festivals, regulating the probates of wills by administration, instituting a kind of inquisition against Lollardism, providing against false weights, reviving the constitutions of John Peckham, archbishop of Canterbury, who decreed that in those cases and articles in which the sentence of the greater excommunication was incurred, should be publicly declared in every parish church for the information of the people; and augmenting the stipends of vicars, who were allowed to sue for such augmentation "in forma pauperum."

The last ecclesiastical occurrence in the reign of Henry V. was the reformation of the Benedictine monks, who were become so luxurious and dissolute that the king himself interposed to reduce them to greater regularity; and by his orders a provincial chapitulary was held in the year 1422, in the chapter-house at Westminster, where the following regulations passed.

"That the abbots should employ their attention in the cure of souls; and that the extravagance of their equipage should be retrenched, so that none should be attended by above twenty horse, under a severe temporal penalty.

"That none of the monks should ever make gifts of the effects of the convent above the value of forty shillings.

"That they should be uniform in the colour and fashion of their habits.

"That their necessities should be supplied, not in money, which none of the order ought to possess, but in provision of things needful.

"That they should not have distinct private cells for the entertainment of female guests.

"Lastly, That, since the way to preserve chastity was to avoid the conversation of women, therefore none of the monks should have liberty to go into the cities or towns to visits or merry-makings."

No sooner had the illustrious Henry V. paid the common debt of nature, and the reins of government were devolved into the hands of an infant king, than the see of Rome began to take advantage of a circumstance which appeared so favourable for her purpose, and to endeavour at levelling that terrible fence against her usurpations, the statute of Præmunire. This statute, which has been already mentioned on several occasions, though it did not directly attack the pope, since the parliament had no jurisdiction over him, yet as it hindered the English from applying to the court of Rome for things contrary to the prerogative of the crown and the laws of the realm, it abridged the pope of good part of the advantages which he pretended to reap from his apostolic power. It will, perhaps be thought strange that the popes should be silent at the time, and so long after the time this statute was passed; but the continued schism which had rent the Roman church from 1378 to 1409, had hindered them from stirring. It is true there was an interval of some years, during which Alexander V. and John XXIII. might have made some attempt against that law; but Alexander's pontificate was very short, and John was employed in affairs which he thought of more importance. Martin V. however, did not consider this affair with the same indifference; and he no sooner heard of the death of Henry V. than he thought the minority of his successor, Henry VI. a favourable opportunity to compass his ends. Accordingly he wrote a thundering letter to Chicheley, archbishop of Canterbury, upbraiding him for his remissness, and enjoining him to exert his utmost efforts to get this statute repealed. As this letter is a very extraordinary one of its kind, and shews the pope's sentiments of the pretended privileges of his see, it may not be unacceptable to give an extract from it; such of our readers who may be desirous of perusing it entire, will find it in bishop Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i.

He begins with accusing the archbishop in the warmest terms with "having neglected his pastoral care, and minding nothing but the means of amassing wealth." He tells him, "that he suffered his flock to brouze on poisonous herbs, and that when wolves came to devour them, he stood like a dumb dog, without so much as barking." Then he inveighs against the statute of Præmunire as an act "that repealed the laws of God and the church, and subverted the ancient usages of the good kingdom of England." He complains that "such a rigour is the more unjustifiable, as the English government does not treat Jews, Turks, and Infidels with so great severity: people of all countries and persuasions (says he) have the liberty of coming into England, only those who have cures bestowed on them by Christ's vicar are excluded; those only are banished, seized, imprisoned, stripped of their fortunes, and thrown out of the king's protection. Was ever such iniquity (exclaims this mild and modest pontiff) passed into a law?" He concludes with an order to the archbishop to repair immediately on the receipt of his letter to the council, and use all his interest there, and in the parliament, for the abrogating this statute; and threatening him, in case of remissness or non-compliance with this his apostolic injunction, that he should incur the sentence of excommunication."

If it should be enquired, why pope Martin poured forth all his indignation upon Chicheley in particular, who was not concerned in the statute of Præmunire, passed long before he was archbishop? the reason is this, Chicheley had opposed to his utmost the papal exemptions; he had dissuaded Henry V. from consenting that Henry Beaufort, his uncle, bishop of Winchester, should be made cardinal and legate a latere for life; moreover, he had publicly declared that the views of the see of Rome were perpetually to drain the country of its treasures for the aggrandizing of her own sons.

Chicheley, on receiving the above letter, sent an apology for his conduct to Rome; notwithstandwhich he was again severely reprimanded; and, notwithstanding the archbishop of York, and the bishops of London, Durham, and Lincoln wrote to his holiness in favour of their brother, and that their instances were backed by the university of Oxford, which gave testimony greatly in honour of the archbishop's character, whom they termed "the golden candlestick of the church of England," yet Martin remained implacable, and summoned Chicheley to Rome, as an enemy to the pope in England.

At last the archbishop, seeing the pope thus obstinate, and not daring longer to disobey him, went, with with ſeveral other biſhops, to the houſe of commons, where he made a long ſpeech, tending to perſuade the houſe to repeal the ſtatute, and put them in mind of the danger of an interdict upon the whole kingdom. But the members, ſuppoſing this harangue was the effect of compulſion, paid no regard to the metropolitan's threats or remonſtrances, but preſented an addreſs to the king, praying that he would take the archbiſhop into his protection, and to write to the pope in his behalf.

When the cruſade againſt the Bohemians was preached up, and the cardinal of Wincheſter declared general of the enterprize, the pope ordered that prelate to collect a tenth from the Engliſh clergy, for the expence of the expedition; but all the convocation would grant was eight pence in the mark, on condition it ſhould be found conſiſtent with the king's prerogative, and the laws of the kingdom. The pope's nuncio thinking this ſupply inſufficient, had the inſolence to venture to collect money without being properly authoriſed, and was impriſoned for his preſumption: in ſhort, Martin perceiving he was ſupported neither by the king's council, the clergy, nor the people, dropped the affair, not thinking proper to expoſe his authority any farther.

Pope Martin V. in the year 1430, iſſued his ſummons for a general council to meet at Baſil, the capital of a canton of that name in Switzerland; upon which the archbiſhop of Canterbury held a convocation at London, when the following delegates were choſen to repreſent the Engliſh church in that aſſembly, and two pence in the pound voted to defray their expences: Thomas, biſhop of Worceſter; William, prior of Norwich; Thomas Brown, dean of Saliſbury; Peter Patrick, chancellor of Lincoln; Robert Baſton, precentor of Lincoln; John Saliſbury, doctor of divinity; and John Simon Deſborough, bachelor in common law. Theſe received inſtructions to act againſt all papal diſpenſations and other abuſes which had crept into the church of Rome, eſpecially that of providing livings for unqualified perſons. Pope Martin would have avoided convening this council if it had been in his power, but finding himſelf ſtrongly preſſed by the emperor and other princes in Chriſtendom, he ordered cardinal Julian Ceſarini to preſide as legate, and open the aſſembly; but dying before its meeting, which was in the year 1431, Eugenius IV. was choſen in his room.

Neither the emperor Sigiſmund nor the fathers of the council of Conſtance had foreſeen the conſequences of the execution of John Hus and Jerom of Prague. Out of their aſhes roſe a civil war; for the Bohemians looked upon this action as a cruel affront offered to their whole country, and imputed the death of their fellow-citizens to the revenge of the Germans, who had withdrawn from the univerſity of Prague: they openly reproached the emperor with having violated the law of nations; and, not long afterwards, when Sigiſmund attempted to ſucceed his brother Wenceſlaus in the kingdom of Bohemia, he found that, though he was emperor and king of Hungary, the death of two private citizens barred his way to the throne of Bohemia. The avengers of John Hus amounted to no leſs than forty thouſand. Martin V. eſpouſing the cauſe of Sigiſmund, and publiſhing cruſades againſt the Huſſites, they found themſelves obliged to ſtand in their own defence, and choſe for their general a perſon called Ziſka (or the One-eyed), chief in barbarity and rank among theſe barbarians who defeated Sigiſmund in ſeveral battles. This ſame Ziſka having loſt his only remaining eye in an engagement, ſtill continued to march at the head of his troops, giving his orders to his generals, and aſſiſting at their victories: he commanded his ſoldiers, that, after his death, they ſhould make a drum of his ſkin*, which they obeyed, and theſe his remains proved for a long time fatal to his enemies.

This war continued till the meeting of the council of Baſil, which, conſidering the bad ſucceſs of Sigiſmund, reſolved to make peace with the Huſſites. With this view the fathers invited them to ſend deputies to the council; who, being ſent accordingly, preſented the four following articles containing their chief tenets and ſentiments, in which they differed from the church of Rome, to whom they offered to reunite themſelves ſhould it agree to theſe articles:

"I. That communion in both kinds ſhould be adminiſtered to the Bohemian laity.

"II. That offenders ſhould be puniſhed according to the law of God, and by thoſe to whom ſuch correction belonged.

"III. That the word of God ſhould be preached by paſtors properly qualified. And,

"IV. That the clergy ſhould have no juriſdiction over temporalities."

Eugenius IV. who had by this time ſucceeded pope Martin, highly reſented the proceedings of the council: he ſaid, that admitting the Bohemians to a conference was an indignity, not only to the holy ſee, but to the authority of the council of Conſtance, wherein thoſe heretics had been ſo ſolemnly condemned; he therefore publiſhed a bull in the beginning of the year 1432, diſſolving the council, and ſummoning another to Bologna in a year. The members, however refuſed to ſeparate, and paſſed ſeveral decrees, which placed the authority of a general council above that of the pope, and vacating the bull for their diſſolution. On this occaſion a convocation was held at London, in which it was reſolved to ſend more delegates to the council, and that ſome of them ſhould repair to the pope, in order to attempt an accommodation between him and the council. In this ſame convocation a diſpute happened between the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, about precedency; for Kemp, archbiſhop of York, having obtained a cardinal's hat, claimed the upper hand of the archbiſhop of Canterbury in the parliament houſe at Weſtminſter; Chicheley oppoſed this with great firmneſs: pope Eugenius, before whom the matter was laid, eſpouſed the cauſe of the cardinalate, though without any effect.

The diſpute between the pope and the council now flamed forth more violent than ever; but the emperor, the king of France, and moſt of the other princes of Europe, declaring for the council, and this latter threatening to ſuſpend the pope, Eugenius ſaw himſelf under the neceſſity of confirming the council and approving its decrees.

This forced compliance of the pope appeaſed the quarrel for ſome time, and, in the year 1433, the affair of the Huſſite hereſy was taken into ſerious

conſideration. The fathers of the council exhauſted all their art and eloquence in perſuading the Bohemians to ſubmit to the church at diſcretion; but finding them inflexible, reſolved to grant their demands, on condition that they ſhould be previouſly explained, in order to avoid new diſputes. This they accordingly did by the mouth of their orator, Peter Payne, an Engliſhman, and a concordat was ſettled, to the ſatisfaction of all parties. This affair being accommodated, Sigiſmund was acknowleged king of Bohemia, after having approved of the concordat, and ſubſcribed ſome other conditions; but he had no ſooner mounted the throne, than he broke his promiſe, and the pope refuſed to ſign the concordat: the troubles of Bohemia were renewed; and, being fomented by the pope of Rome, continued till the Huſſites were entirely ruined*.

In the year 1438, the univerſity of Oxford complained that church-preferments were beſtowed without any regard to learning or merit: that the colleges were thereby become empty, becauſe there was no need of ſtudy or learning to be qualified for a benefice. Whereupon the convocation, then ſitting, formed a canon, declaring "that none but graduates in either of the univerſities ſhould be capable of enjoying benefices†."

During theſe tranſactions, Chichely, archbiſhop of Canterbury, died, after having filled that ſee twenty-nine years, during all which time he had been a ſtrenuous aſſertor of his own independency, and that of the church of England, though ſometimes obliged to give way to the neceſſity of a conjunction with the Roman pontiff. He was alſo a remarkable benefactor to learning and learned foundations. He was ſucceeded by John Strafford, ſon to the earl of Strafford, one of the greateſt families in England. This prelate, at the time of his acceſſion to the ſee of Canterbury, was lord high-treaſurer and biſhop of Bath and Wells. Under this prelate the clergy complained grievouſly that the act of Præmunire, which was meant to guard the church of England, was, by the conſtruction of the common lawyers, turned into an engine of oppreſſion, and that, by the arts of perverſe men, they were ſubjected to all manner of perſecution, by vexatious ſuits in the courts, and this by the miſapplication of a ſingle word; for it was enacted in that ſtatute, "That if any purchaſe or purſue, or cauſe to be purchaſed or purſued, in the court of Rome, or elſewhere, any tranſlations, proceſſes, &c. &c. affecting the king's rights ‡," &c. Now they obſerved, that when common lawyers were diſpoſed to harraſs the clergy, they put ſuch a conſtruction upon the word elſewhere, as to bring them within the ſtatute, if ever they ſhould proſecute any matter of eccleſiaſtical right before any of the eccleſiaſtical courts without the kingdom; whereas the word elſewhere can only refer to the place in which the pope might chance to preſide; and therefore they prayed that ſome remedy might be applied to this evil, by expunging elſewhere in the ſtatute of Præmunire: but the times were too unſettled for them to obtain immediate ſatisfaction.

The diſpute between the council of Baſil and pope Eugenius IV. being again revived, on account of his perfidy in refuſing to ſign the concordat, the aſſembly proceeded to depoſe him, and, in the year 1440 or 1441, choſe another pope in his room. This was Amadeus, duke of Savoy, who was the firſt of his family who had borne the title of duke, and afterwards turned hermit from a motive of devotion, which Poggio ſays he thinks to have been far from real: be that as it may, his piety could not hold out againſt the temptation of a tripple crown; accordingly he was declared ſupreme pontiff, though a layman, and took the name of Felix V. But that which had occaſioned ſo violent a ſchiſm, and the moſt bloody war in the time of Urban VI. now only produced a few eccleſiaſtical diſputes, bulls, cenſures, counter-excommunications, and ſplenetic invectives: the council of Baſil had beſtowed the epithets of ſimoniſt, ſchiſmatic, heretical, and perjured, on Eugenius IV. and his ſecretary returned the abuſe by ſtyling the fathers fools, madmen, and barbarians, and their new pontiff Cerberus and Antichriſt. In fine, in the year 1449, this council diſperſed gradually of itſelf, and this hermit-pope duke of Savoy contented himſelf with a cardinal's hat, and left the church in its uſual tranquility. Eugenius dying in 1447, was ſucceeded by Nicholas V. who, upon the reſignation of Felix, was acknowleged as lawful pope. Thus ended at length this ſchiſm, in which there was a complication of three ſchiſms, firſt between Eugenius IV. and the council of Baſil; then between two general councils, and laſtly between two popes. My reaſon for having introduced what paſſed between the two famous councils of Conſtance and Baſil, was to ſhew the reader, in its true light, the wretched ſtate of the church in thoſe days.

Nothing remarkable happened for a year or two in eccleſiaſtical affairs in England. On the firſt of June, 1452, Strafford, archbiſhop of Canterbury, died, and was ſucceeded by John Kemp, archbiſhop of York and cardinal, who held his ſee not quite two years, and was ſucceeded by Thomas Bourchier, brother to the earl of Eſſex and cardinal-biſhop of Ely. He owed his election to the monks alone, which was confirmed by the pope. He compoſed a ſet of articles of reformation for his province, amongſt which were the following:

"I. That all religious who, abandoning their habit, entered upon parochial cures, ſhould loſe their freedom, and be puniſhed as deſerters from their order.

"II. That no church-living ſhould be farmed, without leave from the biſhop. And,

"III. Laſtly, That all marriages and laſt teſtaments ſhould have two witneſſes."

But the moſt remarkable churchman that lived at this period was Reginald Peacock, biſhop of Chicheſter, a perſon of great learning and reputation, who appears to have been a kind of free-thinker in matters of religion. If we believe Collier and other eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians, he maintained, "that the meaning of the holy Scriptures was to be collected by the force of natural reaſon; and as for the generality of preaching, it was little better than bawling in the pulpit. He denied the apoſtles were the authors of the creed which goes under their name; queſtioned the received doctrine of ſeveral articles; and made human reaſon the ultimate judge of the controverſy. He denied the deſcent of our Saviour into hell; and though he granted the article of the Catholic Church might paſs, he added, that Chriſtians were not bound to the obſervance of the canons any farther than they could be found agreeable to reaſon and good ſenſe." For theſe tenets, and others that were deemed equally erroneous, publiſhed by him in a long creed, drawn up in Engliſh, he was condemned, in a convocation, held at London, by Strafford, then archbiſhop of Canterbury; and, upon the death of the earl of Suffolk, his great patron, in the year 1450, his books were ordered to be burnt, and himſelf forced to recant part of his writings. He was afterwards deprived of his ſee, and ſent to live at Maidſtone, in Kent, where he died in obſcurity.

During the remainder of the period under conſideration, the civil and eccleſiaſtical affairs of England are ſo interwoven, that the latter have generally been accounted for in the relation given of the former; we ſhall therefore be very brief on this head, touching only on ſuch matters which could not be introduced in the civil hiſtory.

Edward IV. found the friendſhip of the clergy ſo neceſſary for ſupporting his diſputed title to the crown, that he rather enlarged than abridged their privileges. He granted them a charter, exempting them from the juriſdiction of the civil power, in criminal cauſes, and remitting all ſuch to the judgment of their ordinaries.

In this reign, pope Sixtus IV. at the ſolicitation of Graham, archbiſhop elect of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, erected that ſee and Glaſgow into archbiſhoprics, independent of the dioceſe of York, which claimed a juriſdiction over the church of Scotland: but the ſame pope, to make this encroachment go down with the Engliſh clergy more ſmoothly, granted them ſeveral advantageous bulls, by which they were rendered more independent of the ſecular power; and alſo confirmed, renewed, and greatly augmented the privileges of the univerſity of Oxford.

Upon the death of the uſurper Richard III. whoſe ſhort and troubled reign left little room for any eccleſiaſtical tranſactions of note, archbiſhop Bourchier placed the crown of England on the head of the fortunate earl of Richmond, Henry VII. and dying in the year 1486, was ſucceeded by Morton, biſhop of Ely, who had been greatly inſtrumental in raiſing Henry to the throne. The civil hiſtory of this king's reign has ſhewn us, that his ſituation, like that of Edward IV. laid him under a kind of neceſſity of keeping fair with the clergy; and they, in return, took care to gratify ſo obliging a patron. The ſecure retreat that ſanctuaries afforded to all thoſe who took refuge in them, had given Henry no little uneaſineſs in the caſes of Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck; he therefore applied to his friends the churchmen, to give up ſome part of this their privilege in his favour; and, by their concurrence, a bull was procured from Rome for regulating theſe ſanctuaries, which, according to lord Bacon, contained, among others, the following articles:

"I. That if any ſanctuary-man did, by night or otherwiſe, privately get out of a ſanctuary, and commit miſchief or treſpaſs, and then come in again, he ſhould loſe the benefit of ſanctuary for ever after.

"II. That how ſoever the perſon of the ſanctuary man was protected from his creditors, yet his goods out of ſanctuary ſhould not.

"III. That if any took ſanctuary for caſes of treaſon, the king might appoint keepers to watch and guard him in ſanctuary."

Such in general was the ſtate of the Engliſh church during the period from the year 1413 to the year 1509, in which we meet with no national councils, but only convocations of the clergy in the two metropolitical provinces of Canterbury and York. National ſynods were, indeed, become uſeleſs, ſince the popes had engroſſed the cognizance of all eccleſiaſtical affairs; beſides, the leaſt appeal to the pope was ſufficient to annul all the canons of a council. On the other hand, the popes had ſo managed, that no national ſynods could be held without their licence; now as in thoſe ſynods there was but too frequent occaſion to enquire into the extent of the papal authority, they were grown ſo odious to the court of Rome, that the uſe of them was inſenſibly laid aſide, and the pope was become the centre of religion, to which every thing was to tend: while the legates ſent hither by the ſee of Rome were ſo many incendiaries, who ſought every means to ſow diſcord and diviſion among kings and their nobles, or excite the former to acts of violence and oppreſſion. In a word, they regarded only the intereſt of their maſter, and the papal chair, making no ſcruple to violate all the ties of religion and equity to accompliſh their ends.

The indolence and devotion of Henry VI. was extremely detrimental to the Engliſh church. He was the firſt king of England who gave the biſhops a taſte for a court-life, which brought them into all the intrigues of ambition and avarice. The heads of the univerſities, and ſome of the more virtuous prelates, were ſenſible of this degeneracy, and endeavoured, but in vain, to put a ſtop to the papal proviſions, which were the roots of all abuſes, ſince few could hope to attain any degree of preferment in the church, who did not render themſelves commendable by their attachment to the intereſts of the court of Rome, or for their ſervices to the prince in his temporal concerns.

The great favour ſhewn the clergy by his ſucceſſors, Edward IV. Richard III. and Henry VII. who all ſtood in need of their aſſiſtance, at length raiſed this body to ſuch an envied pitch of greatneſs as prepared the way to that reformation, which, ſome years after, uſhered in their fall: a glorious event! which muſt make the ſubject of the enſuing period.

LEARNED

LEARNED MEN in the XVth CENTURY.

LEARNING was at a very low ebb in this century, till the acceſſion of Henry V. but through the whole courſe of his glorious reign, there was always a particular biaſs on the part of the crown towards the advancement of literature. This great deſign was carried into much more extenſive execution than could be imagined from the multiplicity of martial concerns with which the life of that prince was filled: in ſhort, perhaps ſeveral princes, to the time of Charles I. in England, have been patrons of learning, but we know none who was at the ſame time the patron of liberty and the arts beſides Henry V. The fine taſte for polite learning he inherited from his family always appeared uppermoſt, amidſt the toils of the field or the intricacies of the cabinet: in a word, we may ſay, that from his time learning in England began to gain every day new ſtrength, and to improve in numberleſs uſeful diſcoveries. The moſt eminent men for learning which this period produced, were the following.

John Seguard was a very fine Latin poet, and poſſeſſed a variety of polite learning. He flouriſhed about the year 1414, and was ſo unblameable in his life and morals, that the freedom he took in laſhing the lives of the monks and prieſts never brought him into trouble. His great patron was the martial biſhop of Norwich, Richard Courtney.

Richard Snettiſham acquired ſo great reputation at Oxford, that, though very young, he was elected chancellor of that univerſity in the year 1412. He was reckoned one of the beſt diſputants of the age, and was indefatigable in his labours in expounding the holy Scriptures in the public ſchools. He was appointed, by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, one of the cenſors of Wickliff's doctrine.

John Beſton, prior of a convent of Carmelites, in Lynn, was held to be one of the greateſt orators of the age. He was illuſtrious for philoſophy and divinity, in the univerſity of Cambridge, as likewiſe in that of Paris. He was ſent as one of the delegates to the council of Sienna, called by pope Martin V. but that council never meeting, he died at Lynn about the year 1428.

The elder Leland was one of the beſt grammarians of that age. He taught in the univerſity of Oxford with ſo much ſucceſs, that the following barbarous verſe grew into part of his character with the public:

Ut roſa flos florum,
Sic Leland grammaticorum.

He was buried at Oxford, in the year 1428.

Richard Ullerſtone, a Lancaſhire man, was fellow of Queen's college in Oxford, doctor of divinity, and canon of York, but a zealous Anti-Wickliffite. He publiſhed a book in 1409, concerning the articles of faith, or the creed of the church, which ſhews him to have been a great maſter of controverſial learning. He likewiſe, at the requeſt of the cardinal-biſhop of Saliſbury, wrote a book in Latin, concerning the reformation of the church, in which he proved himſelf as zealous a reformer as the warmeſt Wickliffite. He was likewiſe author of ſeveral other tracts, relating to the divinity common in thoſe days.

Peter Clerk was himſelf a profeſſed Wickliffite, though maſter of arts in the univerſity of Oxford. He diſputed about the points in debate, in the year 1420, with Thomas Walden; but his great zeal had almoſt coſt him his life, for he was obliged to fly to Bohemia: but even there he was apprehended by order of the emperor, nor did he ever after return to England.

Thomas Walden is repreſented by Leland, and other authors of that ſtamp and time, as one of the moſt formidable enemies that the Wickliffites ever had: he is cried up by Leland and other writers as a man of prodigious acuteneſs in diſputation. This much is certain, that Henry IV. who was a great judge of learned men, ſent him from England to the council of Piſa, where he diſtinguiſhed his zeal againſt the ſchiſm of the two antipopes. In the year 1414, he was made provincial prior of his order of the Carmelites, being the twenty-third of that ſucceſſion; and he had the courage to reproach Henry V. to his face from the pulpit, for his indolence againſt the Wickliffites: this freedom was not, perhaps, diſagreeable to the king, as Leland tells us that Walden's zeal was principally levelled againſt the Oldcaſtellans, of whom, no doubt, the king, in the beginning of his reign, was extremely jealous. About the year 1415, the king made Walden his father-confeſſor, and ſent him to the council of Conſtance, as being the beſt qualified of any man in England to make a figure againſt the Huſſites. About the year 1419, he was employed in a kind of mediation between the king of Poland and the great-maſter of the Teutonic order: his interceſſion had great weight, and he had the addreſs to introduce his order of Carmelites into thoſe countries. But this was not all, for he converted to the Chriſtian religion Wittold, duke of Lithuania, one of its moſt dreadful enemies. He had the honour to be in the bed chamber when Henry V. expired; and he afterwards died at Rouen, on the third of November, 1430.

Richard Flemming, a Yorkſhireman, educated at Oxford, was a profeſſed favourite of Wickliff's doctrine, and very eminent in the learning of thoſe days. One Nicholas Pout particularly affected to oppoſe him in all public diſputations: but Flemming, either receiving new conviction, or altering his ſentiments, through the flow of eccleſiaſtical promotions which came upon him, became a violent perſecutor of the ſect he had befriended, and was appointed one of the twelve cenſors of Wickliff's doctrine. He was the founder of Lincoln college, which he had deſigned as a ſeminary for Anti-Wickliffites. On the twenty-fourth of May, 1420, he was appointed biſhop of Lincoln by the pope; and afterwards, as we have already ſeen, was nominated to the ſee of York, but the pope was obliged to drop his nomination. In the council of Sienna, to which he was ſent, he made a great figure in defending the honour of the Engliſh nation above all others. He died in the year 1430.

William Lyndwood was firſt of Gonvil hall, in Cambridge, and then took his degree as doctor in Oxford. He was undoubtedly one of the greateſt canoniſts this nation has produced, and a moſt conſummate ſtateſman. He was keeper of the privy-ſeal to Henry V. and employed by him in many important negociarions, particularly to the courts of Spain and Portugal. By Henry VI. he was ſent to the council of Baſil; and in the year 1434 he was made biſhop of St. David's, but died in 1446. His great work, and indeed the only work of the kind we have, compoſed by an Engliſhman, is his Provinciale ſeu Conſtitutiones Angliæ. Therein we have the provincial decrees of forty archbiſhops, digeſted into order, with large and learned commentaries upon them.

There were but few good hiſtorians graced this period: thoſe whoſe writings in this kind were the moſt eſteemed, were,

Sir John Froiſſart, who wrote a general hiſtory of France, Spain, &c. but chiefly of England. He was a Frenchman born, but was brought up in his youth in the court of Edward III. and familiarly converſant in that of Richard II. He wrote in his own tongue, which was then the court-language of England. In the Engliſh edition, publiſhed by ſir John Bourchier at the command of Henry VIII. the miſtakes that had crept into the French copies are corrected. His account of matters ſeems to be plain and honeſt; and perhaps none gives a better of the affairs of Edward III. and Richard II.

Enguerrand de Monſtrelet, and Philip de Commines, may not improperly be called Froiſſart's continuators. They give a faithful and complete account of the affairs of England, as far as they are intermixed with, or have any relation to thoſe of France, Burgundy, &c.

Thomas Walſingham, a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's. His Hiſtoria Brevis (or Short Hiſtory) begins at the concluſion of Henry III's reign, where Matthew Paris ended his. The account he gives is well enough; and we are indebted to him for many things not taken notice of by any other writer of thoſe times. His Ypodigma Neuſtriæ (as he calls it) gives an account of Normandy, from the time it came firſt into the hands of Rollo and his Danes, down to the ſixth year of Henry V. wherein the reader will find many occurrences not elſewhere to be met with. Both theſe works were publiſhed by archbiſhop Parker, in 1547, and reprinted at Francfort in 1603.

John Harding comes next, a northern Engliſhman, and an inveterate enemy to the Scots. He collected whatever might tend to the proof of the antient vaſſalage of Scotland to the crown of England; and hearing of an old record in that kingdom which put the matter paſt diſpute, he went in diſguiſe, with much ado brought it away, and ſhewed it to Henry V. Henry VI. and Edward IV. To the laſt of theſe he dedicated his two books of Chronicles in Engliſh rhyme. Printed at London, 1543.

John Roſe, or Rous, travelled over the greateſt part of England, and having made large collections out of the libraries where he came, he wrote the hiſtory of our kings, which was publiſhed in 1716, by T. Hearne, from a MS. in the Cottonian Library. He died 1491.

L A W S.

THE common law of England (ſaith the author from whom we borrowed our laſt obſervations on this head *), during the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V. fell ſhort of the excellency it had in the firſt part of the reign of Edward III. but the times of Henry VI. as alſo of Edward IV. Edward V. and Henry VII. were times that abounded with excellent lawyers.

The firſt part of Henry VI. indeed is more barren, ſpending itſelf in much learning, of little moment, and now out of uſe: but the ſecond part is full of excellent learning. In the time of theſe three kings, Henry VI. Edward IV. and Henry VII. the learning ſeems to be much alike: but theſe two things is obſervable in them, and indeed generally in all reports after the time of Edward III. viz.

Firſt, that real action and aſſize were not ſo frequent as formerly; but many titles of land were determined in perſonal actions: and the reaſons thereof ſeem to be, firſt, becauſe the learning of them began by little and little to be leſs known or underſtood: ſecondly, the ancient ſtrictneſs of preſerving poſſeſſions to poſſeſſors till eviction by action, began not to be ſo much in uſe, unleſs in caſes of deſcents and diſcontinuances, the latter neceſſarily drove the demandent to his Formedon, or his Cui in vita, &c. But the deſcents that ſhewed entry, were rare, becauſe men preſerved their rights to enter, &c. by continual claims: thirdly, becauſe the ſtatute of 8 Henry VI. had helped men to an action to recover their poſſeſſions by a writ of Forcible Entry, even while the methods of recovery of poſſeſſions by ejectments was not known or uſed. The ſecond thing obſervable, is that though pleadings in the time of thoſe kings were far ſhorter than afterwards, eſpecially after the death of Henry VIII. yet they were much longer than in the time of Edward III. and the pleaders, and even the judges, became ſomewhat too curious therein. So that art or dexterity of pleading, which in its uſe, nature, and deſign was only to render the fact plain and intelligible, and to bring the matter to judgment with a convenient certainty, began to degenerate from its primitive ſimplicity, and the true uſe and end thereof, and became a piece of nicety and curioſity; which, how theſe latter times have improved the length of the pleading, the many and unneceſſary repetitions, the miſcarriages of cauſes upon trivial niceties, have too much witneſſed. Our author next gives ſome general obſervations touching the proceedings of law in theſe latter times, more eſpecially touching the length and nicety of pleadings, which at this day far exceeds not only that ſhort yet perſpicuous courſe of pleading which was in the time of Henry VI. Edward IV. and Henry VII. but thoſe of all times whatſoever, as the vaſt preſſes of parchment for any one plea do abundantly witneſs; and the reaſons thereof ſeem to be theſe, viz. firſt, becauſe in ancient times, the pleadings were drawn at the bar, and the exceptions all taken at the bar, which were rarely taken for the pleaſure or curioſity of the pleader, but only as it was apparent that the omiſſions, or matter excepted to, was for the very merit or life of the cauſe, and purpoſely omitted or miſpleaded, becauſe the matter or cauſe would bear no better; but now the pleadings being firſt drawn in writing, are drawn to an exceſſive length, and with much laborioufneſs and care enlarged, leſt it might afford an exception, not intended by the pleader, and which could be eaſily ſupplied from the truth of the caſe; leſt the other party ſhould catch that advantage, which commonly the adverſe party ſtudies, not in contemplation of the merit or juſtice of the cauſe, but to find a ſlip to faſten upon, though in truth not material to the merits of the plea, wherein all things conform to it. Secondly, becauſe thoſe parts of pleading (which in antient times were material, but at this time are become mere ſtyles and forms), are ſtill continued with much ſtrictneſs; and ſo all thoſe ancient forms (at firſt introduced for conveniency, but now not neceſſary, or it may be antiquated to their uſe) are yet continued, as things wonderfully material, though they only ſwell the bulk, and contribute nothing to the weight of the plea. Thirdly, theſe pleas being moſtly drawn by clerks, who are paid for entries and copies thereof, the larger the pleadings are the more profit comes to them; and the dearer the clerk's place is, the dearer he makes the client pay. Fourthly, an overforwardneſs in courts to give countenance to frivolous exceptions, though they make nothing to the true merits of the cauſe, whereby it often happens, that cauſes are not determined according to their merits, but do often miſcarry for inconſiderable omiſſions in pleading.

only

Next our author gives reaſons why, in the time of Edward I. one term contained not above two or three hundred rolls; but in latter times one term contained two thouſand rolls, or more: his reaſons are, firſt, many petty buſineſſes, as treſpaſſes or debts under forty ſhillings, are now brought to Weſtminſter, which uſed to be diſpatched in county or hundred courts; and yet the plantiff is not to be blamed, becauſe at this day thoſe inferior courts are ſo ill ſerved, and juſtice there ſo ill adminiſtered, that they had better ſeek it (where it may be had) at Weſtminſter, though with ſome more expence: ſecondly, multitudes of attorneys practiſing in the great courts of Weſtminſter, who are ready at every market to gratify the ſpleen, ſpite, and ſtrife of every plaintiff: thirdly, a great increaſe of people in this kingdom above what they were anciently, which muſt needs multiply ſuits: fourthly, a great increaſe of trade, and trading perſons, above what there were in ancient times, which muſt have the like effect: fifthly multitudes of new laws, both penal and other; all which breed new queſtions, and new ſuits at law: and particularly the ſtatutes touching the deviſing of lands, cum multis aliis: ſixthly, the multiplication of actions upon the caſe, which were rare formerly, and thereby a wager at law outſted; which diſcouraged many ſuits; for when men were ſure that they reſted upon a bare contract, without ſpecialty, the other party might wage his law, they would not treat upon ſuch contracts without reducing the debt into a ſpeciality, if it were of any value, which created much certainty and accorded many ſuits*.

We ſhall now proceed to ſhew the great improvements made in the ſtatute law, by the ſeveral monarchs who reigned during this period. And firſt of

HENRY V.

THIS great king, on his acceſſion to the throne, gave his aſſent to ſeveral ſtatutes tending to the preſervation of the public peace, and of the people's rights and privileges, and in particular one relating to the elections for members of parliament. Henry IV. as well as Richard II. had endeavoured to corrupt the houſe of commons; and the court had of late years fallen upon the method of getting its own dependents choſen for counties and boroughs, to whoſe intereſts they were abſolute ſtrangers, and where they had reſided. This practice, if not diſcouraged, bid fair to extinguiſh all the ſpirit of an Engliſh parliament, a ſeaſonable check therefore was given to it in this king's firſt parliament, which met on the fifteenth of May, 1413, and which enacted,

"That none ſhould be choſen knights of the ſhire who were not reſident in the county on the day when the writs were dated; nor any be choſen burgeſſes but ſuch as were citizens, or townſmen and freemen, dwelling in the towns and cities where they were elected."

It was alſo enacted in this ſeſſion, that no underſheriff, ſheriff's clerk, receiver, or bailiff, ſhould be attorney in the king's courts during the time he is in office with ſuch ſheriffs †.

In the next parliament under this king, holden at Leiceſter, on the thirtieth of April, 1414, the commons, deſirous to have a clear and full explanation of their rights, drew up a petition for that purpoſe; and that the matter might be clearly underſtood, their petition was drawn up in Engliſh. In this remarkable addreſs, they lay it down as an inconteſtible fact, "That it has ever been the privilege of their houſe, that no ſtatute or law ſhould paſs without their aſſent; and upon this principle the houſe of commons has been ever a conſtituent part of the legiſlature, and aſſented as well as the petitioners; they therefore inſiſt, that no act or ſtatute ſhould be made without their conſent; and that nothing ſhould be entered upon the rolls as their petitions, but in the direct terms in which they were preſented by their ſpeaker and granted by the king."

Had this petition, which Henry agreed to, been ever examined, it would have given an irrevocable blow to the arguments advanced by the enemies of the power of the commons in parliament.

In the eighth year of this king's reign, a parliament, which met on the ſixteenth of October, among other regulations, paſſed an act for the conſumption of home manufactures, by providing that all the Engliſh troops in France ſhould be cloathed and furniſhed with Engliſh commodities manufactured in England.

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY V.

His firſt parliament, which met on Monday the fifteenth of May, 1413, at Weſtminſter, continued the ſubſidy of wool and leather for four years, and the tonnage and poundage for one: and, granting him an entire fifteenth and an half, expreſſed their hopes of being ſoon eaſed of ſuch taxes and talliages by his good government.

* Analyſis of Common Law, vol. i. p. 172, 173, &c.

† See Statutes, 1 Hen. V.

On occaſion of his parliament addreſſing him to make war with France, in the ſecond year of his reign, they granted him a ſubſidy of two whole tenths and two fifteenths, to be levied upon the laity; an immenſe ſum for thoſe days!

In his fourth year, he had again two whole tenths and two fifteenths, to be levied on the laity; and the clergy gave two tenths to be raiſed from their own body.

In his ſixth, he had one tenth and one fifteenth, and two tenths from the clergy.

In his ſeventh, the parliament gave him one fifteenth and an half, and one tenth and an half.

In his ninth, he received a fifteenth from the laity, and a tenth from the clergy; and the biſhop of Wincheſter (afterwards cardinal of England) lent him twenty thouſand pounds by way of advance.

HENRY VI.

THE firſt remarkable parliamentary tranſaction we meet with under this reign, was during the king's minority, when, in a parliament held by the duke of Bedford, as regent of the kingdom, in April, 1425, the fourth after Henry's acceſſion, amongſt other ſalutary acts, one paſſed againſt the exportation of ſheep beyond ſea, without the king's licence; becauſe, by carrying ſheep into Flanders and other parts, the wool of England would at laſt become of little value, and the woollen manufacture be diminiſhed, to the damage of the realm: to prevent which, they laid an heavy tax upon exported wool, of forty-three ſhillings by the ſack, ten ſhillings more than ever was paid in England for the like quantity. From this ſeaſonable proviſion we learn how jealous even in thoſe days the legiſlature was of the Engliſh golden fleece; a jealouſy which hath hitherto been tranſmitted down to their poſterity, and which never can be loſt without loſing ſight of the true intereſt of England. We have from this proviſion another hint, that the woollen manufactures of England were then much advanced beyond what is generally imagined; a retribution more than ſufficient for all their expence of blood and treaſure incurred in the reduction of France. The happy diviſion of England from the continent had rendered her the aſylum of baniſhed arts and induſtry; and however loudly then the people complained of the public taxes, which were immediately and ſenſibly felt, as they muſt be under all governments, it is evident that the increaſe of trade and riches had now enabled them, eſpecially the lower ſort, to ſupport them with eaſe, while the government applied them to bad purpoſes.

But, beſides manufactures, it is certain that agriculture, that neceſſary attendant, was by this time highly advanced in England. Honeſt induſtry had for ſome time enjoyed under her own vine the fruits of her labour; and trade in ſome meaſure connected with the continent of the country, which nature had diſjoined from it; for we find that there was another act of this parliament for the exportation of butter and cheeſe, to encourage huſbandry, giving the chancellor of England power to grant licences, at his diſcretion, to ſuch perſons who ſhould apply for them, to ſell and vend the ſame in all foreign parts as well as at the ſtaple of Calais. "That all merchant-ſtrangers, within fifteen days after they are landed in any port of this kingdom, ſhall take up for themſelves lodgings, or ſome other habitations, in the town or place where the port is, under ſome Engliſhman; and ſhall not make ſale of any goods or merchandizes till they are ſo ſettled; and then ſhall ſell all their merchandizes within forty days next enſuing; and if any goods after this time ſhall remain unſold, they ſhall be forfeited for the king's uſe." This act, ſays a judicious, but inaccurate author, was intended that the king might not be defrauded by ſtrangers of his cuſtoms; and next, that ſtrangers might not, by keeping their goods and merchandizes, underſtand the wants of the nation, and ſo raiſe the prices. After theſe acts the parliament gave the king a tax of twelve pence per pound upon all merchandizes, whether brought into or carried out of the realm, except wool, which they had otherwiſe taxed; and wine, upon which they laid three ſhillings per tun for three years enſuing.

But we cannot diſmiſs this parliament without taking notice of ſome other laudable proviſions which the commons inſiſted upon, for the public good; as if they had thought that their glory and grandeur abroad was but a ſecondary enjoyment to that of liberty and property at home.

For, among other petitions of the commons, one was from the inhabitants of Northumberland, praying that the extortions of the ſheriffs, by yearly levying certain ſums of money, called head-pence, amounting to fifty-one pounds, may be utterly aboliſhed.

That ſuch merchants as be grieved by the Bretons in time of truce, may have letters of marque.

That remedy may be provided for ſuch victuals as are taken by the ſoldiers lying at ſundry towns.

The grieved, upon complaint, ſhall be heard.

That all men impriſoned for treaſon, felony, or Lollardy, may come to their anſwers ſpeedily.

The ſtatutes afore-made ſhall be obſerved.

Another, That the treaſurers of the chamber of Henry IV. and Henry V. who only are accountable to the king, and not in the Exchequer, may pay all due upon tallies.

The king will be adviſed.

Another, That the juſtices of peace in every county may redreſs all matters of ſewers, and touching the waters.

The ſtatutes therefore made ſhall be obſerved.

Another, That the feoffees that buy lands of the king's tenants in tail, may enjoy the ſame againſt the king.

The king will be adviſed *.

In this ſame fourth year of Henry VI. an act paſſed, "granting a diſcretionary power to the king and council to reſtrain the exportation of corn, whenever they ſhall judge it to be for the benefit of the realm:" Which reſtraint may be neceſſary, firſt, in the caſe of a bad harveſt at home, whereby our own corn may prove too ſcanty for ourſelves: ſecondly, in caſe of a very great dearth of it beyond ſea, ſo that our dealers in corn may be allured by its high price in foreign parts, to export more of it than we can ſpare from our home conſumption: and laſtly, it may be frequently prudent and beneficial to reſtrain our exportation of corn for the diſtreſſing of our enemies, who may at ſuch times be in great want of it, and who might obtain a

ſupply

ſupply of it from thoſe neutral nations to whom we export it."

This prudent law has in the main been continued ever ſince in force, though with ſome temporary regulations, as the public utility from time to time required.

In the year 1429, the eighth of Henry VI. it was enjoined by act of parliament,

"That every city and town of England ſhould at their own expence keep a common ballance with ſealed weights, correſponding to the ſtandards in the Exchequer; and all the inhabitants might weigh thereby, without paying any thing for the ſame; but ſtrangers were obliged to pay." By this ſame ſtatute it was enacted "that no man ſhould buy woollen yarn, unleſs he will make cloth thereof."

In the parliament holden at Weſtminſter, the tenth year of his reign, the following acts paſſed.

"I. That whereas, under the colour of outlawries ſued out againſt certain perſons, occaſion was taken to moleſt others of the ſame name, and to ſeize goods and chattels, eſpecially when they were dead, becauſe there was no remedy at common law for executors to recover ſuch ſeizures; wherefore it was enacted by the parliament in favour of executors, that, in defence of the teſtator's goods, a writ called "Identitate nominis," ſhould be granted to them, and ſhould be maintainable by them as by any other perſon living.

"II. That whereas the Welſhmen aſſembled in great numbers, and did, in a riotous and rebellious manner, intercept and ſtop the boats, trowers, and boats called drags, carrying wares and merchandizes to Briſtol, Gloceſter, Worceſter, and other places upon the river Severn, and broke the ſaid veſſels, to the end that the traders might have their boats and veſſels of them only; therefore it was enacted, that all the king's liege people ſhould have free paſſage upon the ſaid river, to carry their goods and chattels as they pleaſe, without any moleſtation from the Welſh; and if, for the future, they any ways moleſted them in their traffick, the party or parties aggrieved, ſhould have their action according to the courſe of common law.

"III. That in all pleas wherein baſtardy is alleged againſt any perſon, party to the ſaid plea, the judge or judges in the court wherein the ſaid plea is depending ſhall certify it to the chancellor of England, for the time being, to the intent that proclamation be made in the ſame chancery by three months, once every month, that all perſons that have any thing to object againſt the ſaid mulier, or perſon pretending a legitimate iſſue, may put in their allegation and objections before any certificate be given in by the biſhop."

In the twelfth year of his reign, in a parliament holden at Weſtminſter, on the eighth of July, the following acts were paſſed.

"I. That ſuch perſons as were keepers of the ſtews, or whore-houſes, in Southwark, ſhould not be impannelled upon any jury, nor keep any inn or tavern in any other places; leſt men of ſuch vile conſciences and practices ſhould corrupt juſtice, and propagate their villanies over the nation.

"II. It was enacted, that even diſſeiſors ſhould not be put out of poſſeſſion by any colluſive tricks of law, as was then uſual, by making the ſheriff the diſſeiſor, and then entering upon the lands for the default of the tenants not anſwering; wherefore it was ordained, that all ſuch writs ſhould be abated and quaſhed. And,

"III. In the behalf of the perſon diſſeiſed wrongfully of his lands, whereas before the law was, that the diſſeiſee might ſue the diſſeiſor in his life-time, if he took the profits at the time the ſuit commenced, which, to avoid, the diſſeiſors made over the land by feoffments to others, and ſo avoided the ſuit; whereas it was enacted, that the diſſeiſees ſhould have their action as well againſt the feoffee, as diſſeiſees or himſelf, if either of them take the profits of the lands.

"IV. And becauſe divers tenants of lands for term of life and years, made over the ſaid lands to other under-tenants, to the end that they might not be liable to writs of waſte, for the damages done upon the ſaid lands by their order and connivance before the grant of the ſaid leaſes; it was hereupon enacted, that the tenant in reverſion might have his action againſt the tenant for life or years, for the damages done as well before as after the leaſe made to any under-tenants, and recover treble damages for the ſaid waſte, provided that it were proved that the ſaid firſt tenants took the profits of the land to their own proper uſe at the time of waſte done.

"V. Whereas divers ſuits and indictments, as well for the king as his ſubjects, were diſcontinued by making of new commiſſioners for the peace, to the great delay of juſtice, and wrong of the ſubject; it was enacted, that no pleas or proceſſes ſhould be diſcontinued by any new commiſſions; but the juſtices ſo made, ſhould have power and authority to continue all pleas depending, and determine the ſame.

"VI. An abuſe alſo being crept into the nation about meaſures contrary to the ſtatutes, and purveyors, bakers, merchants, and buyers of corn, taking nine buſhels for the quarter; it was enacted, that the ſtatutes for weights and meaſures ſhould be retained in every market-town, and that there ſhould be a buſhel, common balance, and weights in every market-town, city, or borough, kept by the mayor and juſtices thereof, according to the ſtandard in the Exchequer; and if any perſon ſhall preſume to ſell or buy by any other weights or meaſures, they ſhall forfeit five pounds to the perſon that ſhall ſue for it, and five pounds to the king.

"VII. Recognizors having found out the way to defeat the exactions of ſuch perſons as they were indebted to for recognizances, by bringing their writ "De corpus cum cauſa" out of chancery, and giving ſureties to the king only, are delivered out of priſon, and their creditors are defeated of their debts; it was therefore ordained, that ſureties ſhould be given as well to the party as to the king, that their debts may be ſurely paid."

In the parliament which ſat early in the year 1437, the ſixteenth of this reign, the following acts were paſſed.

"I. A remedy was provided againſt vexatious and troubleſome ſuits of ſuch perſons as were not of the king's houſhold, in the courts of ſtewards and marſhals in the king's houſe; and it was allowed as an exemption from their juriſdiction, to plead and aver that they are not of the king's houſe.

"II. An allowance was given to all the ſubjects of England to tranſport corn of low price out of the realm, realm, viz. wheat at ſix ſhillings and eight pence, and barley at three ſhillings and four pence the quarter.

"III. An injunction to all ſheriffs, bailiffs of franchiſes, and coroners, that in actions or writs of attaint of plea for land, of the yearly value of forty pounds, they do not return nor impannel any perſons but ſuch as be inhabitants in his bailiwic, and have an eſtate to their own uſe, in lands and tenements, to the yearly value of twenty pounds, or more, upon the penalty of forfeiting ten pounds to the king, and ten pounds to the plaintiffs in the ſaid actions or writs of attaint: and that no perſon of leſs ſufficiency of freehold than twenty pounds a year, ſhall be ſworn in the king's courts upon any iſſue in the ſaid actions, if he be for the ſame by the plaintiffs in due form challenged.

"IV. A permiſſion was given to all perſons, as well religious as ſecular, to appoint themſelves general attorneys, to ſue or plead for them in every hundred or wapentake. And,

"V. A prohibition was laid upon all merchants to ſhip, or cauſe to be ſhipped, any wool, woolfells, or any other merchandize belonging to the ſtaple, in any place within the realm, excepting the quays and wharfs appointed by ſtatute, where the king's weights and wools be ſet; excepting the merchants of Genoa, Venice, Tuſcany, Florence, and the burghers of Berwick."

In the Fœdera, vol. x. p. 661. we meet with the form of a naturalization granted by Henry VI. this year to Titus Livius of Ferrara, poet to Humphrey, duke of Gloceſter, the king's uncle, in ſubſtance, viz. "that he be received and taken in all reſpects as if he were a native of England; and ſhall be capable of holding any office or employment in England; may take or receive, buy or ſell, any lands, revenues, reverſions, advowſons, or other benefits, for him and his heirs; to have and plead all manner of actions, in all courts, in all reſpects like a natural-born ſubject." Than which a fuller naturalization can ſcarcely be penned in any words whatever.

In ſir Robert Cotton's Abridgment of the Records, p. 626, there is a ſecond inſtance or proof that the Engliſh people, even ſo early as the year 1440, underſtood the expediency of a navigation act (the former being under the year 1381), as the only means to preſerve to themſelves the benefit of being the ſole carriers of their own merchandize, and as much of thoſe of other nations as they could procure. It is a petition of the houſe of commons to the king Henry VI. requeſting "that no Italian, nor any other merchant beyond the Streight of Morocco (i. e. Gibraltar), ſhall bring any other merchandize into the realm than ſuch as are growing or produced in the ſame, their own reſpective countries;" and that for good reaſons in the record.

The anſwer of king Henry was, "The king will be adviſed;" (which every one knows to be a flat denial from the crown.) Whether the king's own weak judgment or (which is moſt likely) the bribes of the Italians to his worthleſs miniſters, produced this anſwer, is not perhaps eaſy to determine at this diſtance of time; but ſure the petition was wiſely intended, being the very ſubſtance of that enacted after the reſtoration of king Charles II. and ſtill in force, to the very great benefit of the nation.

A remarkable and wholeſome law was made in the twenty-third of king Henry VI. chap. vii. for reducing the number of attorneys at law in the two manufacturing counties of Norfolk and Suffolk: it takes notice, "that not long paſt there were not ſix or eight attorneys in both thoſe counties and the city of Norwich together, in which times great tranquility reigned there; whereas there were now more than fourſcore attorneys, moſt part of whom, not being of ſufficient knowlege, come to fairs, markets, and other public places, exhorting, procuring, moving, and inciting the people to ſuits for ſmall treſpaſſes, &c. wherefore there ſhall be but ſix attorneys for the county of Suffolk, ſix for Norfolk, and two for the city of Norwich."

In his thirty-ſecond year, an affair of a very extraordinary nature took up the attention of the parliament, then aſſembled at Reading. This was no leſs than the arreſting of Thorpe, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. The whole of this tranſaction, and the proceedings conſequent thereupon, we have thus related by Mr. Carte, from the records.

Thorpe was a baron of the Exchequer, and, as was repreſented by the duke of York's counſel, to the houſe of lords, had, in the laſt ſummer, ſeized, in Durham Place, and carried off the duke's harneſs and warlike habiliments, with other goods, to the value of two thouſand marks, againſt the ſaid duke's will and licence; who thereupon brought an action againſt him in Michaelmas term, for the inſult, in the court of Exchequer, agreeable to its privilege, Thorpe being a member thereof; and, after ſeveral hearings before a Middleſex jury, judgment was given againſt Thorpe in one thouſand pounds damages to the duke for his treſpaſs, and he was moreover committed to the Fleet priſon till he ſhould have made payment thereof, as alſo of his fine to the king for the breach of his peace. When this affair came to be argued, the duke's counſel inſiſted, "that as the treſpaſs had been committed by Thorpe not in parliament-time, but during the prorogation, and that if he ſhould be releaſed by privilege of parliament before the duke had ſatisfaction for his coſts and damages, the latter would be left without remedy; therefore that Thorpe ſhould be kept, according to law, in cuſtody till he ſhould give full ſatisfaction for the ſaid damages." The lords, out of tenderneſs for the privileges of the commons, and yet obliged to do juſtice to every one according to law, conſulted the judges on the ſubject; who, after a mature deliberation, anſwered, "that it did not belong to them to determine in any ways the privilege of parliament; but the houſe of lords was the proper judicature to determine ſuch privileges." The chief-juſtice, however, added in their name, "that, with regard to proceedings in the lower courts, in ſuch caſes as writs of Superſedeas and privilege of parliament, there were many of that kind brought into thoſe courts, but never any general Superſedeas for the ſurceaſe of all proceſſes; for if there were, it would look as if the high court of parliament, which miniſters all juſtice and equity, ſhould obſtruct the proceſs of common law, and put the party complainant without remedy, ſince actions at common law are not determined in parliament. But if any member of parliament were arreſted in caſes as neither for treaſon, felony, ſurety of the peace, nor for a condemnation had before the parliament, it was uſual in ſuch caſes for the member to be releaſed of his arreſt, and to conſtitute an attorney, that he might have his liberty freely to attend on the parliament." The lords hereupon adjudged, that Thorpe ſhould, according to law, remain in priſon, notwithſtanding his privilege as a member and ſpeaker of the parliament; and the commons were thereupon required to chuſe another ſpeaker, which they accordingly did.

In the parliament of 1460, the thirty-ninth of this king's reign, the following ſtatute was made, "that women being of the age of fourteen years at the time of the death of their anceſtors, ſhall, without queſtion or difficulty, have livery of their lands and tenements deſcended to them; for ſo the law of this land wills they ſhould have."

TAXES in the Reign of HENRY VI.

In the fourth year of his reign, the duke of Gloceſter then acting as regent, the parliament granted the king the ſubſidy of wool, namely, forty-three ſhillings and four pence on every ſack, from ſtrangers; and from denizens, thirty-three ſhillings and four pence: as alſo three ſhillings on every tun of wine, and twelve pence in the pound for all ſorts of merchandize imported or exported.

In his ſixth year, the parliament granted tonnage and poundage for two years; and of every pariſh within the realm, ſix ſhillings and eight pence for every twenty nobles in value; and ſix ſhillings and eight pence of every perſon that held immediately by knight's fee, or according to the rate.

A parliament held at Weſtminſter, in January, 1431, the tenth of his reign, by the duke of Gloceſter, keeper of England, gave the crown the grant of one tenth and one fifteenth, and of a third of both; a grant of tonnage and poundage for two years, with a ſubſidy of like value, of all merchant-ſtrangers, over and above the ſaid tonnage and poundage. The commons alſo granted the king, that every perſon holding a whole knight's fee, ſhould pay the king twenty ſhillings; and ſo according to the value, under or over: and ſo of the clergy, for lands purchaſed ſince the twentieth of Edward I. that all other perſons having any hereditaments to the value of twenty pounds, over all reprizes not holden as above, ſhall pay to the king, and ſo according to the rate.

In his twelfth year he had a grant of one tenth and one fifteenth, to be levied on the laity; as alſo three ſhillings on every tun of wine imported or exported; twelve pence in the pound on all merchandize ſold for two years, and a ſubſidy of fifty-three ſhillings and four pence on every ſack of wool for three years.

In his fourteenth, a parliament which met at Weſtminſter, on the tenth of October, granted the king a tenth and a fifteenth, deducting out of it four thouſand pounds for the relief of decayed towns and villages; alſo tonnage and poundage for two years; a ſubſidy of thirty-three ſhillings and four pence of merchant-denizens, and of forty-ſix ſhillings and eight pence of aliens, for every ſack of wool. They alſo granted, that every perſon having any freeholds in lands, annuities, fees, offices, or hereditaments, above five pounds yearly, ſhould pay for every pound ſix pence, upon his oath. There was alſo a parliament in the beginning of the year 1436, which met at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-firſt of January, and granted a tenth and fifteenth, and the like ſubſidy of wool for three years, as was granted in the former parliament.

In his eighteenth, a parliament met at Weſtminſter, on the twelfth of November, which granted the king one tenth and one fifteenth, to be levied on the laity; and the ſubſidy of thirty-three ſhillings and four pence from the denizens, and forty-ſix ſhillings and eight pence from aliens, for every ſack of wool; as alſo for tonnage and poundage, for which aliens were to pay ſeven ſhillings and eight pence. The commons alſo granted, that all aliens within the realm, who were not denizens, ſhould pay to the king ſixteen pence, if they were houſholders; and if they are not, then but ſix pence.

The parliament which met in 1446, granted the king a conſiderable ſubſidy, for a vigorous proſecution of the war in France, for which purpoſe they gave a tenth and an half, and a fifteenth and an half, except five thouſand pounds allowed to poor waſted towns; they alſo granted tonnage and poundage on denizens as before, but double on aliens; and a ſubſidy of thirty-four ſhillings and four pence on denizens, and fifty-three ſhillings on aliens, for every ſack of wool, for four years.

In his twenty-ſeventh year, his parliament granted him a tenth and a fifteenth; tonnage and poundage, for five years, of all merchants, with three ſhillings tonnage more of aliens; and the ſubſidy of wool for four years, as before. They alſo granted the king ſixteen pence to be taken of every houſholder within the realm not born in the king's dominions, and ſix pence of every other perſon not ſo born; and alſo ſix ſhillings and eight pence of every merchant-ſtranger, and twenty of all and every of their clerks.

In the year 1449, the twenty-ſeventh of his reign, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, from whence it was adjourned to Black-friars, London, by reaſon of the plague being in the fore-named place; and on the fourth of December it was adjourned back again to Weſtminſter, prorogued on the ſeventeenth to the twenty-ſecond of January, 1450, and on the thirtieth of March prorogued to the twenty-ninth of April, at Leiceſter. In this parliament the commons granted the king an annual ſubſidy, viz. "that every perſon having frank tenement by free deed, copy, grant of annuity, or office, to the clear yearly value of twenty ſhillings, ſhould pay ſix pence; and ſo to twenty pounds; from twenty pounds to two hundred pounds yearly, twelve pence in the pound; from two hundred pounds to pay two ſhillings for twenty ſhillings, as well for the laity as the clergy, guardians of wards, men having fees, and all corporations to pay accordingly."

On the ſeventeenth of March, 1453, a parliament ſat at Reading, and on the eighteenth was prorogued to the twentieth of April, at Weſtminſter, where it aſſembled accordingly; from thence, on the ſecond of July, it was prorogued to the ſeventh of November, at Reading, and from thence to the eleventh of February, 1454, at Weſtminſter: but notwithſtanding it appears that it met at Reading, whence it was adjourned to Weſtminſter; for on the fourteenth of February, in the firſt ſeſſion, the commons granted the king one tenth and an half and one fifteenth and an half, tonnage and poundage during life, the ſubſidy of wool, viz.

twenty-three ſhillings and four pence for every ſack of denizens, and five pounds of aliens; and ſo of other ſtaple ware in proportion. They alſo granted the king, of every merchant not born within the realm who was no denizen and kept houſe, forty ſhillings per annum; and of every ſuch merchant as ſhall remain within the realm but ſix weeks, twenty ſhillings; and of every merchant alien being no denizen, ſix pounds thirteen ſhillings and four pence yearly, during the king's life.

EDWARD IV.

THE moſt remarkable ſtatutes in this king's reign were the following.

In his third year the importation of woollen cloth, laces, ribbons, all ſorts of iron ware, and moſt other things manufactured in England, was ſtrictly forbidden. This ſtatute was farther enforced, eſpecially in regard to Engliſh wool, in the following year.

In his ſeventh year, a parliament meeting at Weſtminſter, on the third of June, or, according to others, the third of July, the king ſigned an act of reſumption, wherein he recalled into his own hands all the crown-lands granted away during his reign.

TAXES in the Reign of EDWARD IV.

In the third year of his reign his parliament granted him an aid of thirty-ſeven thouſand pounds, to be levied in the counties, cities, and towns. And, in the following year, the ſame parliament, which had been prorogued ſeveral times till the thirty-firſt of January, gave him tonnage and poundage for life; and of every Engliſh merchant for every ſack of wool, thirty-three ſhillings and four pence, of every two hundred and forty wool-fells the ſame, and of every laſt of hides three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight pence; of every merchant-ſtranger, denizen or otherwiſe, for every ſack of wool three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight pence, of every laſt of hides three pounds thirteen ſhillings and four pence, of every two hundred and forty wool-fells, three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight pence.

In his ſeventh year, the parliament at Weſtminſter paſſed the reſumption act, and alſo granted the king two tenths and two fifteenths.

In his eleventh year the commons granted that fourteen thouſand archers ſhould ſerve the king at their own charge, to be levied out of all men's lands, according to a certain proportion; and the lords ſpiritual and temporal granted towards the ſame the tenth part of one whole year's revenues of all and ſingular their poſſeſſions; and at a ſecond ſeſſion of the ſame parliament, the commons granted the king one tenth and one fifteenth.

In his thirteenth year they granted him one tenth and one fifteenth, and fifty-one thouſand, one hundred and ſeventy pounds four ſhillings and ſeven pence three farthings, in full payment of the wages of the fourteen thouſand archers granted before; towards the payment whereof every county, city, and town were ſeverally taxed.

In the beginning of the year 1482, the twenty-ſecond of his reign, a parliament, which met at Weſtminſter, gave the king a tenth and fifteenth, to be levied on the laity, except ſix thouſand pounds to be beſtowed on decayed towns. They alſo granted a yearly ſubſidy, to be levied on all ſtranger as well denizens as otherwiſe. They moreover allowed a yearly rent out of the cuſtoms and other revenues, to defray the king's houſhold expences, amounting to eleven thouſand pounds.

RICHARD III.

IN January, A. D. 1484, the ſecond of this king's uſurped reign, he held his firſt parliament at Weſtminſter, in which an act of attainder was paſſed againſt Henry, earl of Richmond, and all his adherents. The moſt remarkable ſtatutes enacted in this parliament were theſe:

"I. An act aboliſhing a new impoſition ſet on foot by Edward IV. called a benevolence.

"II. An act giving every juſtice of the peace power to admit a priſoner, arreſted for felony, to bail; and that no officer ſhall ſeize the goods of a priſoner arreſted for felony, till he is attainted.

"III. An act to ſettle the qualification of perſons to be impanelled upon juries; no one to be choſe but who hath twenty ſhillings freehold, or twenty-ſix ſhillings and eight pence copyhold, at leaſt.

"IV. An act for ſettling the ſtandard meaſures of wine and oil veſſels, as follow: that every tun ſhould hold two hundred and fifty-two gallons; a pipe, one hundred and twenty-ſix gallons; a tertian, eighty four gallons; an hogſhead, ſixty-three gallons; a barrel, thirty-one gallons and an half; a runlet, eighteen gallons and an half."

We meet with no other ſtatutes worth notice during this reign, nor was the ſubject loaded with any new impoſt, nowithſtanding the heavy outcries ſome hiſtorians have made on account of the exorbitant taxes this king laid on the nation: in this parliament, indeed, the commons continued to him, for his life, the ſubſidy of tonnage, poundage, wool, and hides, which they had granted in like manner to his brother Edward IV.

HENRY VII.

THE conſtitution of England, by the feodal law, was calculated plainly to govern the realm with a ſtanding army, of which the king was commander in chief; the barons, his field-officers; the knights, his ſubalterns; and all the other ſubjects, the common ſoldiers. While the kings of England had great hereditary countries and lands of their own, whilſt they were purſuing foreign conqueſts and ſubduing great nations, thoſe countries ſupplied England with manufactures, and many of the neceſſaries of life; and the people were too much abroad to feel their wants at home. The immenſe eſtates of the great barons, and their uncontrouled power over their vaſſals, kept them from feeling the miſeries of the inferior ſort; whilſt the vaſt prerogative which was lodged in the crown often times ſqueezed all the riches of thoſe barons into its own coffers. But the almoſt perpetual wars which the kings of England, upon their own accounts, and to preſerve their hereditary dominions on the continent, were obliged to carry on with the kings of France, Scotland, and other potentates, made the barons ſometimes of ſuch importance, as to diſpute their attendance, and by degrees to emancipate themſelves from the rigours of the feodal conſtitution, as both the king and the nation ſeverely felt till the days of Henry VII. That wiſe prince made uſe of the circumſtances of the times he reigned in, to encourage encourage commerce and agriculture, and to raiſe the middling ſtate of the ſubjects as the only ballance againſt the dangerous power of the barons. In this he was greatly aſſiſted by the ſituation in which the barons found themſelves: they had juſt begun to breathe from a long and bloody war, which had emptied their veins and exhauſted their eſtates; they wanted to enjoy the ſweets of peace, but found themſelves without the means to do it on account of the vaſt debts they had contracted.

But Henry, to ſmooth the way for removing thoſe difficulties, ſeemed to part with an uſeleſs prerogative of his crown, by paſſing an act giving leave for all barons and great land holders, who ſhould attend him, to alienate their eſtates, or ſell or otherwiſe mortgage or diſpoſe of the ſame, without paying for fines or licences of alienation. This act following a great benevolence very unconſtitutionally granted by parliament, and which muſt have proved very prejudicial for many of the landed intereſt to have complied with, and the thing itſelf being popular, we know no oppoſition made to it by the great barons*.

A legal though dangerous cramp to the liberty of the ſubject was projected, encouraged, and at laſt enacted by this prince, almoſt in the very beginning of his reign: for under pretence that the channels of juſtice, by unlawful maintenances, giving of liveries, miſbehaviour of ſheriffs, and a number of other cauſes, were corrupted, the authority of the court of Star Chamber was now ſet up. The officers who conſtituted this court were, the chancellor and treaſurer of England, for the time being, and the keeper of the privy-ſeal, or two of them, calling to them a biſhop and a temporal lord of the king's moſt honourable council, and the two chief-juſtices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas for the time being, or other two juſtices in their abſence. Their powers "were (as appears by the words of the ſtatute, 3 Hen. VII.) to proceed upon bill, or information, that to the ſaid chancellor, for the king, or any other, againſt any perſon for miſbehaving, to call before them, by writ or by privy-ſeal, the ſaid miſdoers, and they, and others by their diſcretion, by whom the truth may be known, to examine; and ſuch as they find therein defective, to puniſh them after their demerits, after the form and effect of the ſtatutes thereof made, in like manner and form as they ſhould, and ought to be puniſhed, if they were thereof convict after the due order of laws." Thus the reader may perceive that the moſt valuable privileges of Engliſhmen, of not being taken or impriſoned but by the law of the land, or the judgment of their peers, was ſet aſide.

But this inſtitution, or, as lord Bacon will have it, re-creation, of the Star Chamber, who makes it of a date much more early than is to be found upon the rolls, or records of parliament, was far from completing the great civil ſcheme, which Henry had projected, of humbling the great men, ſo terrible to the crown, and enhancing the conſequence of the commoners. He obſerved, that many ſalutary laws had been made by parliament, but that the over-grown powers of his great men, by neglecting the obſervance of thoſe laws, had brought many of them into ſuch diſuſe, that they were now as if they never had been. It was, for example, the law of the land, "that if any man be ſlain in the day, and the felon not taken, the townſhip where the death or murder is done, ſhall be amerced: and if any man be wounded, and in peril of death, the party that ſo wounded ſhall be arreſted, and put in ſurety till perfect knowlege be had whether the perſon ſo hurt ſhould live or die." But thoſe excellent inſtitutions, with that of the coroner's duty upon ſuch an occaſion, had fallen into ſuch diſuſe, that murder was every day committed with impunity; for whilſt the protection that great men gave to their retainers exiſted, it was dangerous or impoſſible for the officers of juſtice to attach the perſon of any malefactor. Thus the courſe of civil juſtice was obſtructed, and the hopes of impunity made all who had ambition, revenge, or any other paſſion to gratify againſt their neighbours, to enliſt them as retainers, or dependents of great men. Henry therefore revived, reinforced, and renewed the old laws againſt murderers and felons, as the moſt proper way for bringing them to the puniſhment of the law, and withdrawing them from the protection of the great.

The parliament alſo paſſed an act, by which it was ordered "that the coroner, upon the view of a dead body, ſhould, according to the former acts, enquire of him or them that had done that deed or murder; of their abettors and conſentors, and who were preſent when that death or murder was done, whether man or woman, and the names of them that were preſent; and ſo bound to enrol and certify." But this was not enough for rooting out this pernicious practice of murder: it appears by the common law, a felony could not determine at the king's ſuits within a year and a day after a death or murder, for ſaving of the party-ſuit. That the firſt edge of reſentment being taken off in the proſecutor, his eagerneſs was abated, his proſecution was often times a ſeeking revenge in cold blood, and few were found who proſecuted with the ſame earneſtneſs twelve months after the crime had been committed, that they would have done immediately after ſuch commiſſion: we may add to theſe reaſons, which are expreſſed in the act of parliament, another not there expreſſed, which is, that ſuch a delay gave the great men, who were perhaps at the bottom of thoſe murders, an opportunity of interpoſing and making matters up, to the infinite prejudice of the public juſtice; but it was now enacted, that "if any man be ſlain or murdered; and therefore the ſlayers, murderers, or abettors, manſlayers, and comforters of the ſame be indicted; that the ſame ſlayers and murderers, and all other acceſſaries to the ſame, be arraigned and determined of the ſame felony and murder, at any time, at the king's ſuit, within the year after the ſame felony and murder done, and not tarry the year and a day for any appeal to be taken for the ſame felony or murder. And if it happened that any perſon named as principal or acceſſary to be acquited of any ſuch murder, at the king's ſuit within the year and a day, that then the ſame juſtices aforeſaid, by whom he is acquitted, ſhall not ſuffer him to go at large, but either remit him again to priſon, or elſe to let him to bail, after their diſcretion, till that year and a day be paſſed. And if it fortune that the ſame felons or murderers, and acceſſaries, ſo arraigned, or any of them, to be acquit, or the principal of the ſaid felony, or any of them, to be attained, the wife, or next heir, to him that is ſlain, as ſhall require, may take and have their appeal of the ſame death and murder, within the year and day after the ſaid felony or murder done, againſt the ſaid perſon ſo arraigned, and acquit, and all other their acceſſaries againſt the ſaid principals ſo attainted, if they be alive, and the benefit of his clergy thereof before not had: and that the appellant have ſuch and like advantage as if the ſaid acquitance or attainder had not been the ſaid acquital or attainder notwithſtanding."

A kind of civil rapes upon women of property were none of the leaſt frequent conſequences of the power of the great men; and it was a common way of rewarding their followers by aſſiſting or protecting them in ſuch violences: it was therefore to put a ſtop to ſo enormous an abuſe that this ſame parliament made an act, "That whatever perſon or perſons from henceforth that taketh any woman againſt her will unlawfully, that is to ſay, maid, widow, or wife, that ſuch taking, procuring, and abetting the ſame, and alſo receiving willingly the ſame woman ſo taken againſt her will, and knowing the ſame, ſhall be felony."

We find another act of the ſame parliament, according to the act of Richard III. concerning the power which juſtices had in admitting priſoners, committed for felony to bail. By this act, the juſtices of peace who took bail, were obliged to certify the ſame at the next general ſeſſions of peace or next goal-delivery of the county, city, or town; and the ſheriff was to certify the names of all the priſoners in his cuſtody, to the juſtices of goal-delivery. Thus the act of Richard III. giving authority and power in the premiſſes to any juſtice by himſelf, was repealed.

The other remarkable ſtatutes enacte this time, were the following.

"I. That if any of the king's ſervants, under the degree of a lord, did conſpire the death of the king, or any of the king's council, or lord of the realm, as the lord-ſteward, treaſurer, or comptroller, it ſhould be felony." This law was thought to be procured by the chancellor, Morton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who, being unamiable in his private manners and extremely obnoxious to almoſt all the great men of Henry's court, provided this act for his own ſafety.

"II. An Act for making void all deeds of gift made to defraud creditors.

"III. An act awarding coſts to the plaintiff, where the defendant ſueth a writ of error before execution had *."

The parliament which met in the beginning of the year 1490, the ſixth of Henry's reign, paſſed an act which ſhews the conſiſtency and firmneſs of Henry's policy at home. It was founded upon a ſtatute made under Edward I. by which it was ordained, "That notes and fines to be levied in the king's court before his juſtices, ſhould be openly and ſolemnly read; and that both pleas in the mean time ſhould ceaſe; and this to be done two days in the week, after the diſcretion of the juſtices." But the ſtatute now enacted ſays, "That fines ought to be a final end and concluſion." The contrary practice had ſome time before prevailed, to the great trouble of the Engliſh ſubjects; it was therefore enacted, "That, after the engroſſing of every fine to be levied, after the feaſt of Eaſter that ſhall be in the year of our Lord 1490, in the king's court, before his juſtices of the Common Pleas, of any lands, tenements, or other hereditaments, the ſame fine be openly and ſolemnly read and proclaimed in the ſaid court, the ſame term, and in three terms the next following the ſame engroſſing in the ſame court, at four ſeveral days in every term; and in the ſame time that it is ſo read and proclaimed, all pleas to ceaſe:" ſome exceptions of minors, married women, and ſuch others, are inſerted in the ſtatute. Thus Henry in ſome reſpect gave his ſubjects the ſame right to their eſtates that he had to his crown, thereby engrafting upon the Engliſh conſtitution, and even tenor of government, and reſtoring the peaceable poſſeſſion of eſtates. This admirable law prevented and ſhut the door upon that dreadful litigiouſneſs which civil commotion introduced, and which the ſucceſs of the one or the other party which the claimant favoured, always revived and encouraged.

During the ſeſſion of the ſame parliament we meet with a proclamation, which, by act of parliament, every juſtice of peace was to take care ſhould be proclaimed four times yearly in four principal ſeſſions within the county where he acted. This proclamation complains bitterly of the remiſſneſs of juſtices of the peace in doing their duty; it takes notice, that by their remiſſneſs riots, murder, and other enormities were occaſioned, to the great prejudice of agriculture, the great ſtay and ſupport of the land, the upholder of the Engliſh church, and the fund for the payment of the landlords rent: it is therefore decreed, "That if any perſon ſhall be baulked in his ſuit, or aggrieved, that they may have an appeal to the next neighbouring juſtice, from him to the juſtices of aſſize; and if he find no remedy there, to the king himſelf or his chancellor. In this caſe the juſtice is to be ſtruck out of the commiſſion, and further puniſhed according to his demerits."

The other remarkable ſtatutes enacted in this parliament were,

"I. That benefit of clergy ſhall be allowed but once; and that perſons convicted of murder, ſhall be marked with an M upon the brawn of the left thumb, and other felons with a T.

"II. That no butcher kill any manner of beaſt within the walls of London, on pain of forfeiting for every ox twelve pence, and for a cow and every other beaſt eight pence; this to extend to every city, borough, and walled town within the realm of England, Berwick and Carliſle excepted." There were ſome other laws then made, which are either repealed or of ſmall conſequence.

In the eighth year of his reign an act paſſed, by which the barons and gentlemen of landed intereſt were at liberty to ſell and mortgage their lands, without fines or licences for the alienation; and that likewiſe they ſhould have their own liveries, and authority to diſpoſe of the wardſhips of their heirs: but this act was confined only to thoſe who ſhould enter into the army; and nothing could be better calculated than it was, not only for the purpoſes already mentioned, but for Henry's great and favourite ſcheme in breaking the tenures and dependencies upon the landed intereſt. For luxury and vanity were become as it were neceſſary to the Engliſh for the enjoyment of life. Thoſe vices had been begun, continued, and encouraged by Edward IV. the ſhort reign of Richard III. could not, but Henry (though he did not practiſe them in his own perſon) did encouraged them at his court. The great debts the nobility had contracted, rather encreaſed than weakened the dependency, as long as it was out of their power, without the king's licence, and without paying exorbitant fines, to diſpoſe of their lands for diſcharging them. This act in ſome meaſure took off this check. The prodigal, the brave, and the adventurous ruſhed precipitately into extravagance; ſome through motives of luxury, and others of ambition; whilſt the induſtrious commons made every day freſh acquiſitions of the landed intereſt, and thereby threw an additional weight into the ſcale, which Henry wanted to ſupport and help to preponderate. Some other military acts paſſed in the ſame parliament, particularly a kind of mutiny bill; for every captain whoſe muſters were not complete, or who defrauded his ſoldiers of their legal pay, was to forfeit all his goods and chattels to the king, and his body to the priſon. By another clauſe of the ſame act, all deſerters were adjudged to be guilty of felony without benefit of clergy: the captain was likewiſe, if in the land ſervice, to make a return of all ſoldiers who ſhould die or deſert, within ten days after ſuch deaths or deſertions, to the paymaſter of the forces; or if in the marine ſervice, to the admiral of the navy. By another act of this ſeſſion, every officer and ſoldier of the army ſerving beyond ſea, or on the ſea, was protected; and he had power by his writing to make his attorney enter upon lands deſcended unto him.

The parliament which met towards the end of the year 1495, after a long prolongation, enacted a law which is well deſerving the attention of every Engliſh reader. This act was founded upon a reflection of the dreadful ſituation in which the people of England muſt have found themſelves had Henry himſelf not ſucceeded, and had Richard been victorious. The act itſelf was built upon a maxim ſo ſimple and plain, that it could not be miſtaken or miſrepreſented by the meaneſt or moſt ignorant of his ſubjects: it was, "that the poſſeſſion of the throne points out the king." This was the principle upon which the parliament made the following law: "That none who ſhall attend upon the king for the time being, no matter whether he was ſo in fact or in right, or in both, doing true ſervice, ſhould be attainted or forfeit any thing." And to this act it was added, "That if any act or acts, or other proceſs of law, hereafter made thereupon for the ſame, happen to be made contrary to this ordinance, that then that act or acts, or other proceſs of the law whatſoever they ſhall be, ſtand and be utterly void; provided always, that no perſon or perſons ſhall take any benefit or advantage, who ſhall hereafter decline from their ſaid allegiance."

To explain the true meaning and occaſion of this act, it is proper to conſider the circumſtances of things and the ſituation of the kingdom at the time it paſſed. The feudal law and cuſtoms, agreeable to which all tenures of knight's ſervice were regulated, prevailed in England at that time; and the great lords, who held their lands immediately of the crown, on the condition of ſerving the king in his wars, and other ſervices, granted out parcels of thoſe lands to under-vaſſals, holding of themſelves under the like obligations and ſervice; theſe vaſſals were bound to follow the meſne-lord, or (as he is termed in ſtatute 12 Henry VII. cap. 7.) their immediate ſovereign, in his hoſtings (or arrays); and if they neglected to attend him in the field, even when he fought againſt the crown, they forfeited their tenures, and their lands were confiſcated to the uſe of their immediate lord. Hence aroſe the great power of the ancient barons, who, in the days of Henry III. and in latter reigns, were able to make head againſt the crown in the field, having, in proportion to their eſtates, a powerful body of vaſſals, obliged, by their tenures on pain of forfeiture, to follow them in their riſings, and farther engaged ſo to do by the ſacred tye of their oaths of fealty taken in their lords courts. It had always been Henry's view, from the beginning of his reign, to depreſs the power of the great lords; but as there was danger in attempting it too openly, he choſe to do it in the way of ſap, by means the true deſign whereof was ſcarce perceivable; as by allowing them freely to alienate their eſtates; and by this act juſtifying all perſons (and their vaſſals among the reſt) that ſhould ſerve him in his wars, and ſecuring them abſolutely from all forfeitures on that account, whatever conduct their immediate lords obſerved. This leſſening the dependence of vaſſals upon thoſe lords, ſeems to have been calculated for the ſame purpoſes, as ſome late acts for diminiſhing or taking away the vaſſalage of the Highland clans in Scotland to their ſuperiors; but if it was one part of Henry's view in this, it was not the only end he propoſed to anſwer.

For though Henry thought that the above act was a ſufficient ſecurity for his ſubjects to ſtand by him, yet he wanted a farther ſecurity for himſelf: for though it is declared in general terms, that the poſſeſſion of the crown implies allegiance, yet there is no ſpecification of the caſes that require this allegiance to call the ſubjects into the field, neither is there any penalty upon a man who does not attend. But Henry made a diſtinction among his ſubjects, between thoſe who owed him allegiance, and thoſe who with allegiance owed him ſervice, which laſt rank included all placemen, that is, ſuch perſons who had from the crown promotions or advancement, as grants and gifs of office, fees, and annuities. It was therefore enacted, "That if ſuch do not attend the king, when he ſhall fortune to go in the wars in his perſon, in their ſaid perſons, as their duty bindeth them, that then they, and every of them, making thereof default (the king's ſpecial licence not had, or elſe he have ſuch unfeigned ſickneſs, letting, or diſeaſe that he may not in perſon come to do his perſonal attendance and ſervice, after the form aforeſaid, and that duly proved), that then every ſuch perſon or perſons forfeit and loſe their ſaid offices and annuities, and to ſtand void at the king's pleaſure, any act, ſtatute, or ordinance to the contrary, before this time had or made, in anywiſe notwithſtanding. Provided that this act extend not to any ſpiritual peers, or maſter of the Rolls, nor to any other officer and clerks of the Chancery, juſtices of either bench, barons of the king's Exchequer, and other officers and clerks of the ſaid places, the king's attorney and ſolicitor, and the ſerjeants of the law." But notwithſtanding both thoſe acts, it is certain that Henry thereby took from his ſubjects that determined zeal with which they had hitherto fought, ſince their ſafety no longer depended upon their ſwords, but was inſured by an act of parliament.

In this parliament it was ordained, "That a weight and a meaſure of each kind in uſe, according to the ſtandard of the Exchequer, ſhould be ſent unto every city and borough, and that no commodity ſhould be bought or ſold but with ſuch weights as were ſtamped or ſealed."

There was likewiſe a ſtandard weight and meaſure conſigned into the hands of the repreſentatives of eight-and-twenty cities, towns, and corporations, there to remain, and to be appealed unto upon occaſion. This parliament was likewiſe diſtinguiſhed by a ſtrain of public ſpirit which has ſince been of vaſt uſe to England; for it prohibited the exportation of any horſe, without a licence from the king, and of any mare which was not three years old, and above the value of ſix ſhillings and eight pence, which the government was obliged to pay to the owner in caſe of being ſeized. The parliament afterwards, in this ſeſſion, paſſed an act "That no alienation by the wife of the inheritance of her deceaſed huſband, ſhould be valid; but that a woman may alienate her lands for the term of her life." This parliament likewiſe enacted, "That an attaint ſhould be attainable againſt a petty jury upon a falſe verdict between party and party; but with this exception, that the act ſhould not extend to capital cauſes; for there the virdict of the jury was to be final and irremediable, except by the king's prerogative, if the party was caſt." Lord Bacon upon this obſerves, that ſuch caſes were, for the moſt part, at the king's ſuit; and that if they are followed in courſe of indictment, there are properly two juries, one to find the bill and the other to try the priſoner: add to this, that matters of life and death where a jury is liable to any penalty for acquitting a priſoner, it might occaſion a perpetual warping towards ſeverity, and would diſcourage the ſubjects from the office. Another caſe, wherein this law did not take place, is where the ſum tried did not exceed forty pounds; becauſe ſuch ſums could not bear the charges of farther trial. To this parliament was likewiſe owing the act of admitting poor ſuitors, in forma pauperis, to ſue in courts without paying fees for any writs they ſhould have out of Chancery, and having counſel and attorneys aſſigned to them without paying for the ſame.

On the ſixteenth of January, 1504, a parliament was held at Weſtminſter, in which Dudley, one of the deteſted inſtruments of Henry's mercenary oppreſſions, was choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons. The principal buſineſs of this ſeſſion was to give a farther blow to the power of liveries and retainers. A greater penalty was now enacted for giving or taking any livery, or for retaining or being retained with another, during the king's life. "Hereupon (ſays an excellent author), is a ſtrange power given to ſummon upon a mere ſuſpicion; to proceed, without information, to examine the defendant upon oath, and to make him his own accuſer; to puniſh according to diſcretion, by fine and impriſonment: and thus the king and his council have gotten a power, under colour of liveries and retainers, to bring the whole kingdom to be of their livery; or elſe they can ſuſpect whom they pleaſe, apprehend whom they ſuſpect, put him preſently to the rack of confeſſion, and ſo into priſon till he hath ſatisfied both diſpleaſure and jealouſy, and even covetouſneſs itſelf. Never was England before now in ſo low a degree of thraldom, bound under a double knot of ſelf-accuſing and arbitrary cenſure."

In the ſame parliament it was enacted, "That all perſons having gifts or patents, ſhould forfeit the ſame if they did not attend the king, upon lawful ſummons, whenever he took the field in perſon, either at home or abroad, for the ſafety of his crown and defence of his kingdom." This act was ſupplemental to the act formerly made, by which the like penalty was impoſed upon thoſe who held places, and did not give the like attendance; but neither of thoſe acts have any retroſpect.

By the ſame act it is provided, "That all perſons repairing to the king's ſtandard, upon ſummons, ſhall receive pay according to their degree; nor does that act extend to clergymen or lawyers, nor to any who held mortgages from the crown.

Great abuſes had been committed with regard to the coinage; and among others complained of, was the practice of bringing Iriſh coin into England, and of clipping and counterfeiting the Engliſh coin, eſpecially ſilver. It was therefore enacted, "That no clipped or diminiſhed money ſhould be current in payment, but that the ſame might be brought to the king's mint, there to be changed for new coined groats and two-pences." Our hiſtorians ſay, that this act brought vaſt ſums into Henry's coffers.

A ſtatute was likewiſe made againſt importing certain manufactures of ſilk, ſuch as ribbons, laces, girdles, and points, the ſame being now manufactured in England; but encouraging the importation of raw ſilk, as the materials for the ſaid manufactures. This act does not extend to large pieces of ſilks, there being no ſuch manufacture then in England. Lord Bacon obſerves, that it was founded upon a right principle in commerce, that where foreign materials are but ſuperfluities, foreign manufactures ſhould be prohibited; for that will either gain the manufacture, or baniſh the ſuperfluity. The next act of importance in this ſeſſion, was that concerning gaols: it had been a common practice, during the civil wars, for the great men to have places within their caſtles which they uſed in the nature of gaols, in which they impriſoned and ranſomed at their own pleaſure. But this practice was now aboliſhed. It was enacted, "That the ſheriff of each county ſhould have the keeping of all gaols, except all gaols whereof any perſon or perſons, ſpiritual or temporal, or body corporate, have the keeping, of eſtate or inheritance, or by ſucceſſion; and all letters patent for the keeping of any gaols were reſumed and void."

During this ſeſſion, an act was made to regulate the making of ſtatutes by incorporate bodies. It had, it ſeems, been a practice for maſters and wardens of fellowſhips and corporations to make acts, which were not only inconſiſtent with the laws of the land, but held by them to be compulſive upon the ſubject, and thereby they very often reſtrained ſuits in the king's courts. It was therefore enacted, "That no maſter and wardens of fellowſhips ſhould make any new ordinances without the conſent of the chancellor, or the treaſurer, or the chief-juſtices, tices, or the juſtices of aſſize within the ſame county."

This was not the only act that bore hard upon ſmall corporations in this parliament. An abuſe had prevailed all over England, of extorting a tax called ſeawage, or ſchewage, upon all goods vended within a borough or other corporation. This tax had originally been impoſed upon merchants aliens, but was now extended to natural born ſubjects. An act was therefore now made, aboliſhing this tax upon the natives throughout all England, excepting within the city of London.

The laſt act which we have occaſion to take notice of, in this parliament, concerns vagabonds and unlawful games, and the ſuppreſſing common tippling ale-houſes; abuſes which are all linked together. Proper officers and perſons were appointed for puniſhing, but not by impriſoning, all vagabonds in proportion as they repeated their offences. The playing at games was reſtricted to perſons of certain quality and ſtanding; and two juſtices of the peace had it in their power to ſuppreſs any notorious common tippling ale-houſe.

We ſhall cloſe this ſketch of the laws of Henry VII. with a few obſervations taken from the lord Bacon's character of that prince. "In that part both of juſtice and policy which is the durable part, and cut as it were in braſs and marble, which is the making of good laws, he did excel. His laws he did much maintain and countenance, which nevertheleſs was no impediment to him in working his will; for it was ſo handled, that neither prerogative nor profit went to diminution, and yet, as he would ſometimes ſtrain up his laws to his prerogative, ſo would he alſo let down his prerogative to his parliament."

Taxes in the Reign Henry VII.

In the firſt parliament of this king the taxes granted were as follow: 1. Tonnage, which was three ſhillings on every tun of wine of denizens, and ſix ſhillings of aliens. 2. Poundage, that is, one ſhilling in the pound for all merchandizes imported or exported, except tin, for which aliens were to pay two ſhillings. 3. The ſubſidy of wool and wool-fells, which was thirty-three ſhillings and four pence of denizens, and of aliens three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight pence for every ſack of wool, and for every two hundred and forty wool-fells; and for every laſt of hides denizens were to pay three pounds ſix ſhillings and eight pence, and aliens three pounds thirteen ſhillings and four pence. The clergy at the ſame time granted the king a tenth.

In the fifth year of his reign, the commons voted him ſeventy-five thouſand pounds, to make good his engagements with the ducheſs of Brittany; and for raiſing this ſum they granted a tenth of the yearly value and profits of all honours, caſtles, manors, rents, lands, fees, annuities, offices, and penſions, to whomſoever belonging (except lords of parliament, who likewiſe granted a tenth of all their lands, fees, offices, and penſions); and laid a tax upon perſonal eſtates, at the rate of twenty pence for every ten marks of goods, and upwards in proportion: but this producing only twenty-ſeven thouſand pounds, the commons, to make up the deficiency, gave the king a fifteenth, with a requeſt that he would accept thereof, and remit the reſidue of the ſeventy-five thouſand pounds voted for the ſupply. This Henry conſented to; and the commons were ſo pleaſed with his complaiſance, that the next year they granted him another fifteenth of their goods and chattels.

In the year 1492, the eighth of his reign, having publicly declared his intention of heading his army in perſon againſt France, under pretence that the ſupplies were not ſufficient for the ſervice, he ſent, of his own authority, commiſſioners into every county, to extort money from the ſubject by way of Benevolence, a practice firſt ſet on foot by king Edward IV. but which Richard III. had got aboliſhed by act of parliament. Archbiſhop Morton, the chancellor, is ſaid to have been the adviſer of this illegal taxation; and the lord Bacon relates, that he at the ſame time made uſe of this dilemma in his inſtructions to the commiſſioners (which was commonly called Morton's Fork or Crutch), "That if they met with any who were ſparing, they ſhould tell them they muſt needs have, becauſe they laid up; and if they were ſpenders, they muſt needs have, becauſe it was viſible in their manner of living; declaring that the largeneſs or ſmallneſs of the ſums they gave, would ſerve the king for an infallible rule to diſtinguiſh who were his friends, and who were diſaffected to his government*." By theſe arts immenſe ſums were raiſed all over the kingdom, and near ten thouſand pounds from the city of London alone. Henry's avarice being not yet ſatisfied, he obtained from the parliament, that met towards the latter end of this year, a grant of two fifteenths of perſonal eſtates.

The next extraordinary tax we meet with under this reign (for there were many petty ones intervening) was in his twelfth year, when the two houſes, upon a heavy complaint of the Scots breach of the ſeven years truce, and late invaſion of the realm, voted a ſupply of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds (a greater ſum than had ever been granted on ſuch an occaſion) for the war with Scotland. The way of raiſing it, was by a grant of two fifteenths, and by a ſubſidy, as well on all cities, boroughs, and towns not chargeable to thoſe fifteenths, who were to be aſſeſſed to the amount of both, as on all freeholders and copyholders having twenty ſhillings a year, and others that were worth ten marks in goods. The colleges of Oxford, Cambridge, and Eton were exempted from this taxation; which was not to be levied if the king, or his lieutenant, did not march with an army, or if a peace or truce was made, in which caſes the levies were to be ſuſpended. This enormous impoſition, and the unmerciful manner of collecting it, raiſed a dangerous inſurrection among the inhabitants of the Weſt, as we have already ſhewn in the hiſtory of this king's reign.

In January, 1504, the nineteenth of his reign, he called a parliament, in order to procure an equivalent for two ancient aids due to the crown, on account of the knighting the king's eldeſt ſon, and the marriage of his eldeſt daughter; (the dignity of knighthood he had conferred on his elder ſon Arthur, lately deceaſed; and had beſtowed his daughter Margaret on James IV. of Scotland.) The commons, meanly obſequious to his will, deſired him to accept forty thouſand pounds in lieu of thoſe aids; but Henry, amazed at the largeneſs of the ſum, out of his abundant grace, and to gain the love of his ſubjects, remitted ten thouſand pounds of the money, that the poor might not be charged with it; and the reſt was levied upon all cities, boroughs, and towns (thoſe not uſed to pay it, included) and on all perſons who had either a real eſtate of twenty ſhillings a year, or a perſonal one of ten marks, throughout the kingdom. The lands and tenements of the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge were exempted from this tax, which was levied by an aſſeſſment of ſpecific ſums upon each county, the whole amounting to thirty-one thouſand two hundred and forty-eight pounds and nine pence; out of which, two hundred and forty-one pounds ſix ſhillings was to be deducted for the fees and wages of the collectors.

Thus did this prince, through the moſt inſatiable thirſt for money that ever diſgraced a royal breaſt, oppreſs his ſubjects to fill his coffers. Henry had no view but to get money; and it was indifferent to him by what means: this made him unfeelingly traffick with the blood and treaſure of his people, loading them with taxes, and ſeizing all opportunities of ruining them by exceſſive fines: all which were, towards the latter end of his reign collected by thoſe execrable tools Empſon and Dudley, who left no nerve of villany unſtrained to drain the helpleſs victims of their maſter's avarice to the laſt drop. Theſe two inſtruments of Henry's being lawyers in ſcience, and privy-counſellors in authority, "turned (to uſe lord Bacon's words, and better I cannot uſe) law and juſtice into wormwood and rapine." They, who introduced arbitrary and unuſual methods of informations and proceedings, and revived every penal law, wherein they ſpared none, great or ſmall, nor conſidered whether the law was poſſible or impoſſible, in uſe or abſolete; and, after ſuffering the accuſed parties to languiſh long in priſon, without admitting them to traverſe the charges according to law, they, by various artificial terrors and devices, extorted from them great fines and ranſoms, which they termed compoſitions and mitigations." Nothing can be more melancholy than the repreſentation which this noble author gives of the miſeries of the people for fourteen years together, that theſe proſecutions were carried on; but neither their cries nor their ſufferings cauſed any relenting in Henry's heart; avarice, at once the meaneſt and the worſt of crimes, ſtifled in him every other ſentiment: he baſked in the ſpoils of the ruined, and ſtuck at nothing to amaſs an immenſe treaſure, which he was at length obliged to leave behind him, to be ſquandered away by his ſon and ſucceſſor.

The old debts of the towns of Harfleur and Calais — of the king's wardrobe and houſhold — of the clerk of the king's ſhips — and of the clerk of the king's works — for the arrears of annuities, or yearly ſalaries — to the executors of Henry IV's will for diſcharging his debts — and laſtly for the preſent king's debts when prince of Wales.

" This account was laid before the king, at Lambeth, by the lord-treaſurer of England, in the preſence of the archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſundry other lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the great officers of the crown."

State of ARTS, SCIENCES, and COMMERCE, in the XVth Century.

IF we are to believe many writers, and particularly archbiſhop Nicholſon, in his Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, and baron Holberg, in his Introduction to Univerſal Hiſtory, this century was one of the moſt rude and illiterate: "Learning (ſays the latter author) was looked upon as a ſort of hereſy." There were even biſhops who did not ſo much as know their letters; and in ſome of their ſubſcriptions to ſynodical acts the following words are to be found, viz. "As I cannot read myſelf, N. N. hath ſubſcribed for me:" or, "As my lord biſhop cannot write himſelf, at his requeſt I have ſubſcribed."

All which, with reſpect to the ignorance of many, or even of moſt, of the clergy, may very probably be true; nevertheleſs, there are many viſible traces to be diſcovered of the increaſe of real knowlege within the compaſs of this century; and in particular the noble art of Printing, which was not only invented, but brought to perfection, much about the ſame time with the moſt uſeful invention of rag-paper. William Caxton, citizen and mercer of London, an ingenious man, being ſent, in the year 1464, ambaſſador from Edward IV. to the duke of Burgundy, at great labour and expence learned the art of Printing, and introduced it into this kingdom about 1474: he ſet up a preſs at Weſtminſter, and was greatly encouraged in the art by Margaret, ducheſs of Burgundy, king Edward's ſiſter. The monaſteries ſoon purchaſed the invention, and it was exerciſed at Oxford, Cambridge, St. Alban's, and other places. This noble art diſſeminated freſh ſeeds of knowlege, which were continually labouring for birth. The incomparable ſcience of Algebra alſo began to be known in this country; a ſcience which has proved extremely uſeful in ſome calculations relating to certain branches of commerce, and probably the foundation of the excellent method of merchants accounts by double-entry, commonly called Italian Book-keeping.

This century can moreover boaſt of ſundry other improvements for regulating and rectifying coin, and of the intereſt of money, all which, though not ſo perfectly well underſtood as in more modern times, were however more ſo than in any former century.

Engraving on wood and metal was introduced into England in this century by the famous Albert Durer: Etching was alſo diſcovered very near as early. We need not add, that both of theſe neceſſarily produced rolling-preſs printing.

Geographical maps were firſt brought into England by Bartholomew Columbus, in the year 1489: and the ſtudy of this ſcience began daily to gain ground, through the great encouragement given by Henry VII. to perſons of an adventuring ſpirit.

Painting was in this century greatly improved, and the art of perſpective and clair obſcure began now to animate the canvas, and diffuſe juſtneſs and propriety through all the works of the pencil.

Sculpture, which is a more limited art, and eaſier to be attained, was in this century likewiſe carried to ſome degree of perfection.

Muſic was as yet rude, nor was it thoroughly cultivated till after the ſixteenth century; but even in the ſtate it was at the period we now treat of, we have the ſtrongeſt reaſon to imagine that it was very far ſuperior to that of the Greeks, as they have left no monument of this art, by which we can gather that they ſung in parts.

We find, in the Collection of Public Acts, an annuity or ſalary granted by Henry VII. to his poet laureat, Bernard Andreas (or Andrews) of ten marks yearly (or about ſix pounds modern money); a ſad inſtance of the low eſteem in which poetry was held in thoſe times.

As to architecture, it was ſtill in a very low ſtate; the hand of induſtry had not yet changed our ſorry wooden dwellings into ſumptuous palaces; the thatched roofs and mud walls ſtill remained in the ſtreets of London; and the manner of living among the people in general, was coarſe, hard, and indelicate. The greateſt noblemen, when they went into the country, carried their ladies behind them on horſeback; princeſſes themſelves ſeldom travelled in any other manner, being covered only with a riding-cloak of waxed cloth in rainy weather. Indeed, on certain occaſions, they made a momentary diſplay or ſtretch of luxury; but this did in no wiſe imply that general magnificence, nor thoſe uſeful conveniencies, which ſo far exceed the pomp of a ſingle day. The magnificence of thoſe times were only for days of public ſolemnity; whereas at preſent, the ſhews and entertainments which we ſee common every day, the number of gilt coaches, and the multitude of lamps which are lighted up during the night-time in the ſtreets of all our great cities, exhibit far greater riches, plenty, and convenience, than the moſt brilliant ceremonies of the moſt mighty monarchs of the fifteenth or ſixteenth centuries.

COMMERCE.

The general mercantile characteriſtic of this fifteenth century is, that almoſt every important incident in it contributes more or leſs to its being an introduction to the ſucceeding commerce and opulence of Europe, and very eminently ſo to thoſe of the Britiſh empire, which, towards the concluſion of this century, by marriages and other concurring circumſtances, viſibly tended to a conſolidation of all its formerly disjointed parts and intereſts into one united dominion, by the bleſſings of the Almighty, in ſucceeding times brought to maturity.

With particular regard to the improvement and increaſe of commerce, navigation, and manufactures, as well as of agriculture and fiſheries, and even of ſome mercantile and mechanic arts, this century undoubtedly excels any preceding one; with is the building of larger ſhips, and the undertaking of remoter voyages, even prior to the actual diſcovery of either of the Indies; remote iſles and ſtrange coaſts diſcovered and partly planted, till at length new worlds being diſcovered, before the final concluſion of this century, ſundry new and unheard-of materials for commerce and manufactures were hereby brought among us.

It may, perhaps, be deemed no unacceptable piece of curioſity to ſee the under-named liſt of Engliſh manufactures and merchandize ſo early exported as the year 1428. It is a licence granted by Henry VI. to the king of Portugal's agent to export them cuſtom-free, as being for the proper uſe of his Portugueſe majeſty and of the prince his ſon*, viz.

1. Six ſilver cups gilt.

2. The following woollen goods, viz. two pieces of ſcarlet; one piece of ſanguine, dyed in grain; two pieces deblodis (we know not what); two pieces of Muſtrevillers; two pieces of marble colour; two pieces of ruſſet of Muſtrevillers; two pieces of blanch cloth of Lynn; one piece of white cloth; three hundred pieces of Eſſex ſtraits; two thouſand veſſels of amber, being diſhes, plates, ſaucers, &c. (this is called "electrum" in the record, but could never be pure amber, as it muſt have been of an immenſe value, but was probably a mixture of braſs, or tin, or pewter, a practice formerly uſed to give an amber-colour to veſſels and other matters made of it); two beds with curtains, of the largeſt ſize; four beds, of a middling ſize, with red and green colours; four red and green pallet-beds; two green beds, with curtains; eight pieces of red cloth; four pieces of green; ſixty rolls or bales of worſted, red, white, and green; twelve dozen of lances, and twenty-ſix ſaddle-horſes.

And the ſame year king Henry VI. grants the like licence to the agent of the ducheſs of Gloceſter and Hainault, of exporting the following merchandize duty free:

Thirty-four yards of grey Muſtrevillers; thirteen yards of grey cloth; ſeven yards and half of moray, dyed in grain; ten yards and half of red, twenty-two yards of green, ſix yards of white, and twenty-four yards of grey cloth; two yards and half of brunette; twelve yards of red flowered ſattin (ſatyn figerato); two entire white kerſeys; three mantles of coney-fur; one and half timber of martin fur; certain caſks of grain and meal; and twelve yards of white cloth.

To this account of ſome of our exported commodities, we ſhall add, as matter of equal entertainment to the curious reader, the following account of the materials of commerce brought from almoſt every part of Europe into this country, France only excepted, with which nation England was at this time (viz. about the year 1430) engaged in an unfortunate war. It is taken from a poem in Hackluyt's firſt vol. p. 187, 188, &c. entitled the Proceſs of Engliſh Policy, and is not only curious on account of its exhibiting a brief ſtate of the then productions and manufactures of the different countries of Europe, whereby we may behold the wonderful alterations that have taken place almoſt every where in thoſe reſpects within the ſpace of about three hundred years, but it affords us alſo the ſatisfaction to know, that even ſo early as this time, the great political maxim, never too often to be inculcated, "That without our being always ſuperior to any nation on the ſeas, not only our trade, but even our very exiſtence as a free and independent nation, muſt be loſt," was well underſtood; though in ſome other points the government ſeemed not ſufficiently to have known their true commercial intereſts †.

This account is in ſubſtance as follows:

"I. From Spain came wines, figs, raiſins, dates, liquorice, oil, grain (probably for dyers), ſoap, wax, iron, wool, wadmot, kid-ſkins, ſaffron, and quick-ſilver; all which (ſays our author) are tranſported to Bruges, (the then great emporium of Flanders,) by her haven of Sluys, where are ſo many fair and large ſhips: but then (ſays our poet) they muſt all paſs between Dover and Calais.

"II. From Flanders the Spaniſh ſhips lade homewards fine cloth of Ypres and of Courtray, of all colours, much fuſtian, and alſo linen cloth. Thus (ſays he), if we be maſter at ſea, both Spain and Flanders, who depend ſo much mutually on each other, muſt neceſſarily keep meaſures with us. And if England ſhould think fit to deny to Flanders her wool and tin, and ſhould alſo prevent the Spaniſh wool (which they work up with Engliſh wool) from getting to Flanders, the laſt named ſmall country would be ſoon ſtarved.

"III. Portugal is our friend, it ſends much merchandize into England, and our people reſort thither for trade. They have wines, oils, wax, grain, figs, raiſins, dates, honey, Cordovan leather, hides, &c. all which are carried in great quantity to Flanders (which our author here juſtly terms the then ſtaple of all Chriſtendom); and as Portugal is counted changeable, they are in our power whilſt we are maſters of the Narrow Seas.

"IV. Brittany ſupplies Flanders with ſalt, wines, linen, and canvas. The Bretons, eſpecially thoſe of St. Maloe's (whom their dukes, who were generally friends to England, could ſeldom keep under due ſubjection), having been great ſea-robbers, and often done much hurt on our coaſts, landing, killing, and burning, &c. to our ſhame: whereas, would we keep well the Narrow Seas, they durſt not be our foes.

"V. Scotland's commodities are wool, woolfells, and hides; their wool is ſent to Flanders to be draped, though not ſo good as the Engliſh wool with which it is there worked up. The Scots muſt paſs by the Engliſh coaſt in their way to Flanders; and therefore may be eaſily intercepted. Scotland brings from Flanders ſmall mercery, (which in thoſe times meant many kinds of ſmall wares, &c.) and haberdaſhery wares in great quantities. Moreover, one half of the Scottiſh ſhips are generally laden home from Flanders with cart-wheels and wheel-barrows.

"VI. The Eaſterlings, Pruſſia, and Germany, ſend beer and bacon into Flanders, oſmond, copper, bow-ſtaves, ſteel, wax, peltry, pitch and tar, oak-boards, Cologne-thread, wool-cards, fuſtians, canvas and buckram. And they bring back from Flanders, ſilver plate and wedges of ſilver (which come to Flanders in great plenty from Bohemia and Hungary); alſo woollen cloth of all colours. They alſo (ſays our author) venture greatly unto the bay (of Biſcay) for ſalt, ſo neceſſary for them. All which, &c. they could not do, without our premiſſion, if we kept the Narrow Seas."

"VII. Genoa reſorts to England in her huge ſhips named carracks, bringing many commodities, as cloth of gold, ſilk, paper, much woad, wool (of Spain probably), oil, cotton, roch-alum, and gold coin; and they bring back from us wool, and woollen cloth made with our own wool. They alſo often go from England to Flanders, where their chief ſtaple is: ſo that the Genoeſe we have likewiſe in our power."

"VIII. The Venetians and Florentines, in their great gallies, bring all ſort of ſpices and grocery wares, ſweet wines, and a great variety of ſmall wares and trifles, drugs, ſugar, &c. and from us they carry home wool, cloth, tin, and our gold coins. They alſo deal much in uſury both in England and Flanders. — (This ſhews the ballance in thoſe times was againſt us with the Italian republics.)

"IX. To the Brabant marts (which we call fairs), we ſend Engliſh cloth, and bring back mercery, haberdaſhery, and grocery.

"To thoſe marts repair the Engliſh, French, Catalans, Lombards, Genoeſe, Scots, Spaniards, and the Iriſh who live there, and deal in great quantities of hides, &c." But he adds (as he ſays on good authority) "The Engliſh buy more goods at thoſe marts than all other nations do all together: wherefore (ſays he) let us keep the ſea well, and they muſt be our friends." And here he laments the neglect of our ſhipping for the guard of the ſea.

"X. Brabant, Holland, and Zealand, afforded little merchandize properly of their own, but madder and woad for dyers, garlic, onions, and ſalt-fiſh; for the other rich merchandize which the Engliſh buy at the ſaid marts come in carts over-land from Burgundy, Cologne, &c.

"XI. Ireland's commodities are hides and fiſh, (as ſalmon, herrings, and hake), wool, linen cloth and ſkins of wild beaſts." (Here we may remark the antiquity of a linen manufacture in Ireland.) "To keep Ireland in obedience to us is of great importance, and cannot be done without our being maſters at ſea. And the like may be ſaid, as to Calais."

By an act of parliament paſſed anno 1463, in the third year of Edward IV. cap. iv. we find the following liſt of foreign manufactures prohibited to be imported into England: woollen caps, woollen cloths, laces, corſes, ribbons, fringes of ſilk and of thread, laces of thread, ſilk, twined ſilk in any wiſe, embroidered laces of gold and of ſilk, gold ſaddles, ſtirrups, or any harneſs pertaining to ſaddles, ſpurs, boſſes for bridles, hand-irons, grid-irons, locks, hammers, pincers, fire-tongs, dripping-pans, dice, tennis balls, points, purſes, globes, girdles, harneſs for girdles of iron, latten, ſteel, tin, or alkemine, any thing wrought of any tawed leather, furs, buſkins, ſhoes, galoches, or corks, knives, daggers, wood-knives, bodkins, ſheers for taylors, ſciſſars, razors, cheſſmen, playing-cards, combs, pattens, pack-needles, painted ware, forcers, caſkets, rings of copper or of latten gilt, chafing-diſhes, hanging-candleſticks, chafing-balls, ſacring-bells, rings for curtains, ladles, ſcummers, counterfeit baſons, ewers, hats, bruſhes, wool-cards, black iron-thread commonly called and named white wire, upon forfeiture of the ſame; one moiety to the king, the other to the informer. Iriſh manufactures are, however, excepted; as alſo ſuch as ſhould be taken by ſea or by wreck. Magiſtrates of cities and towns are hereby authorized to ſearch for defective and unlawful wares, which ſhall be forfeited; excepting, however, the liberty of the dean of the free chapel of St. Martin's le Grand, in London, and its precincts. The above catalogue of merchandize may ſhew what manufactures were at that time brought to any perfection in England."

The fiſhing trade of England, for exportation, muſt have been conſiderable at this period, for in the twenty ſecond year of king Edward IV. anno 1482, we find no fewer than four ſtatutes for the well packing, in caſks, ſalmon, herrings, eels, &c. and other barrelled fiſh. Theſe are ſome of the earlieſt ſtatutes for packing fiſh; yet there are ſundry

dry

dry older laws for the preſervation of the fry of ſalmon and lampreys in the rivers Thames and Medway; but theſe are only for home conſumption.

By an act of parliament of the firſt year of Richard III. we find the quality and dimenſions of all kinds of Engliſh woollen cloths regulated in the following manner.

"1. That no broad-cloth be put to ſale, or exported, till it be fully watered.

"2. The dimenſions of all kinds of cloths were directed to be as follow, viz.

"3. Broad-cloths ſhall be at length twenty-four yards (and to every yard an inch); breadth, eight quarters within the liſts.

"4. Half-cloths, twelve yards long, and not to exceed ſixteen yards; and breadth as above.

"5. Straits, two yards long; and breadth, one yard within the liſts.

"6. Kerſeys eighteen yards long; and breadth, one yard and a nail within the liſts.

"7. No ſetting, drawing, or tentering, of thoſe cloths, after watering.

"8. None ſhall ſet, caſt, or put on ſaid cloths, flocks or other deceitful thing.

"9. Nor any chalk on white cloths.

"10. Nor ſheerman ſheer or cancel any cloths till fully watered.

"11. Tenters ſhall not be kept within doors, but alone in open places.

"12. No cloth ſhall be dyed with cork or orchel.

"13. The cloth and liſts ſhall be dyed of one colour.

"Excepting out of this act cloth of bay, and alſo cloths made in Winton and Sarum, uſually joined with bay; and alſo plonkets, jackens, celeſtines, packery-whites, veſſes, cogware, worſteds, florences, baſtards, kendals, ſayling ware, with cremil liſts and friſe ware, ſo as in other reſpects they be fair and legally made*."

In the laſt year of the ſaid king Richard III. we have a commiſſion of his, appointing the firſt conſul for Engliſh merchants in foreign parts, together with the ſalary allotted him, in the following words:

"We, underſtanding that the city of Piſa is a very proper place for the reſidence of our merchants, and being aſſured of the fidelity and probity of Laurentio Strozzi, a merchant of Florence, have and do, at the requeſt of our merchants already frequenting Piſa, and of ſuch as are to reſort thither, appoint him to be Conſul and Preſident of all our merchants at Piſa and parts adjacent; allowing him for his trouble herein the fourth part of one per cent. on all goods of Engliſhmen imported to, or exported from thence†."

Henry VII. made it the chief glory of his reign to raiſe, cheriſh, and ſupport the induſtrious commons, who, ceaſing to live in an abject, deſpicable dependence on the great, ſought to avail themſelves of the riſing arts and flowing commerce which England began at this time to enjoy. The ſupport of agriculture was one of the meaſures which this great prince had chiefly at heart, becauſe it encouraged the yeomanry, the ſtrength and nerves of the Engliſh ſtate, and its great barrier againſt the encroachments of the barons. He perceived evidently, that the power of the latter, troubleſome to the peace of the land, grew weak in proportion as the villains, who by their induſtry could make themſelves free men, grew ſtrong, which always happened according as commerce and agriculture prevailed: but the late civil wars had in ſome reſpects ruined agriculture almoſt to the depopulation of the ſtate, and an infinite quantity of arable lands were now turned into paſture.

But this vaſt uſe of paſturage had one great advantage in it, which was the encouragement of incloſures; for it does not appear that it was then much the practice to incloſe arable ground. The great art therefore was to encourage thoſe incloſures without diſcouraging the practice to incloſe arable land, and thus to prevent depopulating paſturages. This was done by an ordinance paſſed in the parliament of 1490, enacting "That all houſes of huſbandry that were uſed and occupied with twenty acres of ground, and upwards, ſhould be manured and kept up for ever, together with a competent proportion of land to be uſed and occupied with it." This act, as lord Bacon juſtly obſerves, in a manner forced the occupiers of ſuch houſes as are deſcribed in the ſame, to raiſe themſelves above the degree of cottagers or villains, and to become men of property and ſubſtance: it had, likewiſe, a farther tendency, that it raiſed a ſeminary for infantry, or foot-ſoldiers, and therefore prevented England from being obliged, like France and Italy, to hire infantry from other nations.

But perhaps Henry did not in any reſpect ſhew a more maſterly ſtroke of policy, than he did in an act paſſed in this parliament, for the encouraging national power at the expence of national luxury. The Venetians, the Genoeſe, the Spaniards, and the Portugueſe, not forgetting the Bretons, had, for ſome ages, been the carriers of all Europe by ſea; the Engliſh had, indeed, cultivated navigation and commerce, but upon principles more convenient than ſtable; for they had in a manner naturalized all England to foreigners who ſhould reſort thereunto; and when foreigners ſettled here, bringing with them the ſpirit of commerce and induſtry, and their ſons becoming Engliſhmen, it was perhaps, right policy; but the vaſt alteration now introduced in the ſyſtem of power and property, all over Europe, joined to the dreadful effects which the civil wars in England had been attended with, prevented foreigners from ſettling in the kingdom, though not from reſorting to it: the money therefore given as freight for imported commodities, was ſo much loſs to the nation without any retribution, but the increaſe of luxury. But Henry formed a noble plan of making a public emolument from private luxury; an act therefore paſſed, "That no Gaſcoign or Guyon wine, or Thouloufe wood, ſhould be brought into this realm but by Engliſh ſhips, and Engliſh maſters and mariners; nor any perſon ſhall freight in a ſtranger's ſhip, to be brought into this realm, or carried forth, if he may have ſufficient freight in the ſame port in a denizen's ſhip."

The benefit of commerce thus provided for, manufactures came next under conſideration. In this Henry's chief care was to encourage the woollen, that ſtaple commodity of this kingdom. The firſt ſtep towards this was to repreſs the extravagant prices into which the great perſons, and, by their example, the lower ſort, had run for cloaths, in which curioſity ſupplied the place of uſe, and which tended more to the encouragement of luxury, than the conſumption of manufacture; an act therefore was paſſed, impoſing a penalty of forty ſhillings upon any perſon who ſhall ſell by retale a broad yard of the fineſt ſcarlet in grain for above ſixteen ſhillings; or other grained cloth of the fineſt makings for above eleven ſhillings. A like act paſſed with regard to hatters and cappers, by which, under the ſame forfeiture, the price of the beſt hat was fixed at twenty pence; and that of the beſt cap at two ſhillings and eight pence.

Henry VII. alſo made it his buſineſs to take advantage of the jarring intereſts which prevailed on the continent, for improving the trade and commerce of his own kingdom: with this view he granted ſafe-conducts to all merchants, in particular thoſe of France, to come and trade with England, and to buy up her woollen goods, tin, lead, and her other native commodities, by paying the accuſtomed duties to the crown.

In a treaty he made with Philip archduke of Auſtria, governor of the Low Countries, towards the latter end of his reign, we meet with the following remarkable articles.

"It is agreed, that the fiſhers belonging to either prince may ſecurely any where ſail the ſea, and fiſh without any impediment, licence, or ſafe-conduct." It is likewiſe provided, "That the trading ſubjects of neither prince ſhall import into the harbours or dominions of either, any commodities or merchandize belonging to the enemy of that prince." And in the following article it is provided "That, in caſe of a ſhipwreck, if any perſon or any animal, a cat, or a dog, or a cock, ſhould remain alive on board a ſhipwrecked veſſel upon the coaſts of either party, in that caſe the cargo belonging to the ſubjects of either ſhall not be deemed confiſcated, but remain ſafe for a year and a day, till a proper claimant ſhall appear."

But that which diſtinguiſhed this century above all other tranſactions in the commercial way, was the attempt made by Chriſtopher Columbus to diſcover a new world. This fortunate adventurer was the ſon of a mechanic of Genoa, a wool-comber as is ſaid; he had obſerved the improvements which the Portugueſe had made in their diſcoveries towards the Eaſt Indies, and he had been projecting ſome diſcoveries towards the Weſt. Having digeſted his conjectures and reaſons why this was feaſible, he laid them before his natural ſovereign, the ſtate of Genoa. Being rejected there, he applied to the king of Portugal, whoſe miniſters, as he diſcovered, wanted to cheat him. He then went into Spain, from whence he diſpatched his brother Bartholomew, a man of the ſame turn of genius with himſelf, into England, with a commiſſion to lay his ſchemes before Henry. Bartholemew meeting with great misfortunes on his voyage, had ſuch difficulties to be introduced to Henry, that his brother Chriſtopher, deſpairing of ſucceſs in England, applied to the court of Spain. In the mean while Bartholomew, having publiſhed a ſpecimen of his genius in a Map of the World, which he projected, had admittance to Henry, who was not at all averſe to commune with him, and actually entered into an agreement about employing his brother Chriſtopher in the propoſed diſcovery: But Henry's frugal caution, his deſire to be fully informed, and to be himſelf maſter of the ſubject, and the affairs of ſtate which employed his head, ſeem to have occaſioned ſuch a delay in the execution, that Chriſtopher Columbus actually agreed with the court of Spain; and in Auguſt, ſet out upon thoſe diſcoveries which he made, and which (whether for the happineſs or detriment of mankind, we ſhall not determine) are now ſo greatly improved.

Henry, however, let few opportunities ſlip of encouraging the adventuring ſpirit of diſcovery, as the ſureſt means of upholding that taſte for commerce, which was to aſſure treaſure to his ſubjects and himſelf. On the fifth of March, 1497, he granted a licence to John Cabot, a Venetian, and Ludovic, Sebaſtian, and Sancho, his ſons, to ſail with five ſhips, under Engliſh colours, for diſcovering new iſlands or countries. Henry ſeems, when he granted this licence, not to have been himſelf engaged in the expence of fitting out theſe ſhips, for there is no limitation either as to their burden or number of ſeamen who were to go on board. Fabian ſays, that Cabot promiſed to diſcover a very rich iſland; and we are told by other writers, that the king afterwards was an adventurer himſelf, by cauſing a ſhip to be fitted out at Briſtol, to which the London merchants added three or four more; but this expedition did not take place till next year; and Cabot's ſcheme ſeems to have been to find out a north-weſt paſſage to the Indies, which he actually attempted, and, after making ſeveral valuable diſcoveries, he ſailed down to Cape Florida, and returned richly laden to England, where he was knighted by Henry. It is obſervable that Henry, in the licence he gives for this expedition, provides that Cabot ſhould, beſides the ordinary cuſtoms and tolls, pay the crown a fifth of all his nett gains. Thus Cabot in effect was the firſt that diſcovered the continent of America; for neither Americus or Columbus knew any thing of it at this time.

Upon Cabot's return, and report of the diſcoveries he had made on the continent of America, from whence he brought with him three ſavages, Henry was more than ever prompted to improve theſe beginnings: he knighted Cabot as a reward for his labours and ſucceſs, and invited ſeveral merchants and others to enter into engagements with the crown for peopling and cultivating, under the royal patent, the diſcoveries which had been or might be made.

At the ſame time he confirmed a treaty with the city of Riga, very advantageous to the Engliſh nation; for by this treaty the citizens of Riga were obliged to cancel a debt of ten thouſand ſix hundred nobles, which was due to them from the crown of England, upon condition that Henry ſhould reſtore them to the liberty of trading to his coaſts. Henry likewiſe this year revived his treaties of commerce, upon very advantageous terms, with the ſubjects of the archduke.

Not long after the return of Cabot from his American expedition, letters patent were granted by Henry to James Elliot and Thomas Aſhurſt, two merchants of Briſtol, and John Gonzales and Franciſco Fernandez, two ſubjects of the crown of Portugal, to ſail with as many ſhips, and of what burden they pleaſed, under Engliſh colours, for making new diſcoveries: but there is in this charter an expreſs proviſion that they ſhall not enter upon any lands or territories poſſeſſed by the king of Portugal, or any of Henry's allies. It may be likewiſe proper to obſerve, that the contractors had power to puniſh all outrages committed by their crews and coloniſts, and particularly all rapes of women, inhabitants of the diſcovered countries. By another article, it is provided that no native of England ſhall, for forty years, preſume to trade to any country diſcovered by the ſaid undertakers, without the king's and their ſpecial leave: if, when the forty years are expired, any ſuch trade ſhould be carried on without the licence as aforeſaid, the contraveners are to forfeit ſhip and cargo, one half to the king, and the other half to the proprietors. It is farther provided, that every maſter of a ſhip ſhall have liberty of importing from the ſaid diſcovered countries four hogſheads duty free; a quarter-maſter two, and a ſailor one hogſhead, for their own uſe.

In the year 1505, the twentieth of this king's reign, we find the firſt charter granted for incorporating and eſtabliſhing "the merchants trading in woollen cloth of all kinds to the Netherlands, by the ſtyle of the Fellowſhip of Merchants Adventurers of England." By this charter they had authority given them to hold courts and marts at Calais, provided that they exacted no more than ten marks of any merchant whatever for his freedom in this fellowſhip for trading to Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zealand, &c. and alſo enjoining all merchants adventurers to come into the freedom of this fellowſhip.

We ſhall now cloſe this article with an obſervation of the rate of living in theſe times, compared with that in our days. The Chronicon Pretioſum ſays, that hay was, in the year 1505, eight ſhillings per load, but that it had been uſually five ſhillings per load; yet the year following it was at ten and twelve ſhillings per load. This ſeems nearly to correſpond with the proportion of wheat, &c. in thoſe days to the ſame in our own times, viz ſtill nearly about one to five; for by the preceding plentiful ſeaſons (ſays Stowe, ſub anno 1499), wheat was ſo low as four ſhillings (i. e. ſix ſhillings of our money) per quarter; bay-ſalt about two ſhillings per quarter; and a tun of Gaſcon wine, two pounds: ſo that ſuppoſing, very probably, the mean or moderate price of wheat to be now eight ſhillings per quarter, or twelve ſhillings of modern money, this brings it to the proportion of three one-third to one in our days, forty ſhillings per quarter being (if every other neceſſary were as cheap) about the moderate price of wheat at our time.

THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

FROM

The Acceſſion of King HENRY VIII. to the Union of the Two Kingdoms of ENGLAND and SCOTLAND, under JAMES I.

PART IX.

HENRY VIII. The ſecond King of ENGLAND of the Line of TUDOR. A. D. 1509.

FEW princes have made a more conſiderable figure in hiſtory, than the monarch whoſe remarkable reign we are now entering upon: he aſcended the throne with every advantage that nature and fortune could poſſibly give him. Amiable in his perſon and addreſs, in the flower of youth, bleſſed with uncommon talents, and poſſeſſed of immenſe treaſures, he ſaw himſelf, at eighteen years of age, at the head of a flouriſhing kingdom, where the arts and ſciences wanted only a liberal benefactor to promote their progreſs; and the public tranquility being ſecured by an honourable peace and by powerful alliances, his people had already formed great expectations from his diſtinguiſhed abilities, not doubting that he would ſo employ his great wealth as to make the pleaſing arts of peace univerſally ſucceſsful, and, by rewarding ingenuity and induſtry, free them from the cruel oppreſſions they had ſuffered in the preceding reign, to gratify the odious paſſion of avarice, one of the moſt deteſtable that can poſſeſs the mind of a great prince. In fact, they were not diſappointed; for the young monarch was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than he ſhewed himſelf the reverſe of his father, by a liberality of temper which bordered on profuſion; but was fundamentally beneficial to his ſubjects, though, in particular inſtances, his generoſity was miſapplied.

His education, by order of his father, before the death of his brother Arthur, was certainly in a great meaſure eccleſiaſtic; from whence ſome have concluded, that the king intended, as Arthur was married, and there was no proſpect of his ſucceeding to the crown, to have brought him up for the church: this circumſtance is very immaterial, and not worthy the attention that has been paid it, much leſs the diſputes it has occaſioned; it is certain, however, that he very early imbibed a taſte for polite learning, and for theology in particular, which he cultivated ever after with peculiar attention, beſtowing the cloſeſt application, whenever he had leiſure from public affairs, on this particular ſcience: and whoever examines his conduct with candour, will find that to this turn of mind is to be aſcribed all his public meaſures with reſpect to religion, and not to his quarrel with the pope concerning his divorce from Catherine of Arragon, which, after all the pains that has been taken to repreſent it as the firſt cauſe of his ſhaking off the papal yoke, will appear, to the impartial, no other than a favourable opportunity which the king readily embraced, to carry into execution a reformation which the hiſtory of former reigns had ſhewn him the neceſſity of, and which a prince of his political abilities could not read but with abhorrence, and an ardent deſire to free his people from the cruel impoſitions of a foreign eccleſiaſtical tyrant. This being premiſed, we purſue the thread of our hiſtory.

After the interment of Henry VII. with uncommon funeral pomp, in the ſtately mauſoleum he had erected in his life-time, in his own chapel in Weſtminſter abbey, the firſt prudent action which did honour to the judgment of the young monarch, was his continuing his father's miniſters and counſellors in their offices. The board was compoſed of the following perſons, William Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury and lord-chancellor of England; Richard Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretary and lord privy-ſeal; Thomas Howard, earl of Surry, lord-treaſurer, ſon of the duke of Norfolk, ſlain in the battle of Boſworth-field, fighting for Richard III. George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, lord-ſteward of the king's houſhold; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; ſir Edward Poynings, knight of the Garter, comptroller, whoſe name is ſtill famous for a ſtatute of his in Ireland, in the former reign; ſir Charles Somerſet, lord Herbert of Gower, Chepſtow, and Ragland, lord-chamberlain; ſir Thomas Lovel, maſter of the wards and conſtable of the Tower; ſir Henry Wyat; ſir Henry Marney, afterwards lord Marney; ſir Thomas Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy. Theſe the lord Herbert, in his Hiſtory of Henry VIII. tells us were ſelected out of thoſe the late king had moſt truſted, by the counteſs of Richmond, grand-mother to the young monarch. But though Henry, as being little experienced in the ways of government, was pleaſed to make uſe at firſt of thoſe who had been at the head of affairs in his father's life-time, yet it is to be obſerved, that when theſe grew over-bearing and inſolent, preſuming too much on the king's youth and inexperience in affairs of government, he ſoon convinced them that by continuing his father's ſervants he did not intend to make himſelf ſo many maſters, and diſmiſſed them with the ſame good policy that he at firſt continued them.

was

The late king, on his death-bed, had ſigned a general amneſty, but with ſome exceptions: this was publiſhed ſoon after his interment, but, to the great joy and ſatisfaction of the people, Dudley and Empſon, the two grand inſtruments of oppreſſion in the late reign were excluded, and a proclamation was iſſued, inviting the people to prefer complaints againſt them; ſo that in a ſhort time there appeared ſufficient evidence of their grievous extortions, and they were ſummoned to attend the privy-council, when Empſon made a defence, wherein he threw the whole blame upon the late king, inſiſting that they had only obeyed his orders. Though this was true in fact, yet it was not conſidered, even in theſe early days of liberty, as any extenuation of their offence; but the letter of the law not expreſsly condemning them as felons for this ſpecies of extortion, the council were obliged to commit them to the Tower, and determine on a freſh accuſation, which was that of a treaſonable conſpiracy againſt the new king, upon which they were tried and condemned, but without ſuch ſufficient evidence of their crime as the law, in ſuch caſes, requires: indeed, the whole foundation of a charge which was ſwelled into high-treaſon appears by the teſtimony of the beſt hiſtorians to have been this, "That, conſcious of the popular odium they had incurred by their unjuſt proceedings, they had ſummoned their friends, when they found the late king was on the his death-bed, to conſult them on the neceſſary meaſures to be taken to ſecure them from the public reſentment." Theſe meaſures were conſtrued into a conſpiracy to ſeize the perſon of the new king, and to take up arms in defence of themſelves and their party. On the ſuppoſition of this abſurd and improbable conſpiracy they were condemned to die; but their execution was delayed till the following year, 1510, when the executors of the late king having diſcovered ſome very flagrant acts of oppreſſion, made reſtitution to the injured parties; and theſe tranſactions being made public, the people were ſo incenſed againſt them, that the king ordered their immediate execution.

The ſeizing of theſe wicked miniſters, and the proceedings againſt them, fully engaged the attention of the common people; but the court had a more important queſtion to canvas, which required the matureſt deliberation, and the moſt able advice. This was no leſs than "Whether the king ſhould conſummate his marriage with Catherine of Arragon, to whom he was ſolemnly contracted?" But it muſt be obſerved, that the king, when prince of Wales, at the age of fourteen, had proteſted againſt any conſent on his part to this contract, made for him by his father in his nonage; and this proteſtation was made in the preſence of ſufficient witneſſes, but was kept a profound ſecret for many years after the period we are now conſidering: it is neceſſary to mention it here, becauſe it appears probable that Henry VII. whoſe motive to this contract was avarice, had ſome ſcruples concerning the legality of the contract in point of proximity.

The council which decided this grand queſtion conſiſted of the late king's miniſters and counſellors, and amongſt theſe was Fox, biſhop of Winchester, a zealous prelate, violently bigotted to the papal authority: his opinion greatly contributed to determine the king and council in favour of Catherine; for when Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, urged that a man's marrying his brother's widow was contrary to the Levitical law, and that the pope's diſpenſation, though obtained, was invalid, as being inſufficient to cancel a poſitive law of God; Fox, who regarded only the political convenience attending this match, oppoſed to this argument the unlimited authority of Chriſt's vicar, and told the king, that it ought to ſatisfy his conſcience that the pope had granted the diſpenſation. To this idle ſophiſtry he added ſome arguments founded in ſound policy, and which ſhewed him an able ſtateſman: he repreſented the danger of forcing Ferdinand into a league with France, and the two monarchs joining to reſent the affront offered to the king of Arragon by ſending back his daughter, after ſhe had been ſo long affianced to Henry; and, what is very remakable, which we ſhall have occaſion to mention again, when we come to the proceedings for the divorce, the biſhop, after enlarging on the amiable qualities of Catherine, aſſured the king, that there was no doubt of her being ſtill a virgin, for that ſhe had offered to ſubmit to the uſual deciſion of a jury of matrons, for the confirmation of this point. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, finding that the king and council inclined to the opinion of the biſhop of Winchester, gave up the point reſpecting the validity of the diſpenſation, and the king ſoon after conſummated this marriage, which afterwards engaged the attention of all the courts of Europe *.

* The council determined this weighty affair on the third of June, 1509; they were married the ſeventh, and crowned the twenty-fourth of the ſame month. On this occaſion the king created ſir Edward Howard ſtandard-bearer of England.

As

As Henry was very young, newly married, and fond of pleaſure, he gave little attention to the affairs of government; and the nation enjoying a profound peace, the internal policy of the ſtate was well preſerved by the vigilance and experience of the ancient miniſters and of the council; while the king ſpent his whole time in ſuch pleaſures and amuſements as were then in vogue; and to procure him theſe, no coſt was ſpared. This the biſhop of Wincheſter could not bear, without complaining to the earl of Surry, the lord high-treaſurer, and expoſtulating with him on his great change of conduct; whereas in the late reign he was reckoned more parſimonious than the king himſelf, he now readily gave into his new maſter's extravagancies, and encouraged him in all his profuſion. The prudent prelate finding his remonſtrances ineffectual, that his murmurings gave diſguſt, and judging that his diſmiſſion would ſoon follow, artfully contrived to preſerve his intereſt at court, when his credit ſhould be totally loſt, and perſonal attendance withdrawn: for this purpoſe he introduced at court the famous Dr. Thomas Wooliey, as almoner to the king's houſhold; a place which the biſhop ſtill had credit to procure him, eſpecially as he could plead his former ſervices; for having recommended him, in the late reign to ſir Thomas Lovel, in the ſame capacity, he was by his means employed in negociating the marriage of Henry VII. and Margaret, ducheſs of Savoy, upon which occaſion, though he gave a convincing proof of his talent, he was not however, conſidered as yet in any other light than that of a riſing churchman.

This young clergyman, ſet up by the biſhop of Wincheſter as a proper ſpy to watch the motions of the earl of Surry, who had brought on the prelate's diſgrace, afterwards made as conſpicuous a figure in the eyes of Europe, as Henry himſelf.

The moſt remarkable public events during the firſt year of this reign were the renewal of the treaties concluded between Henry VII. and the king of Scotland, and between the emperor Maximilian and the king of England, which were ratified and confirmed about the middle of this year; about the ſame time, Henry having nominated Chriſtopher Bambridge to the archbiſhopric of York, that prelate went to Rome to ſolicit the pope's confirmation of his election, where the king continued him in the character of his ambaſſador, to watch the motions of pope Julius II. a pontiff of a daring and enterpriſing genius, who was on the point of entering into a confederacy with the moſt powerful princes of Europe, with a view to recover ſome dominions which the republic of Venice had ſeized from the Eccleſiaſtic State, in the time of his predeceſſors.

The emperor Maximilian, Lewis XII. king of France, and duke of Milan, Ferdinand king of Arragon and Naples, and the duke of Ferrara, had all much the ſame complaints and the ſame pretexts to engage them in a league againſt the Venetians, who by force and policy had increaſed their domains at the expence of each of theſe princes, and were now become ſo formidable that no one power in Europe durſt attack them ſeparately: each therefore, with a view to recover what he pretended was his juſt right, and to add to it the ſpoils of conqueſt, engaged ſecretly to aſſiſt the reſt; and this ſhameful confederacy was ratified by treaties ſigned at Cambray, from whence it became cuſtomary in hiſtory to call this infamous piece of treachery, perfidy, and cowardice, the famous League of Cambray. The better to deceive the unſuſpecting republic, it was pretended that the congreſs at Cambray was only held for ſettling a difference amicably between the emperor, as guardian to Charles of Auſtria, and the duke of Gueldres; but as this artifice ſoon loſt its effect, a treaty of perpetual peace was ſigned and publiſhed, between the pope, Lewis XII. the emperor, and Ferdinand; and this was declared to be the end of the congreſs; while at the ſame time, the ſecret treaty againſt the Venetians was ſigned, and, in a very ſhort time after, ſuddenly carried into execution. For juſt before the death of Henry VII. namely in the beginning of April, 1509, Lewis took the field with a powerful army, and, entering the territories of the republic on the ſide of Milan, in a ſhort ſpace of time made himſelf maſter of Cremona and five other capital cities, after having routed the army of the Venetians, undiſciplined, and collected in haſte, under the command of count Petigliano: this ſucceſs of the French ſo intimidated the towns ſituated on the Iſtria, which the republic had taken from the empire, that they ſubmitted to Maximilian: at the ſame time the pope's army fell upon la Romagna, and reduced its cities to the obedience of the holy ſee: the duke of Ferrara recovered Rovigo; and Ferdinand paid off an old debt by recovering the five maritime towns in the kingdom of Naples, which had been mortgaged to the Venetians, who in one campaign were diſpoſſeſſed of their extenſive territories, and reduced to the ſingle city of Venice and its dependencies. It is true Ferdinand alone had not tried his ſtrength againſt them, but when they were ſo reduced by the other confederates as to be obliged to ſue to the pope for pardon and peace, they were obliged to offer Ferdinand the five maritime towns, in order to draw him off from the league.

Lewis having accompliſhed his views, withdrew his army and returned to France, only ſending off a detachment to ſupport the emperor, who had not men enough to garriſon the places that had ſubmitted to him: in the mean time the Venetians made their peace with the pope; and the emperor having made an unſucceſsful attempt on Padua, he retired to Germany, and ſent home the French general; by which conduct the republic enjoyed a ſhort truce, and had time to continue their negociations with his holineſs, already grown jealous of the union between the emperor and the king of France, and apprehending more danger to the eccleſiaſtical territories from theſe powerful princes than from the once flouriſhing republic of Venice, and imagining there was a private treaty between them to get poſſeſſion of all Italy, he formed the project of breaking the league of Cambray, of diſuniting the powers engaged in it, of forming an alliance with the Venetians on certain conditions, of engaging the king of England in his intereſts, and of fomenting a quarrel between the emperor and the king of France.

Whilſt Julius was imployed in forming theſe projects, the parliament of England aſſembled, on the twenty-firſt of January, 1510, when the firſt care of the commons was to repreſent ſeveral grievances, occaſioned by the rigour of ſome ſtatutes in force, which gave too great a power to the miniſters of the crown to oppreſs the people, even under the protection of the law: these were so mitigated and explained in this parliament, as to prevent all abuses of them by future ministers. During this session of parliament, Lewis sent ambassadors to London, to renew the treaties made with the late king, which the young monarch and his ministers had neglected, though, by the tenor of the treaty of Estaples, on the death of Henry VII. it was his successor's business to apply for the renewal of this treaty. Lewis overlooked this omission, and fearing, as Henry was a young and sprightly prince, he might be engaged in some enterprize against his dominions, either by the persuasions of the pope or the emperor, he ordered his ambassadors to conclude a new treaty with him, without mentioning former treaties: by the present it was agreed, "that the peace between the two king's should last till the death of one of them; that it should be ratified by the parliament of England and the states general of France; and that the pope's approbation should be obtained, with a sentence of excommunication against the first violator of the treaty*."

In the mean the pope was maturating his plan, first against Lewis, and afterwards against the emperor, in case he should not bring him over to his party: his first care was to endeavour to excite all the states of Europe against France; and, in order to engage our young monarch in his favour, he bestowed on him this year a most singular mark of apostolical favour: he sent him a consecrated golden rose, which the popes used to present only to their most favourite princes; and Ferdinand having at length taken the pope's party, proposed an artful treaty of alliance with his son-in-law, the king of England, which he had reason to expect would, by its consequences, draw him into a war against France; for in this treaty which was concluded and signed at London on the twenty-fourth of May, 1510, it was expressly stipulated, "That in case either Henry or Ferdinand should be attacked by any prince whatever, the other should be obliged to declare war against him, though he should then be his ally: and that if either was attacked by the king of France, the other should be obliged to take the field against him in person."

This treaty reflects great dishonour on the ministers of Henry, who had just concluded a new treaty with Lewis, which secured their master from any attacks from France, consequently there could be no necessity for providing for a danger there was no reason to apprehend, by a treaty wholly in favour of Ferdinand, and likely to engage the nation in an unnecessary foreign quarrel; but the English court at this period was wholly taken up with pleasure and amusement, which would not admit of leisure to deliberate and weigh every article of a treaty.

In the midst of the general dissipation of the court, when each was vying with another in the magnificence of carousals, Wolsey was privately forming the plan of his future grandeur. He already began to attract the king's favour, and was this year promoted to the deanery of Lincoln, and to this was added a present of a country-house, which had fallen to the king by the confiscation of the estate of Empson, lately beheaded: but it certainly is an error to rank Wolsey amongst the ministry at this period †, for it is no where asserted, that he was even of the king's council; nor is it probable that if Wolsey had been in power, he would have made so bad a use of his political abilities, as to have given his consent to so weak a treaty as that concluded with Ferdinand, the consequences of which will soon appear, as we must return to the affairs of Italy, which are intimately interwoven with those of England, throughout the major part of this reign.

The pope's plan being ripe for execution, he quarrelled with Lewis XII. on the most frivolous pretext, by disposing of a vacant bishopric in Provence, without asking the king's consent. Lewis complained of this proceeding: the pope insisting strenuously upon his apostolical authority, and Lewis standing up as stifly for his independence, this produced an open rupture; the pope now openly declared the league he had entered into with the Venetians, and sent his orders to the duke of Ferrara to renounce the league of Cambray and join with him. But the duke refused to comply with his commands, and continued steady to the king of France; this gave Julius a handle to interdict him and confiscate his duchy: and, that his intention might be the better known, he refused the tribute which the duke offered, as usual, for the fief of Ferrara, held of the see of Rome.

Ferdinand, in order to support the pope's interest, to whom he had united himself, used all his endeavours at this time to draw Henry from his alliance with Lewis, who all this time never suspected the Arragonian prince, but concluded, from the repeated assurances of his ambassador, that he still firmly adhered to the treaty of Cambray.

While Ferdinand was thus working in secret, the pope stirred up a new enemy against France, by engaging the bishop of Sion, who was in great credit with the Swiss, to set them at variance with Lewis, by demanding an augmentation of their subsidy: on Lewis's refusal, and entering into an alliance with the Grisons, their enemies, they immediately fell into the bishop of Sion's measures, and, in a diet at Lucerne, resolved to declare for the pope, and to send an army into the duchy of Milan.

The pope carried on these negociations with so much privacy and expedition, that Lewis, when he found the papal army was in the field, imagined it was designed to act solely against the duke of Ferrara, and therefore he only sent orders to his general, Chaumont, governor of Milan, to support the duke in case of an attack: but soon after, the Venetian fleet, in conjunction with the pope's forces, making an unsuccessful attempt to surprize Genoa, his eyes were immediately opened to the grand designs that were forming against him by Julius, in conjunction with Ferdinand and the Venetians, and therefore lost no time in sending fresh instructions to the governor of Milan. Chaumont received his new orders very seasonably, for hearing that the pope was arrived at Bologna, and intended to lay siege to Ferrara as soon as the reinforcements he expected should arrive, he resolved to surprize him, and accordingly departed from Milan, at the head of a powerful army, and, if he had not suffered himself to be amused by treating with the pope's envoys, in all probability he would have put an end to all the projects of this enterprizing pontiff; but, while he was busy in hearing proposals, some Venetian troops had time to throw themselves into the castle, and Chaumont not being prepared for a regular siege, was obliged to retreat.

The pope loudly complained of this pretended insult, and ordered his ministers to expatiate largely thereon in every court of Europe, but particularly at London, in order to engage Henry to espouse his cause: he also excommunicated all the French officers; and soon after made a second attempt, in conjunction with the Venetian fleet, upon Genoa, but without success: and the Swiss army, that was to enter the Milanese, under the conduct of the bishop of Sion, finding the passes into that country well defended, and not being paid by the pope according to agreement, dispersed and returned home.

Lewis at last, having tried every means to obtain a reconciliation with the pope, and finding all his proposals were rejected, determined no longer to keep any measures with him; and therefore forming a new alliance with the emperor, he afterwards assembled a synod at Tours, that he might have the sanction of their authority for his future conduct. The synod determined, that Lewis should offer fresh terms of reconciliation to his holiness; and that, in case of a refusal, he might attack him with a safe conscience. This decree obtained, and Julius still refusing to come to an accommodation, Lewis concluded a second treaty with the emperor, whereby it was resolved to summon a general council to meet at Pisa, in order to depose Julius; and for this purpose they gained over nine cardinals, who agreed to call the council in their names.

At the same time the French king published his complaints against Ferdinand of Arragon, for his behaviour in assisting the pope; but Ferdinand defended himself by maintaining, that, in quality of vassal to the see of Rome, he was bound to protect the pope's person and dominions; that he did not consider the disputes between France and the pope, but only firmly adhered to the articles of the treaty of Cambray.

While things were in this situation, Henry of England was revelling in pleasures, which, however, received some little damp in the beginning of the year 1511, by the queen being brought to bed of a son in January, which died the following month; and it was soon after this event that Henry first saw himself under a necessity of attending to the important affair of Italy; and, with an impetuosity of temper equal to his want of judgment and experience, allured by the charms of conquest, he blindly embraced the artful proposals of Ferdinand who, to engage him the more readily to enter into the confederacy against France, promised to assist him in the recovery of Guienne, which had formerly belonged to the crown of England; and while a treaty for this purpose was negociating at London, Henry endeavoured to maintain a good understanding with the king of Scotland, appointing ministers to settle all differences between them; but a singular event gave rise to a fresh disagreement, and finally determined James to support Lewis against the confederates, and to oppose all Henry's measures. The subject of this quarrel between England and Scotland was the taking of a Scots vessel which had committed some acts of piracy in the British Channel, seizing and destroying all Portuguese ships that passed that way, in revenge for the murder of a private person (one John Barton, a Scots merchant), by the Portuguese, an act which that government by no means authorized; and yet James had the imprudence, on account of this transaction, to grant commissions to the son of the deceased (whom he also knighted by the name of sir Andrew Barton), for equipping two large frigates to cruise in the British channel, and obstruct the trade between Portugal and England. The ambassador of Portugal complained loudly of this insult at the court of London; and Henry thereupon ordered out two ships of superior force, under the command of sir Thomas and sir Edward Howard, to fight the Scottish pirate. They met, and an engagement ensued, in which Barton was slain, and his ship taken. The king of Scotland demanded restitution and satisfaction, for what he termed a breach of treaties; but Henry alleging that pirates were not entitled to the law of nations, James in return vowed revenge.

This affair gave Henry a fair opportunity of arraying the militia of the kingdom to prepare against an invasion from Scotland, while in reality he was meditating a war against France. On the other hand, the king of Arragon, afraid to push matters too far at once, represented to Henry his ardent desire to continue the war he was engaged in against the Moors, and desired a succour of a thousand English archers, which were immediately sent him, under the conduct of sir Thomas Darcy. Having received this aid, he plainly discovered his intentions by employing it, and the rest of his forces, against France, and not against the Moors as he had pretended.

At the same time the ambassadors from the Venetians at London, and the archbishop of York, Henry's ambassador at Rome, who had lately obtained a cardinal's hat, so strongly pressed the king and council to engage in the league against France, that at length they prevailed; and Henry, forgetting the ties of honour and equity, renounced his late alliance with France, and impoliticly entered into the selfish views of the pope and Ferdinand. Lewis, though unacquainted with the transactions between the kings of England and Arragon, yet had a suspicion that the pope was secretly forming alliances, and that he had some more extensive plan in view than the conquest of Ferrara; and knowing that he could gain little or nothing by a war with the haughty pontiff, while on the other hand he had much to lose, he determined to attempt once more a reconciliation: to this end he made him some condescending proposals by Chaumont, his general, while he lay before Mirandola; but Julius, knowing how strongly he was supported, rejected them with disdain, and continued the siege till the town surrendered.

The king of France finding his holiness would not listen to any terms of accommodation, ordered Chaumont to lose no farther time in fruitless parleys, but at all events to support the duke of Ferrara. The French general, accordingly, by forced marches, though in the depth of winter, joined the last-mentioned prince. This seasonable activity so disconcerted the pope and Ferdinand, that, though their forces were superior to those of the French, yet they durst not order an attack; and the pope, in order to fix Maximilian on his side, put into his hands the important city of Modena, which Chaumont was preparing to beſiege; and from this time the emperor appears to be greatly eſtranged from the cauſe of France. The king of Arragon, however, ſtill diſſembled with Lewis, and would not declare againſt him till he was quite ſure of Henry; and, to gain time, while the ſecret treaty was finiſhing at London, he affected to be well diſpoſed to peace, and propoſed a congreſs at Mantua. All parties having agreed, the congreſs was opened, but with no other view on the part of the allies than to amuſe the French king, whoſe forces were victorious, while they were ſecretly ſtrengthening the confederacy by the acquiſition of Henry. Thus was Lewis overpowered by ſtratagem, at a time when his army, flushed with ſucceſs, and dreaded by the allies, might have made its way through the whole Eccleſiaſtical State, and have reduced the pope to the laſt extremity. At length, however, he ordered the marſhal de Trivulcé, who had ſucceeded Chaumont, lately deceaſed, to fall upon the enemy by ſurprize: Trivulcé accordingly ſurprized and took Concordia, at the very time when, by conſent of the emperor and Ferdinand the ſummons was publiſhed for calling the council of Piſa, in order to depoſe the pope; and afterwards by continual marches he came up with the army of the allies, and offered them battle, but in vain; he then reſolved to approach Bologna, where the pope was in perſon, with a view to engage the inhabitans to riſe in favour of the family of Bentivoglio, who had been formerly ſovereigns of Bologna. The pope on his approach retired to Ravenna, leaving his prime miniſter to take care of the city. He was no ſooner gone than the inhabitants, agreeable to Trivulcé's expectations, raiſed a tumult, obliged the cardinal de Pavia, the pope's agent to fly, and reſtored the government of the city to the Bentivoglios; while this was tranſacting, the army of the allies approached the gates, and finding the pope and the cardinal were fled, they followed the example; and the citizens and peaſants ſallying out, entire ſtripped their camp, which rendered the army unfit for ſervice during that campaign. The cowardly cardinal was ſtabbed by the duke d'Urbino, his nephew; while his holineſs had the ſenſible mortification of returning to Rome, attended only by a few domeſtics, and of ſeeing the placards for holding the council of Piſa, in which his character was ſeverely handled, ſtuck up in all the towns and villages through which he paſſed.

The duke of Ferrara, improving the favourable juncture, eaſily recovered his dominions; and it was generally imagined that Lewis would ſoon become maſter of Rome. Inſtead of this, through ſcruple of conſcience, being urged by the queen not to oppoſe the church too far, he ordered Trivulcé to retire to Milan; and the pope now ſaw himſelf reduced to the neceſſity of propoſing an accommodation to Lewis, who readily agreed to his terms, which were rather thoſe of a conqueror than of a vanquiſhed prince: but while the emperor's conſent (which Lewis inſiſted on) was obtaining to this accommodation, his holineſs received the welcome news that Ferdinand's fleet, deſtined to aſſiſt him, was arrived at Naples, and immediately altered his meaſures, demanding ſuch freſh conceſſions from Lewis, as left him no room to doubt that his whole aim in this negociation was to gain time. This prevarication highly exaſperated the king of France, who immediately ordered his general to ſend ſtrong detachments to Bologna, and firmly to ſupport the Bentivoglios; he alſo added a reinforcement to the emperor's troops in the ſtate of Venice, and took every precaution to prevent a ſurprize by Ferdinand, whom he now regarded as his declared enemy. The pope, on the other hand, having advice that Ferdinand had nearly gained over the king of England, determined to ſummon a general council, in oppoſition to that of Piſa; accordingly he publiſhed a bull for holding a council at the Lateran, at Rome, on the nineteenth of April, 1512, whereas that of Piſa was ſummoned for the firſt of September, 1511; ſo that the ſubſequent council of the Lateran was contrived to annul the proceedings of that held at Piſa.

The affairs of Italy now remained in a very perplexed ſituation: the pope and the Venetians only were at open war with Lewis XII. while Ferdinand and the pope had promiſed ſecretly to aſſiſt each other againſt France, yet waited for the junction of Henry, and in the mean time miſtruſted a ſeparate accommodation with Lewis.

At length Ferdinand, being moſt ſuſpicious of an accommodation between France and the pope, ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of openly avowing his intentions, and accordingly he ſent his whole armament, which he pretended was deſtined for Africa, to Naples, and declared that he would defend the church againſt the inſults of Lewis; and ſoon after Henry promiſed to enter into this unjuſt confederacy; as for the emperor he remained quiet at Inſpruck, neither abſolutely forſaking Lewis his ally, nor yet acting agreeable to treaty againſt the confederates, but ſeemed determined to wait the event, and take part with the moſt powerful. While this was tranſacting, the cardinals who were in oppoſition to the pope, appointed commiſſioners to open the council of Piſa, and though this was only for form ſake, that the appointed day of opening it might be obſerved, yet the pope was ſo enraged at it, that he excommunicated the Florentines and Piſans, and put the cities of Milan and Piſa under an interdict; which only haſtened the actual aſſembly and ſitting of that council for the diſpatch of buſineſs on the fourth of November; and on the eleventh following, Ferdinand having by his ſecret negociations, at length fixed the court of London in the pope's intereſt; it was agreed, that Henry and himſelf ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to the court of France, to demand a ceſſation of all hoſtilities againſt Julius, and to declare in caſe of refuſal, that, as became Chriſtian princes, they would ſupport the cauſe of the church. Lewis having been long prepared for this rupture, returned an anſwer becoming his dignity, and loudly inveighed againſt the perfidious conduct of Henry and Ferdinand; and ſoon after, viz. on the fourth of October, 1511, a league was concluded at Rome by the pope, the king of Arragon, and the Venetians, and ſpaces were left in the league to be filled up by the king of England's miniſter at Rome; but he was ordered not to accede to the treaty at this time, the court of London expecting to obtain ſome ſecret articles from the pope in favour of England; but a circumſtance happened in the interim, which prevented all farther delay, and engaged Henry to ſign the league without waiting for any better terms for his own kingdom: for John d'Albret, king of Navarre, being in ſtrict alliance with France, declared for the council of Piſa, which furniſhed the king of Arragon with a pretext for depriving him of his kingdom; and the better to put this deſign in execution, he repreſented to Henry, that this was a favourable opportunity for recovering and reſtoring to the crown of England the province of Guienne, which had formerly belonged to the Engliſh, and he generouſly promiſed to furniſh the neceſſary troops and ammunition, to ſave Henry the expence of tranſporting them from England. Deceived by this offer, and the too common ambition of ſovereigns, the hopes of extending his dominions, the Engliſh monarch entered into the league, which by good policy he ought to have avoided, not only as the peace lately renewed with France was a very advantageous one for England, but as, by diverting the arms of that kingdom and turning them againſt Italy, he was ſecured in the quiet poſſeſſion of his own kingdom, which had been continually expoſed to invaſions from France. The league at Rome being now ratified, in a ſhort time a ſeparate treaty of alliance was ſigned at London between Ferdinand and Henry, in the preamble to which they very indecently and unjuſtly accuſe Lewis "of impiety, and repreſent him as a ſacrilegious perſon, who had violated the peace of the church, and waged a civil war againſt the vicar of Chriſt; and that, having attempted in vain to engage him to deſiſt from his cruel hoſtilities againſt the holy ſee, they had entered into a ſolemn league and alliance for the defence, exaltation, and increaſe of the catholic faith and of the holy Roman church, ſo unjuſtly oppreſſed: and for this purpoſe it was mutually agreed, that they ſhould diſtreſs the king of France by carrying war into Guienne, which ſhould be conquered for the king of England, to whom it juſtly belonged; that they ſhould adhere to the council of Lateran, and oppoſe that of Piſa and all its adherents; that neither king ſhould make peace without conſent of the other; that this treaty ſhould not cancel thoſe which the two princes had formerly concluded; and that it ſhould be ratified in four months *."

In this ſtate, with regard to England, ſtood affairs in the year 1511. Very little of importance then paſſed with relation to domeſtic concerns: Henry was chiefly employed in ſpending the money left him by his father, and in all the parade of magnificence. His favourite ſeat was Greenwich, and his chief companions were William Compton and Charles Brandon (the latter of whom was afterwards the famous duke of Suffolk), ſir Edward Howard, Edward Neville, Thomas Grey, marquis of Dorſet, with Bourchier, earl of Eſſex, and Courtney, earl of Devonſhire.

But before we cloſe the tranſactions of this year, it is neceſſary that we ſhould give ſome account of two expeditions ſet on foot from England, in the beginning of this year. Henry had granted an aſſiſtance of a thouſand archers to Ferdinand, to be employed againſt the Moors, and to be commanded by the lord Darcy, governor of Berwick. He alſo ſent ſir Edward Poynings, with a body of forces conſiſting of fifteen hundred men, who were to be employed by Margaret, ducheſs of Savoy, againſt the duke of Gueldres, in the Low Countries.

The lord Darcy embarking at Plymouth in the month of March, landed ſafe at Cales (or Cadiz), in Spain, where he was received by Ferdinand with great friendſhip and magnificence; but about the time he arrived, that prince had altered the deſtination of his troops, and was bent upon his Italian expedition. The lord Darcy received the declaration of this with no little diſſatisfaction, which communicating itſelf to the Engliſh ſoldiery, occaſioned ſome diſturbances in the town, and about the beginning of Auguſt the troops returned to England.

As to the forces under ſir Edward Poynings, they ſailed from Sandwich about April, and joined the French army at Bois le Duc. A few days after their arrival they had an opportunity of ſhewing their courage in ſeveral encounters and attacks of places; but the enemy keeping themſelves on the defenſive all the time the Engliſh were in that country, the latter, as ſoon as the time limited for their ſervice expired, deſired and obtained leave to return home, which they did about the middle of October, with the loſs of above one hundred men.

On the fourth day of February, 1512, the parliament of England ſat: at the opening of the ſeſſions a very plauſible ſpeech was made in behalf of the king, with regard to the part he had taken in the preſent diſturbances of Europe. Perhaps the members were not inſenſible of the error in politics which he and his council had committed; but as the honour of the nation was now engaged, and as the public entertained a very high opinion of Henry, the commons granted him a handſome ſupply, and the clergy did the ſame.

Thus ſtrengthened, the king, upon the riſing of the parliament, entered into ſerious deliberation with his council, on the beſt methods for proſecuting with vigour the war againſt France; and Silveſter, biſhop of Worceſter, and ſir Robert Wingfield, being ſent as ambaſſadors to the council of Lateran; the next meaſure reſolved upon, was concerning the operations of the approaching campaign, by ſea and land. Sir Edward Howard, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Surry, had, upon ſeveral occaſions, given great proofs of his abilities in the ſea-ſervice, and was therefore appointed lord high admiral of England.

The indenture entered into between the king and the admiral on this occaſion is very particular, and affords us great light as to the manner of fitting out fleets at this time; the reader therefore cannot be diſpleaſed at ſeeing in the note † a part of this indenture, eſpecially as very few hiſtorians have given any particular account of the ſtate of the the marine in these days. Indeed, from this year we may properly date the commencement of what may be called an English navy-royal, that is a number of stout ships for war actually belonging to, and permanently kept on foot by, the English crown for natural defence, Henry VIII. being the first English king who effectually pursued this plan, and for that end first established a royal navy-office, with commissioners, &c. nearly as at present: and, according to lord Herbert, the king built, in the preceding year, the largest ship ever known in England before; it was built at Woolwich, which place is said to have had the first or oldest royal dock of any place in England. This is the ship which in the indenture is called the Regent. The next year a magazine and store-house was first erected at Deptford, near London, which has since become a large town. But to return.

Every thing being now in readiness for the expedition, the marquis of Dorset was appointed general of the land forces, and had as officers under him, the three brothers John, Anthony, and Leonard Grey, the lord Thomas Howard, the lords Brooke, Willoughby, Ferrers, and Burford, sir Richard Cornwall, sir Maurice Berkeley, sir Griffith Rice or ap Rice, and many other persons of great distinction and courage.

But here I must observe, that Ferdinand acted with his usual policy and deceit; for when he first proposed the affair of Guienne to Henry, he promised to furnish him with troops and ammunition for the conquest; but after he found that Henry greedily swallowed the bait, he contrived in the late treaty to change these proposals, by agreeing to furnish only his quota of troops, and to provide forty transports and ammunition, provisions, &c. at a moderate price.

The fleet was got ready with such expedition, that in May following it put to sea, and landed the troops in the province of Guipuscoa in the middle of June. The English admiral, in his return, made some successful descents on the coast of Brittany; and Henry learning that Lewis had fitted out a powerful fleet, sent a reinforcement to Howard. Soon after the French fleet sailed from Brest, and met the English in the Channel, when a general engagement ensued, the decision of which was prevented by a most rash and desperate action of one of the captains of the French fleet, named Porsmoguere, who, being grappled by the great English ship the Regent*, and finding himself overpowered, madly set fire to his powder-room, which blew up both ships, by which every person on board them perished, to the amount of sixteen hundred. This dismal catastrophe so affected both parties, that the engagement ceased; the French retiring to Brest, and the English remaining in the Channel.

The marquis of Dorset being ignorant of Ferdinand's intentions, was surprized to find, that, instead of pursuing the conquest of Guienne, that prince gave such instructions to his general, the duke d'Alva, as plainly shewed his whole aim was to conquer Navarre for himself; for the Spanish general, instead of joining the English army, which was encamped near Fontarabia, with a design to besiege Bayonne in conjunction with Ferdinand's forces, as had been agreed, kept moving about the frontiers of Navarre; and Ferdinand sent to the English general, to acquaint him, that as the king of Navarre was supported by France, he thought it would not be adviseable to attack Bayonne till they had taken some measures about Navarre, because, while they were carrying on the siege, the king of Navarre might call in the French, and, by encamping between the mountains of Navarre and the sea, prevent all supplies of provisions passing to the camp before Bayonne: on these considerations he said he judged it necessary to try to gain the king of Navarre to their party, before they undertook the siege. The English general, not suspecting any deceit, readily agreed to these proposals, and sent an English officer to the king of Navarre, to desire him to join the allies; while Ferdinand, who knew his attachment to France, sent him a summons to join them, couched in such terms as, he was well convinced, would only be treated at best with great coldness; however, his answer was very moderate, having resolved to observe a strict neutrality. But Ferdinand, not content with this, insisted on his declaring in their favour, or delivering up four capital places as a security that he would not act against them. This proposal was rejected with the contempt it merited, and in the mean time a French army approached the frontiers of Bearn, which obliged the marquis of Dorset to remonstrate to Ferdinand, that the time expended in treating with the king of Navarre had given the French leisure to approach and defend their frontiers; and insisted, that he should declare if he would attack Guienne agreeable to the treaty of London, Ferdinand replied, that, in the present posture of affairs, he could not send his army to the siege of Bayonne, and leave his own dominions defenceless and a prey to the incursions every captain and soldier, four shillings; and of every mariner and gunner, one shilling and eight pence.

V. For the dead shares of the said eighteen English ships the admiral was to have as follows, viz.

	Tons burden.		Dead shares.
For the Regent, being	1000	four pilots	50
the Mary Rose	500	——	34½
the Peter Pomegranate	400	——	28
John Hopton's ship	400	Dead shares needless to be mentioned.
the Nicholas Rude	400
the Mary George	300

The rest of the eighteen ships were,

One of	240 tons	Two of	140 tons
One of	200	Three of	120
Three of	160	One of	100

Moreover, for re-victualling and watering the said eighteen ships (they are here nineteen) the admiral was allowed two crayers, viz. one of sixty-five tons, and the other of fifty-five; in the former, twelve mariners and a boy, in the latter, ten and a boy, besides their commanders; each of the masters and mariners to have ten shillings per month (as before) for wages and victuals.

VI. All the soldiers and sailors to have six pence per day for conduct money, allowing a day's journey to be twelve miles only.

And forasmuch as our sovereign lord, at his own costs and charges, victualleth the said army and navy, the said admiral shall therefore reserve for the king one half of all gains and winnings of the war, which he and the fleet, or any of them, shall fortune to obtain in the voyage, either on land or water; and also all prisoners, being chieftains; and one ship royal of two hundred tons or upwards, with the ordnance and apparel of every prize to be taken by them. Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xiii. p. 326, 327.

This English fleet was, by agreement, to guard the seas from the Channel to the Streight's Mouth of Gibraltar; and king Ferdinand's fleet was to do the like in the Mediterranean. It was about this time that ships began to be reckoned by guns and tonnage jointly, gunners being now the first time mentioned in the Fœdera.

of the French and of the ſubjects of the king of Navarre; that it was more for their joint intereſt to paſs through Navarre and ſecure three or four conſiderable places, in order to prevent the enemy making uſe of that kingdom againſt him; he therefore requeſted that the Engliſh would advance and join the duke d'Alva; that his army ſhould make the vanguard, and be expoſed to the greateſt danger; that in the mean while the ſiege of Bayonne could not be ſaid to be retarded, but rather haſtened by the ſecureſt means, for that the king of Navarre only wanted to be hard preſſed, in order to ſave appearances, when he ſhould enter into the league. To this the Engliſh general replied, that he had no inſtructions to act offenſively againſt the king of Navarre; that the duke d'Alva might march his army through that prince's dominions, and take poſſeſſion of his towns, if he thought proper; but that he ſhould remain where he was. Ferdinand ſtill perſiſted in his deſign, and while he was endeavouring to bring over the Engliſh general to join his army, he ordered d'Alva to inveſt Pampeluna, the capital of Navarre, which ſoon ſurrendered, and the king took refuge in France, where he entered into an offenſive and defenſive treaty of alliance with Lewis, to whom, however, he was obliged to make ſeveral conceſſions, and in particular to cede to him the town of Salvatierra and all Bearn. After the ſurrender of Pampeluna, Ferdinand, inſtead of ſending d'Alva to join the marquis of Dorſet, ordered him to purſue his conqueſts, ſo that the Engliſh army ſerved as an army of obſervation, intimidating the French from attempting to ſuccour Navarre, while the Spaniſh general ſubdued the greateſt part of that kingdom without moleſtation.

In the mean time Ferdinand artfully diſpatched a meſſenger to London, to amuſe Henry with a different repreſentation of the ſtate of affairs, and to requeſt him to order the Engliſh to join his army. Before this order, which Ferdinand obtained from Henry, could reach the marquis of Dorſet, the duke d'Alva had taken St. Jean de Pied de Port, and then Ferdinand, content with his acquiſitions, made a ſhew of joining the Engliſh army, and propoſed to march directly to the ſiege of Bayonne; but that able general, the marquis of Dorſet, now refuſed in his turn, alleging that it was become impracticable, as the French had gained time to entrench themſelves between Bayonne and Salvatierra; and even the garriſon of Bayonne muſt, during theſe delays, have provided themſelves with every thing neceſſary for a long ſiege; beſides, the ſituation of the French was ſuch, that he muſt hazard the loſs of all his army by croſſing the river Bidaſſoa. Ferdinand was apprized of all theſe obſtacles, but was willing, if poſſible, to throw all the blame on the marquis, who at laſt was highly incenſed at his conduct, and, perceiving his army daily diminiſhed through ſickneſs and ſcarcity of proviſion, he demanded tranſports to convey them to England; theſe were granted by Ferdinand with an appearance of diſcontent, but as he had gained his point in ſubduing Navarre, which he now annexed to the crown of Spain, it is not to be doubted that he ſecretly rejoiced at the voluntary retreat of the Engliſh army.

Before the embarkation took place, the marquis was taken ill, and was ſucceeded in command by lord Howard, who received an order from court for the Engliſh army to remain all the winter where it was, and to obey Ferdinand in all his directions; but theſe now produced a mutiny in the army, which inſiſted on embarking; and when they arrived in England, the king was at firſt greatly incenſed againſt the marquis of Dorſet; but when the proceedings of the whole campaign came to be fairly ſtated, he too plainly perceived that Ferdinand had ſhamefully impoſed upon him and his impolitic miniſters; and of this he was more fully convinced towards the end of the year, when he ſaw that prince in full poſſeſſion of Navarre, and pretending to maintain himſelf in it by virtue of a bull from the pope, who had excommunicated John d'Albret, king of Navarre, for adhering to the council of Piſa, and had declared a right of poſſeſſion in favour of the conqueror. Henry, though undeceived by theſe meaſures, was forced in his turn to diſſemble, being apprehenſive that Ferdinand would make his peace with Lewis.

While Ferdinand was making himſelf maſter of Navarre, the confederate army, conſiſting of the pope's forces, thoſe of the Venetians, and a detachment of Ferdinand's, under the command of the vice-roy of Naples, undertook the ſiege of Bologna, at the pope's expreſs deſire, contrary to the ſentiments of the vice-roy and of the general of the Venetian army: but Gaſton de Foix, duke of Nemours, governor of Milan, coming to the relief of the place with a powerful force, the allies were obliged to raiſe the ſiege: and, in a few days after, the ſame general defeated the Venetian army, and at length totally routed that of the allies; but it coſt him his life, for he was ſlain in purſuing the vanquiſhed too warmly, after he had gained a complete victory.

After his death, la Paliſſe took the command of the army, and made himſelf maſter of Ravenna; upon which all the towns belonging to the pope in la Romagna voluntarily ſurrendered to the cardinal de St. Severin, who was legate in the French army from the council of Piſa, now removed to Milan. This rapid ſucceſs of the French threw the cardinals of the pope's party at Rome into ſuch conſternation, that they publicly petitioned Julius to make peace with France; but the pope probably knew that the affairs of France were on the decline, and that the council of Piſa would have little or no weight when that of the Lateran was opened, for he perſiſted in refuſing to offer any terms of accommodation, and only made his forces advance to prevent the French marching to Rome, which they might eaſily have done, if la Paliſſe had not judged it more for his maſter's intereſt to oppoſe the progreſs of the Swiſs, who, encouraged by the cardinal of Sion, had entered the duchy of Milan with ſixteen thouſand men; this engaged la Paliſſe to fly to the aſſiſtance of that country; leaving only a ſmall detachment, under the conduct of St. Severin, to defend his new conqueſts in la Romagna. In proportion as the French army retreated from the pope's dominions, his holineſs aſſumed his accuſtomed haughtineſs and implacability, and he now reſolved to open the council of Lateran, and to refuſe every offer of peace: he next proceeded to excommunicate Lewis, and laid France under an interdict; his pretence for this ſevere ſentence was the detention of his legate at Milan, where, though a priſoner, his authority ſo far prevailed, that the inhabitants of that city refuſed fuſed to acknowlege the authority of the council removed there from Piſa. In the abſence of la Paliſſe all the towns of la Romagna once more ſubmitted to the pope; Ferdinand was become maſter of Navarre; and Lewis was obliged to have an army in Bearn, in order to prevent the Engliſh invading Guienne; beſides this, the emperor was ſecretly agreeing to withdraw from France a body of German troops, lent to Lewis for the defence of the Milaneſe: thus the affairs of Lewis grew every day more deſperate, and la Paliſſe, finding himſelf too weak to defend the duchy of Milan againſt the Swiſs army, after the emperor had recalled his troops, was obliged to ſend for the remainder of his army, which he had left under the command of the cardinal St. Severin for the defence of la Romagna.

The Swiſs army having obtained the emperor's permiſſion, marched to Trent, and thus entered the duchy of Milan by an indirect road, which the French did not ſuſpect, as the emperor was in alliance with Lewis; by this means they avoided all the paſſes which la Paliſſe had ſtrongly guarded, and having joined the Venetians, they marched directly to Milan, which totally diſconcerted the meaſures of the French general, who, not being ſtrong enough to give battle to the united army of the Swiſs and Venetians, was forced to retire into the fortified towns, and there wait for relief from France; which not arriving as he expected, he found it was in vain to attempt the defence of that country, and therefore retreated with his army to France: upon this the council of Piſa was once more removed to Lyons, the prelates that compoſed it following the motions of la Paliſſe, for their own ſecurity.

After the retreat of the French, the whole duchy of Milan ſurrendered to the Venetian and Swiſs army, except Parma, Placentia, and Reggio, which were ceded to the pope; and Alexander Bentivoglio once more abandoned Bologna to the mercy of his holineſs, who, by this revolution, in a ſhort ſpace of time ſaw his affairs totally retrieved, by the French being entirely driven out of Italy: but, for the completion of his wiſhes, there ſtill remained the following changes to take place; the reſtoration of the Sforzas to the duchy of Milan, the expulſion of the duke of Ferrara, the reſtoration of the Medici at Florence, and the driving the Germans and Spaniards out of Italy. For this end he procured a congreſs of the allies to be held at Mantua, where it was agreed to reſtore Sforza to Milan, and to re-eſtabliſh the houſe of Medici at Florence. In conſequence of this agreement, the army of the allies approached Florence, and compelled the inhabitants to admit the Medici as citizens, but not as governors; but the cardinal de Medici entering the city, by virtue of the new agreement, while the army of the allies were at the gates, he took that opportunity of raiſing a ſedition in his favour, by means of which the gates were opened to the allied army, and the government was veſted in the houſe of Medici as before their baniſhment.

Having gained theſe points, Julius, flushed with ſucceſs, determined to loſe no time in accompliſhing the reſt: for this end a ſecond meeting of the allies was held at Rome, but he could obtain nothing of the Venetians, who would not act againſt the duke of Ferrara, becauſe he was ſupported by Ferdinand. He then endeavoured to bring about an accommodation between the emperor and the Venetians; but in this he was likewiſe unſucceſsful, owing to the hard terms propoſed by the emperor: and when he found there was no other method of completing his ambitious views, and probably that one of theſe powers might recal the French into Italy, he entered into an unjuſt league, offenſive and defenſive, with the emperor againſt the Venetians. The emperor, on his part, engaged to become a principal in the treaty formerly made at Rome, between Ferdinand, the pope, Henry of England, and the Venetians, who were by this treaty to be excluded from the former; he alſo promiſed to renounce the authority of the council of Piſa, and to abandon the duke of Ferrara and the family of Bentivoglio. This treaty being ratified, the biſhop of Gurck, the emperor's miniſter, renounced, in the next aſſembly of the Lateran council, the authority of that of Piſa, and annulled all the former proceedings of his maſter in its ſupport.

To return to the affairs of England. It is remarkable, that in all theſe revolutions in Italy, and in the ſeveral negociations conſequent thereupon, the principals in the league at Rome ſeemed wholly to forget that Henry was of their party, ſo that he was merely conſidered as a neceſſary agent to carry on the deſigns of the pope and Ferdinand; yet, though he was not ſo much as mentioned in any of the tranſactions, after the emperor and the pope had concluded their treaty, they, in conjunction with Ferdinand, once more formed a ſcheme for impoſing on the youth and inexperience of the Engliſh monarch, and, through the corruption or weakneſs of his miniſtry, ſucceeded a ſecond time. It was repreſented to him, that, having driven the French from Italy, they now intended to unite their forces and turn them againſt France, promiſing to give Henry all proper aſſiſtance to recover Guienne and Normandy. In conſequence of theſe offers Henry ſent ambaſſadors to Bruſſels, with full powers to enter into a league with the pope, the emperor, Ferdinand, and Charles of Auſtria, ſovereign of the Netherlands, againſt the king of France: and the parliament being aſſembled in November, readily granted a ſubſidy for the ſupport of this confederacy; while the pope, the better to enable the king to carry his arms into France with expedition, ſent over a plenary indulgence to all his ſubjects who ſhould voluntarily aſſiſt him with their perſons or eſtates.

Henry, that he might be able to proſecute this war without being interrupted by his neighbour, the king of Scotland, ſent ambaſſadors to his court, with aſſurances that he would on his part inviolably adhere to the treaty of peace ſubſiſting between them: but the affair of Barton, and the detention of his ſhips, had deeply affected James, who only waited a proper opportunity to reſent it, and the intended expedition againſt France ſeemed to offer him a favourable one, ſince England would be drained of men and money for this impolitic enterprize: accordingly he ſecretly treated with Lewis, and agreed to make an incurſion into England as ſoon as the Engliſh ſhould land in France; and, by way of preparing matters for a rupture, he equipped a fleet, which he ſent over to the continent, under colour of paying a compliment to the queen of France; but it was diſabled, and ſome of the ſhips loſt, in a ſtorm. But when Henry ſoon after declared war againſt Lewis, the ſecret was divulged; for a treaty was ſuddenly ſigned between France and Scotland, which had been long concerted. Upon on this Henry ſent ambaſſadors to Scotland, under pretence of ſettling all differences between the two crowns, but in reality to obſerve the preparations that were making by the king of Scotland to aſſiſt Lewis, and alſo to procure a copy of the treaty with France: which they effected*; and then Henry, finding a war with Scotland was inevitable, gave a commiſſion to the earl of Surry to levy an army in the North of England, and to act againſt the Scots, if they attempted to enter England with an armed force.

Of all the allies concerned in the confederacy againſt France, the king of England alone had ſerious views upon that kingdom: the pope's ſole aim was to deſtroy the council of Piſa, to ſeize on the poſſeſſions of the duke of Ferrara, and in proceſs of time to drive the emperor out of Venice, with whom he was allied only from the motives of intereſt; his only deſign therefore, with reſpect to France, was to find her employment at home: the king of Arragon wanted only to ſecure Navarre: the emperor, who was naturally covetous, was endeavouring to ſell his friendſhip to the higheſt bidder, as occaſion offered: the Venetians were endeavouring to put an end to a deſtructive war, on the beſt terms they could obtain from the emperor by the ſtrength of money: conſequently, while Henry was making ready for his expedition, theſe allies were ſeparately contriving the means of accompliſhing their particular views, without any regard to his meditated conqueſt of Guienne and Normandy.

The firſt proof of this treachery was given by the emperor, who, early in the year 1513, propoſed a new league with France, offering to aſſiſt Lewis in recovering the duchy of Milan, if that prince would aid him againſt the Venetians; he likewiſe demanded the ſecond daughter of Lewis for Charles of Auſtria, his grand-ſon; but to this propoſal, terms were annexed that were ſo inconſiſtent and incompatible with the intereſt of France, that they argued both extreme weakneſs and arrogance in Maximilian, and were treated with that indignation they juſtly merited: but they had one good effect in favour of Lewis, for the Venetians, who earneſtly deſired an union with France, liſtened to terms of accommodation as ſoon as they found the emperor was attempting to be before-hand with them. While the treaty was negociating between France and the Venetians, the grand promoter of the confederacy, pope Julius II. died in the midſt of his preparations againſt the duke of Ferrara, and by his death gave a new turn to the ſyſtem of affairs in Europe, as will be ſeen in the ſequel.

He was ſucceeded by the cardinal John de Medici, the ſame who, in the preceding year, had reſtored his family to the government of Florence: he aſſumed the name of Leo X. and, though while a cardinal he had diſapproved of ſeveral of the violent meaſures taken by Julius, yet he ſeemed now determined to purſue his plan with regard to the affairs of Italy. He was doubly intereſted to keep the French from returning into that country, not only on account of the eccleſiaſtical dominions, but for the ſecurity of the houſe of Medici; and he was equally incenſed againſt the council of Piſa. In this ſituation of affairs, all the allies animated Henry to purſue the war againſt France; and, the better to perſuade him of the ſincerity of their friendſhip, they entered into a new treaty at Mechlin. This treaty was chriſtened by the name of the Holy League againſt France, and we have a copy of it in Mr. Rymer's Collection †, containing in ſubſtance as follows:

"I. The firſt article of the confederation made between the pope, the emperor, and the kings of England and Arragon, againſt Lewis XII. was to be friends of the friends, and enemies of the enemies, &c. to give mutual aid, at the charges of the demandant.

"II. To denounce war, after thirty days after the date hereof, and within two months to invade him, viz. the pope in Provence or Dauphiné, the emperor in ſome other fit place, the king of England in Aquitaine or Guienne, Picardy or Normandy, the king of Arragon in Bearne, Languedoc, and Aquitaine: not to deſiſt from any hoſtility, or make any truce, without common conſent.

"III. That the ſubjects of the confederates ſerve not the enemy, under pain of loſing life and goods.

"IV. That the emperor (if he hath not yet done it) ſhall recal the authority by him given to the ſchiſmatical cardinals and their conventicle, and within a month after the date of this, ſignifying his pleaſure, ſhall void and nullify all their proceedings and acts in the ſame.

"V. The pope ſhall, at the requeſt of the confederates, fulminate his eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt all that oppoſe this league.

"VI. The king of England ſhall give the emperor (towards the great charges he ſhall be at) one hundred thouſand crowns.

"VII. Yet the emperor, by this treaty, will not engage his grand-child Charles (now under his tuition) into this war with Lewis."

Lewis, as a counterpoiſe to this league, entered into alliance with the Venetians, and immediately ſent an army into Italy, under the command of la Tremouille, on whoſe approach Sforza abandoned Milan, and left the duchy open to the French army, who took poſſeſſion without oppoſition; and, much about the ſame time, Alviano, the Venetian general, took ſeveral conſiderable places, and the French intereſt prevailing at Genoa, Lewis was again put in poſſeſſion of that government. But a quick revolution ſucceeded this ſhort ſucceſs; for Tremouille being repulſed at the ſiege of Novarra, and afterwards totally defeated by the Swiſs, Sforza returned to Milan, and the French loſt Genoa; and, to add to their misfortunes, the Venetian general was defeated, and the ſtate, terrified by theſe two accidents, referred themſelves to the pope, imploring his protection of their affairs.

By this time every thing was ready in England for the expedition to France, and Henry's eyes were at laſt opened to the many impoſitions that

* It was expreſſed in the treaty ratified by both kings, "That whereas before the kings of Scotland and France were obliged to aſſiſt one another, in oppoſition to the Engliſh, or ſuch as ſhould offer to invert the hereditary right or ſucceſſion to their reſpective crowns, they became now bound to aid and aſſiſt one another, and even in perſon if occaſion ſhould require it, againſt all who may live and die; that is, the king of Scotland, rather than his allies, the king of France and the duke of Gueldres, ſhould periſh, undertook, in conjunction with them, to make war againſt the pope and all Italy, the emperor and all Germany, the king of England and his formidable dominions of England and Ireland, the king of Arragon and all Spain, the governeſs of the Netherlands and all Holland, Brabant, Flanders, &c. the ſtate of Venice, the cantons of Switzerland, &c." had been practiſed on him, not only by foreigners but his own miniſters: the aſpiring genius of Wolſey, who had lately been advanced to the dignity of a privy-counſellor, where he ſoon diſcovered his great talents for public affairs, put the biſhop of Wincheſter, who had placed him about the royal perſon, upon ſeizing this opportunity to inſtruct his creature in the method of ſecuring the king's favour, and of increaſing his confidence in him, by which the good biſhop hoped to obtain the advancement of Wolſey, and the removal of the king's favourites. This was ſoon after effected; for Wolſey, having gained the eſteem of the king, by complying with all his foibles, and by humouring him in his paſſions, he took the liberty of remonſtrating to him on the ill conduct of affairs; and fully convinced Henry how greatly he had been abuſed, both at home and abroad. The king finding that an able miniſter was wanting, to recover his affairs, rightly judged that the propereſt perſon for this office was the man who had been capable of diſcovering to him the inſufficiency of his former council: accordingly from this hour Wolſey was entruſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs; and for the following ſeventeen years managed all the king's buſineſs, both at home and abroad; with what ſucceſs, will be ſeen in the courſe of the hiſtory.

The firſt hoſtilities againſt France commenced at ſea. Admiral Howard having attacked ſome French gallies, under the command of Pregent, an able ſea officer in the ſervice of Lewis, during the engagement, the admiral's ſhip having grappled Pregent's galley, he boarded her ſword in hand, and threw the French into great confuſion; but unfortunately the galley having diſengaged herſelf from the Engliſh, the admiral was left on board with a few attendants, and in the confuſion was knocked overboard with a handſpike, and killed, before it was known who he was. The loſs of the admiral ſo intimidated the Engliſh, that they immediately tacked about, and bore away for their own coaſt. The French, encouraged by the ſucceſs of this action, and being joined by ſome ſhips from Breſt to reinforce them, approached the coaſt of England, and made a deſcent, but in a ſmall body, in Suſſex, where they did ſome trifling damage, and then retired to their fleet. Henry appointed the late admiral's brother, ſir Thomas Howard, to ſucceed him in the command of his fleet.

Shortly after, Henry came to the knowlege of a truce which Ferdinand had entered into with Lewis for one year, and to which his good father-in-law had made him a party, without giving him the leaſt intimation of ſuch an unexpected meaſure. Upon this Henry ſent an ambaſſador to upbraid him for his perfidious conduct, and to inſiſt on his fulfilling the treaty of Mechlin. Ferdinand ſtill pleaded his integrity, urged the neceſſity of his affairs, which had forced him into this truce, deſired Henry to agree to it, and promiſed to fulfil all his engagements at the expiration of this truce: but Henry had now a miniſter that was not to be amuſed in this manner: and ſhortly after, the emperor having ſent the king of England a frivolous excuſe for not obſerving his part of the treaty, this year it was reſolved that England ſhould carry the war into France alone; and thus Ferdinand equally betrayed Lewis and Henry, for the former, truſting to the truce, had ſent his beſt troops into Italy, and left his own dominions expoſed to the invaſion from England.

Reſolved not to loſe the fruits of the great preparations which had been made for the French expedition, and which were now nearly completed, Henry, on the ſecond of May this year, iſſued a commiſſion for a general muſter of the army. The marquis of Dorſet was made lieutenant-general under Henry himſelf; the earl of Shrewſbury was appointed to command the firſt column; the lord Mountjoy, William Atclyff, and Miles Gerard, were ordered to take up tranſports, which were to rendezvous at the ports of Dover, Sandwich, Winchelſea, Haſtings, and Rye; and laſtly, queen Catherine was appointed guardian of the kingdom during Henry's abſence: her commiſſion for this purpoſe was very ample, having command given her over all the troops in England, and a power, in conjunction with five noblemen, of taking up money upon loan, and giving ſecurity for the ſums to be employed for raiſing and maintaining forces*.

The ſea was now open and ſafe for Henry and his army: it was, however, warmly debated in the council, how far it was proper for the king to expoſe his own perſon in the expedition; but his vanity getting the better of all other conſiderations, he determined to hazard every thing in purſuit of what he called glory, the council conſented, and the laſt orders were given for the tranſports to put to ſea. At the ſame time Henry, willing to oblige his favourite, Charles Brandon, who had greatly endeared himſelf to his royal maſter by his ſweetneſs of temper and many perſonal accompliſhments, and who, though with all the appearance of ſeeking pleaſure only, indulged a noble ambition, gave him a very high poſt in his army, created him viſcount Liſle †, and raiſed him next year to the dignity of duke of Suffolk. Wolſey, though already jealous of the leaſt competitorſhip in Henry's eſteem, yet was ſo won by the captivating frankneſs of this young courtier, that, inſtead of oppoſing, he cloſed with Henry's bent towards him, and found a conveniency in his ſovereign's having ſuch a friend, with whom he could amuſe himſelf during thoſe hours which might have elſe been uneaſy to the miniſter, and it was reſolved that both of them ſhould attend the king in his French expedition; Wolſey in the character of almoner of the houſhold.

Nothing now remained but to provide for the peace of the kingdom, in caſe of the worſt event, by putting the unfortunate earl of Suffolk, ſtill a priſoner in the Tower, to death. His brother Richard de la Pole was at that time in the French ſervice, which has made ſome hiſtorians conjecture, that Henry put the earl to death in reſentment for his brother's ſerving againſt him; but it is more probable that the king was determined to prevent the ſucceſſion of the crown falling to the houſe of York, in caſe of his own death during this expedition: and if we believe the French writers, it was in conſequence of Henry VII's dying commands to his ſon. However this might be, it is certain that Henry was inexorable to all entreaties in the earl's favour, who loſt his head upon Tower-hill on the twenty-ninth of April.

About the beginning of June this year, two diviſions of the Engliſh troops were embarked, and ſafely landed at Calais, where they remained till the ſeventeenth of the ſame month, when an order came from court for their marching towards Terouenne, a town of Artois, ſituated on the Lys, ſix miles from St. Omer's. The place was at this time ſtrongly fortified, and had in it a garriſon of between two and three thouſand men, under Telegni, ſeneſchal of Rouvergne, and Anthony de Crequy. Upon the approach of the Engliſh army, on the twenty-ſecond day of June, within cannon-ſhot of the place, the enemy's artillery played ſo furiouſly upon them, that the baron Carew, maſter of the ordnance, was killed by the lord Herbert's ſide. The Engliſh, however, ſat down within a mile of the town; the earl of Shrewſbury on the north-weſt and the lord Herbert on the eaſt. By this diſpoſition they inveſted the place ſo as to cut off the garriſon from all relief, and to maintain their poſts till they were reinforced. And here it will not be improper to take a review of the number of theſe forces, and the names of their commanders, who were ſent from England to prepare the way for Henry.

The firſt diviſion conſiſted of eight thouſand men, and was commanded by George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, and Thomas Stanley, earl of Derby, attended by Thomas Docwra, lord-prior of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem, Robert Radcliff, lord Fitz Walter, the lord Haſtings, the lord Cobham, and ſir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light-horſe. The ſecond diviſion was headed by the lord Herbert*, lord-chamberlain of the houſhold, under whom ſerved Piercy, earl of Northumberland, the earls of Kent and Wiltſhire, the lords Audley and Delewar, the barons Carew and Curſon, with many other knights and gentlemen. This diviſion conſiſted of ſix thouſand men.

About the thirtieth of June Henry ſet ſail in perſon for Calais, with about four hundred ſhips in his company, commanded by Hopton, gentleman-porter to the bed-chamber, for the lord-admiral, Thomas Howard, was then employed in the North againſt the Scots. Upon his arrival at Calais he was complimented by the ambaſſadors of the emperor, the ducheſs of Savoy, and the duke of Brunſwick. The troops which Henry brought over with him, and which formed the third diviſion of his army, conſiſted of about twelve thouſand men; the vanguard was commanded by Charles Brandon, viſcount Liſle, and Henry Bourchier, earl of Eſſex; the centre by the king himſelf, under whom ſerved Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, ſir Edward Poynings, and ſir Henry Guilford as ſtandard-bearer. As to the rear-guard it ſeemed rather for parade than uſe, being chiefly compoſed of retainers belonging to the two great churchmen who waited upon Henry in this expedition, Fox, the old biſhop of Wincheſter, and the riſing favourite, Wolſey. The Engliſh army had alſo a noble train of artillery, among which the French hiſtorians mention a very fine ſet of cannon called the Twelve Apoſtles. The king, conſidering how far the river Thames was expoſed to inſults from foreign enemies, gave orders before his departure for erecting a platform of cannon at Graveſend, and another oppoſite to it on the Eſſex ſhore, where Tilbury Fort now ſtands.

Henry remained ſome days at Calais, attending the ſucceſs of the ſiege of Terouenne, under the earl of Shrewſbury and lord Herbert. Theſe generals ſent advice that the duke of Longueville was on his march to relieve the place, upon which Henry haſtened to the ſiege, and arrived before the town on the fourth of Auguſt. A few days after the emperor deſired a conference with the king, between Aire and Terouenne, after which Maximilian ſerved in the Engliſh camp as a volunteer, and even ſubmitted to receive pay for his ſervice, his avaricious and ſelfiſh views leading him to any means, however deſpicable, to compaſs his deſigns. The duke of Longueville approaching Terouenne, the king paſſed the Lys with the main body of his army, and an engagement enſued, which was but of ſhort duration, for the French, without any motive to be aſſigned for their conduct, made a precipitate retreat, particularly the cavalry, which gave occaſion to the calling this ſkirmiſh the Battle of the Spurs†. The principal officers, endeavouring in vain to rally their forces, choſe to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war than follow this ſhameful example. After the battle, the beſieged, deſpairing of ſuccours, ſurrendered at diſcretion, and, on the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, the king entered the city, attended by the emperor and his illuſtrious priſoners, the duke Longueville, the chevalier Bayard, and other French officers of diſtinction. By ſome ſecret agreement between the king and the emperor, to whom Henry ſeems deſtined to be the eternal dupe, the city was delivered into the hands of the latter, who ordered it to be razed to the foundation; which ſhews that he did not ſubmit to ſerve as a volunteer in the Engliſh army, but in hopes of an ample reward; and it is more than probable, that the flattering Henry's vanity at his firſt appearance in the field, by doing him this ſignal honour, procured him the ceſſion of Terouenne, to the ſurprize of every one.

The next place Henry reſolved to attack was Tournay, which at this time was in a weak and defenceleſs ſtate; and while the preparations were making for this ſiege, the king went to Liſle to pay a viſit to Margaret of Auſtria, who governed the Low Countries. He ſtaid with her three days, and then joined his army on its march to Tournay; and ſoon after the emperor left the king, upon ſome diſguſt; ſo that what moſt hiſtorians have aſſerted, that the ſiege of Tournay was undertaken through the emperor's intrigues ſeems entirely groundleſs, eſpecially as Tournay appeared to be an eaſy conqueſt, the garriſon being thin and ill provided; whereas Boulogne, which they imagined he would have attacked, if he had conſidered his own intereſts before thoſe of the emperor, was well fortified and had a ſtrong garriſon. Tournay ſurrendered in a few days after the king appeared before it; and on the fifteenth of September the king entered the city, having granted very favourable terms to the inhabitants. It being reſolved in a council of war to keep this place, the king appointed ſir Edward Poynings governor, and gave him a ſtrong garriſon: and, ſome time after, he gave the adminiſtration of the biſhopric to Wolſey, the French prelate having refuſed to ſwear fealty to him.

The day after the king entered Tournay, Margaret of Auſtria, attended by the archduke Charles, her nephew, for whom ſhe held the government of the Netherlands, paid a viſit to the Engliſh monarch, to congratulate him on the ſucceſs of his arms. For ſeveral days the king entertained his gueſts with the diverſions of thoſe times, as tilts, tournaments, running at the ring, &c. and, amidſt all theſe amuſements, a treaty was ſet on foot between Henry and the emperor, on the part of his grand-ſon Charles: by this treaty, which the king ſigned at Liſle, the emperor agreed "to keep a ſtrong force in Artois and Hainault, for the joint defence of Tournay and of the Low Countries during the winter; and Henry, on his part, agreed to pay for the maintenance of theſe troops the ſum of two hundred thouſand crowns. It was alſo agreed, that Henry ſhould carry the war into Guienne, Normandy, or Picardy, before the firſt of June, 1514, and that the emperor ſhould attack ſome other province of France: and that, before the fifteenth of May in the ſame year, the emperor, Margaret, Charles, the king and queen of England, and the princeſs Mary of England, ſhould meet at Calais, to celebrate the nuptials of the archduke with the princeſs Mary, purſuant to the treaty concluded by the emperor and the late king of England."

Having thus ſettled the operations of the enſuing year, the king prepared to return to England. In the mean time Ferdinand, thinking his credit was ſtill good with the king, ſent an ambaſſador to him, with propoſals for a new treaty: but he was no longer attended to; for, on the ſeventeenth of October, the king left Liſle, and, on the twenty-fourth of the ſame month, arrived ſafely in England, highly ſatisfied with the ſucceſs of his firſt campaign.

It is now neceſſary to take a view of the tranſactions of Lewis, in oppoſition to the dangers he was threatened with from every quarter. The misfortunes of the campaign in Italy, joined to the progreſs of the Engliſh arms, and an invaſion of the Swiſs, threw his affairs into ſo deſperate a ſituation, that he was obliged to compound with the Swiſs army, already entered into Burgundy, for the ſum of four hundred thouſand crowns, and to think of a reconciliatioh with the pope; as the firſt ſtep towards which he renounced the council of Piſa, which was now grown very thin; and Leo X. not having any perſonal enmity to him, this meaſure ſoon effected a reconciliation. This renunciation was ſolemnly made in the tenth ſeſſion of the council of Lateran, in the month of December, 1513, and effectually took away all pretext from the kings of England and Arragon for levying war againſt him. The pope, being reconciled to Lewis, wrote a letter to Henry, wherein he referred to one he had ſent him on his acceſſion to the pontificate, exhorting him to peace, which exhortation was now ſtrongly urged and enforced, as Henry had avowedly taken up arms for the defence and ſupport of the church, which he had happily accompliſhed by his victories, and therefore it was reaſonable he ſhould lay down his arms. This ſecond letter effectually undeceived Henry, who had been ſo long blind to his own intereſt; he now plainly ſaw that all the allies, himſelf excepted, having accompliſhed the particular deſigns for which they had engaged him in a war with France, were now determined to leave the whole weight of it upon him; the conſequence of which was, that Henry from that inſtant formed a reſolution to conclude a peace with France, without ſo much as conſulting his perfidious allies.

The king's foreign affairs being thus happily ſettled, his next care was to put an end to the war with Scotland, which, during his abſence, had declared itſelf againſt England, under pretence of an ancient alliance with France, which obliged that nation to aſſiſt France whenever the king of England ſhould invade that country. The war with England was carried in the Scottiſh parliament by a great majority, but not without a warm and ſenſible oppoſition from thoſe who had the true intereſt of their country at heart; but the French intereſt, and their money prevailed. However, to preſerve ſome form of decency, James wrote Henry a letter, which was delivered to him at the ſiege of Terouenne: it contained complaints of ſundry grievances, demanding immediate redreſs, and threatening a declaration of war if he did not deſiſt from his deſigns againſt France. Henry's anſwer was delayed, on account of the ſiege, till the twelfth of Auguſt, and it is probable that he ſaw from the contents of James's letter, that it was mere matter of form, and that no anſwer that could be given would divert the king of Scotland from taking this favourable opportunity of invading England, for which he had been making ſuch conſiderable preparations before the king paſſed over to France. Henry, in his anſwer, warmly reproached the king of Scotland for entering into a war with England on ſo frivolous a pretext as that of aſſiſting France; he ſet before him the fate of the king of Navarre, who had juſt been deprived of his dominions for engaging unneceſſarily in the quarrels of France; at the ſame time aſſuring him, that he had received ſuch early intelligence of his baſe deſigns, that he had taken care to provide for the ſecurity of England againſt all his attempts, before he quitted it; and he concluded with vowing revenge on every occaſion.

It is plain that James had no ſerious intention of accommodating his differences with Henry by means of the letter he wrote him; for, without waiting for an anſwer, he took the field in Auguſt, and entered Northumberland at the head of ſixty thouſand men. The firſt place he took of any note was Norham caſtle, which ſurrendered to him after a ſiege of ſix days. The earl of Surry, purſuant to the king's commiſſion before he went to France, had levied an army of twenty thouſand men, and was then in Yorkſhire; with this army he immediately marched to meet the Scots, and on the fourth of September, having advanced near enough, he ſent to offer battle to the king of Scotland, who anſwered the herald, that he would accept it in three days. The herald, on his return, reported, that the king of Scotland was encamped in a very advantageous advantageous ſituation on the ridge of Mount Cheviot; that there was but one narrow field by which to approach him, and that all the ordnance were placed at the foot of the hill to defend this paſs. On this repreſentation, the earl of Surry changed his reſolution, and determined not to give the Scots battle till they ſhould quit this ſituation. The Engliſh army not appearing on the day appointed, the king held a council of war, in which an old nobleman adviſed him to retire to Scotland with his booty, telling him that he had done enough to fulfil his engagements with France; and that it was not prudent to hazard a battle with the Engliſh in their own country; and that, in ſerving France, Scotland was not to be neglected merely to pleaſe the French ambaſſador, who wanted others to undertake hazardous enterprizes to relieve his maſter from his preſent difficulties. This prudent advice was over-ruled, and the king determined to take the firſt favourable opportunity of giving battle to the Engliſh. In the mean time the earl of Surry, in order to draw the king from his advantageous poſt, marched his forces along a river which ſeparated the two armies, and made a feint to enter Scotland by way of Carliſle, the river leading to that city. James, obſerving this motion, ſet fire to his camp, and marched his troops along the oppoſite ſide of the river: the wind happening to drive the ſmoke directly in the faces the Scots, the earl of Surry took advantage of this happy circumſtance, and forded the river almoſt unperceived, which obliged the king of Scotland to draw up his army in great confuſion, and poſſeſs himſelf as faſt as poſſible of a place called Floddon Field: to add to the earl of Surry's good fortune, king James's army was greatly leſſened by deſertion; for many, diſliking the removal of the camp, and approving the advice given by ſome of the nobles, and by the queen, of returning to Scotland, had abſolutely followed it, with the forces under their command; of this number were the earls of Angus and Hume †. In this ſituation the earl of Surry attacked him, and, after a very ſharp and well-fought battle, the Engliſh army gained the victory; but as the battle continued till night, and the ſlaughter was very great on both ſides *, the Engliſh were not ſenſible of their ſucceſs till the next morning, when they found themſelves maſters of the field. The circumſtances of this battle are variouſly reported, the event alone remains indiſputable; for which reaſon we ſhall only add, that on all hands it is acknowleged that king James fought with great bravery, and often refuſed to retire when preſſed to it on account of his perſonal danger: whether he fell in the battle, or was ſlain afterwards by treachery, ſtill remains undecided; however, a dead body, ſuppoſed to be that of the late Scottiſh king, was found, and conveyed to London in a leaden coffin, where it remained for ſome time unburied, till Henry had obtained permiſſion from the pope to have the funeral rites performed, his holineſs having excommunicated him for taking part with France, in oppoſition to the church. James IV. had made a will before he took the field, in conſequence of which, on his demiſe, his queen Margaret was made regent during the minority of his eldeſt ſon, who was but two years old when his father loſt his life. He was immediately acknowleged king, by the name of James V. and the queen-mother, who was Henry of England's ſiſter, wrote a letter to her brother, on his return from France, to deſire him not to purſue the war during her regency; in conſequence of which the king ordered the earl of Surry to withdraw his forces, and the affairs of Scotland gave him no farther trouble at this time.

It has already been obſerved, that Henry, towards the cloſe of the year 1513, had taken a reſolution to enter into a treaty of peace with France, and as the remainder of this year affords nothing worthy of notice in England, the time being paſſed away in continual rejoicings and amuſements, on account of the king's late victories, it will be proper to conſider the ſtate of affairs abroad, that we may form a better idea of the peace with France, which took place in the following year.

After Lewis was reconciled to the pope, and had procured him to write a letter to the king of England, recommending an accommodation with France, renewed the negociation which had been begun at Liſle with the emperor, concerning the marriage of his daughter Renée with Charles of Auſtria. This gave the pope freſh uneaſineſs, as by this treaty Milan muſt have fallen into the hands of the French; and therefore he joined with the Swiſs in labouring to ſettle the family of the Sforzas in that duchy. The chief aim of the Venetians was to obtain an honourable peace with the emperor, which they deſpaired of, in this caſe, without the aſſiſtance of France, which was not to be expected, unleſs they agreed to aſſiſt Lewis in recovering Genoa and the duchy of Milan. The emperor, on his part, had no inclination for peace, the war having been carried on to his advantage againſt the Venetians at the expence of his allies: and as for Ferdinand, it was his deſire to embroil the affairs of Italy as much as poſſible, that he might thereby remain in quiet poſſeſſion of Navarre: with this view he was conſtantly changing ſides, and, to gain time, equally deceiving all parties. His truce with France being expired, he renewed it for another year: and the pope, alarmed at the negociation between the emperor and Lewis, endeavoured to reconcile the latter with the Swiſs, and the emperor with the Venetians, that the French might not get footing again in Italy; but all his attempts proved unſucceſsful, for, after a long negociation, the Venetians and the emperor choſe him arbiter of their diſputes, and he pronounced a proviſional decree, "that a truce ſhould immediately take place: that the emperor ſhould, by way of depoſit or ſecurity, till the final deciſion of their diſpute, put in his hands the town of Vincenza; and that the Venetians ſhould do the ſame with reſpect to Crema, and ſhould pay the emperor fifty thouſand ducats: but that this proviſional agreement ſhould be null, if not ratified by both parties:" and the Venetians not ratifying it, the agreement was accordingly annulled. Nearly in this ſituation the affairs of the belligerant powers remained till the campaign of 1514.

On the third of January, this year, the parliament of England aſſembled, in which nothing of importance was tranſacted, except that the king created ſeveral peers; and amongſt the reſt he created the earl of Surry duke of Norfolk, thereby reſtoring him, for his good ſervices, to the title which his father had loſt with his life, in the defence of Richard III. at the battle of Boſworth *: by this change Thomas Howard, ſon and heir of the new duke, became earl of Surry. Charles Brandon, viſcount Liſle, was now created duke of Suffolk; and Charles Somerſet, lord Herbert, earl of Worceſter: Margaret of York, daughter of the duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. obtained at the ſame time the title of counteſs of Saliſbury, as heireſs to the earl of Warwick, her brother, beheaded by Henry VII †. Wolſey was, during this ſeſſion, promoted to the biſhopric of Lincoln by the pope, and admitted to retain the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay: ſo ſenſible was the pope of the value of ſuch a friend in the Engliſh court.

In the mean time the negociation with France was in great forwardneſs; but was carried on with great ſecrecy, no perſon being made acquainted with it but Wolſey; and the whole tranſaction was managed, on the part of Lewis, by the duke of Longueville, who was taken priſoner at the Battle of the Spurs, and who had a ſecret commiſſion appointing him the king of France's ambaſſador extraordinary on this occaſion. As ſoon as all the preliminaries were ſettled, Lewis ſent over two public ambaſſadors, and a ceſſation of hoſtilities immediately took place, and, after ſome little obſtructions, three definitive treaties were ſigned on the ſeventh day of Auguſt.

The firſt treaty ſtipulated,

"That the peace ſhould ſubſiſt till the demiſe of one of the parties; and that the ſucceſſor ſhould give notice to the ſurvivor, within twelve months, if he intended to renew the treaty.

"That all impoſitions laid on the merchandize of the ſubjects of either crown within the preceding fifty-two years, ſhould be aboliſhed.

"That rebellious ſubjects ſhould not be harboured or protected by either party.

"That the peace ſhould not be deemed violated by any private tumults or diſorders that might ariſe on either ſide.

"That each ſhould defend the dominions of the other when attacked, at the expence of the crown that ſhould demand aſſiſtance, provided the attack ſhould be made in conſequence of this treaty, in which Scotland was included, on condition no hoſtilities were committed by that kingdom againſt England after the twenty-fifth of November."

The ſecond treaty was a contract of marriage between Lewis and the princeſs Mary, Henry's ſiſter, who had been ſolemnly contracted to Charles of Auſtria, but that prince not appearing at Calais at the time appointed for the ſolemnization of the marriage, by the treaty of Liſle, Henry now thought proper to give her to Lewis, who had lately buried his queen. It was agreed by this treaty,

"That the marriage between Lewis and the princeſs Mary ſhould be contracted by proxies, in ten days after the ſigning of the treaty.

"That the princeſs ſhould be conducted to Abbeville at the expence of the king of England; and that Lewis ſhould conſummate the marriage in four days after her arrival.

"That the princeſs Mary's dower ſhould be four hundred thouſand crowns, one half of which ſhould be laid out in jewels; and in caſe of recovery, that Lewis ſhould only be obliged to reſtore the jewels: the other half was to be paid by acquittal of ſo much of the ſum of one million of crowns which Lewis agreed to pay to Henry by the third treaty, in which he acknowleged,

"That, by the treaty of Eſtaples, Charles VIII. was bound to pay to Henry VII. or his ſucceſſors, the ſum of ſeven hundred and forty-five thouſand crowns, and that he was obliged to pay the arrears of that ſum.

"Alſo that Charles, duke of Orleans, his father, by an obligation dated in March, 1444. appeared to be indebted to Margaret, ducheſs of Somerſet, grand-mother to Henry VIII. wherefore theſe two ſums remaining ſtill unpaid, by this treaty Lewis bound himſelf to pay to the king of England, or his ſucceſſors, a million of crowns, by half yearly payments till the whole was diſcharged ‡."

Thus the war between France and England was ended on very advantageous terms for Henry, who had ſuffered himſelf to be drawn into it by the ſuperior policy of his allies. Before the ſecond treaty was ſigned, it was judged neceſſary for the princeſs to declare, in preſence of two notaries, that ſhe had been betrothed to Charles of Auſtria without her conſent; that Charles, on his part, had failed in the performance of his promiſe to be contracted to her by proxy, as ſoon as ſhe attained the age of fourteen; and that his counſellors and confederates had lately inſpired him with enmity againſt her brother, the king of England; on which accounts ſhe deemed the intended marriage with him null and void, and that ſhe was at full liberty to marry the king of France: which marriage was accordingly conſummated at Abbeville, in the month of October, without ſo much as demanding a diſpenſation from the pope to abſolve the princeſs from her former contract.

* For his memorable victory over the Scots at Floddon, he had a ſpecial grant from the king, to himſelf and the heirs male of his body, of an honourable augmentation to his arms; namely, to bear on the bend thereof the upper half of a red lyon (painted as the arms of Scotland are) pierced through the mouth with an arrow. He was created duke of Norfolk, Feb. 1, 1514. His father derived his deſcent (by the heirs male of Mowbray, and Seagrave) from Thomas Brotherton, ſon to king Edward I. While

While Wolſey was engaged in this important negociation, cardinal Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, was poiſoned at Rome, by Rinaldo de Modena, his chaplain, in revenge for a blow he had given him. Notice was ſent to the king of his death by cardinal Julius de Medici, afterwards pope Clement VII. acquainting him at the ſame time, that he had prevailed on the pope to keep the ſee of York vacant till the king's pleaſure was known. Upon this the king demanded the archbiſhopric for Wolſey, which was readily granted. The remainder of this year affords little matter of any conſequence, except the intrigues of the emperor and Ferdinand, who laboured to the laſt to prevent the peace between England and France, and to obſtruct its good effects. As to domeſtic affairs, the king enjoyed perfect tranquility, and ſpent his time in his uſual diverſions.

On the firſt day of the following year, 1515, died Lewis XII. leaving behind him the glorious character of Father of his Country. But the death of this prince made no alteration in Henry's affairs, for the count d'Angouleſme, who ſucceeded him by the name of Francis I. plainly diſcovered his intention of purſuing the plan of his predeceſſor, by adding to his other titles that of duke of Milan. By this event Lewis's young queen was left miſtreſs of her perſon, and accordingly ſhe took care to prevent any future diſpoſal of it to anſwer political ends, for ſhe privately married Charles Brandon, the newly created duke of Suffolk. Her affection for this accompliſhed nobleman was ſo well known, even before her marriage with Lewis, that when ſhe went over to France, the count d'Angouleſme took care to have her narrowly watched, leſt ſhe ſhould give the king an heir to his excluſion. Henry, ſuſpecting her deſign, wrote to her, in February, not to diſpoſe of herſelf without his conſent; but the queen, truſting to her intereſt with her brother, thought proper to give her hand to her beloved Brandon, and to write to the king what ſhe had done, taking the whole blame to herſelf: and though Henry was diſpleaſed at firſt, in a ſhort time he was reconciled, and they returned to the Engliſh court.

As England was now free from all foreign and domeſtic diſputes, the parliament, which met on the fifth of February this year, was wholly employed in enacting ſome wholeſome and beneficial laws reſpecting the civil and commercial intereſts of the nation, of which in their proper place.

About the middle of March this year, Francis I. ſent inſtructions to his ambaſſador at London to renew the alliance with Henry, as alſo the bond for a million of crowns ſigned by Lewis. And in the month of May king Ferdinand ſent an ambaſſador to London, to propoſe the renewal of his alliance with Henry, and to court his friendſhip; but Henry had been ſo often deceived by him, that the ambaſſador was received very coldly, and probably would never have ſucceeded in his negociations, had not Wolſey been brought to favour his maſter's intereſt, and to bring about a reconciliation, which he effected in the month of October.

While theſe things were tranſacting at home, Charles, archduke of Auſtria, had aſſumed the government of the Low Countries, and had made a treaty with Francis I. which a little alarmed Henry, who had reaſon to fear his reſenting the diſpoſal of the princeſs Mary to another, when ſhe had been contracted to him in his minority: the king therefore ſent two ambaſſadors to Bruſſels to palliate his conduct, and ſolicit the friendſhip of Charles; but they were very ill received, and no notice was taken of the ſubject of their embaſſy for ſeveral months: the young archduke prudently declined entering into any party, till he ſaw more of the intentions of the other powers, and particularly of Francis I. who began to make preparations for carrying on a new war in Italy. Indeed, as ſoon as he aſcended the throne, he declared that he would expel the Sforzas from the duchy of Milan, and annex that duchy to the crown of France. As he was a prince poſſeſſed of equal valour and ambition, the eyes of all parties were turned upon him, and Ferdinand began to prepare for the defence of Naples and Navarre: but he might have been relieved from his fears for the preſent, by a renewal of the truce which Francis propoſed to him, on condition that he would remain neuter in the affairs of Milan; however, Ferdinand was ſo accuſtomed to deceive others, that he could not rely on Francis, and therefore rejected his propoſal, and made uſe of it to engage the emperor and the Swiſs to join with him in the defence of Milan; thereby to divert Francis from any thoughts of turning his arms againſt Navarre, whilſt he ſaw himſelf likely to be ſo ſtrongly oppoſed in his attempt to recover Milan, that it was neceſſary to employ all his ſtrength in that quarter. The emperor readily entered into a league with Ferdinand, and the Swiſs were at laſt prevailed upon, though with much difficulty, for the French had a party amongſt them; but the allies agreeing to pay them thirty thouſand ducats monthly, they ſigned the treaty in conjunction with Ferdinand, the emperor, and Sforza, duke of Milan.

Ferdinand having gained this point, engaged them to attack Francis in his own kingdom, as the ſhorteſt way to divert him from any attempts on Milan; and he promiſed on his part, to make a diverſion on the ſide of Fontarabia, while they ſhould attack Burgundy: as for the emperor, he was to continue the war in the Venetian territories, to prevent their aſſiſting Francis. The ſole aim of Ferdinand in this confederacy being, at all events, to ſecure Navarre, he no ſooner learned that Francis was marching his forces towards the Alps, in order to enter the duchy of Milan, than he diſbanded the army he had raiſed for the defence of Navarre, leaving Milan to the care of the Swiſs; and ſo very deceitful was he in this, as in all his other treaties of alliance, that even his army in Italy, under the command of the vice roy of Naples, had no orders to aſſiſt the Swiſs, while on the other hand, the emperor and the pope, who had been included in the league, remained totally inactive, and the Swiſs were left alone to ſuſtain the burden of the war, in the ſame manner as Henry had been ſerved a few years before.

Francis having ſucceſsfully marched his army through a defile between mount Viſo and mount Cenis, which, being deemed an impracticable paſs, had been left unguarded, the Swiſs retired precipitately to Milan, and the French advanced to the ſame city: a negociation was then ſet on foot for engaging the Swiſs to withdraw their forces, in conſideration of a certain ſum of money offered them by Francis; but a reinforcement of fifteen thouſand of their countrymen arriving, it was reſolved, by the advice of cardinal Sion, to attack the French, who were encamped at Marignano, and little expected them. This reſolution coſt them dear, for they loſt ten thouſand men in the action, and were totally defeated; the remainder of the army returned home, and Francis made himſelf maſter of the duchy of Milan: as to Maximilian Sforza, the late duke, he had ſhut himſelf up in the citadel of Milan, which he was obliged to ſurrender on capitulation, and agree to retire to France, there to reſide as a private gentleman. In the mean time Octavian Fregoſa had reduced Genoa to the obedience of France, and inſtead of a doge declared himſelf governor for the king his maſter.

The popes, when they chanced to make leagues or undertake wars that did not proſper, could always find a way to extricate themſelves in quality of head of the church and vicar of Jeſus Chriſt. Leo X. had been in hopes that Francis would never be able to enter Italy, and joined in the league againſt him ſo privately, that Francis knew nothing of it till he came to Verceil; but his holineſs no ſooner received tidings of the victory of Marignano, than he made propoſals of reconciliation to Francis; and though the pontiff's behaviour had been ſuch that he deſerved no favour from that victorious prince, yet he obtained however advantages which he could ſcarcely have expected, had he even been his friend from the beginning.

As the Scots had been comprehended in the renewal of the late treaty between Francis and Henry, it will be proper to attend the hiſtory of that people, ſo far as it is connected with that of England. James IV. who was ſlain in the battle of Floddon, had left one only ſon his ſucceſſor, who was not as yet two years of age; but, ſoon after his death, his queen was delivered of a poſthumous child. She had been by his will declared regent of the kingdom, and the ſurviving nobility had ſubmitted to her authority, which, however, was but of ſhort duration; for giving her hand to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus, the party which oppoſed that nobleman, headed by the earl of Hume, perſuaded the ſtates to beſtow the regency on John Stuart, duke of Albany, ſon of Alexander, duke of Albany, brother to James III. who, having died in France, where he took refuge ‡, left his title to this ſon, a young nobleman of great abilities, and warmly devoted to the intereſts of Lewis XII. who had diſtinguiſhed him with many marks of favour and regard. Lewis XII. dying during theſe tranſactions, Francis I. his ſucceſſor, having great reaſons not to diſoblige the king of England, who violently oppoſed the election of the duke of Albany, would not ſuffer that nobleman to depart till he had compleated his treaty with Henry, ſo that he did not arrive in Scotland before the eighth of May this year; and the firſt act of his government upon record, was on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month, when, as regent and protector of Scotland, he confirmed the acceſſion of the Scots to the late treaty between France and England †.

Francis I. from the inſtant of his acceſſion to the crown of France, had formed the deſign of getting Tournay out of the hands of the Engliſh; for this purpoſe he had made ſome overtures to Henry, but the Engliſh monarch demanding ſome places in exchange which Francis thought above an equivalent, the negociation was dropped. The truth is, that Wolſey, fearful, if this compromiſe ſhould take place, he ſhould loſe the valuable adminiſtration of that biſhopric, had perſuaded Henry, who was wholly governed by his advice, to ſtand upon ſuch terms as the miniſter knew muſt fruſtrate the deſign: and by his inſtigation, twelve hundred carpenters and maſons were ſent over this year, with three hundred other labourers, for making ſome additional works to the town; and orders were tranſmitted to the lord Mountjoy, the governor, to be in a particular manner upon his guard to prevent a ſurprize, which Wolſey affected to fear on the part of the French king.

Francis, nettled at this proceeding, perſuaded the pope (Leo X.) who durſt not diſoblige him, to reinſtate Guillard, the former biſhop of Tournay, in that ſee; a bull was accordingly iſſued for that purpoſe, and obtained before Wolſey knew any thing of the matter. This mandate gave great offence both to Henry and his favourite, who thus ſaw himſelf deprived of a very lucrative office: but Francis, who had never an intention to break entirely with Wolſey, whoſe friendſhip was ſo neceſſary to him about Henry's perſon, endeavoured to appeaſe the powerful prelate by promiſing to exert his utmoſt efforts to procure him a cardinal's hat, which he knew to be the principal object of his ambition.

Wolſey before this had made ſeveral advances to obtain that honour: upon the death of cardinal Bambridge, archbiſhop of York, he had employed Adrian de Caſtello, who was biſhop of Bath, and collector for the pope in England, to be his agent in this affair; but de Caſtello, inſtead of promoting, had betrayed Wolſey's intereſt, which when the latter knew, he was ſo exaſperated, that he threw Polydore Virgil, the hiſtorian, who was ſubcollector in England to Caſtello, into the Tower, from whence he was with great difficulty afterwards releaſed, though not till Wolſey had obtained the cardinal's hat, which Francis at this time actually procured him *; but the haughty prelate looked upon the favour as due to his merit, and, inſtead of ſhewing himſelf grateful to Francis, he ſtill retained an implacable hatred againſt him, on account of the affair of Tournay, and did all he could, not only to exaſperate Henry, but to promote a general league in Europe againſt him.

Henry's cabinet-council was at this time compoſed of Wolſey; Fox, the old biſhop of Wincheſter; the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk; and Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury: the four latter, though extremely devoted to the king, made the intereſt of their country the governing principle of all their councils, and were deſirous that the king might huſband both his treaſure and his reputation. As Francis had hitherto behaved with ſeeming good faith towards England, they ſaw no reaſon for indulging ſo bitter a ſpirit againſt France, and accordingly oppoſed the cardinal in the council, when he was labouring to prove that it was the intereſt of England to humble the French monarch: at the ſame time they adviſed the king rather to turn his arms againſt Scotland, where the French party, under the duke of Albany, prevailed over the intereſt of his ſiſter.

Wolſey, impatient of controul, and holding it for a maxim, "that thoſe who were not with, muſt be againſt him," reſented this oppoſition ſo much, that he never ceaſed till he had alienated the king's favour and countenance from the honeſt counſellors, who were not long before they perceived the change, nor much at a loſs to divine the cauſe: they for ſome time, however, kept their ſentiments to themſelves; but at laſt old Wincheſter's patience forſook him, at beholding a creature of his own rearing, over-top himſelf and every one at court, and ſought leave to retire to his biſhopric, which was eaſily granted him: however, before he left the council-board, he told the king in his blunt way, "that he hoped he would not ſuffer the ſervant to be greater than the maſter." "Fear not, my good lord biſhop (replied Henry), it ſhall be my care that ſubjects ſhall obey, and not command." An anſwer which ſtung Fox to the quick, who now haſtened his departure for his dioceſe. He was followed in his reſignation by the duke of Norfolk, who likewiſe withdrew from a court where he perceived he was looked upon as little better than a cypher. The duke of Suffolk ſoon after applying for the remiſſion of a large ſum of money he had borrowed from the crown, to ſupport the great figure he had made in France, was violently oppoſed in his ſuit by Wolſey, upon which he alſo retired from court.

But there yet remained a formidable rival at the council-board, who muſt be removed before Wolſey could completely carry his point; this was Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of approved diſintereſtedneſs and prudence, who had never indeed entered into any court intrigu s, but, being poſſeſſed of the great-ſeal as chancellor, he was often uneaſy to Wolſey; but the latter not daring to puſh at him in a violent manner, compaſſed his ends in another way, and managed ſo as to oblige Warham to reſign the great ſeal.

Since his promotion to the dignity of cardinal he had become more vain, proud, and imperious than ever; but the chief ſtreſs of his arrogance was levelled againſt Warham: to mortify whom, he this year got himſelf appointed legate a latere from the pope, which gave him precedency in the province of the archbiſhop of Canterbury; and being thus empowered to have the legatine croſs borne before him, he cauſed that of York to be alſo carried erect along with it. We have ſpoken elſewhere of the conteſt between the two ſees, which, after having cauſed violent quarrels, could not be decided but by the king's expreſs commands to the archbiſhops of York not to have the croſs carried before them in the other province; but Wolſey, who thought himſelf much above his predeceſſors, prepared to revive the conteſt in contempt of theſe prohibitions, and made ſuch other encroachments upon the archbiſhop in his eccleſiaſtical capacity, as left him little better than a cypher at court. Warham, who was of a peaceable temper, ſeeing the moſt valuable rights and privileges of his primacy trampled upon by this inſolent miniſter, and knowing that if he ſhould attempt to oppoſe him, he ſhould not ſucceed, by reaſon of the abſolute ſway the other had over the king, he reſigned the great-ſeal into Henry's hands, who, two days after, committed it to the cuſtody of Wolſey, whom he enabled to ſupport his increaſing dignity with continual benefactions of prebends, wardſhips, and other perquiſites. Beſides the revenues of his archiepiſcopal ſee, and the office of chancellor, he farmed at a low rate the biſhoprics of Bath, Worceſter, and Hereford, poſſeſſed by Italians, who were allowed to reſide abroad, and who were glad to purchaſe this indulgence by parting with a conſiderable ſhare of their profits.

Wolſey being now rid of every check upon his conduct, purſued his favourite project of being revenged upon Francis I. by ſetting the king his maſter at variance with him, and cauſing him to enter into a league againſt France. Having properly prepared Henry by repeated inſinuations of the danger of letting France grow too powerful, he privately acquainted the emperor Maximilian, that it would not be difficult to diſengage his maſter from his connexion with Francis; and in the mean time he perſuaded Henry to renew the alliance between Spain and England, notwithſtanding the treachery and deceit with which Ferdinand of Arragon had formerly behaved.

As to Maximilian, he was overjoyed at this propoſal: he had for ſome time been apprehenſive that the balance of power muſt be ruined in Italy by the ſucceſs of Francis, unleſs he could raiſe him up a competitor for the duchy of Milan; the preſent conjuncture appeared moſt favourable to his project, and he diſpatched an ambaſſador to London, to ſolicit ſuccours for Francis Sforza, who now reſided in Germany, and had borne the title of duke of Milan ever ſince the captivity of his elder brother.

Notwithſtanding all the arrogance of Wolſey, he ſaw many difficulties offer themſelves to the carrying on his deſigns; but he obviated them all by that politic diſſimulation which ſerved him ſo effectually through the whole courſe of his adminiſtration: he deſired Henry not to rely wholly on his advice, but to ſummon a general council, and take the opinions of the ableſt ſtateſmen of the kingdom; at the ſame time he was ſure that his ſovereign was already ſo prepoſſeſſed by the force of the arguments he had laid before him, that any oppoſition to his plan would only end in the confuſion of thoſe who ſhould ſet themſelves up againſt it.

A general council being ſummoned on this occaſion, Wolſey opened the aſſembly with a long and laboured ſpeech, in which he very roundly gave his opinion for a breach with France, and expatiated on the reaſons which Henry had to be diſſatisfied with that court; he in particular dwelt upon the protection which Francis had afforded to the duke of Albany, who, by French intereſt, had wreſted the government of Scotland from a princeſs of the Engliſh blood; and, after many florid arguments, concluded with obſerving, that the daily ſucceſſes of Francis, and the continual accretion of his power, were alone ſufficient reaſons for England to interpoſe to check the progreſs of thoſe arms, which, in a ſhort time, ſhe might expect to ſee turned againſt herſelf. There was a ſtrong oppoſition made to this belligerant ſcheme, drawn from the ſacred nature of public faith, and of the engagements between Henry and Francis: but the biſhop of Durham and ſome other new counſellors, introduced by the cardinal, declared themſelves to be ſtrongly of his opinion.

At laſt, the debate being over, Henry declared himſelf in favour of his miniſter's ſentiments, but, in order to follow a middle courſe, added, "that he did not mean to plunge England into a war, but to raiſe work for France by ſupporting the Sforza family;" as, in all probability, had been ſuggeſted to him by his favourite and director. Agreeable to theſe views he empowered Richard Pace, his ambaſſador at the court of the emperor Maximilian, to treat with that ſovereign and the duke of Milan on this ſubject, and in the mean time ſupplied them with a large ſum of money.

Sforza was not ungrateful for this inſtance of Wolſey's friendſhip, as appears from an authentic note of hand given to Wolſey by Michael de Abbatis, ſecretary to the duke of Milan, for a penſion of ten thouſand ducats to the cardinal, as ſoon as his maſter ſhould recover poſſeſſion of his duchy*.

I muſt now, before we cloſe the year 1515, briefly mention the affairs of Scotland, which likewiſe engaged the government's attention. We have already obſerved, that Alexander, duke of Albany, arrived in Scotland in the beginning of the year, where he found the kingdom involved in civil diſcord and diſſention, which the king of England carefully fomented. As uncle to the infant James V. he aſſumed the title of Protector of the Scottiſh realm, and, by the connivance of the pope, filled the benefices with his own creatures.

The duke of Albany, though of Scottiſh extraction, was a ſtranger to Scotland, being born in the time of his father's baniſhment, nor could he ſo much as ſpeak the country language: in this ſituation he was under a neceſſity to be guided by the counſels of others, natives of the kingdom; and he adopted thoſe of Hepburn, biſhop of Murray, a paſſionate and factious prelate, who having a diſpute about his dioceſe with Fermor, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, who was ſupported by the earl of Hume, he repreſented this nobleman ſo diſadvantageouſly to the regent, that the latter treated him with manifeſt ſigns of coldneſs, and even contempt.

Hume, being naturally proud and haughty, was ſtung to the quick with Albany's behaviour, and reſolved to let him ſee that he was not a perſon to be affronted with impunity: he directly reconciled himſelf to the queen dowager, and perſuading her that the king her ſon was in danger, adviſed her to carry him over privately to England, and to throw both herſelf and the young monarch upon the protection of Henry. The queen, alarmed for the ſafety of her ſon, gave into the advice of Hume, and had actually got as far as Stirling with the infant king on their way ſouthward, when Albany, having received intelligence of their deſign, ſuddenly ſurprized them both: however, he ſhewed ſo much regard for the queen of Scotland, as to leave her at liberty to retire into England, which ſhe did this year, with her huſband the earl of Angus; but the perſon of the young monarch was by Albany delivered to the care of noblemen of the greateſt diſtinction and neareſt relation to the crown. As for Hume, he, with the earl of Arran, a nobleman allied to his family, made his eſcape into England; whereupon the regent ſent ambaſſadors to Henry, to juſtify his conduct; and at the ſame time ſo artfully treated with the fugitives, that he prevailed with them to return into Scotland. In the mean time the queen of Scotland was delivered of a daughter at Harbottle caſtle, in Northumberland, who was chriſtened by the name of Margaret.

The beginning of the year 1516 was diſtinguiſhed by the death of the famous Ferdinand, king of Arragon, by which event the crown of Spain of courſe devolved upon prince Charles, whoſe mother Juanna remained ſtill unfit for government. Wolſey, to his great mortification, now ſaw his meaſures broke, for engaging all Europe in a war with France; for a diviſion happening in the councils of the young prince of Spain, and a diſpute about the regency of Caſtile during his minority, de Chievres, his governor, who had a great aſcendant over him, and always inclined to the French party, perſuaded Charles to take no manner of concern in the affairs of Europe until thoſe of his own territories were ſettled. Nothing remarkable paſſed in England in the beginning of the year 1516, except the birth of a princeſs, of whom the queen was delivered on the eighteenth day of February, at Greenwich, and who was afterwards the infamous queen Mary.

It was not without reaſon that Maximilian had readily embraced the opportunity offered him by cardinal Wolſey, of making war upon France: there was no more likelihood of his being able to keep his conqueſts in the ſtate of Venice, ſince Francis I. was become maſter of the Milaneſe, and had joined forces with the Venetians; nor could he expect any farther aſſiſtance from the pope, who had lately made his peace with the French king; he therefore found he ſhould be obliged to act alone in Italy: but firſt he tried to cajole Henry, by offering to inveſt him with the duchy of Milan, and then to reſign the imperial diadem in his favour, and put him in poſſeſſion of the empire. At the ſame time he delivered to Pace, Henry's ambaſſador at his court, a plan for executing his project, in which it was propoſed, "that the king of England ſhould croſs the ſea with two thouſand horſe and four thouſand archers, and march through the Low Countries to Triers, where Maximilian was to meet him, with the electors and other German princes, and the reſignation of the empire was to be accompliſhed, and the inveſtiture of Milan granted. An army, raiſed in the empire, was to be there aſſembled, ready to enter France on that ſide, on being joined by one thouſand Engliſh horſe and three thouſand archers, under the duke of Suffolk, or ſome other general of equal quality; whilſt Henry, with a thouſand horſe and as many archers, and another body of German troops, ſhould paſs through the Auſtrian territories, and the country of the Griſons, to the lake of Coma, and ſo to Milan; from whence, matters being thus ſettled, Maximilian was to attend him to Rome, where he ſhould be crowned emperor †."

Whatever ambition Henry had in his nature, he had too good a judgment to accept of this glaring propoſal: he was by this time perfectly well acquainted with Maximilian, and therefore, thanking him for his offer, he deſired he would defer the execution of his ſcheme to a more favourable opportunity, and in the mean time gratified him with a ſum of money, which was the real object of the emperor's purſuit, who was ſo eager for driving the French out of Italy, that he employed this money in raiſing an army of about twenty thouſand Germans and Swiſs, with which, in the month of March, he entered the ſtate of Venice, while the Venetians, aſſiſted by a body of French troops, commanded by Lautrec, were beſieging Breſcia. Upon his approach the French and Venetians raiſed the ſiege, and, after making a ſhew of oppoſing his paſſage of the rivers Mincio, Oglio, and Adda, retired to Milan to avoid a battle. Then the emperor approached Milan without much difficulty; but thirteen thouſand Swiſs arriving at the ſame time, on the other ſide of the town, to the aſſiſtance of the French, Maximilian ſaw his enterprize was impracticable; and having reaſon, from ſome intercepted letters, to apprehend a conſpiracy was formed for ſeizing his perſon, he decamped with great precipitation, and repaſſed the Adda. The French, puſhing the Imperialiſts in their retreat, cut off numbers of them, while ſtill greater numbers were daily deſerting. Maximilian, abandoning all his conqueſts, retired with the utmoſt expedition into the Trentin, and the French in a few days took Breſcia. All this happened before the twenty-ſeventh of May, when the ambaſſador Pace ſent advice of the ſucceſſes of the French; but their career was then ſtopped, being repulſed with loſs in ſeveral attacks upon Verona, and forced to raiſe the ſiege of that place upon the approach of count William de Roquendolf, one of Maximilian's generals.

Whilſt the emperor was endeavouring to embroil the French affairs, Francis was forming a new project for the conqueſt of Naples, and tried to render the pope propitious to his undertaking; but Leo wiſhed for nothing ſo eagerly as the expulſion of the French from Italy, and, forgetting all his obligations to Francis, laboured to make the beſt of the preſent poſture of affairs, and, while he amuſed the king of France with vague negociations, exerted all his endeavours in private to traverſe his deſigns.

Maximilian ſtill ſeemed determined to purſue the war, and make another expedition into Italy. It was with this view, and in the hopes of getting more money from England, that he ſent the cardinal of Sion thither, to apologize for his late retreat from the Milaneſe, and to propoſe a new alliance. The cardinal acted his part ſo well, that he once more brought Henry to truſt his court; and, on the twentieth of October this year, the plan of a new treaty was formed for the defence of holy church, and for reſtraining the unbounded ambition of certain princes. The young king of Spain and his mother were parties in this treaty, as were likewiſe the cantons of Switzerland. The heads of the treaty now concluded were as follow:

"I. That the confederates ſhould defend one another, and bring aid by land, at their own coſt, being required, within one month after complaint againſt the enemy.

"II. If the enemy have not port-towns, &c. then the war ſhould alſo be made by ſea by them both, and the fleet ſupplied if it be diminiſhed, &c.

"III. That no peace ſhall be made with the enemy, or truce, but by mutual conſent.

"IV. Place alſo was left for other princes whatſoever, to come into this league within eight months, by conſent of all the confederates.

"V. That pope Leo X. ſhall be comprized in this league, if he will excommunicate the perſons and ſtates that ſhall moleſt the confederates, and that he enter within ſix months.

"VI. That the Swiſs ſhall be admitted if they will, ſo that they bind themſelves not to ſerve under any other princes, and on that condition to have penſions."

This laſt article ſeems to have had no effect, ſince the king of France made, about the ſame time, a league with the whole Helvetic body (ſtyled the Treaty of Perpetual Peace), in which, upon augmenting their penſions, the Swiſs engaged never to aſſiſt any potentate againſt France.

As nothing in this league pointed directly againſt France, Francis took great care not to puſh Henry into any open breach; he even, on the fifth day of November, this year, punctually paid fifty thouſand crowns, as ſtipulated by the late treaty with England; and now perceiving the inſincerity of the pope, he dropped all thoughts of the conqueſt of Naples, and applied himſelf to gain over Charles, the young king of Spain. This latter, wiſely reſolving, if poſſible, in the infant ſtate of his government, to live well with all, ſo as to be ſure of the aſſiſtance of the one ſtate, if he ſhould be attacked by the other, agreed to open conferences at Noyon, de Boiſi acting for the king of France, and de Chievres for the king of Spain. Each of thoſe miniſters had been tutor to his maſter, and was zealous for his intereſt. The conferences laſted thirteen days, and ended in a treaty, by which it was agreed, That Charles ſhould marry mademoiſelle Louiſa, the daughter of Francis, inſtead of madame Renée, the late king's daughter; and that he ſhould pay one hundred thouſand crowns a year for the board of the young lady, who was but a year old, until ſhe was marriageable. In conſideration of this, Francis was to reſign to Charles all his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples. By another article it was agreed, that Charles ſhould, within ſix months, reſign the kingdom of Navarre to Henry d'Albret, ſon of John d'Albret and Catherine, king and queen of Navarre, who had been diſpoſſeſſed by Ferdinand; and in caſe he ſhould not perform this article, Francis ſhould be allowed to aſſiſt the king of Navarre *.

Soon after, the emperor, that mean, mercenary, timid, and inconſtant prince, weary of his league with England, that brought him in no money, and afraid that Francis might interrupt his grandſon Charles's journey into Spain, and thereby defeat the whole ſcheme of his ſucceſſion, did, towards the end of this year, agree that a congreſs ſhould be held at Bruges, and a treaty of peace with France was ſigned by his miniſters at Cambray, in March following, by which, for the conſideration of two hundred thouſand ducats, Maximilian delivered up Verona into the hands of the French general, who immediately reſtored it to the Venetians.

The Engliſh court was not much alarmed at the treaty of Noyon: the diſcerning Wolſey plainly ſaw that Charles, by this treaty, meant nothing more than to gain time, by granting Francis whatever he could deſire, for fear of being hindered by him from going to take poſſeſſion of his dominions:

but the conduct of Maximilian was of a much more ſerious nature to England, and the cardinal now ſaw his whole ſyſtem of politics daſhed in pieces by a ſingle blow. The emperor had, by his treaty with France, ſhut himſelf out of Italy, the promiſing alliance againſt France was vaniſhed into ſmoke, and the great ſums Henry had advanced appeared to have been uſeleſly ſquandered: in a word, England was obliged for ſome time to taſte the ſweets of peace, that moſt deſireable of all ſtates to a trading and a maritime power, ſuch as ſhe at this time began to be.

But it fared not ſo well with her ſiſter kingdom, Scotland, where the Humes ſtill continued to foment diſturbances; and Henry, at their inſtigation, had, in the beginning of this year, wrote to the Scottiſh parliament, deſiring that they would ſend back the duke of Albany to France, becauſe it was not proper that the young king ſhould be in the power of his preſumptive heir; and he threatened, in caſe they ſhould refuſe to comply with this propoſal, that he would take other meaſures for the preſervation of his nephew. The parliament, in anſwer to this letter from Henry, ſent a memorial, or, as they ſtyle it, "a refuſal to the king of England, touching his advice to remove the duke of Albany from the government of the young king of Scotland," ſealed with the ſeals of the chief nobility of the kingdom. In this paper, after ſome reaſoning with Henry touching the nature of his demands, they tell him, that "the duke had been elected regent without one diſſenting voice in all their parliament, whoſe ordinances and elections were not to be impugned by any perſon whatſoever*."

The Humes finding their ſcheme fruſtrated by the noble reſolution of the parliament, perſuaded Hamilton, earl of Arran, to claim the regency, as kinſman to the king, and in the mean time they levied troops to ſupport his pretenſions. The duke of Albany being informed of this conſpiracy, marched againſt the earl of Arran, and in a few days reduced his caſtle of Hamilton; then the Humes, pulling off the maſk, made themſelves maſters of Dunbar, which they demoliſhed; but being defeated and taken in fight, they were brought to trial, and loſt their lives and eſtates as traitors to their country. The regent having thus eſtabliſhed his authority, acted with ſo much prudence that he preſerved the affections of the Scots, and gained the eſteem of Henry and his miniſter, notwithſtanding all that the party of the queen dowager could do to hinder it; and, on the laſt day of December, 1516, Henry agreed to a truce with Scotland for one year.

The year 1517 affords very little buſineſs for the hiſtorian's pen in relation to affairs in England, which now enjoyed a profound peace, ſave that a ſedition was raiſed by the London apprentices, on account of the great number of foreign tradeſmen that had ſettled in England, on the great encouragement which cardinal Wolſey, who may truly be ſtyled the father of revived learning in this country, gave to men of learning and abilities in the polite and mechanic arts. As thoſe foreigners, at their firſt ſettlement, generally excelled the Engliſh in dexterity and application to their buſineſs, the ſhopkeepers and the lower ſet of artificers complained that their cuſtomers fell off, and that greater encouragement was given to foreigners than to the natives. From murmurings they came to acts of outrage, and many ſtrangers were inſulted and beaten upon the ſtreets, until the government was obliged to interfere by iſſuing an order for all tradeſmen to keep their apprentices and ſervants within doors from ſeven at night till nine in the morning: but the latter ſo ill brooked this reſtraint, that, on the evening of the thirtieth of April, they gathered in great numbers, broke open ſeveral priſons, ſet criminals at liberty, and pulled down the houſes of foreigners. But they were ſuppreſſed in a few days, and many of them condemned to death: one Lincoln, a broker, their ringleader, with a few others, were actually executed; but all the reſt, amounting to above four thouſand, were pardoned at the interceſſion and by the advice of cardinal Wolſey.

This year England was viſited with a return of that moſt dreadful epidemical diſeaſe, the ſweating ſickneſs. The effects were very ſudden, for it proved fatal in three hours after the patient was affected. When it firſt began, Henry's court was extremely ſplendid and numerous, on account of the queen of Scotland's being in London upon a viſit to her brother; but the dreadful havock which the ſickneſs made, ſoon thinned it: that princeſs retired to Berwick with her huſband; the law-terms were adjourned; and Henry, to keep as much as he could the infection from his family, reduced his officers and domeſtics to a very ſmall number. It was computed, that in ſome towns half, and in others one third of the inhabitants, died of this dreadful diſtemper.

In the mean while Maximilian, finding his late conduct in Italy had reduced him very low in the eſteem of the Engliſh court, ſought to revive Henry's ambition by keeping him in hopes of the imperial dignity: what abſurdities will not ambition and avarice lead men into! Though Henry had at firſt affected to decline this honour, it made an impreſſion upon his mind; and now that the emperor had come into the Low Countries, to viſit his grandſon Charles, he diſpatched the earl of Worceſter and Dr. Cuthbert Tunſtal to treat with Maximilian, and propoſe an interview; but when they came to preſs the point of reſignation home to Maximilian, he ſhuffled in ſuch a manner that the ambaſſadors plainly perceived that he had no deſign to part with the imperial crown, and that his propoſal was no other than a plot to draw more money from the king their maſter. Of this they gave Henry notice, and Wolſey now diſſuaded him from having any farther concern with Maximilian, or from the leaſt truſting him, unleſs he ſhould, by his actions, give ſome previous earneſt of his ſincerity; and, above all, he wiſely and honeſtly put the king in mind of his father's maxim, "that the leſſer dominion is always ſwallowed up in the greater," and that the dignity of an emperor of Germany muſt do great prejudice to the great figure which England then made.

And, indeed, it muſt be confeſſed, that Henry, through the management of the cardinal, was at this time in very high reputation all over Europe, as appears from the many letters, and other inſtruments, upon our public records, ſent to the government of England during this pacific year, in particular an application from the pope and the whole college of cardinals, imploring a ſubſidy againſt the Turks, who had juſt defeated the ſultan of the Mamelucks* in Egypt, and who, they obſerved, would certainly turn their arms next againſt the Chriſtians; though it afterwards appeared, that the ſole deſign of pope Leo was to enrich himſelf and his family with the ſpoils of Chriſtendom.

This pontiff had, in the preceding year, made uſe of the intereſt and arms of Francis I. to ſtrip Francis Maria de la Rovera of the duchy of Urbino, which he beſtowed on Laurentio de Medici, one of his own nephews; but Rovera, in this year, by the help of the Spaniſh forces, recovered his duchy: though Francis I. being afraid of loſing Milan by the intrigues of the pope, not only ſupplied his holineſs with troops for the war of Urbino, but likewiſe offered Catherine, heireſs of the houſe of Boulogne, in marriage to Laurentio de Medici, who eſpouſed her accordingly. The pope was ſo well pleaſed with the match, that he indulged Francis with a tenth upon his clergy, on pretence of maintaining the war againſt the Infidels.

At the ſame time, to indemnify himſelf for the mortification he had ſuffered by Rovera's ſucceſs, he availed himſelf of the friendſhip he now entertained with all the princes of Europe, each of which vied with one another in giving his holineſs proofs of their eſteem: the ſeaſon was to be improved, and the progreſs of the Turks gave a plauſible handle for beginning the operations, and laying all the Chriſtian world under an immenſe tax.

It was ſtill taught and believed for a good while, that the pope, out of the inexhauſtible treaſure of the church, ariſing from the merits of Chriſt, and works of ſupererogation of the ſaints, had a power of diſtributing indulgencies on certain conditions preſcribed by him, to the greateſt and moſt profligate of ſinners, for a plenary remiſſion of ſin (as it is practiſed at this day in Portugal, &c.) Theſe indulgences were ſuppoſed at firſt to reach only to relaxation of penances or eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. Urban II. in the beginning of the XIth century, was the firſt that granted a full remiſſion of all ſins, to thoſe who ſhould take up arms for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Infidels; which cuſtom was kept up by his ſucceſſors, ſome of whom extended the benefit of their indulgences to ſuch perſons who, being unwilling or unable to go, maintained a ſoldier in their room. At length theſe ſpiritual favours were diſtributed to thoſe who took the field againſt the enemies of holy church, or heretics. Great ſums were raiſed by this means, but ſeldom applied to the ends for which they were intended. Leo X. reſolved to follow ſo good precedents, the benefit whereof was to extend even to the dead, whoſe ſouls, upon payment of ſo much money, were immediately redeemed out of purgatory. People had likewiſe the liberty of eating eggs and white meats on faſt days, and of chuſing their confeſſor, and the like. Guicciardini ſays, that the powers for releaſing ſouls out of purgatory were openly played for in taverns.

The order of Dominicans, as being moſt in favour with the lower rank of people, were made the brokers of this ſcandalous commerce; each friar or agent was entruſted with a ſet of indulgencies of all prices, of all denominations, in all caſes, and for all ſins; and the better to collect the money ariſing from this market, all Chriſtendom was divided into different departments, in each of which a certain number of thoſe prieſts were commiſſioned to recommend and enforce the utility of indulgences.

But Leo had, in ſome meaſure, already defeated his own intention; the great encouragement he had given to learning, had awakened curioſity in thoſe whoſe profeſſion it was to be ſcholars, and the flagrant practices of his agents had diſpoſed many of the common people againſt him: nevertheleſs, ſuch was the authority of the ſee of Rome at this time all over Europe, that it is hard to ſay where this evil would have ſtopped, had it not been for Martin Luther, an Auguſtin friar, profeſſor of divinity at Wirtemberg in Saxony, a man of great parts, learning, and ſpirit, who, full of zeal againſt theſe abuſes and novelties, roſe up to expoſe and refute them. He confined himſelf to his ſubject in his firſt writings, but having occaſion afterwards to enquire into the grounds and pretences upon which ſuch indulgences were founded, he began to call in queſtion ſome of the received notions about penance, purgatory, and the papal authority: this he did in ninety-five problematical theſes, which he ſent this year to Albert of Brandenburgh, archbiſhop of Mentz, which he offered to maintain againſt all opponents. Hence aroſe a controverſy, in which other doctrines were diſputed. And this happening at a time when the art of printing had rendered learning more eaſy and general than it had been in former ages, a foundation was laid for one of the moſt remarkable and important revolutions in the human mind that occurs in hiſtory, either ancient or modern; this was no other than the Reformation, an incident which opened the eyes of men to diſcover the cheats and impoſitions of the court of Rome, and, together with the ineſtimable privilege of the freedom of private judgment in religious matters, introduced the no leſs valuable bleſſing of civil and political liberty.

Had any one told Luther at that time, that he would ſubvert the Roman catholic religion in almoſt one half of Europe, he would not have believed it. He went farther than he intended; as is the caſe in all diſputes, and in almoſt all tranſactions. It has been ſaid, and with an air of probability, that the beſt method to have made this zealous reformer change his opinion, would have been to have ſent him a cardinal's hat; but the contempt he was held in by the church of Rome proved fatal to her power; for Luther, ſeeing himſelf upon the brink of a great undertaking, that of a total breach with the court of Rome, and not receiving aſſurances of protection from any of the German princes, though ſeveral of them had given ear to his doctrine, he endeavoured to reconcile himſelf to the pope, by writing a letter to cardinal Cajetanus, in which he makes an apology for his behaviour, and promiſes to drop his diſpute concerning indulgences, provided ſilence was impoſed upon his adverſaries; but the court of Rome taking the letter as a proof that Luther was intimidated, and would ſoon become tractable, paid no regard to his propoſal of a reconciliation: but at length the controverſy aroſe to ſuch an height, that Leo, though in his own mind he deſpiſed ſuch kind of diſputes, was obliged, as pope, to interfere in defence of the doctrine of indulgences, and of his own right to grant them.

* The word Mameluck ſignifies in Syriac, a hired ſoldier. Jovius ſays, they were Circaſſian ſlaves, ſold by the Tartars and Podolians to the merchants, and being trained up at Cairo in military exerciſes, were picked out for the ſultan's guard, and preferred to the higheſt poſts, who in 1255, reſolved to obtain the kingdom of Egypt for themſelves. The government was elective, and the ſon could claim no inheritance but his father's perſonal eſtate. Every Mameluck, whoſe number in all was about ſixteen or eighteen thouſand, had a vote in the election, and required a gold ducat of the ſultan, as ſoon as choſen. There were in all of this race ſixteen kings, from the year before-mentioned, to the preſent year 1517, when Tonombeius II. their laſt king, was conquered in the firſt year of his reign, by Selimus I. Thus Egypt became a province of the Turkiſh empire, as it ſtill continues. Heylin, &c. Guicciard.

Luther now ſaw that he had no hopes but by declaring open war againſt the pope himſelf. Not to enter into particulars, he firſt appealed to a general council againſt his holineſs; he then proceeded to plead "for reſtoring the cup to the laity; for reforming the diſorders of monaſteries; and for aboliſhing auricular confeſſion." Upon the pope's condemning forty-two of his articles, upon thoſe and other heads, and ordering his books to be burned by the univerſities of Louvaine and Cologne, this bold reformer, in a public aſſembly of the univerſity of Wirtemberg, threw into a fire, made in an open ſquare, all the pope's bulls and decretals.

At length the old elector of Saxony, Frederick ſurnamed the Wiſe, and ſeveral other German princes, with a great body of the people, openly eſpouſed Luther, whoſe writings were thereby diſperſed all over Europe, and in England eſpecially, where the diſpoſitions of the people at this time ſeemed particularly favourable to the great event which ſoon after happened. But it is now time to reſume our relation of civil tranſactions. The ſickneſs, or rather plague, which ſtill continued in England, ſeems, for the moſt part of this year, to have confined Henry to a private life; we ſhall therefore proceed to the more buſy year 1518.

The French king, who had ſtill greatly at heart the recovering of Tournay, thought he could not hope to ſucceed in that deſign, unleſs he could gain Wolſey over to his intereſt; and this was only to be done by indemnifying him for the loſs of the adminiſtration of that biſhopric: accordingly he ſent a gentleman of his bed-chamber over to England in the ſpring of this year, in order to ſound the cardinal on that ſubject. The meſſenger found Wolſey very ready to liſten to the overtures he had to make: the truth is, that this miniſter was heartily tired of his biſhopric, as he found very little regard paid to his adminiſtratorſhip, and conſequently he could draw very little profit from it; and as he had no hopes that Maximilian, who was exceſſively poor, and Charles taken up with ſettling his affairs in Spain, would come up to his price, he reſolved to make the beſt bargain he could with Francis, who agreed to give him a bond for the payment of twelve thouſand crowns annually, during his (the cardinal's) life, in conſideration of the loſs he might ſuſtain by the redelivery of Tournay. This private convention being ſettled, Wolſey on a ſudden changed his ſtrain, and repreſented to Henry, that the reſtoring of Tournay to the crown of France would be the moſt political meaſure he could purſue, inaſmuch as the citizens had, ever ſince it came into the poſſeſſion of England, been contriving how to deliver it up to France, and the keeping it coſt every year an immenſe ſum to the king, while the nation received no return either in power or profit. This argument, however Polydore Virgil and ſome other prejudiced writers may have tried to miſrepreſent the motives of it with regard to the cardinal, was certainly juſt, and founded on ſound policy. Henry ſaw it in this light, and, though it is probable that he might think his favourite had a point to gain in it for his own advantage, yet, as his intereſt and that of the nation happened to coincide, the king aſſented to the propoſal; and admiral Bonivet, with the archbiſhop of Paris, and Villeroy, ſecretary of ſtate, were ſent over by Francis, in the latter part of the ſummer, with a retinue of no fewer than twelve hundred perſons, to open the negociation: at the ſame time they brought a letter, all written by the hand of Francis himſelf, to Henry, with the ſtrongeſt profeſſions of his friendſhip, and ſome preſents.

Wolſey had now a commiſſion given him by Henry, for ſettling preliminaries with Villeroy; and the generous offers of Francis had ſuch an effect with the Engliſh miniſter, that in a few days four different treaties were engroſſed.

The firſt related to the marriage between the princeſs Mary and the dauphin, which was to be ſolemnized as ſoon as the young prince ſhould be full fourteen years old, each of the two kings promiſing to pay five hundred thouſand crowns, in caſe it was his fault that the marriage was not completed. Mary's dower was to be three hundred thirty-three thouſand crowns of gold, one half to be paid on the day of marriage, and the other within a year after. The jointure was to be as great as had ever been aſſigned to any queen of France, and particularly to Anne of Brittany, and Mary of England, wives to Lewis XII.

The ſecond treaty was upon the reſtitution of Tournay, for which Francis I. engaged to pay Henry ſix hundred thouſand crowns of thirty-five pence Tournois each, beſides fifty thouſand livres Tournois due to him from the inhabitants. But out of theſe two ſums Francis was to keep back the princeſs Mary's dower. As to the payments, he obliged himſelf to pay fifty thouſand livres upon taking poſſeſſion of the place, and then twenty-five thouſand livres every ſix months, till the whole was paid.

The third treaty concerned the outrages which might be committed for the future againſt the peace by the ſubjects of either king, and contained certain regulations to procure ſpeedy reparation.

By the fourth, the two monarchs agreed upon an interview in the village of Sandinfelt, between Ardres and Guiſnes*.

Theſe treaties being ratified, the princeſs Mary was betrothed to the dauphin in St. Paul's church, at London; and the earl of Worceſter (late the lord Herbert), with Weſt, biſhop of Ely, and a magnificent train, were ſent over to demand the performance of Francis, who ſwore to the obſervance of the treaties, delivered hoſtages for the payment of the money, and, in the name of his ſon, fulfilled the contract of marriage.

* Rymer, vol. xiii. p. 624—679.

During

During theſe tranſactions, which took up the greateſt part of the year, pope Leo, ſtill intent upon the affair of the cruſade (or rather the ſums he propoſed to raiſe by virtue of that holy bubble) appointed cardinal Laurentius Campeius, or Campejo, his legate a latere* to the court of England, with inſtructions to ſolicit Henry's engagement in the general league, or five years truce, amongſt all the princes of Europe, in order to proſecute jointly the war againſt the Infidels; and an authority to demand a tenth of the Engliſh clergy for the ſame ſervice.

Campejo ſet out from Rome in the beginning of May, on his way to England; but Wolſey, having gotten notice of his appointment, ſent one of his confidents to Rome, to complain to the pope of the affront put upon him by the nomination of another legate, while he reſided cardinal in England. Leo being unwilling to diſoblige ſo powerful a favourite, joined Wolſey in the legation with Campejo, and at the ſame time ſent the Engliſh cardinal a commiſſion, veſting him with the ſole right of viſiting Engliſh monaſteries. Campejo arrived in England in July; but when he came to open the points of his embaſſy, Wolſey, who was the pope's enemy in every one of theſe matters, managed it ſo that the Engliſh clergy gave a flat denial to the pope's demand; and as to the project of the league, he repreſented it to Henry in its juſt light, that of a ſtale expedient for ſqueezing from the crown ſubſidies to the ſee of Rome: Henry therefore declined all ſuch engagements. There is in the Collection of Public Acts a bull of Leo X. with extraordinary powers to the two legates, authoriſing them to grant a plenary indulgence to the faithful of both ſexes who ſhould be preſent at the maſs which either of the legates ſhould celebrate in the preſence of the king and queen, or at leaſt at the Benediction, provided they confeſſed their ſins or deſired to confeſs, and were penitent†. Among other circumſtances which this year contributed to Wolſey's greatneſs, we are to mention two new grants conferred on him by the king: by the firſt he is empowered to give letters patent of denization, under the great ſeal, to all who ſhould ſue unto him for the ſame; and by the other he had the following full powers from Henry, which we ſhall give in the words of the patent‡.

"To doo and make out our letters patent, under our great-ſele, from time to time, of all congie d'elires, royal aſſentes, reſtitution of temporalities, as well as archbiſhoprickes, biſhoprickes, monaſteries, abbies, and priors of our foundation, as of all other houſes of religion, beyng for the tyme in oure handes by any other meane, within this our royalme of England, Wales, and the Marches of the ſame, unto ſuch perſon or perſons, as hereafter ſhall, by due order, ſue for ſuch congie d'elires, royal aſſentes, and reſtitutions of temporalities. And alſo that ye, by virtue hereof, from tyme to tyme, doo cauſe to be made out our commiſſions and writtes of Dedimus proteſtatem to ſuch as ye ſhall think convenyent to take the omagies and fealtiſe of all manner of perſons, as well archbuſhops, buſhops, or other, due unto us for our ſaid temporalities; and that all ſuch ſummes of money as from tyme to tyme ſhall be due unto us by reaſon of the ſaid archbuſhoprickes, buſhoprickes, monaſteries, abbeys, priories, and houſes of religion, be always contented and paid to our uſe, in our hanaper of our Chauncerie, unto the clerke of the ſame for the tyme being. And theis our letters ſhall be to you ſufficient warrant and diſcharge in the premiſſes at all tymes hereafter."

Thoſe, with other dignities and powers, now conferred upon the cardinal, gave him double luſtre abroad, and made him reſpected equal to a crowned head; and ſuch was the deference paid him by the court of Rome, who were fearful of doing the leaſt thing to diſoblige him, that, on his application, cardinal Adrian de Caſtello, whom, as was before obſerved, he had gotten removed from the office of pope's collector in England, was now deprived of the cardinalate and of the biſhopric of Bath and Wells, which had been conferred on him, and the adminiſtration of which was now given to Wolſey, in order, as is there ſaid, to enable him the better to ſupport his dignity of cardinal and legate of the holy ſee.

Campejo's negociation, however, was in no wiſe accelerated by theſe conceſſions of the pope to his Engliſh colleague, for all he could obtain was a defenſive alliance in favour of the holy ſee, in caſe it ſhould be attacked by the infidels, to which Henry, about the end of the year, agreed, with room for the pope, the emperor, and the king of Spain to enter into the ſame. This cold alliance, however, was far from anſwering the views of his holineſs, who intended to fill his coffers with the money which the more diſtant powers were to advance, to buy off a perſonal attendance upon this expedition; nevertheleſs, he approved and ratified the treaty, and the report of an intended invaſion by the Infidels, immediately vaniſhed.

The genius of the Engliſh was daily taking a new and more pacific turn; it was now cultivating riſing arts, it was improving trade, and encouraging manufactures; and we muſt do cardinal Wolſey the juſtice to ſay, that he made the nobleſt uſe of his power, excepting the vanity that attended it, that any miniſter ever did. His poſt of high-chancellor placed him at the fountain of juſtice, and never was it better adminiſtered; he was particularly careful in puniſhing that moſt deſtructive of all evils, perjury: he was a great protector of the poor, and enforced ſeveral excellent laws for the protection of the mercantile and induſtrious part of the people. We have already obſerved, that he was a great promoter of the arts and ſciences: the learning of the Engliſh was at this time equally uſeleſs and heavy, and their taſte none; Wolſey ſaw this, and had the virtue to attempt to improve the one, and to introduce the other. With this view he ſpared no pains to find out men of literary merit, nor thought any reward too great for ſuch merit. He employed no miniſters but ſuch as were

* There are four ſorts of legates. 1. They whom the pope ſends to preſide at general councils. 2. The pope's perpetual vicars in countries remote from Rome; thus before the Reformation, the archbiſhop of Canterbury was legatus natus apoſtolicæ ſedis. 3. They who for a certain time, and in certain places, are delegated to convene ſynods for reſtoring church diſcipline and other emergencies. 4. The name of legate is given to the pope's extraordinary ambaſſadors to emperors and kings, who are called legati a latere. At preſent none but cardinals have this character.

ſcholars; and under his adminiſtration the dignities of the law, of the church, and of the ſtate were filled with men whoſe merit was their only recommendation: Dr. Clark and Dr. Knight were, through him, made biſhops; Dr. Taylor was made maſter of the Rolls; Dr. Pace, one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate; Dr. Gardiner, who had a very fine turn for letters, was employed in ſeveral ambaſſies; not to mention Cromwell and Moore, who, by his means, roſe to the higheſt offices in the ſtate; with a vaſt number of other promotions, equally juſt and generous.

He this year laid before the king a ſcheme for the advancement of learning, particularly at Oxford, which he propoſed to effect by founding ſeveral lectures for the furtherance of the belles lettres, and by reforming the ſtatutes of that great ſeminary. Henry, whoſe heart was as yet good, had a regard for the proſperity of his people, and gladly lent his countenance and authority to the noble and patriotic views of his favourite. The ſtatutes of the univerſity were put into Wolſey's hands, and he had the new-modelling of them, which was followed by the noble inſtitutions by him erected for the encouragement of learning, the particulars of which we have given us by a late writer of his life, and were as follow.

The firſt was that of theology, whereof one Blackwell, an excellent divine, was the firſt lecturer, of whom honourable mention is made in an epiſtle from the univerſity to the cardinal, wherein they acquaint his eminency, "that they are not able to expreſs the great benefit of his lectures in general, and more particularly the theological." Secondly, civil law; but who was the firſt perſon who read this lecture does not appear. Thirdly, of phyſic; the firſt who diſcharged this province was Thomas Muſgrave, maſter of arts. Fourthly, philoſophy; though we know nothing more concerning the perſon who was firſt appointed to read this lecture than that the initial letters of his name were L. B. Fifthly, for the mathematics, one Richard Crutcher was the firſt reader, of whom we find this character, repreſenting his morals and learing: "Crutcher is a perſon of ſo great probity and goodneſs, that he deſerves a better fortune than is common to mathematicians; and ſo great a maſter of his art, that he merits to be called ſo, by way of eminence and peculiar diſtinction." He was a native of Holland, and educated in the colleges of Wirtemburg and Cologne. Sixthly, for the Greek language, one Calphurnius, a native of Greece, was firſt appointed by the cardinal to this province, who firſt taught the pronunciation of that language in Oxford, as it is now read. Seventhly, for rhetoric and humanity, Clement was the firſt reader, who was ſucceeded by Thomas Luport, concerning whom More writes to his friend Eraſmus, "That he read in both tongues with the greateſt reputation*."

Neither muſt it be forgotten, that Henry, in imitation of the beſt regulated cities in Italy, and at the requeſt of the cardinal, and that of ſeveral other learned men mentioned in the preamble to the patent†, founded the College of Phyſicians, "to check (to uſe the words of the ſaid patent) the boldneſs of thoſe unſkilful men, who profeſs phyſic more out of avarice, than any confidence of a ſafe conſcience;" a ſalutary and undegenerating inſtitution!

At the ſame time that Wolſey was giving proofs of his glorious zeal for learning, he was exerting all the painful talents of a conſummate politician. The peace which Europe now enjoyed was interrupted in the beginning of the year 1519, by the death of the emperor Maximilian ‡, of whole mercenary feeble character the preceding pages have furniſhed ſome lively inſtances. This event neceſſarily induced Wolſey, as an able miniſter, to change his party with regard to France; for, upon the emperor's death, Francis I. declared himſelf a candidate to ſucceed him; a deſign which, had it taken place, muſt have proved very injurious to the intereſts of England: but Wolſey found means to fruſtrate it, through the means of Dr. Pace, the ſhrewdeſt negociator of the court of England, who ſo managed matters, that Charles, king of Spain, grandſon of the deceaſed emperor, was elected by a majority of one voice among the electors ‖.

The election of Charles was a terrible mortification to Francis, and the jealouſy of thoſe two potent princes occaſioned the bloody wars, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the courſe of this reign. In the mean time, as the government of England was now free from the fears of ſeeing a king of France emperor of Germany, Wolſey now renewed the former negociations with Francis, from whom he had received, while the election of an emperor was depending, a commiſſion conſtituting him that prince's procurator, commiſſary, and deputy for ſettling the whole particulars of the approaching interview between him and Henry; but it may be obſerved, that the advances made the cardinal not only by this monarch, but likewiſe by the new emperor, who, ſoon after his election, gave him a penſion of five thouſand ducats upon the biſhopric of Pace, in Caſtile, and two thouſand more upon the biſhopric of Pala, was not ſo much the effect of any perſonal eſteem for the miniſter, as through the fear of loſing the friendſhip of the king his maſter, whom they knew to be entirely governed by him. Francis, on his part, to give Henry a freſh mark of his reſpect, deſired him to ſtand god-father to his ſecond ſon, afterwards king of France by the name of Henry II. Hence we may perceive how happy Henry's ſituation then was, and how glorious his reign might have been, had he wiſely improved it; but, unfortunately for him, by his after-conduct he forfeited all thoſe advantages, and incurred a load of guilt and infamy.

As for Wolſey, all his fine qualities were diſgraced by his inſolence, pride, and rapaciouſneſs:

having lately prevailed on the pope to recal Campejo, and to veſt him with the ſole power of legate, he opened a new tribunal called the Legatine Court, wherein he exerciſed very high, if not illegal powers. It was in effect a court of conſcience, that took cognizance of almoſt all the actions of life; and one John Allen, doctor of laws, being appointed judge of this bench, committed the moſt flagrant acts of violence and extortion, on pretence of reforming the manners of the people. He pretended that his juriſdiction reached to all ſuits ariſing from wills, and contracts of marriage, and tried an infinite number of cauſes which properly belonged to other courts; while the king's judges were afraid to oppoſe his encroachments. While his ſubſtitute thus harraſſed the laity, the cardinal himſelf treated the clergy with no leſs rigour and ſeverity: he beſtowed all the benefices of the kingdom upon his favourites, nor durſt any one complain to the king of theſe arbitrary and oppreſſive meaſures, until Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ventured to inform him of the diſcontents of the people, and the inſolence of his miniſter. And ſhortly after, John London, a prieſt, boldly accuſing the judge of the legate's court of malverſation in his office, the king reſolved to take cognizance of the affair himſelf; and Allen being convicted of numberleſs miſdemeanors, the king ſo reprimanded the cardinal for his choice of ſuch a man, that from thenceforward he became more cautious how he acted.

The cardinal's pomp was equal to his power: he now celebrated maſs with all the ſtate and magnificence of the ſovereign pontiff, being conſtantly ſerved by biſhops, and even earls and dukes preſented him with the water and towel. In his habit he was moſt gorgeous: beſides the richneſs of his veſtments, which in that reſpect were even regal, he wore ſhoes of ſilver gilt, ſet with pearls and precious ſtones: whenever he went abroad, he cauſed two large croſſes (the one for York, and the other as legate) of maſſy ſilver to be carried before him by two tall prieſts; as alſo two pole-axes and two pillars of ſilver gilt, and golden cuſhions; with a train of ſtately horſes, richly capariſoned. Nor was he content with the great power, wealth, and authority he enjoyed in England, while there was one degree of eccleſiaſtical dignity to which he had not yet attained; accordingly he already began to concert meaſures for procuring the papacy, whenever the holy ſee ſhould become vacant, and the king of France had actually promiſed him the votes of fourteen cardinals; but ſince Charles had been elected to the imperial dignity, Wolſey ſeemed to think that prince more capable of advancing him to the papal throne, and began gradually to detach his maſter from the intereſts of France, and engage him in the behalf of the houſe of Auſtria.

The news of the approaching interview between Henry and Francis alarmed Charles V. who feared it might be a means of creating a perſonal friendſhip between the two monarchs, or of producing a league between them to his prejudice. Theſe apprehenſions put him upon endeavouring to gain the cardinal ſo far over to his intereſt as to try his maſter, king Henry, to agree that Charles, in his return from Spain to Flanders, might land in England, and confer with the king before the latter paſſed over to France. The cardinal, who, as we have juſt obſerved, thought it his intereſt to make a friend of Charles, brought Henry to conſent to this propoſal, by obſerving to him, that if Charles landed in the manner propoſed, and went to the court of England, ſuch an action could not be deemed an interview, but merely a viſit to his aunt Catherine, Henry's conſort. The king not only conſented, but agreed to have a formal interview with Charles, after that with the king of France was over. In conſequence of this private agreement, Charles ſet ſail from Corunna, and, about the twenty fifth of May, 1520, landed at Dover, while Henry had proceeded as far as Canterbury, on his road to France, Wolſey having now ſettled every thing relating to the ceremonial of the interview between his maſter and Francis.

Upon the news of the emperor's landing, Wolſey was immediately diſpatched to compliment his imperial majeſty at Dover, where he was next day met by Henry in perſon, who conducted him to Canterbury, whither likewiſe the queen came, to pay her reſpects to her nephew, whom ſhe had never ſeen before. The emperor, during his ſtay, laboured to diſſuade the king of England from his intended interview with Francis; but Henry told him, with an air of frankneſs, that he had gone too far to retract, but, at the ſame time, aſſured him that nothing ſhould paſs between him and Francis to his prejudice. We have nothing beſides that is material to relate concerning this viſit, excepting that Charles renewed the treaty of commerce which had been concluded in 1506, and then took his leave of the Engliſh court.

Henry having made ſome neceſſary reformations in his court, where the licentious behaviour of ſeveral young noblemen had given offence, ſet ſail for France, on the thirty-firſt of May, and landed the ſame evening at Calais *, from whence he proceeded to Guiſnes, a ſmall town near the frontiers. Francis, attended by a like ſplendid retinue, repaired to Ardres, a few miles diſtant, and the two monarchs met, for the firſt time, at a place ſituated between theſe two towns, but ſtill within Henry's French territories, Francis having agreed to pay that compliment to the Engliſh king in conſideration of his having paſſed the ſea in order to come to the interview.

The reader can ſcarcely exceed in his idea of the magnificence of the interview between the two kings; it was ſo ſplendid, that the place where it was held was called the Field of Cloth of Gold. Henry had cauſed a building, three hundred and twenty-eight feet ſquare, to be erected, from which a private gallery reached to the caſtle of Guiſnes;

* He was attended by his own queen, the queen dowager of France (married to the duke of Suffolk), cardinal Wolſey, the archbiſhop of Canterbury; the dukes of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Buckingham; the marquis of Dorſet; the biſhops of Durham, Ely, Armagh, Cheſter, Rocheſter, Exeter, Hereford, and Llandaff; the lord prior of England; the earls of Stafford, Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, Shrewſbury, Worceſter, Devonſhire, Kent, Wiltſhire, Derby, Eſſex, and Kildare; the lords Abergavenny, Curſon, Maltravers, Montacute, Herbert, St. John, Roſs, Fitz Walter, Haſtings, Delawar, Mountjoy, Dacres, Ferrers, Cobham, Daubeney, Morley, Lumley, and Howard, with many others, knights, eſquires, and gentry to the number of four thouſand three hundred and thirty-four perſons; and of horſes one thouſand ſix hundred and thirty-ſeven, beſides thoſe who attended the queen dowager of France and the duke her huſband, and the cardinal's retinue. See Grove's Wolſey, p. 111. 112.

the parts of this great building were artificially framed in England, and brought over for this purpose. Its outside was covered with painted cloth, so as to have the appearance of fine hewn work, and its inside richly hung with tapestry: in the front was painted a device, being the figure of an English archer, with these words for the motto, CUI ADHÆREO PRÆEST, "he prevails, whom I favour," thereby expressing Henry's situation, as holding in his hands the ballance of power among the politicians of Europe.

Francis at first proposed to lodge in a rich pavilion of cloth of gold; but the wind having thrown it down, he caused a large house, no wise sumptuous, but built of such materials as could be got in haste, to be erected near Ardres. Wolsey was sent thither to him on the fifth of June, to settle every thing for the final ratification of the late treaties between him and Henry. This was done next day, with only two additional articles; "one referring all matters in dispute to the judgment and award of the countess d'Angoulesme (mother to Francis) and cardinal Wolsey; the other, providing, that when the million of crowns, stipulated by the treaty of May, 1513, was satisfied, the king of France should pay one hundred thousand livres Tournois yearly to Henry, till the marriage of the dauphin with the princess Mary of England should be solemnized in the face of the church."

The intelligent reader, who is sensible upon what small incidents the greatest events of life turn, cannot be offended if we subjoin some particulars of this famous interview, which strongly mark the dispositions of the two kings. When Henry, at their first meeting, was reading the draught of the proposed treaty, instead of pronouncing his own titles of "I, Henry, king of France and England," he stopped short, and very handsomely told Francis, that he had almost been hurried into a breach of good manners, and went on with the simple appellation of, "I, king Henry." Francis, charmed with this delicacy, returned him the compliment by an obliging bow; and observing in Henry a frankness of disposition, and a kind of willingness to shake off the restraints of formality, he resolved to hold conversation with him in a more friendly manner.

It had been agreed that Francis should visit the queen of England at Guisnes, while Henry was visiting the queen of France at Ardres; and that neither visit should continue longer than an appointed signal. Both accordingly withdrew to their respective lodgings; and Francis took that opportunity of slipping from all his guards, and going with only two gentlemen and a page to Guisnes, where he found the commanding officer for the day, with two hundred archers, posted on the bridge: the officer knew Francis, who addressed him with an air of frankness: "Gentlemen (said he) you are all my prisoners; and I order you to conduct me to the apartment of my brother the king of England." The officer instantly obeyed, and Henry was astonished on seeing his brother of France enter his chamber single; but instantly recovered himself, and, embracing Francis, "Brother (said he) you have served me as shrewd a turn as ever one man did another; you have instructed me with what confidence to behave towards you: I yield myself your prisoner from this hour." Upon this Henry immediately made Francis a present of a rich collar which he wore about his own neck, to the value of fifty thousand angels: and Francis presented Henry with a bracelet from his own arm of double the value. A conversation then ensued, to the mutual satisfaction of both kings, who laid aside the formalities of state in their ensuing conversations*.

The emperor had daily information from the cardinal, and even from Henry himself, concerning what passed at the interview; but still he was extremely uneasy about the event. Having occasion soon after to come to Gravelines, Henry went, on the tenth of July, with a noble train, to visit him there; and being met on the way by his imperial majesty in person, was entertained with as much magnificence as the place would admit. This meeting gave Francis great disquiet: he ordered la Pluche, one of his ministers at the imperial court, to require Charles's accession to the triple league, in his new quality of emperor; but the latter waved the demand, saying, that as he had already signed it by the name of Charles, he deemed that sufficient; Henry at the same time declaring himself of the like opinion. This left Francis no farther room to doubt of an intimate connection subsisting between his rival and the court of England. The interview between these princes did not last above three days; Henry returning to England about the middle of July, and Charles, after passing some time in Flanders, proceeded to Aix la Chapelle, where he was crowned emperor, on the twenty-third of October, with great solemnity; and, to crown his good fortune, he about this time received an incredible accession of wealth by the bravery and conduct of Hernando Cortez, who subdued the Mexican empire*, by whose treasures both this prince and his successor, Philip II. were afterwards enabled to aspire to universal monarchy.

The posture of affairs in the beginning of the year 1521 seemed to threaten Europe with a fatal war. The violent personal emulation and political jealousy which subsisted between the new emperor and the French king soon broke forth into action. These two princes invaded the dominions of each other with numerous armies; and, after they had gratified their ambition by some petty conquests, and glutted their revenge by committing the most terrible ravages and devastations, they preferred their complaints to the king of England, as the most proper person to decide the difference between them.

Henry, influenced by the cardinal, affected to lay the blame of this rupture upon Francis; nevertheless, professing to observe an exact neutrality, he prevailed on the contending princes to send their ambassadors to Calais, where they should find cardinal Wolſey, veſted with full powers to act in his (Henry's) name as mediator. Charles willingly embraced this propoſal, becauſe he knew himſelf ſure of the favourite's intereſt; and Francis durſt not reject it, leſt he ſhould furniſh Henry with a colour to declare openly for his enemy: it was therefore agreed, that the plenipotentiaries of the two monarchs, the pope's nuncio, and the cardinal of York, ſhould meet at Calais on the fourth day of Auguſt.

The time appointed for the congreſs of Calais being come, Wolſey repaired thither, attended by a moſt ſplendid retinue of noblemen, prelates, and gentlemen; in the mean time a ſix weeks truce was appointed between the emperor and the king of France*. According to the lord Herbert, the cardinal mediator had given the emperor a hint not to agree, whatever ſeeming advances were made, to any peace with France: it is certain, from the whole tenor of his conduct, that Wolſey entered upon this his high office with very partial ſentiments, and a firm reſolution to make his maſter declare againſt Francis, whom he thought not ſo able to ſerve him in his great deſign of obtaining the papal dignity as the emperor. The conſequence of theſe underhand dealings was, that Charles inſiſted on ſuch high and unreaſonable terms, that Francis abſolutely refuſed to agree to the conditions he offered.

This refuſal furniſhed Wolſey with a pretext to undertake a journey to Bruges, in order to confer perſonally with the emperor, and find out ſome expedient to procure a peace between the two monarchs: accordingly, on the twentieth of Auguſt, he ſet out, attended by four hundred and ſixty horſe, and was met by the emperor himſelf, a mile out of the town of Bruges. Here he concluded a league between Henry and the emperor, againſt France, by which the king of England obliged himſelf, in caſe of Francis's noncompliance with the terms offered him by the emperor, to invade France with an army of forty thouſand men, and to beſtow upon Charles the princeſs Mary, his only child, who had now ſome proſpect of ſucceeding to the throne, notwithſtanding that the emperor had already agreed to eſpouſe the king of France's daughter, and that the Engliſh princeſs was already affianced to the dauphin of France†.

Thus ended this ſecret negociation, for it can be called no other, between Wolſey and Charles, and thus was Henry wrought upon by his miniſter to declare himſelf the enemy of Francis I. without the leaſt provocation, and contrary to all the rules of ſound policy, conſidering the vaſt and continually increaſing power of the emperor, which it was his intereſt to ballance.

Wolſey having now placed matters on ſuch a footing as he thought moſt for his own intereſt, and having nothing more to do in the quality of mediator, he returned to England about the latter end of the year, and preſented Henry a moſt magnificent bull from the pope, conferring upon him the title of Defender of the Faith, in conſideration of a book which Henry had written againſt Luther, and which ſhall be farther taken notice of, in the eccleſiaſtical part of this hiſtory. But it is now now time to take a view of what paſſed in England during this year.

The cardinal had long borne a grudge to the duke of Buckingham, on account of that nobleman having not only made free with his character in public converſation, but having offered him ſome perſonal affronts; in particular it is ſaid, that the duke one day holding the baſon to the king, ſoon after his return from France, the cardinal, when the king had waſhed, dipped his hands in the ſame water, upon which the duke, enraged at his inſolence, threw the water into his ſhoes: the cardinal, ready to burſt with rage, told him, in a threatening tone, that he would ſit upon his ſkirts. The duke, in order to expoſe the cardinal's malice to the king, came the next day to court richly dreſſed, but without any ſkirts to his coat: the king aſking what he meant by appearing in that ſtrange faſhion? he repeated the cardinal's threats, with the occaſion of them, adding, that he thus equipped himſelf to baulk the cardinal of his intention, for that now he could not ſit upon his ſkirts.

This jeſt, however, did the duke no ſervice, for from that inſtant Wolſey vowed his deſtruction. He began by depriving him of his two beſt friends, the earl of Northumberland, his father-in-law, and the earl of Surry, his ſon-in-law; the former of whom he cauſed to be put under arreſt, on account of ſome matter in law concerning a wardſhip; and the latter he ſent into an honourable baniſhment, by making him lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The duke of Buckingham thus ſtanding alone, the cardinal gained over one Knevet, a retainer of the duke's, but who, upon being diſcharged his ſervice for ſome miſdemeanor, was now his mortal enemy: this fellow gave information againſt his maſter, that he ſhould ſay in private company, that, ſhould the king die without iſſue, he would lay claim to the crown, as the deſcendant of Anne of Gloceſter, grand-daughter of Edward III. and that, ſhould he ever aſcend the throne, he would puniſh Wolſey in the moſt exemplary manner; alſo that the ſaid duke correſponded with one Hopkins, a monk in the priory of Hinton, who pretended to the gift of prophecy, and flattered the duke with aſſurances of his ſucceeding to the crown of England.

The cardinal now thought he had gotten ſufficient matter for an accuſation, which he ſo aggravated to the king, that orders we inſtantly iſſued for apprehending the duke, who, on the fifteenth of April, was committed to the Tower, and ſhortly after was arraigned in Weſtminſter-hall, before the duke of Norfolk (who was, for the time, conſtituted lord high-ſteward) of divers points of high-treaſon: the ſubſtance of the charge againſt him was, "that, in the ſecond year of the king's reign, and at divers times before and after, he had imagined and compaſſed the king's death, at London, and at Thornbury, in Gloceſterſhire; and that, in the ſixth year of the king's reign, he went in perſon to the priory of Hinton, and there had conference with the aforeſaid Nicholas Hopkins, who told him that he ſhould be king; and that he had often ſaid to the lord Abergavenny, who had married one of his daughters, that if king Henry died

* The plenipotentiary on the part of the emperor was Galinara, his chancellor, an able politician and complete courtier. without without iſſue, he would make ſure of the rule of the realm, in ſpite of whoſoever ſaid the contrary; ſwearing, that if the lord Abergavenny ever revealed this, he would fight with him to death."

The duke made a long and vigorous defence; but, after a full hearing, he was, by his peers, found guilty, and condemned; and, on Friday the ſeventeenth of May, was beheaded on Tower-hill †. Thus fell Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, who was deſcended from Edmund, earl of Stafford, who married Anne, daughter of Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Gloceſter, and ſon of Edward III. He was alſo earl of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton. He married Eleanor, daughter of Henry Piercy, earl of Northumberland; and had iſſue Henry, lord Stafford; Elizabeth, married to Thomas Howard, earl of Surry (ſon to the duke of Norfolk); Catherine, married to Ralph Neville, earl of Weſtmoreland; and Mary, married to George Neville, lord Abergavenny. In this duke the office of hereditary high-conſtable, which he inherited from the Bohuns, earls of Hereford (and which was the greateſt poſt in the kingdom, its power extending, in ſome caſes, even to controul the crown), became forfeited, and was never afterwards revived ‡. His ſon Henry was, by an act of parliament, in the year following, reſtored in blood, though not to his father's honours or eſtates; but ſome of theſe were afterwards granted him: and George, lord Abergavenny, his ſon-in-law, was impriſoned for miſpriſion of treaſon, but ſoon reſtored to favour.

We are now, after a long interval, to enter upon ſome review of the affairs of Ireland, as they ſtand connected with the affairs of England. In the late reign, the earl of Kildare, and the miniſters of ſtate, who had favoured Simnel, had received their pardon; and ſir Richard Edgcombe was ſent over, with five hundred men, to take a freſh oath of allegiance from the Iriſh nobility to Henry's government. We have already ſeen what ſhare theſe people had in ſupporting Perkin Warbeck, and the earl of Kildare, for that and ſeveral other reaſons, was detained priſoner in England in the year 1496. Henry VII. however, ſaw within this nobleman ſuch great ſentiments of honour and valour, that he ſoon after gave him his liberty, and even raiſed him to the dignity of lord-lieutenant, in which ſtation he acquitted himſelf with great loyalty and honour: and in the year 1499, he acted as lord-deputy under Henry, then the ſecond ſon of the king, who was made lord lieutenant. In year 1504, he, with great courage and reſolution, quelled a conſpiracy of ſome of the chief nobility in Ireland, who had brought a great army into the field, which he totally defeated with very little loſs to himſelf. All the reſt of Henry VII's reign was free from any commotions in Ireland, and Kildare was continued in that government till his death, which happened in 1513, the fifth year of the preſent reign, when he was ſucceeded, as well in his poſts as eſtates, by his ſon, who in no wiſe degenerated from the virtues of his father ‖.

He began his adminiſtration with great ſucceſs againſt the turbulent Iriſh; but Wolſey finding it neceſſary to remove the earl of Surry to a greater diſtance from the court, on account of the duke of Buckingham's affair, Kildare was called to England, to anſwer ſome frivolous complaints, and Surry was ſent over in his room, though with powers ſo greatly circumſcribed, that he found he could not maintain his character with any degree dignity, and ſoon after had intereſt enough to get himſelf recalled from this troubleſome poſt, and was ſucceeded by Pierce, earl of Ormond. Under him the Iriſh again took arms againſt the Engliſh government, encouraged by the earl of Surry's carrying away with him all the Engliſh forces. The truth is, the Iriſh, without the pale of the Engliſh government, ſeem as yet to have conſidered themſelves as an independent and unconquered people: each clan had its own head, who made war and peace, as he was provoked or ſatisfied; ſo that Henry found the beſt meaſures he could take in reſpect to Ireland, was to ſupport the principal chiefs one againſt another: and in this ſituation ſtood the affairs of Ireland towards the end of this year.

On the firſt day of December, this year, died pope Leo X. (John de Medici) in the forty-ſixth year of his age and the ninth of his pontificate. He had, a little before his death, granted to cardinal Wolſey, for life, the adminiſtration of the abbey of St. Alban's, which, being authorized by the king of England, was afterwards confirmed, and the cardinal's dignity of legate renewed by Adrian VI. Leo's ſucceſſor in the papacy.

Wolſey was not without hopes of being choſen at this time to fill the vacant ſee, and had actually in different ſcrutinies nine, twelve, and nineteen voices, this laſt number being more than half the number of cardinals aſſembled in the conclave *. He applied to the emperor for his intereſt; and Henry, zealous for the elevation of his favourite, ſent Dr. Pace to Rome, with inſtructions to promote his election; but theſe meaſures proved in vain: Charles V. though he had engaged to aſſiſt Wolſey with all his intereſt, had no inclination to

* The conclave is in the Vatican, where there is a long gallery full of cells, which are choſen by the cardinals by lot. The funeral of the deceaſed pope laſting nine days, on the tenth each cardinal goes to his cell, and are ſhut up in the conclave with one ſervant, called a conclaviſt, with each a ſecretary and gentleman to attend them, carry their meſſages, and manage their intrigues. The conclave is guarded by the militia of the city, to prevent their receiving any letters; and the diſhes of meat (which are received in at a window by the conclaviſt) are ſearched by the maſter of the ceremonies for the ſame reaſon. The cardinals meet every morning and evening in the chapel for a ſcrutiny, which is done by writing their ſuffrages in the billets done up in two folds, and ſealed with two ſeals. In the firſt fold, the conclaviſt writes the name of the cardinal his maſter votes for, becauſe the cardinal's hand would be known. In the ſecond the cardinal writes his own name; and on the outſide, the conclaviſt writes any motto the cardinal pleaſes, as Deo volente, by which they know their own billets when they are read, for the fold containing the elector's name is not opened till the pope is choſen, and then he opens all to know who elected him. When the billets are ready, they put them, after a ſhort prayer, into a chalice upon the altar, and appoint two of their number to read the names of the cardinals aloud, and keep account of the votes for each. And this they do till two thirds of the votes fall upon one perſon; and if they do not, the billets are all burnt. The court of Rome conſiſts at preſent of the pope and ſeventy cardinals; viz. fifty cardinal-prieſts, fourteen cardinal-deacons, and ſix cardinal-biſhops, who are for the moſt part of the pope's privy-council. perform perform his promiſe; he wanted to have a pope who ſhould be entirely at his devotion, and he was too well acquainted with the imperious temper of Wolſey to think that he could ever manage ſuch a pontiff; he therefore determined to advance cardinal Adrian Florentio, biſhop of Tortoſa, who acted as his prime miniſter in Spain, to the papal chair, and proceeded ſo artfully therein, that this prelate was unanimouſly elected pope before the arrival of Pace at Rome, and thereby his imperial majeſty was furniſhed with a plauſible excuſe for the failure of Wolſey's application; and as he was deſirous to maintain a friendly correſpondence with this favourite, on whoſe pleaſure he knew in a great meaſure depended whether or not he ſhould live on good terms with Henry, he granted him a penſion of twenty-five thouſand ducats a year, in lieu of the adminiſtration of the ſee of Paca, granted him by the late pope, beſides another of nine thouſand thouſand crowns a year, in lieu of that of Tournay, the payment whereof Charles undertook, ſince, after the league above-mentioned, it could not be expected from Francis.

This prince had by this time gotten intelligence of the private league made at Bruges, which he doubted not would be followed by a war with England; he therefore, in order to oblige Henry to declare himſelf one way or the other, on the twenty-third of February, 1522, ſent a letter to the king of England, putting him in mind of the treaty of October, 1518, between them and the late pope and the preſent emperor, whereby the contracting parties obliged themſelves, upon notice of any of their territories being invaded, to require the invader to deſiſt and make ſatisfaction for what he had done, and in failure thereof to declare war againſt him, requiring Henry accordingly to declare himſelf an enemy to the emperor, whoſe troops had taken Mouzan, in Champagne, and joined thoſe of the late pope in an invaſion of the Milaneſe.

This ſeems to have made Henry declare himſelf ſooner than he intended; and accordingly, about the latter end of March, he ſent Clarencieux king of arms to the French court, with a declaration, that he looked upon Francis as the breaker of the common peace, and therefore found himſelf under a neceſſity of taking part with the emperor againſt him. Nothing but war was now to be looked for; the ambaſſadors on both ſides were recalled, the effects of merchants were ſeized in both countries, and Henry fitted out a ſtrong fleet for making prizes of the French ſhips, and protecting the Engliſh commerce. The command of this fleet was given to the earl of Surry, who was now in high favour, and made lord high-admiral of England.

Beſides the other motives which induced the king of England to ſide openly with the emperor, he pretended great cauſe of complaint againſt Francis in regard to ſome tranſactions of his, relating to the affairs of Scotland, of which it will be neceſſary here to take a curſory review.

Towards the latter end of the preceding year, the duke of Albany had returned to Scotland from France, where he had been detained ſome time at the inſtances of Henry, who wanted to avail himſelf of the regent's abſence to procure an aſcendant in the Scottiſh council; beſides, he ſuſpected the duke of a deſign to marry his ſiſter, the queen dowager of Scotland, who, having a diſpute with her huſband, the earl of Angus, had applied to the pope for a divorce, and in the mean time not only refuſed to cohabit with the earl, but gave all her intereſt to Albany. Henry upon this complained that Francis had deceived him, in ſuffering the duke to return to Scotland: he likewiſe revived his complaints againſt the duke to the Scottiſh parliament, in the beginning of this year 1522, accuſing him of procuring a diſſention between the queen dowager and her huſband, and of an intention to procure a divorce that he might marry her himſelf; and concluded with inſiſting that the duke might be removed from the regency and the cuſtody of the young king. The parliament of Scotland replied to this letter with ſo much ſpirit and firmneſs that Henry plainly ſaw they were reſolved to ſtand by the duke. He alſo now learned, that, upon the return of the cardinal, without communicating any reſult of his conferences at Bruges to Francis or his miniſters, the latter, ſuſpecting what was indeed the truth, had thought it neceſſary to ſtrengthen himſelf by a ſtrict alliance with Scotland, through the means of the duke of Albany, with whom he had, on the twenty eighth of December, in the foregoing year, concluded a treaty at Edinburgh, by which, in caſe of a war between Francis and Henry, the Scots were to ſend ſix thouſand men to the aſſiſtance of the former; and if Scotland was attacked, which Henry ſeemed to threaten, if the duke was not removed from the regency, Francis was to aid the Scots with a powerful force: and to bind this treaty, a marriage was ſtipulated between one of the daughters of France and the young king of Scotland. Theſe conſiderations, partly real and partly pretended, were by Henry made uſe of as his reaſons for preparing for a double war againſt France and Scotland.

Such was the ſituation of affairs when Charles V. paid a new viſit to England, with a view to ſtrengthen his intereſt with Henry and the cardinal, whom he was fearful of having diſobliged by what had paſſed at the late conclave, and alſo to confirm the articles agreed upon at Bruges. He landed, on the twenty-ſixth of May, this year, at Dover, whither the cardinal went to receive him with a magnificent train, and was followed by Henry himſelf two days afterwards, who conducted the emperor to his court at Greenwich. As Wolſey did not think this a proper juncture to ſhew any reſentment, the emperor had reaſon to be ſatisfied with his reception, and found a ready compliance with all his deſires. After ſome days were paſſed in the cuſtomary diverſions of thoſe times, the king carried the emperor to Windſor, where he was inſtalled of the order of the Garter. This done, the two monarchs received the ſacrament from the hands of the cardinal (who omitted nothing to diſplay his grandeur on the occaſion), and ſwore to the treaty of Bruges, to which ſome new articles were now added. The preamble to this treaty, as containing the grounds of the war which afterwards happened, we ſhall here give.

"Whereas there was lately war begun between us, Charles, and the king of France; and, by virtue of a league between us king Henry, and the ſaid king of France, both we and Francis, by our letters, required aid of the ſaid king Henry, one againſt the other, and the ſaid king of England, in the beginning of this year, to compaſs theſe differences, ſent to Calais the moſt reverend father in God, Thomas, cardinal of York, as his lieutenant, before whom, when many diſputes had been on both ſides who firſt began the war, and it was found that the fault was in the French king, and that he firſt began with us, not in Luxemburg only, but by his captains alſo in Navarre, and hired foreign ſoldiers which were not his own ſubjects, to break the public peace, contrary to the treaty of London; wherefore, when the moſt reverend father could not effect at Calais neither peace nor truce, under any honourable conditions, the king of England underſtanding, as well by the relation of the moſt reverend father, as by the letter of Francis king of France, written by his orators and captains, which were ſhewed to the king of England, that the ſaid Francis had broken both the treaty of London, and all other treaties and agreements of affinity concluded between them, not only by ſending the duke of Albany into Scotland (which was againſt his oath given), but alſo denying the king of England his penſion, and violating his ſubjects, againſt the league; the ſaid king of England hath reſolved thereupon to ſend us aid againſt him, accordingly as he is bound by the treaty of London: and therefore, upon treaty of a perpetual and ſtricter confederacy between us and the ſaid king Henry, and alſo of a marriage with the princeſs Mary, we being on both ſides free from all agreement made heretofore in this kind with the French, have concluded both league and alliance in manner following."

As the treaty itſelf is too long, we ſhall only give its principal clauſes, which are as follow.

"That Henry ſhall give with the princeſs Mary four hundred thouſand crowns; the ſame to be reſtored to the king of England's executors, in caſe that the ſaid princeſs ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England; but ſubject to the deduction of ſuch ſums as Maximilian the late emperor borrowed of Henry VII. and that the marriage ſhall be conſummated as ſoon as the princeſs ſhall be twelve years of age: her fortune to be made a million of crowns in caſe of Henry's having a ſon; and ſhe to be inveſted with a jointure of fifty thouſand crowns a year."

The chief articles of the treaty of alliance were as follow.

"That before the end of May, 1524, or ſooner, the emperor ſhall declare war, in all his dominions, againſt the king of France, and invade France on the ſide of Spain, with thirty thouſand foot and ten thouſand horſe; while Henry was to enter France, with the like force on what ſide he found moſt convenient. In like manner each was to furniſh three thouſand marines, for inveſting the coaſt of France by ſea; and likewiſe a competent number of ſoldiers to harraſs the frontiers of France on the ſide of Artois and Picardy; the emperor obliging himſelf to do his beſt to recal all German mercenaries out of the French pay.

"The emperor was to aſſiſt Henry, ſhould the latter think proper to attempt to annex the crown of Scotland to England, or entirely to reduce Ireland: and Henry was to aſſiſt the emperor if he ſhould attempt to reduce the dukes of Gueldres or Frieſland, or any of the rebel feudatories of the empire: and that neither prince ſhall make peace, nor diminiſh their contingencies, without conſent of the other; and that both ſhould declare their pretenſions to the places to be recovered from France, before the firſt of May, 1524, that proper reſtitution may be made. The whole of the treaty to be kept ſecret from the French.

It was agreed alſo, "That this treaty ſhall be ſignified to pope Adrian VI. and he be intreated to enter into it, and held as a principal contrahent if he accept it within three months. The Venetians, if they will accept this treaty within three months, ſo as, according as they ought by the treaty of London, they will forſake the French and declare themſelves againſt him, ſhall be comprehended. The Swiſs ſhall have this treaty ſignified to them, and be practiſed to renounce the French, or at leaſt to be neutral. None ſhall be comprized in this treaty which is enemy to either of the two principal contrahents; for the reſt, each may have his friends."

We muſt not forget that there was in this treaty a clauſe, by which both contracting parties obliged themſelves to appear before Wolſey as judge, in what place he ſhould chuſe, and voluntarily ſubmit to his juriſdiction as legate; and confeſſing themſelves to be bound to obſerve this treaty, ſhall require the ſaid legate to pronounce the ſentence of excommunication againſt them, if they violate the articles thereof.

At the ſame time that this treaty was concluded, Charles gave Henry an indemnification, by which he bound himſelf to ſave Henry harmleſs for all the ſums of money and penſions, which were or ſhould be due to king Henry from Francis, upon former agreements, and now were or ſhould be with-held by the ſaid Francis, upon denunciation of war againſt him.

In the mean time, to ingratiate himſelf with Henry and the Engliſh nation, the emperor, during his ſtay here (which was but five weeks) preſented the earl of Surry, high-admiral of England, with a commiſſion for being admiral of his dominions likewiſe: and the Engliſh fleet being now joined by a great number of Flemiſh ſhips, and ſome Venetian gallies, the whole amounting to one hundred and eighty ſail, the earl of Surry, as lord high-admiral of both kingdoms, took command thereof; and the emperor going on board on the third of July, landed, on the ſixteenth of the ſame month, at St. Andero, on the coaſt of Biſcay, in Spain; after which, cruiſing off the French coaſt, he made a deſcent near Cherbourg, and, after having deſtroyed the adjacent country, ſailed for Morlaix, in Brittany, and burnt and plundered that town, from whence he brought a great booty; but the ſeaſon advancing, and his men growing ſickly, he returned home.

The war being thoroughly reſolved upon, Henry's next concern was how to get money for its ſupport. He did not chuſe to call a parliament to demand a ſubſidy, ſeeing that he could allege no juſt cauſe for undertaking a war ſo detrimental to the trade and commerce of his ſubjects: however, money muſt be raiſed, and it was the cardinal's buſineſs, who had embarked his maſter in the war, to find means. His firſt ſtep was to borrow twenty thouſand pounds of the citizens of London, and other ſums of other perſons capable of advancing them. A general loan was then demanded, in the king's name, of the tenth of all the eſtates of the temporality, and a fourth of the clergy, requiring the Londoners to give in the value of their eſtates upon oath; but they oppoſed this method of taxation

tion in the moſt ſtrenuous manner, alleging, with great juſtice, the impoſſibility of giving an exact account of their effects, ſeeing that, as a trading people, the greateſt part of their properties were in the hands of their correſpondents in foreign parts. This argument bore ſo much conviction with it, that the king contented himſelf with a ſum barely ſufficient to bear his expences until a parliament ſhould be called, to which at laſt he was obliged to have recourſe.

The moneys thus raiſed falling far ſhort of the king's neceſſity, a general muſter and valuation was appointed, by means of a new Domeſday book, to be formed in a very peculiar manner. Stowe gives us an account of this ſurvey from the original warrant, dated at Brentwood, in Eſſex, March 27, 1522. It was by appointing commiſſioners throughout all the counties of England; and theſe commiſſioners were to iſſue warrants to the conſtable of every hundred, who was commanded to charge the conſtables of every pariſh within the ſaid hundred to appear perſonally before certain commiſſioners, and to bring with them the names of all perſons above ſixteen years old, dwelling within the ſaid hundred, and to enjoin them to repair to a certain place aſſigned, with their arms, and declare what their names are, and to whom they belong, and who is lord of every town or hamlet, and who ſtewards, and who perſons of the town, and what their benefice is worth, and who owners of every parcel of land within the ſaid precincts, and what is the yearly value of every man's land, what ſtock on the lands, and who the owner thereof; alſo what ſtrangers dwell there, and what buſineſs they follow; alſo the value and ſubſtance of every perſon above ſixteen years of age; alſo what penſions go thence to religious and ſpiritual men*.

Henry reſolved to apply ſome part of the money his favourite had thus ſqueezed from the people, in chaſtiſing the Scots for the little regard they had ſhewn to his demands in the caſe of the duke of Albany. In the ſpring of the year ſir William Fitz Williams, vice-admiral of England, had put to ſea with his ſquadron, and ſailed up the Firth of Forth; but the Scots had ſo well ſecured their ſhipping, that he was obliged to return without effecting any thing to their detriment. On the thirtieth of July, George, earl of Shrewſbury, was appointed to command as the king's lieutenant againſt the Scots, and had a commiſſion for making a general array of the northern counties, in order to enter Scotland; but the duke of Albany had by this time raiſed a ſtrong army, and advanced as far as the river Eſk, near Carliſle, with an intention to invade England; but when he gave orders for paſſing the borders, many of the principal nobility refuſed to advance, alleging that it would be extremely impolitic to involve their country in an unneceſſary war with England, ſince they had no quarrel with Henry, nor he with them, but on account of their adhering to the duke as regent. This latter, finding it impoſſible to engage the Scots in a war on his account, and ſeeing no remedy, made a ſhort truce with the lord Dacres of the North, who had been detached by the earl of Shrewſbury, and had burnt the town of Kelſo: and, under favour of this ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities the duke retreated to Edinburgh, where he diſmiſſed his army, and ſailed, the twenty-fifth of October, for France, to get a body of foreign troops from Francis, his ally, by the help of whom he hoped, at his return, to make the Scots more tractable. Here we ſhall have time to take a ſhort view of the ſtate of affairs in Italy, where the events of the war proved very unfavourable to Francis.

The new pope was entirely in the intereſt of Spain, and conſequently an enemy to France. A little before the death of the late pontiff, Leo X. the crafty cardinal of Sion, finding means to corrupt the Swiſs in the French pay, had brought them over to the allies, who were thereby vaſtly ſuperior to the French army. The conſequence of this was, that Proſper Colonna, the pope's general, paſſed the Adda, and ſurprized Milan, where he had a correſpondence. This was followed by the reduction of Pavia, Lodi, Parma, and Placentia, an many other places in the Milaneſe; and this year Cremona and Genoa fell into the hands of the Imperialiſts. The Venetians, who had hitherto been the friends and confederates of France, afraid of the reſentment of the allies, began to treat with the emperor, and civilly deſired Lautrec, who commanded for the French in Italy, to retire out of their territories, where he had taken refuge with his troops after a defeat he had ſuffered in attacking the Imperialiſts at Bicocque; and, about the latter end of this year, Henry and the emperor prevailed on them, partly by threats, and partly by fair promiſes, to engage to obſerve a neutrality. They were chiefly induced to do this from the dreadful apprehenſions they were under from the Turks, who had this year taken Belgrade from the king of Hungary, and the iſland of Rhodes from the knights of St. John of Jeruſalem; beſides, the new pope, the devoted ſervant of the emperor, had found means to gain over the dukes of Ferrara and Urbino, and thereby terribly weakened the French intereſt in Italy. In Navarre the French kept their ground with good ſucceſs, under the marſhal de Chavennes, who compelled the Spaniards to raiſe the ſiege of Fontarabia†.

Such was the ſtate of England and of Engliſh concerns on the continent in the beginning of the year 1523, when the cardinal, finding how diſagreeable his late method of raiſing money had been to the nation, adviſed the king to convoke a parliament, which accordingly met on the fifteenth of April, at Black-friars, in London: the clergy meeting in convocation at the ſame time, Wolſey, to convince the laity that he did not intend to burthen their ſhoulders only, in what he had lately done, began the plan of his operations with his reverend brethren, of whom he demanded a ſubſidy of one half of their annual revenues, payable in five years. This unreaſonable demand was ſtrongly oppoſed by Fox and Fiſher, biſhops of Wincheſter and Rocheſter; but the cardinal, incenſed, at their heſitation, rated them ſo roundly in a ſpeech he made on the occaſion, that the reſt of the clergy were diſcouraged from ſupporting them, and the ſubſidy was agreed to.

Having thus ſucceeded in the convocation, he repaired to the houſe of commons, where he made a very long and copious ſpeech on the ſtate of affairs, ſetting forth the faithleſſneſs and ambition of the French king, and the neceſſity of England's taking part with the emperor, concluding his harangue with a demand of eight hundred thouſand pounds, to be raiſed by the fifth (or four ſhillings in the pound) of every man's goods and lands; payable in four years ‡.

This demand was enforced the day after by ſir Thomas Moore, a creature of the cardinal's: but the members objecting to the extravagance of the ſum required, occaſioned many and warm debates, which at length ended in an offer of granting the king two ſhillings in the pound from thoſe poſſeſſing twenty pounds and upwards per annum, and one ſhilling in the pound for all who had above forty ſhillings per annum; and for thoſe under forty ſhillings, and above the age of ſixteen, two pence per head, to be paid in three years.

The cardinal, impatient of the leaſt controul, when he had a point to gain, was much offended at this backwardneſs of the commons, and accordingly, returning to the houſe, by an inſinuating ſpeech prevailed on them to reſume the debates on a more extenſive plan; at the ſame time he had recourſe to a notorious falſhood to win them over to his will, by telling the houſe that the lords had agreed to four ſhillings in the pound; whereas the lords had granted nothing, but waited to ſee what the commons would do. We are told farther, by ſome of our oldeſt hiſtorians, that when ſeveral members of the houſe begged Wolſey to prevail with the king to moderate his demand, he peremptorily replied, "that rather than attempt to perſuade the king to abate one ſhilling, he would have his tongue plucked out of his head with hot pinchers."

The debate was then revived, and laſted fourteen or fifteen days, and at laſt it was agreed, upon the motion of ſir John Huſſey, which was ſeconded by Mr. Montague, a lawyer of great credit in the houſe, and of great weight in the debates *, that thoſe of fifty pounds a year ſhould pay three ſhillings in the pound for two years; which, ſaith the lord Herbert, being at length continued to the fourth year, and extended to ſuch as were worth five pounds in goods, was all that could be obtained; and the parliament was, on the thirty-firſt of July, adjourned to Weſtminſter, where it ſat till the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, when it was diſſolved. For the ſtatutes made in this parliament, we refer the reader to their proper head.

About this time the biſhop of Durham died, and the king gave that biſhopric to the cardinal, who reſigned the biſhopric of Bath and Wells to Dr. John Clark, maſter of the Rolls; and ſir Henry Marney, who was vice-chamberlain, was made lord privy-ſeal, and ſhortly after created a baron. Alſo, during this parliament, Arthur Plantagenet, baſtard ſon to king Edward IV. was created viſcount Liſle in right of his wife, who was widow to Edmund Dudley, the wicked miniſter of Henry VII.

In the ſummer of this year, Chriſtiern, king of Denmark and Sweden, who had married the emperor's ſiſter, and had been driven out of his dominions by his own ſubjects, on account of his inſufferable cruelty, came into England with his queen, and was honourably received by Henry, who made him many valuable preſents: he then went to Flanders, where he remained as a baniſhed man. Some years after, king Henry ſent ambaſſadors, to perſuade his people to receive him again; but they could not prevail, ſo great was the hatred of his ſubjects againſt this tyrannical king.

Henry being thus, by the timidity or the venality of parliament, furniſhed with an immenſe ſum, prepared to put in execution his great engagements. The Venetians had been ſtrongly ſolicited by the Imperial and Engliſh ambaſſadors to renounce their alliance with Francis: the ſenate was for a good while irreſolute what party to take, but finding, by advices from their ambaſſador at Paris, that Francis, through want of money, diſturbances in his court, and the neceſſity of defending his frontier againſt the attempts of the Spaniards, the Engliſh, and the Flemings, was not in a condition to ſend over an army into Italy, they agreed, on the twenty-eighth of June, to a league with the emperor, Ferdinand, archduke of Auſtria, and Sforza, duke of Milan, by which they engaged to furniſh ſix hundred men at arms, with as many light horſe, and ſix thouſand foot, for the defence as well of the Milaneſe as of the kingdom of Naples, againſt all powers whatever, except the Turks, with whom they durſt not break; and the emperor was to aſſiſt them with the ſame force, if any of their territories ſhould be invaded. The pope, at the requeſt of the contracting parties, entered into this league, and was followed by the republics of Florence, Genoa, Lucca, and Sienna ‖: the marquis of Mantua was appointed general of the Eccleſiaſtical and Florentine troops, a ſeparate army of obſervation was formed, and Proſper Colonna was made generaliſſimo of the grand alliance.

Francis behaved on this occaſion with an intrepidity truly heroic; and it is more than probable that he might have been able to have withſtood all the efforts of his enemies, had it not been for the injuſtice he was guilty of towards Charles, conſtable of Bourbon, to whom he had been indebted for the ſucceſs of his arms in Italy. It was not thought ſufficient to mortify him on all occaſions, but Louiſa of Savoy, counteſs of Angouleſme, the king's mother, being deſirous of marrying the conſtable, who was lately become a widower, and having been refuſed by him, reſolved to ruin the man ſhe could not wed, and preferred a ſuit againſt him, which was deemed highly unjuſt by all the lawyers of thoſe times, and which no other but a powerful queen-mother could have gained. This ſuit was for no leſs than all the poſſeſſions of the family of Bourbon. The judges ſuffered themſelves to be prevailed on by the queen's ſolicitations; and, by a ſentence of ſequeſtration, ſtripped the conſtable at once of all his eſtates; who thereupon ſent his friend, the biſhop of Autun, to requeſt the king at leaſt to put a ſtop to the proceedings: but the king would not even ſee the biſhop. Upon this the conſtable, who had already been ſtrongly ſolicited by Charles V. to enter into his ſervice, now, in a fit of deſpair and anger, accepted the offer. It would have been truly heroic in him, to have continued to do his duty to his country, though ill treated; but there is another kind of heroiſm, that of revenge: unfortunately, Charles of Bourbon, made choice of the latter, quitted France, and entered into the emperor's ſervice. Few men ever taſted the fatal pleaſure of revenge more fully than himſelf.

* It is ſaid, that when Henry was informed of the commons having refuſed to grant the required ſupply, he was ſo incenſed that he ſent for this Mr. Montague, and addreſſed himſelf to him in the following manner: "Ho! man! will they not ſuffer my bill to paſs?" and laying his hand on Montague's head, who was then on his knees before him: "Get my bill paſſed by to-morrow (ſaid he), or elſe to-morrow this head of yours ſhall be off." Such was the haughty and tyrannical ſtyle employed by this arbitrary king, to the free-born natives of England; and ſuch the oppreſſive practiſes of his imperious miniſter!

The emperor received him with open arms, and immediately made Henry acquainted with the affair, who ſent ſir John Ruſſel, an able negociator, over to Calais, to treat with the conſtable, whom he brought to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with the emperor and the king of England, by which he obliged himſelf to act againſt Francis in the heart of his dominions with an army of his own vaſſals, reinforced by ſeven thouſand Imperialiſts, while Charles and Henry ſhould attack the French in Bearne and Picardy. It was alſo ſtipulated in this treaty, that, after they ſhould have conquered France, the conſtable was to have for his ſhare Provence, erected into a kingdom, and eſpouſe the emperor's ſiſter Eleonora, widow of don Emanuel, king of Portugal*.

In the mean time, as the affairs of Italy preſſed, and the emperor was ſenſible of the great advantages a general muſt have, who knew the ſtrength and weakneſs of all the French troops, he conſtituted the conſtable his lieutenant-general in Italy, and the latter repaired to Milan, which was now in the hands of the French admiral Bonnevet, Bourbon's greateſt enemy.

But about this time Henry was greatly chagrined by the news of the duke of Albany being ready to ſail from France, with a reinforcement of foreign troops, for Scotland. Upon this the earl of Surry was appointed general of the army to act againſt the Scots; and ſir William Fitz Williams was ſent, with a ſquadron of thirty-ſix ſhips, to cruize off the French coaſt, and prevent the duke's getting out; but being obliged by ſevere gales of wind to return to the Downs, the duke took the advantage of his abſence to put to ſea, and, ſailing weſt-about, landed in Scotland about the middle of September, which country the earl of Surry had by this time entered and moſt miſerably ravaged, burning the town of Jedburgh and ſeveral villages and caſtles.

The duke of Albany, upon his arrival, called a parliament at Edinburgh, when, after ſome debate, it was reſolved to march againſt the Engliſh. Accordingly, the duke, taking the field with a numerous army, approached the Engliſh borders, where he heard that the earl of Surry was then lying at Newcaſtle; upon which he ſent a herald to him, promiſing him, if he would come forth to meet him, he would give him battle; and if he took him priſoner, grant him good quarter. To this defiance the earl replied, that he ſhould in no wiſe decline meeting the duke in the field; but, if he took him priſoner, all the quarter he would give him ſhould be to cut off his head and ſend it to his maſter, the king of England.

The laſt day of October, the duke of Albany croſſing a wooden bridge over the Tweed, which divided England from Scotland, with a part of his army, laid ſiege to the caſtle of Werk, which was very near capitulating, when ſir William Liſle, the commander, making a ſudden ſally at the head of his garriſon, drove the enemy from before the place, with the loſs of three hundred men, moſt of them French. By this time the earl of Surry's army being reinforced, for which purpoſe he had returned back out of Scotland, amounted to upwards of forty thouſand men; but having received orders from court to act only upon the defenſive (leſt by preſſing the Scots too much they might be brought to unite among themſelves), he did not follow the enemy into their own country. Shortly after, the queen dowager of Scotland ſent to her brother, the king of England, deſiring him to refrain from farther hoſtilities, and agree to a twelve-month's truce, which propoſal Henry readily conſented to, as it left him more at leiſure to proſecute his deſigns againſt France. Accordingly orders were ſent to the earl of Surry, to diſband his army, and that nobleman returned to court, where he ſoon after took the title of duke of Norfolk, fallen to him by the death of his father, the old duke.

Henry had been ſo taken up with attending to the affairs of Scotland, that it was the twenty-fourth of Auguſt this year before the Engliſh army could be carried over to Calais. It was commanded by the duke of Suffolk, under whom ſerved ſeveral valiant noblemen, and other perſons of diſtinction. On his arrival at St. Omer's, in September, he was joined by three thouſand foot and five hundred horſe in the Imperial ſervice; and a council of war being held, it was reſolved to coaſt along the Somme, and, if poſſible, draw the French to a battle: but theſe latter not daring to hazard an engagement, contented themſelves with harraſſing the enemy by flying parties, and depended on the ſtrength of their frontier garriſons, and the advanced ſeaſon of the year, to prevent the Engliſh taking winter-quarters in their country.

The duke of Suffolk coming before Bray, a town on the Somme garriſoned by ſixteen hundred men, took it by aſſault on the twentieth of October, and, paſſing the river, made himſelf maſter of Montdidier, Roye, and other conſiderable places. He thus continued to advance till he came to the Oyſe, within eleven leagues of Paris, which put that city in the utmoſt conſternation: however, the arrival of the duke de Vendoſme with a large body of troops re-animated the inhabitants, and filled the Engliſh, in their turn, with apprehenſions, leſt their proviſions ſhould be cut off, and themſelves encloſed between this army, and one which was forming by marſhal Tremouille, from draughts out of the garriſons of Picardy. The Engliſh were maſters of no ſtrong towns to maintain themſelves in, during the winter, which now ſet in ſo ſevere that numbers of the ſoldiers died by the extremity of the cold, and Suffolk found himſelf obliged to retire to Calais, to put his army into winter-quarters. The neceſſary effect of this treaty was, that almoſt all the places he had taken during the campaign fell again into the hands of the French.

The emperor was not more ſucceſsful in the attempt he made at the ſame time upon Gaſcony, though he had come in perſon into Navarre, in order to haſten the enterprize. His troops, making a feint of laying ſiege to Fontarabia, paſſed the mountains the next day, encamped at St. John de Luz, and on the eighth of September inveſted Bayonne.

The city was nobly defended by Lautrec, the French general, and the attack was as obſtinate as the defence. The Spaniards had inveſted it on all ſides by ſea and land, and inceſſantly battered the walls with great fury; but Lautrec animating not only the ſmall number of ſoldiers that were in the garriſon, but even the women and children, to defend the place, the Spaniards, after ravaging all the country round, and finding the rigour of the ſeaſon increaſe, were obliged to draw off their troops, and return to their own country, leaving a ſufficient number however to renew the ſiege of Fontarabia. Thus ended the operations of the two expeditions deſigned againſt France: we are now to attend the third, which the reader may remember was to be attempted by the conſtable of Bourbon, with his own vaſſals and a body of German troops, in the very heart of the kingdom.

It was September before theſe troops, commanded by general Furſtemberg in the conſtable's abſence in Italy, entered Burgundy through the Franche Comté, who, after taking Coiffi, paſſed the Meuſe, and made himſelf maſter of Monteclair; but being ſurprized by the count de Guiſe, and having no horſe to oppoſe to the French cavalry, he reſolved to retire into Lorraine: he could not, however, make his retreat ſo ſafely but that Guiſe, falling upon his rear near Neufchatel, cut in pieces the beſt part of his troops.

As to Francis, the rebellion and flight of the conſtable of Bourbon threw him into the greateſt perplexities. He was juſt ſetting out from Lyons, to head his army in Italy, when he heard of the treaty this revengeful ſubject had made with his enemies, and fearing he might have intereſt enough to foment a rebellion in France, he committed the care of the Italian war to admiral Bonnivet, to whom he gave the ſole command of his army there, amounting to thirty-three thouſand men, and who paſſed the Alps about the end of Auguſt or the beginning of September. Bonnivet was but an indifferent ſoldier, and a worſe ſtateſman: he took, however, Novara and ſome other places of no great conſequence in Italy; and had he marched directly to Milan, he might have recovered it for his maſter; but he loſt ſo much time in treating with the inhabitants, at four leagues diſtance from the city, that the conſtable of Bourbon had an opportunity to put it in a ſtate of defence. The reſt of the campaign was ſpent in ſeveral fruitleſs attempts made by the admiral upon Cremona and Milan, in all which he was diſappointed. At laſt, after being in danger of his army ſtarving in camp, and daily threatened with a mutiny from the Swiſs troops, he ſent his forces into winter-quarters in Piedmont.

While theſe things were tranſacting, pope Adrian VI. died, and the conclave was ſplit into two different factions, one of which favoured cardinal Colonna, and the other Julio de Medici, a natural ſon of Julio de Medici, uncle to pope Leo X. the latter of whom, after a debate of fifty days, was choſen pope, and aſſumed the name of Clement VII.

Wolſey was no ſooner informed of Adrian's death, than he perſuaded Henry to write a letter with his own hand to the emperor, recommending him in the ſtrongeſt terms to the papal throne; but Charles had already eſpouſed the cauſe of Julio, and the Engliſh cardinal affected to bear his diſappointment with all the reſignation of an hermit, though, in all likelihood, his heart was inflamed with revenge againſt the emperor, who had twice deceived him in a point which he, from his inmoſt ſoul, ſo much coveted to gain: however, his ambition was in ſome meaſure gratified by the new pope, who beſtowed on him a grant of the legatine power for life, which had never been conferred upon any other perſon.

Before we cloſe the tranſactions of this buſy year, it will be neceſſary to mention a word or two concerning the ſtate of affairs in Scotland towards the end of it.

The duke of Albany, upon his return to Edinburgh from his unſucceſsful attempt againſt England, did not find the eſtates of the realm ſo obſequious to him as they uſed to be: James V. was now in the thirteenth year of his age, and many of the nobility thought it was high time that he ſhould be taken out of wardſhip and initiated into the affairs of government. This was the general ſenſe of the nation; and the duke of Albany, ſeeing it difficult to ſtem the tide, deſired leave to return to France: he was taken at his word, and going over in the following year, his poſt of governor was aboliſhed, and the queen, in her ſon's name, aſſuming the government of the kingdom, had, jointly with eight lords, the cuſtody of the royal perſon. The truce lately concluded was ſoon after followed by a treaty for a perpetual peace, and for the marriage of the young king of Scotland with the princeſs Mary, Henry's only child, and as yet the heir of his dominions. As for the duke of Albany, he never again returned to Scotland; and the Scottiſh nobles, diſtracted by their own inteſtine diſſentions, were not able, for a number of years, to give any more diſturbance to England.

The year 1524 opened with ſome military operations on the frontiers of Spain, that made the emperor amends for the ill ſucceſs of his arms in the preceding campaign, for his troops, under the command of the conſtable of Caſtile, having entered Bearne in January, and taken Mueillan, St. Palais, and Sauveterre, and cut off all communication between Bayonne and Fontarabia, they inveſted this laſt place on the firſt of February, and on the twenty-ſeventh Frangel, the French governor, capitulated for a ſurrender; for which he was ſoon after condemned by a council of war, and degraded: however, the Spaniſh army ſuffered ſo much by the ſeverity of the weather during this ſiege, and the toil of the operations, that it was not fit for any farther buſineſs for ſome time.

The emperor's arms were no leſs ſucceſsful in Italy, where the confederate generals, at the head of whom was the conſtable of Bourbon, having taken Marignano, reſolved to attack admiral Bonnivet before he ſhould receive the reinforcement he expected from France. The operations of the allies, who took the field as early as the beginning of March this year, were ſo quick, that they actually drove the French quite out of the Milaneſe, and forced Bonnivet to repaſs the Alps. But this great ſucceſs of the Imperialiſts alarmed not only the pope, but the duke of Milan and the Venetians, who now began to cool greatly in their ardour to the cauſe of the league, ſeeing themſelves ready to be ſwallowed up by the Imperial power; and and the Venetians actually withdrew their troops out of the Milaneſe.

The evacuation of Italy left the emperor now at liberty to carry the war into the heart of France; and, agreeable to this ſcheme, which had been concerted between Charles, Henry, and the conſtable of Bourbon, the latter paſſed the Alps, and entered Provence about the end of July, with fifteen thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and a train of eighteen pieces of cannon; and, after having made an eaſy conqueſt of the almoſt defenceleſs towns of Antibes, Frejus, Vignolles, and Aix, the imperial army, on the nineteenth day of Auguſt, ſat down before Marſeilles, which was defended by a garriſon of three thouſand foot and two hundred men at arms, beſides nine thouſand inhabitants, who took arms on the occaſion. In the mean time don Hugh de Mençada, the Spaniſh admiral, who had been ſent with a ſtout fleet from Genoa, to aſſiſt the operations of the land-forces, took Toulon. The ſiege continued to be vigorouſly, but ineffectually, preſſed for almoſt a month; but on the approach of Francis, with an army of forty thouſand men to its relief, the conſtable was obliged to riſe from before the place and retreat with ſome precipitation into the Italian territories.

Francis hereupon reſolved to march immediately into the Milaneſe by a ſhorter route; and the conſtable, being apprized of his deſign, redoubled his diligence in order to prevent it: thus the two armies, marching by different routes, arrived the ſame day, the one at Alba the other at Vexcelli, both in that duchy; then the conſtable being joined by the vice-roy of Naples, at Pavia, they conſulted upon what was to be done in this unlucky juncture, when finding money and proviſions grow ſcarce, it was reſolved to abandon Milan, where a terrible plague now raged, and having ſtrongly reinforced the garriſons of Pavia and Alexandria, they retired to Socino. Thus Francis took poſſeſſion of Milan without oppoſition, and undertook the ſiege of Pavia, one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Italy, in the beginning of November.

The arrival of the French in Italy, and the ſucceſs they had hitherto met with, determined the Venetians and Florentines to abandon the party of the emperor; and at the ſame time pope Clement VII. forgetful of the obligations he owed to Charles, or conſidering himſelf as the guardian of Italy, engaged privately to ſupport Francis againſt the powerful confederacy which had been made to overwhelm him, and made a ſecret treaty with that monarch, by which he promiſed to give a free paſſage through his dominions to a body of French troops that were to march under the duke of Albany, now returned from Scotland, for the conqueſt of Naples, and who was accordingly ſent thither early in the enſuing ſpring; and the pope publiſhed his accommodation with the French king, which he wanted the world to conſider as the effect of compulſion. The emperor, however, ſaw through the trick, and even threatened to take ſevere vengeance on the treacherous pontiff; though, in truth, this league of Clement with Francis was in a great meaſure the cauſe of the ſucceſs of Charles's arms, as it induced Francis to divide his forces, by which his army was greatly weakened.

Mean while the court of England ſeemed to adopt new maxims. By the agreement between the allied parties, while the emperor was making an attack upon Gaſcony with a powerful army, Henry was to have fallen with another, in conjunction with the Flemings, into Picardy; but this he had neglected to do, by which means Francis had been enabled to draw down in a manner the whole force of his kingdom to Avignon, and march to the relief of Marſeilles, as has been already related. Not only ſo, but the king of England had diſcontinued the payment of a ſubſidy he had granted to the duke of Bourbon, and even demanded reimburſement of a ſum of money he had lent Charles when he was laſt in England. Theſe concurring proofs of a coolneſs to the general cauſe, alarmed the emperor not a little; and his ſuſpicions were ſtill farther increaſed by hearing from his ambaſſador in England, that a perſon ſent by Louiſa, counteſs of Angouleſme, mother of Francis, whom her ſon had left regent of his kingdom during his expedition into Italy, had been ſome time at Henry's court, where he had long and frequent conferences with cardinal Wolſey. In a word, Charles foreſaw that the king of England intended no leſs than to abandon his cauſe, and engage in a league with his enemy, and doubted not that this alteration in the ſentiments of Henry was owing to the inſtigation of Wolſey, out of revenge for his (Charles's) having twice diſobliged him in the affair of the papacy; and the behaviour of pope Clement plainly ſhewed that he would ſecond the endeavours of the cardinal.

That pontiff now ſhewed the greateſt deference and reſpect to the court of England: he confirmed the title of Defender of the Faith, which his predeceſſor Leo had granted to Henry; he iſſued a bull, impowering the cardinal to ſuppreſs as many monaſteries as he ſhould think proper, to raiſe the yearly rent of three thouſand ducats, to endow a college which he was about to found; and, in the month of December, he, with the king's conſent, appointed cardinal Laurentius Campejo biſhop of Saliſbury.

We muſt now return to the ſiege of Pavia, to behold an event which made a very great alteration in the affairs of Europe, wherein England was deeply concerned.

Francis had weakened his army by the detachment he had ſent off, under the duke of Albany, towards Naples; and Pavia, to which he had laid ſiege, being extremely well provided for a defence, the Imperial generals had ſome hopes of attacking the French at a diſadvantage. The arrival of the duke of Bourbon, who joined Lannoy, vice-roy of Naples, with twelve thouſand Germans, on February 9, 1525, determined the Imperialiſts to attempt to raiſe the ſiege of Pavia: with this view they marched within a mile of the French camp. They were not yet ſo ſtrong as the enemy; but having no money to pay their forces, it was neceſſary for them to come to an action, leſt their men ſhould diſband, which would have proved full as fatal as the loſs of a battle. Had Francis raiſed the ſiege, the Imperial troops would doubtleſs have diſperſed, and he might have reduced the Milaneſe without any difficulty; but thinking his honour concerned, he reſolved either to make himſelf maſter of Pavia, or loſe his life before the place.

As the French camp was very ſtrongly entrenched, the conſtable was obliged to wait above a fortnight before he could put his reſolves of attacking Francis in execution. Mean while however, the

Swiſs

Swiſs having recalled their ſix thouſand men from the French ſervice, and theſe troops departing notwithſtanding all the king's endeavours to detain them, beſides the deſertion of three thouſand Italians under John de Medici, who diſbanded themſelves, the conſtable thought he ſhould no longer neglect an opportunity ſo favourable to his purpoſe; and on the eve of St. Matthias, February 24, being the emperor's birth-day, he attacked the French camp in the dead of the night.

Upon the firſt alarm being given, Francis put himſelf at the head of two thouſand gens d'armes within the camp, and fell with ſuch impetuoſity upon a body of troops, commanded by the marquis of Peſcara, that this general was unhorſed and dangerouſly wounded, and the entire body he commanded muſt have been ruined, had not he been ſuccoured by the duke of Bourbon, who had already made a terrible carnage in another quarter of the camp, and now returning, fell upon the French gens d'armes with irreſiſtible fury: all that the great officers now ſurviving could do, was to aſſemble and defend the perſon of their ſovereign, who fought like a knight-errant, ſword in hand: la Peliſſe, la Tremouille, Galeas de San Severino, and admiral Bonnivet fell by his ſide, and he was ſurrounded by the Imperial cavalry, the officers of which perceiving, by his armour, that he was ſome perſon of great rank, reſolved to take him alive, and for that purpoſe ſlew his horſe: in his fall he received a wound in the leg, notwithſtanding which he ſtarted up, and ſtill fought on foot with ſurprizing proweſs.

It happened that Pomperant, an officer of ſome diſtinction, who had accompanied the duke of Bourbon in his revolt, came up at that inſtant, who ſeeing the king in ſuch a dangerous ſituation, drew his ſword, and, placing himſelf by the ſide of Francis, aſſiſted him in keeping off the ſoldiers who preſſed upon him in order to take him alive; at the ſame time he deſired that the duke of Bourbon might be called to receive the king as a priſoner: Francis, tranſported with rage, declared that he would rather die than deliver his ſword to a traitor; then, turning to Pomperant, "Send for Lannoy, viceroy of Naples (ſaid he), to him I will ſurrender." That officer accordingly approaching, the king ſaid to him, in the Italian language, "Mr. de Lannoy, there is the ſword of a king, who deſerves ſome commendation, ſeeing, before he parts with it, he has made uſe of it in ſhedding the blood of many of your army, and who is not a priſoner through cowardice, but the accidents of fortune." Lannoy received the ſword upon his knee, and reſpectfully kiſſed the king's hand, to whom he then preſented his own ſword, ſaying, "I beg your majeſty will be ſo good as to receive mine, which hath this day ſpared the lives of many Frenchmen; it does not become the emperor's officer to leave a king diſarmed, though a priſoner."

Francis was now conveyed to the viceroy's tent, where his wounds were dreſſed, and he was treated with all poſſible reſpect. Lannoy is ſaid to have begged his majeſty would ſee the conſtable of Bourbon, who, at his requeſt, was admitted, and, kiſſed his hand: but ſome hiſtorians aſſert, that he poſitively refuſed to admit the duke into his preſence. He ought not to have provoked the duke's reſentment by acts of tyranny and injuſtice, which, by the law of nature, cancel the obligation of allegiance, for the duties of allegiance and protection are reciprocal. Next day Francis was conducted to the ſtrong fortreſs of Pizighitoni, where he remained for ſome time under the guard of Alvazon, the Spaniſh governor of the place, who preſerved to him all the punctilios of decorum. On the fourteenth of Auguſt, the royal captive was, by the emperor's order, conducted to Madrid.

Never was letter more true than that which this prince wrote to the queen regent, his mother, the night after the battle: "Madam, all is loſt, ſave our honour." Every thing ſeemed to foretel his inevitable ruin. His frontiers were unguarded, his treaſury exhauſted, a general conſternation prevailed throughout all orders of the ſtate, and violent diſſentions in the council of the queen, who governed the kingdom during his abſence; laſtly, the king of England threatened France with an invaſion, and to revive the fatal times of Edward III. and Henry V.

Charles V. without having as yet unſheathed his ſword, kept a great king priſoner in his capital of Madrid: and here Charles for once ſeems to have neglected to make the utmoſt of his good fortune; for, inſtead of entering France in perſon, to take advantage of the victory his generals had gained in Italy, he remained idle in Spain; and in room of ſeizing Milan for himſelf, he thought it neceſſary to beſtow the inveſtiture of that duchy on Francis Sforza, that he might not give umbrage to the reſt of Italy. Henry of England likewiſe, inſtead of joining with Charles to diſmember France, became jealous of his riſing greatneſs, and reſolved to ſupport France againſt the emperor; for which purpoſe he, on the ninth of June, entered into treaty with the queen regent, for procuring the liberty of her ſon; and this negociation was carried on ſo heartily, that, on the third of Auguſt, a treaty of peace and alliance was actually ſigned between John Joachim de Paſſau, lord of Vaux, and John Brinon, preſident of Rouen, ambaſſadors from the queen mother of France, at London; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the duke of Norfolk, treaſurer of England, the marquis of Exeter, the earl of Worceſter, the biſhop of Ely, and ſir Thomas Moore, ſub-treaſurer of England, on the other*. In a word,

* The principal articles of this treaty (as we find them in the Fœdera, vol. xiv. p. 39) were as follow:

"That all tranſactions of the late war ſhould be forgot and forgiven on both ſides, and that the ſubjects of the two crowns ſhould live together in good correſpondence.

"That they ſhould furniſh ſuccours to one another in caſe of an attack from a third power; which ſuccours were to be in proportion to their ſeveral abilities.

"That the intercourſe of commerce ſhould be again opened between the two nations; neither ſide to harbour the rebels of the other.

"That priſoners on both ſides ſhould be releaſed; and that their ſeveral allies ſhould be comprehended in the treaty. But that neither of the contracting powers ſhould maintain or protect thoſe allies in any uſurpations which they have made ſince the date of the treaty of London in 1518.

"That Francis ſhould, within three months after he is at liberty, ratify the preſent treaty.

"That the conſtable of Bourbon, the duke of Vendoſme and Longueville, the count de St. Paul de Lautrec, the count de Sevennes, the lords of Montmorency and Breſay, with the counts Mauſurier and Brunne, and nine of the chief cities in the kingdom of France ſhould engage for Francis's ratifying and fulfilling the ſaid treaty"

By another treaty, which is dated at Tours, the ſixteenth of Auguſt, and ratified the thirtieth of the ſame month, at More word, the captivity of Francis, which to all appearance ſhould have occaſioned ſuch great revoluions, produced nothing of any conſequence or advantage to England or the empire.

The court of France had too much ſenſe, if not gratitude, to forget the good offices of cardinal Wolſey on this occaſion, to whoſe management Henry committed this, as he did almoſt every other affair of ſtate: the cardinal was promiſed the arrears of the penſion which had been granted to him in lieu of the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay, which amounted to the ſum of twenty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred and ninety-three crowns of gold, and furthermore gratified with the additional ſum of one hundred thouſand crowns of gold. And now Henry finding his treaſury was almoſt emptied, he committed the care of recruiting it to Wolſey.

That miniſter, inſtead of applying to parliament, from which he had already received a repulſe, iſſued a decree, in the king's name, to levy through the whole realm one ſixth of all lay revenues, and a fourth of the clergy's effects. This impoſt was conſidered as ſuch a violent encroachment on the liberty of the ſubject, and ſuch a flagrant violation of Magna Charta, that it produced a general clamour over the whole nation, and almoſt cauſed a rebellion; which being repreſented to the king, he diſowned the meaſure, ſaying that "no neceſſities of his, though ever ſo great, ſhould make him attempt the raiſing money in any other way than by the people's conſent in parliament." Thus this illegal project of the cardinal was defeated, though it has left an indelible ſtain upon his memory: however, he ſoon fell upon another method of fleecing the ſubject, which he thought would not appear altogether ſo odious; this was by way of benevolence: and to carry that through, he ſent for the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, and told them, that he had prevailed with the king to recal his commiſſion for the heavy tax, and to throw himſelf on their free-gifts. But in this he was likewiſe diſappointed, for the magiſtrates of London refuſed to ſubmit to the impoſition, alleging, that the practice of raiſing money by benevolence had been aboliſhed by Richard III. In ſhort, the court finding that they could not carry their point in any way, it was laid aſide, and a general pardon was iſſued for all delinquents, on account either of the loan or the benevolence.

Henry ſeems to have been hitherto unacquainted with the arbitrary meaſures of the cardinal, and to have imagined that the people were happy and contented under his mild and gentle adminiſtration; but the clamours and frequent inſurrections which had happened in conſequence of the late attempts to oppreſs the ſubject having ſatisfied him to the contrary, he was highly incenſed againſt the favourite, who could not appeaſe his maſter's wrath without the moſt humble and abject ſubmiſſion: he produced his will, in which he had left all his ſubſtance to the king; and at length found means to convince him, that all he did was for his honour, and ſhould turn out for his profit. To confirm his proteſtations by deeds, he made Henry, about this time, a preſent of his ſtately palace at Hampton-court; and in return the king granted him this year letters patent for the founding of his college at Oxford, of which farther notice will be taken in the eccleſiaſtical part of this hiſtory.

Before the cloſe of this year, ſeveral promotions were made: among others, Henry Fitzroy, the king's natural ſon, by the lady Elizabeth Blunt, daughter of ſir John Blunt, and widow of ſir Gilbert Talbois, was made duke of Richmond and Somerſet, earl of Nottingham, and lord high-admiral of all the king's dominions, Engliſh, French, and Iriſh. This young nobleman, though he died before he attained his eighteenth year, is much celebrated by the writers of that time for his accompliſhments both of body and mind.

Towards the end of this year almoſt all the powers of Europe intereſted themſelves in procuring the liberty of Francis; but the emperor inſiſted upon ſuch harſh terms, that Francis declared he was reſolved to ſuffer any extremity rather than give way to them, and actually ſent into France, by by the ducheſs of Alençon, his ſiſter, who had come to viſit him in his confinement at Madrid, a public act ſigned by his own hand, conſenting that his ſon, the dauphin, ſhould be crowned king of France, while he himſelf would remain a captive for the reſt of his days.

This appearance of reſolution in Francis had ſo great an effect on Charles, together with the generous advice and remonſtrance of Guatinara, the Imperial chancellor, that the former began to abate conſiderably in his demands, and to treat in earneſt of Francis's liberty, and a treaty was accordingly ſigned on the fourteenth of January, 1526, at Madrid, the principal articles of which are as follow.

"That Francis ſhould give up to the emperor all the duchy of Burgundy, with its dependencies, with full ſovereignty, within ſix weeks after the king's return to France, without any regard to the decrees of parliament, the Salique law, or any other claim.

"That Francis ſhould be ſet at liberty, in his own kingdom, by the tenth of March enſuing, at which time the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, his two eldeſt ſons, were to be put into the emperor's hands as hoſtages; or, inſtead of the duke of Orleans, the duke of Vendoſme and Albany, with ten other of the chief nobility of France: but this laſt alternative was at the option of the ducheſs regent. It was likewiſe agreed, that upon the return of thoſe hoſtages to France, the duke of Angouleſme, third ſon to Francis, ſhould be given to Charles, to be kept and brought up in his court; and with him Francis likewiſe obliged himſelf, in caſe the reſtitution of Burgundy ſhould not be made in ſix weeks, to return priſoner to Charles.

"Francis gives up all his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, the duchy of Milan, the lordſhip of Genoa, the county of Aſti, Arras, Tournay, Mortaigne, St. Amand, Liſle, Douay, Orchies, Hedin, and alſo all ſovereignty which he could pretend to over the countries of Flanders and Artois, and all other territories which the emperor was actually in poſſeſſion of.

"That the emperor ſhould reſign all his rights and pretenſions to the cities and lordſhips of Pe-

More (a houſe of king Henry's) a ſtate is formed of all the arrears and demands which Henry had upon France, amounting in the whole to two millions of crowns; and the manner in which they were to be paid is ſettled; and the ſame cautioners as before, were bound to ſee it diſcharged.

ronne, Montdidier, Roan, Boulogne, Guiſnes, Ponthieu, and all the cities and territories lying upon the river Somme.

"That there ſhall be between the two powers a league offenſive and defenſive; and that the king ſhall be obliged to furniſh troops to the emperor, for completing the conqueſt of the duchy of Milan.

"That Francis ſhould marry the emperor's ſiſter, the queen dowager of Portugal; who was to have from the emperor two hundred thouſand crowns, with ſeveral lordſhips in diſpute between the two powers; but upon condition of her renouncing all other pretenſions and demands upon the houſe of Auſtria, unleſs the emperor and his brother ſhould die without children. The dauphin was likewiſe to marry Mary, infanta of Portugal, and daughter to the late king Emanuel, and to the queen dowager, who was to be Francis's wife.

"Francis was to do all he could to engage Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, to renounce his pretenſions upon that crown: and if he could not prevail in this, he was to give him no aſſiſtance. He was likewiſe to withdraw all ſupport from the dukes of Gueldres and Wirtemberg, and the houſe of la Mark; and to lend his fleet, fitted out at his own expence for three months, to carry the emperor, when he had a mind to go to Italy for his coronation.

"The duke of Bourbon was to re-enter into poſſeſſion of all his eſtates, as were all his followers; and they were to be left at liberty without ranſom: he was likewiſe to indemnify the Caſtilians, and other Spaniards, for what they had ſuffered in the late war, to the amouut of three hundred thouſand ducats: and the governeſs of the Low Countries was to be indemnified for Francis's keeping her out of the poſſeſſion of the county of Charolois*."

Such, with ſome other private ſtipulations, was the famous treaty of Madrid, which Francis bound himſelf by oath to ratify at the firſt town he ſhould enter upon his arrival in his own dominions; but the ceremonies of exchanging Francis for the hoſtages could not be performed till the eighteenth of March, when he was ſet at liberty; and arriving at Bayonne, he immediately diſpatched a letter to Henry of England, thanking him for the great ſhare he had in his deliverance; but when the Imperial miniſter waited on him, requiring him to ratify the treaty, he made ſuch evaſions as plainly ſhewed that he was reſolved not to be bound to the performance. This double-dealing gave riſe to mutual reproaches between the emperor and him; the lye given on each ſide, challenges in conſequence of that, and a thouſand idle actions, which threw a kind of ridicule on the moſt important events, and ſeemed to degrade the two chief perſonages in Chriſtendom.

As ſoon as Francis arrived at Bourdeaux, he ratified the treaty concluded at More with the king of England. From Bourdeaux he came to Cognac, where he made ſome ſtay with the viceroy of Naples, ſtill in his train, preſſing him to ratify and execute the treaty of Madrid, or return to Spain, as he had ſworn to do when he ſigned that treaty; but all in vain, for the French monarch at length told the viceroy in plain terms, that as the treaty did not concern himſelf alone, but all his realm, particularly his ſubjects of Burgundy, he could not therefore ratify it before he had aſſembled the ſtates of his kingdom, eſpecially thoſe of that duchy." But he offered to give the emperor two millions of crowns as an equivalent for Burgundy; but Charles would not conſent to the leaſt alteration in the treaty.

The pope, the Venetians, and the duke of Milan, had readily foreſeen that Francis would act in this manner, as the treaty of Madrid had been extorted from him, while under confinement, and therefore they ſent private agents to Cognac, who having found Dr. Taylor there, who had been ſent by Wolſey from the court of England, they, on conferring together, ſoon found out that their diſpoſitions were the ſame, namely, to curb the riſing power of the emperor; and having ſounded Francis on this head, they likewiſe found him perfectly ready to concur with them therein, and in a ſhort time they concluded a treaty with Francis, at Cognac, on the twenty-ſecond of May, which was chriſtened by the name of the Moſt Holy League, and was entirely the effect of that great aſcendancy which England had then in the affairs of Europe, for the terms were in a manner dictated by Wolſey, and were as follow.

"The allies were, at their common expence, to levy an army of thirty thouſand foot, two thouſand five hundred men at arms, and three thouſand light horſe, the particular number which each power was to furniſh being ſpecified: and the like agreement made with regard to the ſhips and gallies they were reſpectively to equip. They were immediately to levy Swiſs troops, and Francis was to aſſiſt them therein by his credit with the cantons, whom he was to engage, if poſſible, to undertake the defence of the Milaneſe, on the ſame conditions they had done formerly. The king of France engaged never to diſturb Francis Sforza in the enjoyment of the duchy of Milan, upon his paying him an annuity not exceeding fifty thouſand crowns a year, in lieu of his pretenſions, and providing for his brother Maximilian, who had for ſome years had a large penſion in France for his ſubſiſtence. The duke was likewiſe to marry a princeſs of the blood of France, choſen by the pope; and the county of Aſti was to be reſtored to the king as having been the eſtate of his anceſtors; or at leaſt, the government thereof be given to his ſon, the duke of Orleans. The ſovereignty and title of lord of Genoa were to be reſtored to the king: and if the emperor rejected the common requeſt of all the allies, for ſetting the two ſons of France at liberty; for leaving all the Italian princes in quiet poſſeſſion of their territories; for being attended, when he came to Italy to be crowned, with no greater a train than the pope, the duke of Milan, and the Venetians ſhould think conſiſtent with the ſafety of the country, and ſuitable to his imperial dignity; and for paying the ſums he owed to the king of England, by ſeveral treaties; they were, when they had driven his troops out of the Milaneſe, to invade Naples. If this kingdom was reduced, the pope was ſo diſpoſe of it; but whoever ſhould be placed on the throne was to pay the king of France an annuity not leſs than ſeventy-five thouſand crowns a year; otherwiſe this prince was to reclaim all his rights, and might enter thereon. The family of Medici was to be maintained at Florence, with all their rights and prerogatives.

And

And the king of England, being declared protector of the league, was, in gratitude for his services, to have a duchy or principality in Naples, worth thirty-six thousand ducats a year; and the cardinal of York, for his good services, was to have another of ten thousand; to themselves and successors*."

Such were the principal articles of this league, which was made while the Imperial ambassadors were at Cognac, though they knew nothing of it till the next month. In the mean time they represented to Francis, that, notwithstanding the states of Burgundy might refuse to comply with the promised cession of that duchy, his majesty might still keep his word by returning to his prison in Spain, as his ancestor, king John, had done with regard to England. But Francis complained of the ill treatment he had met with in his captivity, and repeated his offer of two millions of crowns in lieu of Burgundy, and the like sum for the ransom of his two sons. The ambassadors upon this sent another express to their court, who returned with the emperor's ultimate resolution, to run all hazards rather than suffer the least abatement in the articles stipulated by the treaty of Madrid.

The ambassadors returning this answer from their master, were surprized with the league above-mentioned being published in their presence; upon this they took their leave of the French court immediately, and returned to Spain.

The chief view of the French king in entering into the league of Cognac, seems to have been to frighten the emperor, hoping that the open declaration of the court of England to assist him with all its forces, would give weight to the instances that Henry was at this time actually making at the Imperial court for delivering him back his children; and accordingly he was not very forward in drawing the sword, because willing to leave room for an accommodation. But this conduct had almost proved the ruin of the Italian states; for the pope and the Venetians, relying upon the assistance of France and England, sent their troops into the field, under the command of the duke of Urbino; but the Swiss forces, who were paid by France, and the marquis de Saluces, who commanded the French troops in Italy, were so slow in their motions, that Sforza, duke of Milan, who still remained shut up in the castle of that city, was obliged, on the twenty-fourth of July, to surrender to the duke of Bourbon, the emperor's general, and retire to Lodi, which had been taken by the pope's troops.

And now Charles resolved to chastize those allies who had deserted him in the time of danger: of these the most considerable was the Roman pontiff, who, though he had chiefly owed his election to the good offices of the emperor, had been so ungrateful as to abandon the interest of his benefactor, and espouse the cause of the French monarch. In order to punish his holiness for this instance of perfidy and ingratitude, Charles commanded the duke of Burgundy to advance towards the city of Rome, and attack Clement VII. in his capital, Bourbon executed his commission with equal bravery and conduct; and, though he lost his life in the attempt†, the prince of Orange, who succeeded him in the command, continued the assault with so much vigour and resolution, that the city was at length stormed and sacked, and the pope himself made prisoner.

The kings of France and England were so greatly alarmed at the rapid run of success which constantly attended the emperor's arms, that they now engaged in a fresh league to oppose the growing power of that formidable monarch. Accordingly, Francis having sent a solemn embassy to London, in the spring of the year 1527, the negotiators made so good use of their time, that, on the last day of April, according to the lord Herbert, three treaties were concluded. The contents of the first were,

"That the two kings should jointly send ambassadors to the emperor, with offers concerning the the ransom of the two hostages, and to demand the payment of what was due to the king of England.

"That if he rejected the offers, or gave no answer within twenty days, the two kings should proclaim war against him.

"Another article of this treaty contained a mutual engagement for the marriage of Francis, or his son the duke of Orleans, with the princess Mary, at the king of France's choice, and upon such terms as should be agreed on when the time came‡." Probably, this treaty was to be made public, in order to induce the emperor to desist from his claim to Burgundy and be satisfied with the offered equivalent.

By the second, it was agreed,

"That in case the emperor rejected their proposals or deferred his answer, all commerce should be forbidden with his subjects by the two kings, allowing them however forty days to withdraw their effects.

"That the two kings should make war upon the emperor in the Low Countries, with an army of thirty thousand foot and fifteen hundred men at arms, and that two thirds of the foot and all the horse‖ should be furnished by the king of France.

"That they should equip a fleet with fifteen thousand men, whereof the king of France should find ten thousand.

"That if the king of Portugal or any other prince or state should join with the emperor, they should be declared enemies to both the kings.

"That the pope and Venetians should be deemed included in the league, provided they continued the war in Italy.

"That the king of France should endeavour to persuade the king of Navarre, the duke of Gueldres, and Robert de la Mark, to make war upon the emperor.

"That the two kings should use their joint endeavours to encourage John de Zapol to prosecute his right to the crown of Hungary, in case he had not already made an alliance with the Turk, in order to keep the emperor's brother Ferdinand employed in those parts.

"That the league should be notified to the princes of Germany, and the two kings endeavour to prevent their assisting the emperor."

The substance of the third treaty was:

‖ Twenty thousand foot, and fifteen hundred men at arms. Lord Herbert, p. 81.

"I. That

"I. That this treaty ſhould not derogate from that of More, which remained in force.

"II. That there ſhould be perpetual peace between Francis and Henry and their reſpective ſubjects.

"III. That neither of them ſhould give aid or advice to any perſon whatever that ſhould attack the dominions of the other.

"IV. Henry renounced for himſelf and ſucceſſors all right and title to the kingdom of France §, and in general, whatever Francis now poſſeſſed.

"V. In conſideration whereof, Francis bound himſelf and ſucceſſors to pay to Henry's ſucceſſors an annual penſion for ever, of fifty thouſand crowns, at two payments; namely, on the firſt of May and the firſt of November, and that the payment of the penſion ſhould commence, on the firſt of thoſe two days which ſhould happen after Henry's death, without deduction of what ſhould remain to be paid after Henry's deceaſe of the two millions ſtipulated by the treaty of More.

"VI. Moreover Francis bound himſelf to give yearly to Henry fifteen thouſand crowns worth of ſalt of Bruage ¶, beſides the fore-mentioned fifty thouſand crowns.

"VII. That to prevent the objection which might hereafter be made, that a king cannot bind his ſucceſſors, the two kings ſhould cauſe the treaty to be confirmed by the ſtates of their realms, and held as a perpetual and inviolable law.

"VIII. That the treaty ſhould be approved and confirmed by the archbiſhops, biſhops, princes, dukes, earls, barons, and other great men of the two kingdoms, whoſe names were inſerted in this article, under forfeiture of all their goods; and by the parliaments of Paris, Toulouſe, Roan, Bourdeaux, as well as by all the courts of juſtice in England."

The news of the pope's captivity arriving ſoon after the concluſion of theſe treaties, the parties agreed, that, inſtead of carrying the war on in the Low Countries, they ſhould act ſolely in Italy; and as Engliſh troops could not be tranſported into that country without great trouble, time, and expence, the French king took upon himſelf the maintenance of the war, on condition of Henry's paying him a certain monthly ſubſidy. And now, as a mutual earneſt of friendſhip, Francis beſtowed upon Henry the order of a knight of St. Michael; while Henry, in return, choſe Francis a knight of the Garter.

The pope's impriſonment affording reaſon to ſuſpect that the emperor might force him to ſome improper uſe of his eccleſiaſtical authority, cardinal Wolſey was ſent over to Francis about the meaſures fit to be taken on the ſubject. They met at Amiens, and, on the eighteenth of Auguſt, agreed, "that neither king ſhould allow a general council (the liberty of which conſtituted its principal authority) to be either called or ſit, nor admit any bull to be iſſued to the prejudice of either realms, whilſt the pope continued in captivity; and that the method of government in ſpiritual matters, in both realms, during that time, ſhould be ſettled for England by the cardinal of York, with the concurrence of a convocation; and in France, by the king and an aſſembly of the French clergy: at the ſame time it was agreed, that the princeſs Mary of England ſhould be given to the duke of Orleans (inſtead of Francis), as of a more ſuitable age for her; and that this young prince ſhould be brought up in the court of England *.

The emperor was extremely perplexed at theſe negociations, and ſought to break their force by ſeeming to comply with the propoſitions which Francis had made to the viceroy of Naples, when the latter required him to ratify the treaty of Madrid: but he paid all the compliment of this compliance to Henry, whoſe ambaſſadors at his court were daily preſſing for the enlargement of the pope; and he now publiſhed a kind of manifeſto, as from himſelf, addreſſed to the Engliſh ambaſſadors, dated at Valladolid, in which he ſpecifies not only his own conceſſions, but the offers of Francis: a copy of theſe articles were alſo tranſmitted to Wolſey, who was acquainted that Charles had ſignified he was willing to have them moderated by the king of England. At the ſame time, to bring that monarch, if poſſible, off from the allies of the Clementine or Moſt Holy League, Charles offered by one of his miniſters, to give the daughter of Portugal, with the Milaneſe for her dowry, to the duke of Richmond, Henry's beloved natural ſon; but matters had now taken a new turn, and very little attention was paid to what Charles propoſed, who next endeavoured to gain over the cardinal, by advantageous offers; but Wolſey was too far engaged with Francis to retreat, or he was determined at all events to be revenged on the emperor, by whom he had been twice deceived; and perhaps the king's divorce from Catherine was already reſolved upon, in which caſe he could not poſſibly eſpouſe the intereſt of Charles. Certain it is, the cardinal, in a letter to the king, dated on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, told him it was already reported in Spain, that his majeſty intended to obtain a divorce; and counſelled him to ſend orders to his ambaſſadors in that country to ſtifle the rumour as ſoon poſſible, by alleging it had no other foundation than ſome ſcruples expreſſed by the biſhop of Tarbe, one of the plenipotentiaries from the French king to the court of England, on the ſubject of the propoſed match between the duke of Orleans and the princeſs Mary, as if there had been ſome room to doubt her legitimacy.

At the ſame time the cardinal ſhewed himſelf reſolved to compaſs his ends by arms, if he could not by treaty; at leaſt he continued to act as if arms were the moſt effectual means to give ſucceſs to negociations, for he perſuaded Francis to ſend orders to marſhal Lautrec, his general for Italy, to advance into that country, in ſupport of the Clementine league, at the head of the French army, which was to join that of the Italian princes.

Accordingly, on the firſt of Auguſt, Lautrec, entering the Milaneſe, took Alexandria; and ſoon after, aſſiſted by Doria, who commanded a ſquadron of fourteen gallies for the king of France, he inveſted Genoa by ſea and land, and obliged that city to capitulate, and the marſhal de Trevulcé was appointed to command the garriſon. The Lomeline, Viginnano, Bragraſſa, and Pavia were his next conqueſts;

conqueſts; and Antonio de Legna, who commanded in Milan, not having a ſufficient force to reſiſt him, he might eaſily have made himſelf maſter of that capital; but by his affected delays he plainly ſhewed that he had private orders not to be too much in earneſt. The king of France was as yet uncertain of the iſſue of the treaty for the ranſom of his ſons; and if the emperor could be prevailed upon to accept of the ceſſion of the Milaneſe inſtead of Burgundy, rather than run the hazard of loſing both, that project would have been obſtructed by the putting of Francis Sforza in poſſeſſion of the capital of his duchy.

Theſe were not reaſons to be urged to the princes of the league; but Wolſey having given the pope, who entirely depended upon the friendſhip of the Engliſh court, the ſtrongeſt aſſurances that he ſhould be ſet at liberty, cardinal Cibo was ſent to ſummon Lautrec to march directly to Rome for the pope's relief, in conſequence of the treaties lately concluded between the courts of England and France. Lautrec took a middle way between the ſolicitations of the duke of Milan and the Venetians, who preſſed him to make himſelf ſure of the Milaneſe, the applications of the pope, and the ſecret views of his own court. He left the conqueſt of Milan to be completed by the forces of the Venetians and Sforza; and, paſſing the Po, on the eighteenth of October, he took poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, which opened their gates to him, and at the ſame time he found means to draw off the dukes of Ferrara and Mantua from the emperor's intereſt.

That prince, ſeeing the ill effects of his detaining the pope a captive in the ſtorm that was raiſing againſt him, came to a reſolution of ſetting his holineſs at liberty, and had ſent an order to the viceroy of Naples for that purpoſe; but as the ſecurity he exacted from the pope for his ranſom was greater than the pontiff could grant, the negociation proceeded very ſlowly; but the march of Lautrec for the eccleſiaſtical dominions haſtened the treaty, which was at length concluded to this effect: "That the pope ſhould not oppoſe the emperor with regard either to Milan or Naples; that his holineſs ſhould grant to Charles the tenth of all eccleſiaſtical revenues within his dominions; that he ſhould pay ninety-five thouſand ducats before he left the caſtle of St. Angelo (where he was detained priſoner), and thrice that ſum afterwards; that, till the two firſt payments ſhould be made, the pope ſhould be conducted to ſome place of ſafety, out of Rome, and give hoſtages."

The treaty being ſigned, and the cardinals of Ceſſis and Orſino delivered in hoſtage, it was agreed, that, on the tenth of December, the pope ſhould be taken out of the caſtle of St. Angelo, and conducted to a place appointed; but, as he was afraid of being detained a good while longer, as he was not in a condition to perform the pecuniary ſtipulations, he made his eſcape in diſguiſe the night before, and was eſcorted by Lewis Gonzaga to Orvieto.

As ſoon as Lautrec heard that the pope was at liberty, he reſtored to him the city of Parma, and marched to Bologna, where he ſtaid three weeks, expecting freſh orders from the king his maſter. Some days after, he received a letter from the pope, acknowleging himſelf indebted to the marſhal for his liberty; at the ſame time acquainting him, that having been forced to grant the Imperialiſts whatever they were pleaſed to demand of him, he did not think himſelf bound to keep his word.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, Henry's attention was engaged by an affair of a more domeſtic, and to him of a more important, nature: this was no other than a divorce from his queen Catherine, daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, king and queen of Spain, and aunt to Charles V. This affair is the moſt remarkable we meet with in the hiſtory of almoſt any country, whether we conſider it in itſelf, with reſpect to the parties concerned, or, for the conſequences it was attended with.

Henry VIII. was, by nature, ſenſual, violent, and obſtinate in his deſires: he had lately caſt his eyes on Anne Boleyn *, a young lady of his court, who at this juncture was one of the maids of honour to the queen; her free and ſprightly carriage ſeemed to promiſe very little reſiſtance, nevertheleſs ſhe had ſtill the prudence not to yield to the king's ſolicitations, by which ſhe ſo inflamed his paſſion that he reſolved to make her his wife.

But how was he to procure a divorce, or annul his marriage with a perſon like queen Catherine, whom he could not reproach with harſhneſs, ill conduct, nor even that moroſe humour which is ſo frequently found in women of ſtrict virtue? Add to this, that he had lived with her upwards of eighteen years, during which time ſhe had brought him three children, of which there was one ſtill living, viz. the princeſs Mary, afterwards queen of England. Catherine was a princeſs of the higheſt quality, powerful in her family, relations, and friends; her title to be his wife had been confirmed by all the ſanction which could be given by that religion to which he and all the greateſt princes of

* Anna, or Anne Boleyn was of a good though not a noble family. Sir Thomas Boleyn, her father, married a ſiſter of the duke of Norfolk, and had by her this Anne, who was born, according to Camden, in 1507, about two years before Henry VIII. mounted the throne. Her father was twice ambaſſador to Francis I. in 1515, and again in 1517. He was made viſcount Rochford in 1525; and afterwards earl of Wiltſhire and Ormond, in right of his mother. Anne, his daughter, when only ſeven years of age, was carried over to France, in 1514, when Mary, the king's ſiſter, went and conſummated her marriage, at Abbeville, with Lewis XII. and after that king's deceaſe ſhe continued in the French court, in the ſame poſt about Claude, conſort of Francis I. till that queen's deceaſe, when ſhe was taken into the family of Margaret, ducheſs of Alençon. Coming from France in 1525, her father brought her to court, where Henry's queen Catherine took ſuch a liking to her, that ſhe made her one of her maids of honour. Her fine perſon, lively wit, and pleaſant and agreeable converſation, accompanied with all the eaſe, politeneſs, accompliſhments, and graces, which an education in the court of France could give her, naturally procured her many admirers; among theſe, Henry, lord Piercy, ſon and heir to the earl of Northumberland, gained ſo much upon her affections, that ſolemn promiſes of marriage were made between them, in the preſence of witneſſes. This coming to the king's ears, who was by this time deeply ſmitten himſelf, he employed Wolſey, whoſe pupil the young nobleman was, to break off the match. Both parties were obliged to releaſe each other from their promiſes; but retained ever after a violent reſentment againſt the cardinal. As for the lord Piercy, he was, by his father, ſoon after married to the daughter of the earl of Shrewſbury: and we ſhall ſee Anne mount the royal bed, and from thence be conducted to the ſcaffold. Sir Roger Twiſden's Account of Anne Boleyn, from an authentic MS. T. Sebright, No. 9.

Europe were devoted. This princeſs, as we have already ſeen, was firſt married to prince Arthur, eldeſt ſon to Henry VII. who died a few months after the nuptials. Henry procured a diſpenſation from pope Julius II. and made a contract of marriage between her and his ſecond ſon, this Henry VIII. who, as ſoon as he came to the crown by his father's death, was ſolemnly eſpouſed to her. A conſiderable time afterwards he had a natural ſon by one of his miſtreſſes, whom he created duke of Richmond, and of whom he was remarkably fond; but he had then only conceived a diſlike to his marriage, and no ſcruples of conſcience: but as ſoon as he fell ſo paſſionately in love with Anne Boleyn, and found that he could not obtain her without marriage, he inſtantly began to feel a remorſe of conſcience, and ſhuddered to think how much he had offended God by having lived eighteen years with Catherine of Arragon as his wife.

He was not long before he opened to Wolſey the great ſecret of his heart; and this artful miniſter, affecting to believe that thoſe ſentiments did not ſpring from the diſtaſte of an old, nor the love of a new object, but purely from ſcruples of conſcience, fell in with his maſter's deſigns about the divorce, and thought he could not have found a time more favourable than the preſent to his wiſhes: France depended on the friendſhip of England, and the pope could be relieved only by Henry's ſupport; and Wolſey doubted not, by his addreſs, his authority, and the force of his money (he being then about to ſet out for France, whither he was to carry with him twenty four thouſand pounds in ſpecie) that he ſhould be able to procure powers to himſelf from the pope for determining the matter of the divorce in Henry's favour.

As the pope was at this time in captivity, and no ſuits could be regularly carried on in the court of Rome, two methods were propoſed for getting the affair diſpatched: one was, to engage the cardinals, not impriſoned with the pope, to meet at Avignon, and take upon them the adminiſtration of eccleſiaſtical affairs during Clement's detention: the other was, to obtain from the pope a commiſſion, conſtituting Wolſey his vicar-general in all countries on this ſide the Alps*. But the latter of theſe methods was diſagreeable to the French, and the former was deemed very difficult, if not impracticable.

However, as the pope's compliance with any requeſt of the court of England was not doubted, under his preſent circumſtances, the king ſent Dr. Knight as his envoy to Rome, ordering him to paſs by Compeigne, in France, where the cardinal then was, and to receive his eminency's inſtructions for his conduct. Knight did ſo; and having received them, proceeded on his journey, being furniſhed with two inſtruments, drawn up in England and reviſed by the cardinal, which the pope was to be requeſted to ſign, viz. a commiſſion to Wolſey, empowering him to call in whom he pleaſed to his aſſiſtance, to enquire into the validity of pope Julius's bull; to proceed in the cauſe, and to give ſentence with regard to the divorce and ſubſequent marriage: for which laſt the pope was likewiſe deſired to grant a diſpenſation. He was alſo to bind himſelf never to repeal theſe acts. At the ſame time Knight was furniſhed with ten thouſand ducats, to be employed in getting the chief cardinals over to favour his ſolicitations. But as the pope was priſoner, and guarded by a Spaniſh captain, it was impoſſible for Knight to have an audience; he found means, however, to convey to his holineſs a memorial, containing the ſum of his commiſſion, to which the pope returned a favourable anſwer: but as it was impracticable for the Engliſh envoy to have acceſs to the pontiff's perſon, the matter was carried no farther at that time.

This ſeems to have occaſioned Henry's recalling the cardinal from France, in order to conſult him again on the difficulties attending this affair: Wolſey accordingly arrived on the thirtieth of September, bringing back with him the great-ſeal of England, which, by an unprecedented ſtrain of power, he had carried over to France, and left at Calais.

Upon the pope's eſcaping from Rome to Orvieto, on the ninth of December, Knight followed him thither, as did alſo ſir Gregory Caſſali, the king's agent in Italy, and renewed their inſtances for the acts being forthwith expedited. Clement's circumſtances were now ſuch that he was greatly perplexed how to act. To have annulled the marriage under the preſent circumſtances of its being contracted and conſummated contrary to a law which was morally irreverſible, and eternally binding, would have given a mortal blow to the high claim of the diſpenſing power in popes: to grant the acts in his then ſituation, while the French army was at a diſtance from his relief, and while he was ſurrounded by the troops of his inveterate enemy, appeared to him certain deſtruction. On the other hand, he knew of what great ſervice the court of England had been, and could be, to him, and dreaded every thing from its reſentment, ſhould he diſoblige Henry in this favourite point. He therefore endeavoured to find a medium between throwing himſelf entirely into the arms of the emperor, and making him his irreconcileable enemy; he therefore ſet all his wits to work to ſpin out the affair by ways and means the king miſtruſted not: to that end he told the Engliſh envoys, that, before he ſigned the acts, he ſhould be glad to conſult the cardinal de Santi Quatro.

Knight and Caſſali, on hearing this, immediately repaired to that cardinal, and offered him four thouſand crowns down, if he would befriend them in their ſuit, with other promiſes more than ſufficient to biaſs a needy and plundered Italian: he promiſed them all the good offices in his power; but his eminency and the pope ſeem to have underſtood each other perfectly well, for the cardinal having examined the inſtruments drawn up by Wolſey, found very great faults in them, particularly in the affair of the commiſſion, and took upon him to draw up one more perfect: which done, Knight and Caſſali went to the pope, and preſſed him to ſign.

His holineſs finding himſelf ſo much preſſed, put into their hands the commiſſion for cardinal Wolſey to try the marriage, and the diſpenſation for the king; but with this expreſs proviſion, that Henry ſhould not proceed to any proceſs upon them before his holineſs was delivered from all apprehenſions from the Imperialiſts; at the ſame time he perſuaded the envoys to accept of the acts with a poſt-date, viz. April 13, 1528; by which he had it in his power, as the commiſſion could not operate before this date, to revoke it, in caſe the emperor was ſucceſsful; or deliberate upon the confirmation of it, if the allies ſhould prevail. As for the bull of decretal, to annul the marriage of Henry with Catherine, he promiſed to ſend it to England after the agents. Thus, however urgent Henry was to have this affair terminated, he found, at the cloſe of the year 1527, that he was but juſt where he began.

While this affair was thus warmly ſoliciting at the court of Rome, a very ſtrong ſpirit was working at the Engliſh court againſt cardinal Wolſey, by means of the new favourite, Anne Boleyn, who, being in her heart a great favourer of the reformation began in religion by Luther and his followers, and knowing Wolſey to be a profeſſed enemy to that ſect, and to poſſeſs all Henry's eſteem, ſhe uſed all her endeavours to eſtrange that prince from him. Something of this kind ſeems to have been effected about this time for Knight having ſet out for England with the commiſſion and diſpenſation, left Caſſali behind at Orvietto, who received a diſpatch, dated December 27, but from whence it does not appear, requiring him to apply to the pope for a legate to be ſent over to England for determining the matter of a divorce. It is certain that Wolſey does not appear to have been actuated in his proceedings in this affair, by any regard he had for Anne Boleyn; it rather ſeems that he had winked at the king's growing paſſion for her, but had never thought it would have terminated in matrimony; and that when he found this likely to be the caſe, he cooled in the zeal he had before expreſſed for the divorce; and this might occaſion the ſending for a legate, who might be tempted by advantageous offers to ſtir more heartily in favour of the king's deſires.

Be that as it may, Caſſali, on receiving this diſpatch, waited on the pope, and communicated the contents thereof to him. Clement was extremely alarmed at the demand, which could not, as the former acts had been, be granted without throwing off the maſk, and declaring to the Imperialiſts, who were ſtill maſters of Rome, that he was reſolved to proceed in the matter of the divorce: his holineſs, in this dilemma, ordered the cardinals de Santi Quatro and Simonetta, two of the moſt able of that venerable body remaining about him, to attend while the demand of the Engliſh court ſhould be debated before ſir Gregory Caſſali. After mature conſultation and deliberation, the pope gave it as his opinion, "That if the queen ſhould, as ſhe certainly would, proteſt againſt the proceedings ſo carried on in an incompetent place, and by judges who had it not in their power to be impartial, and appeal to his tribunal, he could not help avocating the thing to himſelf, which would give ſuch advantages to the Imperialiſts, as might diſappoint all Henry's wiſhes. That this being the unavoidable conſequence of any judicial proceeding, he thought Henry's beſt way, if he really was convinced in conſciouſneſs of the unlawfulneſs of his marriage, was to proceed upon the commiſſion ſent to Wolſey by ſecretary Knight, or upon his legatine capacity, and for the king immediately, without any manner of noiſe, to marry another wife, and then to ſend for a legate in full form to confirm the ſentence." The two cardinals were ſtrongly of the ſame opinion; and told Caſſali, "That in caſe the queen ſhould appeal, his holineſs could not, without flying in the face of all juſtice and decency, refuſe an inhibition to the Imperialiſts, and an avocation of the whole proceſs to the court of Rome: but that if the king went ſo far as an actual marriage, the pope could not be ſolicited for any inhibition, and would take care to confirm all the proceedings, ſo as that there ſhould be no manner of diſpute upon it." His holineſs, at the ſame time, charged Caſſali, who was an Italian, to ſignify to the Engliſh court, that theſe were only the ſentiments of the two cardinals, Santi Quatro and Simonetta. As to the propoſal of ſending a legate, he ſaid, "there were but ſix cardinals of all the conclave qualified in point of abilities to be ſent, five of whom were very improper, on account of their bodily infirmities; and that Campejo, who was very ill of the gout at Rome, was the only proper perſon to be truſted: his holineſs concluded with deſiring Caſſali to acquaint the Engliſh court of his earneſt diſpoſitions to oblige Henry in the affair, ſaying, that he was ſure the emperor never would forgive him for what he had done, and that he threw himſelf into his majeſty's arms; that he had but very faint hopes of relief from the French, or from any but the king of England and the cardinal of York *."

Henry looked upon this as a ſnare of the pope's. He conſidered, that it was not poſſible to have ſuch a cauſe tried without noiſe, ſince it was neceſſary the queen ſhould be heard, otherwiſe the ſentence would be evidently void: in the next place, ſhould he do what the pope propoſed, he would have been entirely at the pontiff's mercy, who, according to the opinion of the canoniſts, would have had it in his power to refuſe to confirm the cardinal's ſentence, as well as the marriage that ſhould be contracted in conſequence thereof. It was therefore determined to apply directly to the pope, and require new bulls, on pretence that the cardinal of York found his commiſſion inſufficient. Purſuant to this reſolution the king ſent Stephen Gardiner, Wolſey's ſecretary, and Edward Fox, both of them able men, the firſt one of the beſt canoniſts, the latter one of the deepeſt theologiſts in the age, to manage the affair. They were inſtructed to declare to the pope, that the king, conceiving the diſpenſation to be inſufficient to his purpoſe, they were come to have all impediments removed, in a more full and leſs exceptionable manner. Here we ſhall leave them, as we are now to attend the progreſs of the war and differences among the three great powers of Europe, which had ſo great an influence in forwarding or retarding Henry's ſolicitations with the pope.

The French and Engliſh ambaſſadors had in vain exerted their utmoſt endeavours with the emperor to moderate the articles of the treaty of Madrid; but, after an infinite number of memorials, propoſitions, and replies, the emperor could only be brought to relax in the point of Burgundy, conſenting that his right to that duchy ſhould be determined in a way of juſtice; upon which both French and Engliſh ambaſſadors deſired leave to depart, which was very readily granted them: and, after they were gone, two perſons, who had come with them in their train, and whoſe characters were hitherto unknown, deſired an audience of Charles, and appeared to be the one Clarencieux and the other Guienne king at arms, who, being admitted into the Imperial preſence, on the twenty-ſecond day of January, 1528, at Burgos, Guienne defied Charles, in the name of Francis, on the following accounts: for not agreeing to a juſt and honourable peace, and for detaining the two royal hoſtages; for not paying to the king of England the money due to him; for having detained the pope a priſoner; and for kindling a war in Italy. It was next the turn of Clarencieux, who ſpoke like the herald of him who was arbiter of the Chriſtian world, requiring Charles inſtantly to accept of the terms of peace which had been offered, or to receive his declaration of war, which he then pronounced. But both heralds, before they finiſhed their ſpeeches, declared they had orders to offer forty days notice to the ſubjects of Charles, for withdrawing their perſons and effects out of the dominions of the kings their maſters.

after

A few days after, Charles ordered a long laboured reply to be given to Clarencieux: it conſiſted, in the firſt place, of a gentle reproach to Henry, who ſeemed to ſeek for a quarrel: Charles ſaid, "That, upon his brother of England's account, he had abated in the demands he could have made by the treaty of Madrid, even ſo far as to be contented to accept of the ſame propoſals which Francis, when at liberty, had made to the viceroy of Naples: he diſclaimed having had any hand in the captivity of the pope, who he declared was now free: and he laid the non-payment of the juſt debts he owed to Henry, upon the ambaſſadors of the latter not being furniſhed with the original bonds and contracts, without which he could, as he ſaid, have no full acquittance: the matter of indemnification was, he ſaid, not without its difficulties, which would require commiſſioners on both ſides to remove: as to the penalty upon the marriage, he ſaid, the civilians and canoniſts were agreed, that all penal ſtipulations, whereby the free power of marrying in a proper place, are, ipſo facto, void: that Henry could not make it appear, that he had fulfilled on his part the treaty of Windſor, of which he ſought to avail himſelf: that he had required the princeſs Mary to be ſent to him, but had been refuſed; and that he had ſufficient proofs in his hands of a marriage-treaty between her and the king of Scotland, even while the contract between her and him (Charles) was ſuppoſed to be in full force; and this, as he conceived, turned the penalty upon Henry: he next took notice of the treatment de Praet, his ambaſſador, met with at the court of England, only for doing his duty; of the ſame court's entertaining Joachim, a declared French agent, in direct violation of the treaties between himſelf and Henry: he complained of Henry riſing in his demands, in proportion as he abated in his; and of the groſs affront offered to the imperial houſe, if, as fame reported, Henry was ſoliciting a divorce from his queen: he next proceeds to reproach him with endeavouring to palm upon him a baſtard (as Henry muſt imply the princeſs Mary to be), if he was ſoliciting ſuch a divorce: he concludes with a bitter invective againſt the cardinal, whoſe inſatiable ambition, he ſays, led him to be his implacable enemy, becauſe he would not employ his army in Italy to make him pope, as he (the cardinal) had deſired, and procured his maſter to write to him (Charles) to the like effect."

But the emperor dealt not ſo complaiſantly with the king of France's herald, whom he ordered to tell his maſter, that he had acted like a knave and a villain, and that he would maintain it body to body; adding, that Francis ought not to have forgot the laſt converſation they had together. It ſeems, before Francis left Spain, the emperor aſking him one day, whether he did really and truly intend to perform all the articles capitulated between them? the latter anſwered, "Yes; and when you find that I do not keep my word with you, I wiſh and conſent that you hold me and publiſh me for a knave and a villain *. Francis, however, though conſcious of his having made this ſolemn proteſtation, was ſo incenſed at the uſe the emperor had made of it, that, in an inſtrument drawn up by his own hand, and read on the twenty-eighth of March before the Imperial ambaſſador at Paris, he gave the lye direct to the emperor, accepted his challenge, and required Charles to appoint the field, which he did in the very place were Francis had been exchanged with his two ſons; but ſome difficulties ariſing thereon, and Francis affecting delays, theſe ebullitions of a violent reſentment paſſed over without any great effects.

The declaration of war was not agreeable either to the Engliſh or the Flemings, as it put a ſtop to the commerce, wherein both found great advantages, and being followed by a ſeizure of the Engliſh merchants and their effects in Spain, which produced a like ſeizure in England and the Low Countries. The pope's being ſet at liberty had cooled the reſentment which the Engliſh had conceived againſt the emperor on account of his holding him captive, and their animoſities againſt France revived. The clothiers, ſpinners, carders, and other manufacturers in the country, ſuffered by the merchants not buying the cloths ſent to Blackwell-hall, under pretence they had no vend for any commodities: this gave occaſion to a general uneaſineſs, and Wolſey was blamed for precipitating the declaration of war, though agreeable, in the main, to the king's intentions, and the ſtipulations with France for acting jointly in that matter: but the Flemings, on their ſide, making the like complaints, Margaret of Auſtria ſent ambaſſadors to London to propoſe a truce for eight months with regard to all the countries under her government. This was ſigned on the fifteenth of June, by her's and the Engliſh plenipotentiaries, and confirmed afterwards by the king of France and the emperor. This treaty put a ſtop to the war in all parts but Italy, the affairs of which country now claim a part of our attention.

As ſoon as it was known that the negociations in Spain had ended in a declaration of war, the marſhal de Lautrec entered Romagna, and, having reduced Imola and Rimini to the pope's obedience, advanced, in the beginning of February, this year, 1528, towards Rome, which the Imperialiſts, whoſe forces were by this time reduced to fifteen thouſand, immediately quitted, and retired into the kingdom of Naples, whither Lautrec followed them; and, after having reduced ſeveral ſtrong towns in that kingdom to his obedience, he, on the ninth of May, ſat down before the city of Naples itſelf; but as the viceroy, Monçada, had thrown himſelf into the place with the greateſt part of the Imperial forces, the marſhal would not venture to take it by force, but reſolved to reduce it by famine. With this view he poſted his army, amounting to thirty thouſand men, round the city by land, while Philippino Doria blocked it up on the ſea ſide with two men of war and eight gallies, belonging to his uncle Andrew Doria: by this diſpoſition the beſieged were reduced to great ſtraits, and the French general thought himſelf at the eve of reducing the capital of Naples, when Andrew Doria, having taken ſome diſguſt againſt the French king, recalled his nephew Philippino with his gallies, and declared for the emperor; ſo that the French army, having no longer a communication by ſea, ſuffered as much as the beſieged from a ſcarcity of proviſions. At length, to add to their misfortunes, their camp was infected by the plague, which carried off the greateſt part of the officers and ſoldiers; and the marſhal de Lautrec himſelf being ſeized with the diſtemper, he died of it on the ſixteenth of Auguſt. He was ſucceeded in the command by the marquis de Saluces, who immediately abandoned the enterprize, and retreated to Averſa, where he was beſieged in his turn by the Imperialiſts, and obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. Much about the ſame time Andrew Doria, having taken Genoa in the emperor's name, reſtored his country to liberty, eſtabliſhing that form of government which the inhabitants ſtill retain *. Thus the affairs of Italy, which, in the beginning of this year, had ſo promiſing an aſpect for Francis, were ſo entirely altered, that he had hardly any thing left in that country.

The war in Italy raiſed freſh obſtacles to Henry's divorce from Catherine. Gardiner and Fox arriving at Orvieto when Lautrec was on his march towards Naples, pope Clement wanted to protract the diſcuſſion of this affair until he ſhould ſee the ſucceſs of the campaign, and for this purpoſe endeavoured to amuſe Henry with a letter written in cypher, which nobody could explain. This behaviour was greatly reſented by Henry, who ſent orders to his envoys to inſiſt upon his former demands, and at the ſame time to repreſent to his holineſs, that the king was unalterably determined never to bed more with Catherine, on account of the ſcruples which troubled his conſcience, "when he conſidered how expreſly it was forbidden by the Levitical law, to uncover the nakedneſs of his brother's wife, or go in to his wife's ſiſter. They were at the ſame time ordered to repreſent how much Henry was affected by the untimely deaths of ſeveral of his children, which he conſidered as a divine judgment upon him for his breach of the above ſacred law, eſpecially when he had no valid diſpenſation in the caſe, as ſeveral learned canoniſts had agreed that pope Julius's bull of diſpenſation being granted on the falſe ſuggeſtion of the marriage being neceſſary to preſerve the peace between the crowns of England and Spain, and at the requeſt of Henry (VIII.) then not above twelve years of age, and not only incapable of making ſuch a requeſt, but abſolutely ignorant of the whole tranſaction; and being afterwards extinguiſhed by a ſecret proteſtation againſt this marriage, which this prince made when he came to age of puberty, and by the death of Henry VII. was for theſe reaſons invalid, and the marriage conſequent thereupon illegal †."

Clement thus importuned, and animated by the hopes of ſeeing Naples ſoon reduced by the French (whoſe king ſtrongly ſupported Henry's cauſe with the pope, both as his brother in-law and ally, and likewiſe as the enemy of Charles V.) granted, on the twenty-eighth of June this year, a bull, appointing the cardinals Campejo and Wolſey his legates a latere, conſtituting them his vicegerents in the affair of the divorce, and for that purpoſe veſting them with his whole authority; he alſo conſented to furniſh Campejo with a decretal, annulling the king's marriage. Theſe conceſſions were made at different periods, to protract the time; and when he was at laſt prevailed upon to ſign the decretal, he did it very privately, without the knowlege of any of his council, and inſiſted that no other uſe ſhould be made of it, but barely to ſhew it to the king and cardinal Wolſey. This laſt, conſidering it as an honourable teſtimony as well of his own merit and the pope's favour to him, as of his own zeal for the divorce, uſed afterwards very ſtrong inſtances with Clement for leave that it might be ſhewn to the privy-council of England; but the Imperialiſts being by that time maſters of Italy, the pope abſolutely refuſed his conſent; and (according to Burnet's Collection of Records) ſent orders to Campejo, who had carried it over with him, to burn it, that he might be no more teazed on the ſubject.

As this decretal was not to be made public, Gardiner laboured to get the intent of it anſwered, in ſome degree, by another inſtrument that might be ſhewed, and engaged the pope, on the third of July, to ſign a promiſe, or, as it is termed, pollicitation, importing, "that he would not, on any pretence whatever, grant any bull, brief, or other writ for inhibiting or revoking the commiſſion granted to the two legates, for delaying the proceſs or for interrupting them in proceeding to the full and final execution of that commiſſion: but if he ſhould (which God forbid) do any thing of that kind, he declared every ſuch act or attempt to be void, and adjudged it to be of no force or efficacy ‡."

This ſeems to be the laſt act of compliance which the pope did in favour of Henry; for, notwithſtanding all this prince's inſtances, ſupported by the ſtrongeſt reaſons of his envoys, Gardiner and Fox, for preventing all delays, Campejo, waiting the event of the ſiege of Naples, was ſo ſlow in his motions, that he did not reach London till the beginning of October. Upon his arrival in England, he began his legation by exhorting the king to live in good underſtanding with Catherine, and deſiſt from his ſolicitation of the divorce: this advice being very ill received, he endeavoured to perſuade the queen to conſent to the ſeparation; but his counſel was rejected by Catherine, who told him, she was the king's lawful wife, and so would continue until she should be declared otherwise by the sentence of the pope himself, for that she was resolved not to admit such partial judges as he and Wolsey were, to give sentence in the cause. Then the legate declared he could proceed no farther, till he sent to his holiness for fresh instructions.

Henry, vexed at these tedious and dilatory proceedings, sent, in December, sir Francis Bryan, cousin german to Anne Boleyn, and Peter Vannes, his Latin secretary, to the court of Rome, to discover, if possible, the real sentiments of his holiness, to search the pope's chancery for a pretended brief *, which, as the queen's friends alleged, confirmed the dispensation of her marriage, granted by pope Julius II. and to propose some plausible expedients for facilitating the determination of the divorce. These agents, however, found it impossible to dive into the real designs of Clement. That subtle pontiff was at this time treating with the emperor, who made him very advantageous proposals to gain him over to his interest, which Clement, incensed at the Venetians for detaining Ravenna and Cerva from him, was not disinclined to accept; and he found means to protract the cause of the divorce by all the arts of delays, promises, and denials, in hopes that Henry's passion would not last so long as an Italian negociation; but herein he was deceived, for the English monarch growing more and more impatient to enjoy the object of his amorous wishes, sent orders to his envoys to tell the pope plainly, in his name, that, should he refuse granting the satisfaction demanded, England would certainly renounce him and all the popes his successors; and that, as the king of England had engaged in the war merely with a view to deliver his holiness from imprisonment, all Christendom would look with horror upon his ingratitude, should he engage in any league against his deliverer, of which a report currently prevailed. These remonstrances, however, produced no effect upon the pope, who answered only in general terms, and pretended to think himself in a very dangerous situation, from which he could be relieved by nothing but the signal interposition of Heaven.

Although the pope seemed resolved to thwart the king, yet his holiness did not chuse to lose the only friend about Henry's person, who could preserve him firm with France, and break any views he might have of connections with the protestant princes, and therefore he still continued to heap favours upon Wolsey: he granted him several bulls for suppressing divers small monasteries, and many other grants towards the establishment of his two colleges, which he knew the cardinal had very much at heart; he also collated him to the rich bishopric of Wincheſter, vacant by the death of old Fox, which happened about this time.

Before we close the transactions of this year, it will be necessary to mention something concerning the affairs of Scotland. Henry, in the course of this year, sent ambassadors to the court of his nephew, James V. with proposals of peace; but as this could not be effected, on account of the distractions of that kingdom, which was divided into two factions, headed by the queen-dowager and the family of Douglas, a truce was concluded, at Berwick, for five years; in a separate article of which it was stipulated, "that the earl of Angus, his brother George, and uncle Archibald, might be received and protected in England, on condition that they should deliver up to their sovereign the places they held in Scotland; and that, in case they should make inroads into their own country, the king of England should repair the damages, as if it had been done by his own subjects †."

But now a violent distemper which seized the pope, in the beginning of the year 1529, seemed to be the forerunner of a very great change in the face of affairs. Gardiner communicating this intelligence to Wolsey, it revived in the latter all his ambition for the popedom: he again prevailed with Henry (though that monarch appears for some time to have entertained but an indifferent opinion of him) to send instructions, or rather he sent instructions in Henry's name, to his ambassadors at Rome, ordering them to do all that they could, either by promises, threats, or bribes, to engage the cardinals to elect him pope. But all his hopes were again blasted by the recovery of Clement, who from that time began to look upon the cardinal with an evil eye, and to regard him as a dangerous rival, who might one day supplant him on pretence of his bastardy, for which he had been already reproached, and even threatened with deposition by the emperor. In these sentiments he resolved to perplex both the cardinal and his master to the utmost of his power, and all the instances of the English ambassadors could not procure an explanation of the pollicitation formerly mentioned, which appeared very ambiguously worded, or an enlargement of the legate's commission, which was earnestly solicited, as necessary for a speedy determition of the cause, and for preventing its avocation during the process. The emperor's agents were indefatigable as well in opposing those motions, as in pressing for a revocation of the commission already given to the legates; and the pope was now so far engaged with the emperor, that he refused every thing the king desired.

Henry having nothing farther to expect from the court of Rome, recalled his ambassadors, and in their place dispatched William Bennet, doctor of laws, with a letter to his holiness from the two legates, wherein, as it afterwards appeared, they alleged that the chief difficulty in the cause of the

* While Campejo was on the road for England, the emperor's ministers at Rome started a fresh obstacle to the divorce, by the pretended discovery of a brief of Julius II. confirming the bull of dispensation for Henry's marriage with Catherine; but there was this difference between the bull and the brief, that the pope said in the bull "the marriage was perhaps consummated;" whereas in the brief the word perhaps was left out: they inferred from thence, that Julius II. was not surprised, since he looked upon Catherine's first marriage as consummated. But this brief, of which they only gave an authentic copy, without shewing the original to the king's ministers, was, probably, proposed solely to cause time to be lost in examining it. For, there were two reasons, among many others, which manifestly proved it to be a forgery. The first was, that this brief, granted at Catherine's request, supposed that princess's marriage with Arthur to have been consummated, and yet she had sworn the contrary; and upon that her agents had grounded the validity of Julius's dispensation. The second reason was still more strong, namely, that the brief was dated the 26th of December, 1503. Now, as in the date of the briefs, the court of Rome begins the year the 25th of December, being Christmay-day, this date answered to the 26th of December, 1502, of the vulgar year, that is, ten months before Julius II. was pope.

divorce,

divorce, was to determine how far the authority of the head of the church extended; and as this was a matter far above their cognizance, they perſuaded his holineſs to evoke the cauſe before his own tribunal, not doubting that the king would agree to this evocation, provided he might be previouſly aſſured that the cauſe would be determined in his favour. It is extremely difficult to account for the conduct of Wolſey on this occaſion in joining in an advice ſo contrary to the intereſt and inclination of the king, with whom he muſt by ſuch a ſtep be for ever ruined; unleſs we ſuppoſe that he was either duped by his colleague, or actually betrayed the cauſe of his maſter. It may, perhaps, be no improbable conjecture, that Wolſey, finding his enemies at court had greatly eſtranged the king's mind from him, and that his intereſt was alſo ruined with the pope, he thought he had now no other chance for ſafety, but by doing ſomewhat that might make his party once more good with the emperor, who was now preparing to make matters up with France and England, that he might fall upon ſome expedient to prevent his diſgrace with Henry.

Mean while Henry had ſuch excellent intelligence abroad, that he intercepted moſt of the queen's correſpondence, and at laſt came to the knowlege of a treaty which was upon the point of being concluded between the pope and the emperor. In ſhort, every thing appeared as if there was a neceſſity of bringing matters to a ſudden criſis. As there was no queſtion that the pope, as ſoon as he had obtained his ends of the emperor, would recall the commiſſion, and avocate the cauſe to Rome, Henry therefore importuned the legates to execute their commiſſions; and for that purpoſe he granted them, on the thirtieth of May, a licence, under the great ſeal, authorizing them to proceed with all freedom to the trial of the cauſe: and the next day they opened the court in the parliament-chamber at Black-friars, where their commiſſion being read, an order was made for ſummoning the king and queen to appear there on Friday the eighteenth of June. Wolſey, as a proof of his impartiality, allowed Campejo to preſide, though he himſelf was a ſenior cardinal.

The king and queen removed to their palace of Bridewell, to be nearer to the court; and, on the day appointed, they both made their appearance in court, having two ſeats placed under canopies of ſtate, and raiſed ſomewhat higher than the legates, at whoſe feet ſat the ſecretaries and other officers, the court being framed in the manner of a conſiſtory, there being preſent divers biſhops, doctors, lawyers, and learned counſellors: the counſel for the king were Dr. Sangton, dean of the chapel, and Dr. Bell; for the queen, Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, Standiſh, biſhop of St. Aſaph, and Dr. Ridley, the laſt an eminent divine.

The court being opened by proclamation, the queen in perſon read an inſtrument, by which ſhe refuſed the judges as partial and incompetent, and appealed to the pope, alleging that the cauſe was actually evoked, and depending before his holineſs, and deſiring to be allowed competent time for the proof of her allegation. The court then appointed the twenty-firſt for giving their opinion whether they would have any regard to the proteſt: and, upon the twenty-firſt both ſhe and the king appeared again perſonally in court, to hear the determination of the legates upon the head, when the judges giving their opinion againſt admitting the proteſt and for proceeding, and the queen being called upon, roſe, and, falling upon her knees before the king, without taking any notice of the court, addreſſed him in the following pathetic ſpeech:

"Sir, I deſire you to take ſome pity upon me, and do me juſtice and right: I am a poor woman, a ſtranger, born out of your dominions, having here no indifferent counſel, and leſs aſſurance of friendſhip. Alas! wherein have I offended, or what cauſe of diſpleaſure have I given, that you intend thus to put me away? I take God to my judge, I have been to you a true and humble wife, ever conformable to your will and pleaſure; never gainſaying any thing in which you took delight; without all grudge, or diſcontented countenance, I have loved all them that loved you, howſoever their affections have been to me-ward: I have borne you children, and have been your wife now theſe twenty years of my virginity and marriage-bed: I make God and your own conſcience the judge: and if it otherwiſe be proved, I am content to be put from you with ſhame. The king your father, in his time, for wiſdom was known to be a ſecond Solomon; and Ferdinando of Spain, my father, accounted the wiſeſt among their kings could they, in this match, be ſo far overſeen; or are there now wiſer and more learned men than at that time were? Surely it ſeemeth wonderful to me, that my marriage after twenty years ſhould be thus called in queſtion, with new invention againſt me, who never intended but honeſtly. Alas! ſir, I ſee I am wronged, having no counſel to ſpeak for me, but ſuch as are your ſubjects, and cannot be indifferent upon my part. Therefore, I moſt humbly beſeech you, even in charity, to ſtay this courſe, until I may have advice and council from Spain: if not, your grace's pleaſure be done."

Having thus ſpoke, ſhe aroſe, and, making the king a low reverence, departed out of the court, and never would appear in it more, or ſuffer any perſon to plead for her.

After her departure, Henry ſpoke extremely well of her perſonal behaviour and virtue, declaring, that in ſuing for a divorce from her, he acted purely from a motive of religion and conſcience. Wolſey then ſtanding up, made an humble requeſt to the king, that his highneſs would be pleaſed to declare before that honourable aſſembly, whether he had been the cauſe of this his intended divorce, wherewith he was charged in the opinion of the people? Upon which Henry, in very ſtrong terms, cleared the cardinal of that imputation, and laid the whole originally upon the objections ſtarted againſt the legitimacy of the princeſs Mary by the biſhop of Tarbe, when ſent to conclude a marriage between the duke of Orleans and that lady. He likewiſe ſaid, that he had mentioned the ſame in confeſſion to the biſhop of Lincoln; at the ſame time he challenged the archbiſhop of Canterbury, whether he had not applied to him for the opinion of the biſhop; and then produced an inſtrument, under their hand and ſeals, declaring, "that it was their opinion, that there were weighty reaſons of conſcience for the king's applying to the pope, for judging of the validity of the marriage."

Mean while the queen was cited to appear again, on the twenty-fifth of June; but, inſtead of complying, plying, ſhe ſent in her appeal in form, from whatever had been done, or ſhould be done hereafter: upon which the court declared her contumacious; and the biſhop of Bath was commanded to give her the ſame day a freſh and peremptory citation, certifying her, that if ſhe did not appear, they would proceed in their buſineſs. But Catherine perſiſting in her reſolution to pay no regard to the power of the court, on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, twelve articles, containing the heads of what the legates were to proceed upon, relating to the queen's two marriages, and other matters of the divorce, were exhibited in the court, to be diſcuſſed by the examination of witneſſes, which took up the beſt part of three weeks. The principal articles inſiſted upon, were, that prince Arthur and the king were brothers; that prince Arthur had married Catherine, and conſummated the marriage; that, upon the death of prince Arthur, Henry, by virtue of a diſpenſation, had married the widow; that this marriage with his brother's wife was forbidden both by divine and human laws. The king's counſel inſiſted principally on the conſummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine, which the queen had denied with an oath, and which, notwithſtanding, was proved by the teſtimony of ſeveral perſons, as far as any thing of that nature can be proved*. It is therefore hard to conceive by what charm of bigotry and infatuation ſo wiſe and ſo virtuous a woman as queen Catherine confeſſedly was, could be deluded in perſiſting as ſhe did, that ſhe was a virgin at the time of her ſecond marriage.

On the twenty-firſt of July, the king's proteſtation that he made againſt his marriage with Catherine, when prince of Wales, at the age of fourteen†, was read in the court; and his council cloſing their evidence, and demanding judgment, Friday the twenty-third of that month was aſſigned for the ſaid purpoſe, and his court was now filled with expectation of the deciſive ſentence that was to crown his paſſion; but that happy moment was at a greater diſtance than they could poſſibly foreſee, for Campejo had by this time received his final inſtructions from Rome, that every thing had been adjuſted between the pope and the emperor, while a freſh propoſal of accommodation had taken place between the emperor and Francis, and that the pope was reſolved no longer to delay the avocation, concerning which the legates themſelves had written to him, and for which he was receiving daily inſtances from the the queen and the emperor. But it ſeems the avocation was not yet come, and

* Robert, viſcount FitzWalter, depoſed, the prince was then about fifteen, and queen Catherine elder; and that the next day after being in bed together (which he remembered after they entered to be ſolemnly bleſſed), he waited at breakfaſt on prince Arthur, where Maurice St. John did carve, and the lord Fitz Walter gave drink; at which time the ſaid Maurice demanding of the prince how he had done that night, the prince anſwered, "I have been in Spain this night."

Charles, duke of Suffolk depoſed, that he was in the biſhop of London's palace the morrow next following the day of marriage, and that he waited there upon the prince at breakfaſt; confirming however in effect the words of Maurice St. John, before ſet down. Farthermore he added, that the Shrove-tide following the marriage (which was in November preceding) the ſaid prince began to decay and grow feeble in body; which grew, as the ſaid St. John related, by reaſon the ſaid prince lay with the lady.

Thomas, duke of Norfolk, lord-treaſurer of England, depoſed, that he being, the day after the marriage, in the biſhop of London's palace, and the morrow after, at the prince's breakfaſt, heard the prince's words to Maurice St. John, when he ſaid, he had been that night in the midſt of Spain: by which words, and becauſe prince Arthur was a gentleman of a good complexion and nature, and above fifteen, he believed that he carnally knew his lady; becauſe himſelf, at the ſame age, did carnally know and uſe; and he believed this the rather, that he heard from credible witneſſes, that the ſaid prince Arthur did lie with the ſaid lady Catherine five or ſix nights afterwards.

Anthony Willoughby, knight, depoſed, that, being the morrow after the marriage, in the prince's privy-chamber, the ſaid prince ſpoke, afore divers witneſſes, theſe words, "Willoughby, give me a cup of ale, for I have been this night in the midſt of Spain." After which he ſaid, "Maſters, it is a good paſtime to have a wife." Which words he alſo repeated divers other times. Moreover, he heard ſay, they lay at Ludlow together the Shrove-tide following.

Thomas, viſcount Rochford, depoſed, that he heard divers of prince Arthur's followers confirm the words he uſed of having been in Spain. Moreover, he heard ſay, that the king, Henry VIII. was perſuaded by his confeſſor, about two years ſince, to abſtain from the bed of the lady Catherine, leſt he ſhould offend his conſcience.

† This proteſtation, copied from the original deed written with his own hand, is here inſerted, for the ſatisfaction of the curious reader.

"In the name of God, Amen. In the preſence of you, reverend father in Chriſt, lord Richard, and apoſtolic biſhop of Wincheſter, I, Henry, prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, do ſay, affirm, and by theſe writings declare, that although in the time of my minority, and when I was under the years of marriage, I abſolutely contracted matrimony with the virtuous lady Catherine, daughter of the king of Spain; and although alſo, the ſaid contract, by reaſon of my being under age, doth appear now of itſelf inſufficient, weak, and of no force, vigour, or efficacy; yet foraſmuch as that I am come to perfect years, and that thereby the ſaid contract may, peradventure, be thought and ſeem, by ſilent conſent, mutual abode in one houſe, by giving gifts and tokens, or by any other way whatſoever, to be apparently ſufficient and confirmed: therefore, I, Henry, prince of Wales, do hereby proteſt and make known to all men, that I intend not to prove, ratify, or confirm in any ſort, this pretended contract, by any thing that I have ſaid or ſhall ſay, have done or ſhall do; but I do at this preſent renounce the ſame freely of my own accord, unconſtrained either by force, fraud, intreaty, or any way elſe; and I deny it, and wholly propoſe and intend quite to relinquiſh this pretended contract of matrimony, by the beſt ways and means that by law more fully, effectually, and ſufficiently I may or ſhall be able to do; and expreſly do diſavow the ſame, according as by theſe preſents I do diſclaim it and diſavow it; and ſo proteſt that I neither will, nor intend to conſent unto the contract, or unto the ſaid lady Catherine as my eſpouſal wife, by any word, or deed, act, or geſture, to be ſpoke, done, performed, or acted by me, or in my name, by any whomſoever, whenſoever, or howſoever, for the time to come. In witneſs whereof I deſire, require, intreat, and adjure you all to give teſtimony hereunto. By me, HENRY, prince of Wales.

The above-written proteſtation was read and made by the aforeſaid noble prince, lord Henry, in the preſence of the right reverend father and lord in Chriſt, the lord Richard, by divine permiſſion biſhop of Wincheſter, ſitting judicially in his court; and I the writer of this act in his behalf appointed, and in the preſence of the under-named witneſſes, in the year of our Lord God 1505, the eighth indiction of the moſt holy ſee of our father and lord in Chriſt, by divine providence, pope Julius II. in his ſecond year, and the twenty-ſeventh of the month of June; in which day the ſaid worthy prince was of perfect years of marriage, as then he did there affirm in a certain outward court within the royal palace of Richmond, ſituate in the weſt part of the ſaid palace aforeſaid, concerning all and ſingular which things the moſt noble prince aforeſaid inſtantly required and intreated me, the aforeſaid notary, to frame an inſtrument; and likewiſe the witneſſes, underwritten, to give teſtimony in juſtification of all and ſingular the premiſes, the aforeſaid moſt noble prince, hath ſubſcribed his name; and witneſſes, aforeſaid intreated and required, have ſubſcribed their names with their own hands.

The ſecond proteſtation, when he came to years of marriage.

Campejo

Campejo had now no remedy left for preſerving Henry's friendſhip and following the ſecret orders of the pope, than by pretending, that, as he and his brother legate ſat there as a part of the conſiſtory of Rome, they were obliged to obſerve the ſame days of vacation which were obſerved at Rome; and accordingly, when the twenty-third of July came, inſtead of proceeding to give judgment, he ſolemnly adjourned the court to the twenty-eighth of September following.

Henry was thunderſtruck when he heard the adjournment pronounced, and that on the very day when he thought himſelf ſure of a ſentence in his favour, the hopes whereof had induced him to bear the affected delays of the court of Rome through all this proceſs. The nation in general was as much offended at this dilatorineſs of the legatine court in determining a cauſe of the utmoſt conſequence to the peace and welfare of the kingdom.

It was but a few days after the adjournment of the legatine court, when the evocation arrived from Rome, by a courier, furniſhed with a bull ſummoning Henry to appear at Rome in forty days, on pain of incurring the higheſt cenſures of the church. Henry was now in the utmoſt perplexity; but, though extremely provoked with the pope, he yet thought proper to ſuppreſs his reſentment; he would not, indeed, ſuffer the bull to be notified to him in form, but he told the legates that they were at full liberty to obey the pope's order. From this period we may juſtly date the commencement of Wolſey's fall; and, indeed, he had acted, during the whole courſe of this proceeding, with ſuch a coldneſs and indifference as ſeemed to be altogether inconſiſtent with that zealous concern, which, on all other occaſions, he ever manifeſted for the intereſt of his maſter: but we have already offered a conjecture to explain this ambiguity of conduct.

The caſe of this great miniſter was now very deplorable. The emperor and queen Catherine exerted their utmoſt efforts to ruin him in the king's opinion: they were at great pains to propagate reports, contrived on purpoſe to accompliſh his deſtruction, and, by means of their agents, Henry received copies of letters condemning the divorce, which it was ſaid the cardinal had ſent privately to his holineſs. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, with a ſtrong party under their direction, laboured with all their influence to ſupplant him as the engroſſer of the royal favour, and embraced all opportunities of miſrepreſenting his actions. But in all appearance neither their endeavours, nor thoſe of the queen's faction, nor the envy and malignity of the world would have effected his diſgrace without the ſupport they received from Anne Boleyn's aſcendancy over the mind of her royal lover. The cardinal had adviſed Henry not to marry her, wiſhing rather he would take to wife the ducheſs of Alençon, the princeſs Renée of France, or ſome other more ſuitable match; therefore ſhe had declared herſelf an open and irreconcileable enemy, and uſed all her arts with Henry to compaſs his ruin. It was expected by every body, that Henry would have diſgraced the cardinal immediately after the arrival of the bull of evocation from the court of Rome, but they were deceived; Henry had ſo much command of himſelf as not to take any manner of notice of his diſlike to his proceedings; but, having given Campejo his audience of leave, in order to diſpel the chagrin his diſappointment had given him, and revive his ſpirits, he made a progreſs through ſome of the counties of England, but left Wolſey behind him, who from this time began to think he ſhould not long continue in power, but ſtill went on in his uſual manner, and obſerving no alteration in the looks and behaviour of the courtiers towards him, did not imagine that his diſgrace was ſo near as it proved. For his enemies, with Anne Boleyn at their head, who accompanied the king in his progreſs, had ſo effectually worked up that prince's mind, that, on his return from his journey, he reſolved to gratify their revenge and his own reſentment; and the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, Wolſey's foes, went by Henry's order to York Place, now Whitehall, and demanded of him the great-ſeal of England, which he at firſt refuſed to deliver, ſaying, he held it by patent during life; but next day they returned with their orders in writing under the king's hand, and required the cardinal at the ſame time to retire to Aſhur, now Eſher, a houſe in Surry, on the banks of the Thames, which he held as biſhop of Wincheſter. Wolſey, ſeeing Henry's hand to the paper, immediately delivered up the ſeal; and we ſhall leave him in his melancholy retreat, to take a view of the great affairs which were tranſacting during the courſe of this year on the continent.

The ill ſucceſs of the French arms in Italy during the two laſt campaigns had diſpoſed that court ſincerely to peace; and on the other hand, the emperor, finding that he ſhould reap little advantage from his conqueſts, ſo long as the pope continued the head of the Clementine League, reſolved to make than pontiff his friend at all events, who, for the reaſons we have already given, was no leſs deſirous of being upon good terms with his Imperial majeſty; in this mutual reconciliatory diſpoſition they both went heartily to work by their plenipotentiaries, and, on the twenty-ninth of June this year, a treaty was ſigned at Barcelona, on the following terms:

"That the emperor ſhould reſtore the family of the Medici to Florence, on the ſame foot as formerly: that he ſhould cauſe Ravenna and Cervia to be delivered to the pope: that he ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Modena and Reggio, ſaving the rights of the empire: that he ſhould aid him to become maſter of Ferrara: that Franciſco Sforza ſhould be reſtored to Milan, if innocent, but if guilty, the emperor ſhould not diſpoſe of the duchy to any prince the pope ſhould diſlike: that the pope and emperor ſhould employ their temporal and ſpiritual arms againſt the heretics of Germany: that Alexander de Medici ſhould eſpouſe Margaret, the emperor's natural daughter: that the pope ſhould grant the emperor a fourth of the eccleſiaſtical revenues in his dominions, to wage war with the Turks: that he ſhould abſolve all that were any way concerned in the taking and ſacking of Rome."

Such were the terms of the treaty, which the emperor, notwithſtanding his late ſucceſs againſt the pope's allies, thought it his intereſt to accede to, and ſolemnly ratified them at Barcelona.

Mean while Francis I. ſeeing no other proſpect of retrieving his children out of the hands of the emperor, reſolved to effect an accommodation with him; but as they were not on ſuch terms that either ther of them could make advances to, or treat with the other, Louisa, Francis's mother, and Margaret of Savoy, governante of the Netherlands, undertook the negociation, and Cambray was appointed to be the place of meeting; while Francis, in the interim, amused the Venetians, the Florentines, and the duke of Ferrara with the promise of marching into Italy at the head of a powerful army. However, Charles and Francis being both heartily inclined to a peace, the two ladies, who had undertaken the negociation for them, being joined by ambassadors from all the powers concerned in the Clementine League (those of England, which were bishop Tunstal and sir Thomas More, included), on the thirtieth day of August a treaty was concluded, upon the basis of the treaty of Madrid.

By the treaty of Cambray, the emperor agreed "to wave for the present his claim upon Burgundy: Francis, on his side engaged to pay two millions of gold crowns for the ransom of his children; to withdraw his troops from Italy; cede to Charles the sovereignty of Flanders and Artois; restore the county of Asti, with all that he still retained in the duchy of Milan; renounce all pretensions to the kingdom of Naples; espouse Eleanor, queen dowager of Portugal, the emperor's sister; and re-establish the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon in possession of all the estates of that family, which had been confiscated."

By this treaty Francis left all his allies to shift for themselves. The Florentines were obliged to make their peace with the emperor within four months after the ratification of the treaty; and the Venetians to give up all the sea-ports they had made themselves masters of, within the kingdom of Naples: as to the other allies of the French in Italy, no mention was made of them, and consequently they were left to the emperor's mercy.

It is not a little surprizing, that Henry having proclamed war with the emperor by a herald, there was, however, no particular treaty between them, Henry on this occasion satisfying himself with a single article inserted in this treaty, whereby the king of France bound himself to pay the two hundred and ninety thousand crowns which the emperor owed him, and to redeem the rich fleur de lis which Maximilian had pawned to Henry VII. for fifty thousand crowns. He did yet more, he generously forgave Francis the first sum, and made a present to his godson Henry, the second son of the French king, of the other sum. This is a clear evidence, that in making this peace Francis I. had not dealt with Henry as he had done with the princes of Italy, but had convinced him of the necessity he was under of concluding it.

It is now time to return to that setting star, Wolsey, who still continued fluctuating between hope and despair, the only support he had to grasp at being the king's private affection, which he imagined would not suffer him to be given up now that his hair had grown grey in his service; but his enemies having gotten the king in the mind to chastize this overgrown favourite, omitted nothing that could keep him in that disposition. Anne Boleyn dreaded nothing so much as that Henry should admit him to a personal interview, in which case she was afraid he might reinstate himself in in his former favour.

The great-seal had, upon Wolsey's dismission from the office of chancellor, been given to sir Thomas More, a person universally esteemed on the score of his integrity. Soon after, viz. on the ninth of October, Christopher Hales, the attorney-general, presented an information in the King's Bench against the cardinal, accusing him of having violated the statute of Præmunire, "in that he had obtained certain bulls from Clement VII. (who in this bill is treated with no other title than that of the bishop of Rome), by which he exercised jurisdiction and authority legatine, to the deprivation of the king's power established in the courts of justice, to the contempt of the king and his crown, and contrary to the statutes of 16 Richard II. against provisions;" with other charges of the like import.

Wolsey, finding that he was totally abandoned by the king, thought proper not to set up any defence, which he might very justly have done, arising from the king's assent to his exercising his legatine power; but by his attorney he confessed the facts as laid in the indictment, but pleaded ignorance of the statutes of Provision. Upon which the court gave sentence, "that he was out of the king's protection, and his lands, goods, and chattels forfeited, and that his person might be seized upon." In consequence of this sentence, which was founded on several additional articles *, amazingly weak and absurd, sir William Gascoyne, the cardinal's treasurer, delivered the whole of Wolsey's effects to Henry's officers, and, according to the authority of Cavendish, who was an eye-witness, they amounted to an immense value.

Thus fell the ablest minister England ever had seen, the victim of his master's resentment, not of his justice; and by this stroke of severity he saw himself on a sudden reduced from a state of more than princely affluence to the absolute want, for some days, of the common necessaries of life, which so affected him, that he became abjectly disconsolate, and at length sickened in consequence of such repeated mortifications. Henry's tenderness seemed to revive when he heard of the cardinal's wretched condition, and he did, as it were by stealth, give him several assurances and marks of his kindness. It is true, his passion for Anne Boleyn would not suffer him fully to follow the dictates of his own heart, which must have told him, that, of all men, Wolsey merited not such treatment from him: however, he sent him a ruby as a present by his physician, Dr. Butts, who assured him that his highness was not angry with him in his heart, and that he should, in a little time, be convinced of his affection. This kind meſſage contributed in a great meaſure to the recovery of the cardinal, who ſupplicated and obtained the king's permiſſion to live for the benefit of the air at Richmond-houſe, which he had formerly received in exchange for Hampton-court.

* These articles were forty-four, in number, importing, "That he had abused his legatine power; acted tyrannically in the office of chancellor, expedited divers orders of the utmost importance, and executed treaties, without the king's knowlege and concurrence; behaved despotically on many occasions, more like an Eastern sovereign than an English minister; practised extortion, bribery, and all manner of corruption; sought to equal, and even to prefer himself to his majesty, by writing in orders and instructions "Ego & rex meus ——I and my king;" and endangering his sovereign's health by breathing upon him, and whispering in his ear, when he knew himself deeply infected with the venereal distemper."

Nothing could be more absurd, than to accuse a man of high-treason for using the words "Ego & rex meus," which manner of expression is fully justified by the idiom of the Latin language, which requires, that the first person, though applied to a peasant, should always be preferred to the second and third, though denoting people in the most exalted station.

The adjournment of the legatine court, and the removal of Wolſey, made Henry reſolve to puſh his divorce with double vigour. He had been adviſed by Thomas Cranmer, a doctor of divinity, with whom he accidentally fell in company in his late progreſs, and who was a man of acknowleged piety, learning, and moderation, and withal a ſecret friend of the doctrine of Luther, to conſult all the univerſities of Europe, with regard to this controverted point; alleging, that if they agreed to approve the king's marriage with Catherine, his majeſty's ſcruples would ceaſe of courſe; if they condemned it, the pope, he ſaid, could not reſiſt the opinion of all the learned men, nor longer run the riſque of rejecting the ſolicitations of ſo great a monarch. Henry was delighted at this propoſal, which to him ſeemed the oracle of peace, and he forthwith diſpatched his agents to collect the opinions of all the univerſities of Europe *, and they were enjoined to ſpare neither money nor ſolicitations for obtaining a favourable deciſion.

It afforded an extraordinary and curious ſpectacle (ſays Mr. de Voltaire, in his Eſſay on General Hiſtory †), to behold the king of England, on one ſide ſoliciting the ſeveral univerſities of Europe to be favourable to his paſſion; and the emperor on the other, preſſing them as warmly for their deciſion in favour of his aunt; and the king of France between both, ſtanding up for the Levitical law againſt that of Deuteronomy, in order to make the breach irreparable between Henry of England and Charles V. The emperor laviſhed benefices upon thoſe Italian doctors, who wrote for the validity of Catherine's marriage; and Henry paid thoſe as bountifully as gave their opinion in his favour.

At length the univerſities of France, particularly the Sorbonne, came to a reſolution, that the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon was unlawful, and that Julius had not power to diſpenſe with the Levitical law.

Henry's agents went ſo far as to call in to their aſſiſtance the opinions of the Jewiſh rabbins, who acknowleged, that by the Deuteronomical law a man was commanded to marry his brother's widow; but, ſaid they, this law related only to the country of Paleſtine, and it is the Levitical law which ought to be obſerved in England. The univerſities and rabbins of the Auſtrian territories were of a quite different opinion; but theſe, however, were not conſulted. In ſhort, Henry had the pleaſure to find that, before the end of the enſuing year, 1530, it was unanimouſly agreed by all the learned bodies he had ſent to conſult, "that the king's marriage with Catherine of Arragon, being contrary to all laws divine and human, could never be rendered valid by the diſpenſation of pope Julius II."

Whilſt the king was applying to foreign univerſities, he did not neglect aſking the opinion of thoſe in England; and in the beginning of the year 1530, he wrote a letter with his own hand to the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge, which he ſent by Longland, biſhop of Lincoln, to the former, and by ſecretary Gardiner and Dr. Edward Fox to the latter, requeſting them to ſatisfy him, whether the marriage of a brother's relict was forbidden or not by the law of God and nature? After a violent oppoſition from the maſters of arts at Oxford, and a keen conteſt at Cambridge between thoſe who were on each ſide of the queſtion, both thoſe learned bodies agreed in determining, "that marrying the wife of a brother deceaſed without iſſue, after the conſummation of his marriage, was forbidden Chriſtians by the law of God and nature;" and it was in congregation ordered by each reſpective univerſity, that its common-ſeal ſhould be put to this determination. The oppoſition which had been made in theſe two great ſeminaries, and to combat which Henry had recourſe to threats of a moſt irreligious and tyrannical import, and ſuch as in effect took away the freedom of debate, was owing to thoſe who hated the Lutheran reformers, who, they were afraid, would find too much countenance and protection under the influence of Anne Boleyn and Cranmer, which latter was now growing very faſt into favour with the king.

Henry having overcome theſe obſtacles, and perceiving that the court of Rome ſtill continued to turn a deaf ear to all his remonſtrances, perſuaded his chief prelates and nobility to write a ſharp and ſpirited letter to the pope, in which, after mentioning the many good offices which the king had formerly done to his holineſs, the judgment of ſo many learned univerſities, and the little regard he had paid to ſo many weighty conſiderations, they plainly told him, that ſhould he continue to amuſe and deceive them in the affair of the divorce, they would renounce their connection with the ſee of Rome, and do themſelves that juſtice which, whatever right they had to expect, they had ſo long in vain demanded from his holineſs ‡."

Lord Herbert ſays this letter was drawn up in parliament, but that muſt be a miſtake, the letter being dated the thirteenth of July; it appears by the records there could be no ſeſſion at that time, the houſes being prorogued from the twenty-firſt of June to the firſt of October. The letter it ſeems was firſt ſent about to the chief members for their hands; and Cavendiſh tells us, that cardinal Wolſey himſelf ſigned it with the greateſt apparent chearfulneſs. It was ſubſcribed by the two archbiſhops, four biſhops, two dukes, two marquiſes, thirteen earls, two viſcounts, twenty-three barons, twenty-two abbots, and eleven commoners; moſt of them in immediate dependence on, or expectation of, the king's favour.

The anſwer which Clement returned to this letter was ſo far from being ſatisfactory to Henry, that he plainly perceived he had nothing to expect but from his own power, aſſiſted by the affections of his people; and, in order to prevent any ſtep which Clement might take in favour of Catherine, or of the diſgraced cardinal, he publiſhed a proclamation, forbidding all perſons whatever to procure or receive any thing from Rome, or elſewhere, that might be prejudicial to his majeſty's prerogative, or to promulgate any thing of that nature, upon pain of incurring the penalties mentioned in the ſtatute of Proviſors and Præmunire. He then appointed ſeveral learned men to compare all that had been written on the ſubject of the divorce, and out of all the tranſcripts of fathers and councils, to collect whatſoever might ſtrengthen his cauſe. All theſe, and many more, were ſummed up in a ſhort book, and printed, firſt in Latin and then in Engliſh, with the determinations of the univerſities before it *; and a particular anſwer to a book which Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, had compoſed in defence of the marriage.

* To Orleans and Thouloufe were ſent ſir Francis Brian, Fox, afterwards biſhop of Hereford, and Mr. William Paget; to Paris, Reginald Pole, of the blood royal; in Italy the king's agents were Dr. Richard Crooke, at Padua; Hieronimo de Genucci, biſhop of Worceſter, and ſir Gregory Caſſali, at Rome; Dr. Stokeſly, at Venice; Dr. Cranmer, Andrew and John Caſſali were likewiſe employed in Italy.

The parliament, while it continued ſitting, was as favourable to Henry as he could poſſibly wiſh, taking into their conſideration a great number of eccleſiaſtical grievances, and providing means of redreſs for the ſame; and even went ſo far that the commons ſent Audley, their ſpeaker, with thirty of their moſt conſiderable members, to complain to the houſe of peers againſt the biſhop of Rocheſter, for reflecting upon the repreſentatives of the Engliſh commons, by an expreſſion he made uſe of, in the upper houſe, importing, "that nothing would ſatisfy the commons but the total ruin of the church." The charge, however, not being properly ſupported, the biſhop, by ſome conceſſional interpretations, extricated himſelf from this troubleſome affair.

Nevertheleſs, the commons proceeded to paſs ſeveral bills for the reformation of the clergy, which had the aſſent of the lords. The contents of theſe bills will be found under their proper heads, at the end of this centennial period.

While theſe things were in agitation, cardinal Wolſey remained at his country-houſe at Richmond, living betwixt hope and fear, without being able to form any probable conjecture of the king's behaviour towards him; for at the ſame time that the compaſſion which the king expreſſed for him ſomewhat revived his drooping ſpirits, it made his enemies apprehenſive of his return to court; and therefore they never ceaſed to alienate the king's mind from him, and, thinking him too near the court at Richmond, they prevailed on Henry to ſend him an order for retiring to his archbiſhopric of York. The cardinal obeyed this command, though not without great reluctance, and retired, by ſlow journeys, to Cawood, a caſtle about twelve miles from York, attended by a retinue of one hundred and twenty horſemen. He had, during the ſitting of the parliament, the mortification to ſee a bill paſs, ratifying the forfeiture of his effects and eſtates to the king, and, among others, his college at Oxford, which he had nearly completed, the loſs of which, as he himſelf declared, gave him more heart-felt concern than that of all his pomp and riches: however, Henry afterwards founded it in his own name.

Wolſey, notwithſtanding the diſgrace he laboured under, had not entirely laid aſide the thoughts of worldly grandeur; he intended to be inſtalled, according to the ancient cuſtom, with great ſolemnity, in the cathedral of York, which ceremony was to be performed on the ſeventh of November, with a magnificence little ſuitable to his circumſtances. The king, indeed, had, in the beginning of the year, reinſtated him in the poſſeſſion of the revenues of his archbiſhopric, and thoſe of the ſee of Wincheſter, with about ſix thouſand pounds in plate, money, and furniture, part of his former great effects; and theſe, with ſome other marks of the royal favour, beſtowed on him, made it thought that Henry's intention was rather to mortify the pride, than totally ruin the fortune of his old miniſter.

But his enemies did not allow him to remain long unmoleſted in his new retreat. He had, after he came to his dioceſe, applied himſelf ſtrictly to the duties of his charge: and his aſſiduity in the paſtoral care, his charity to the poor, his hoſpitality and obliging reception of all perſons, had gained him the love and eſteem of all orders of men in the country, and now, for the firſt time in his life, he began to be popular, the people crowding to ſee him and aſk his benediction, whereſoever he paſſed. This popularity, with the great concourſe of gentry expected on occaſion of his inſtalment, were made uſe of by Anne Boleyn and her party as a pretence to charge him with treaſonable deſigns, which the jealouſy of Henry diſpoſed him too readily to ſuſpect; and, on the fourth of November, the earl of Northumberland was ſent down, with ſir Walter Walſh, to arreſt him for high-treaſon; which was done on the Friday before the deſigned ſolemnity of his inſtallation: but the earl not producing his warrant, Wolſey refuſed to obey the arreſt, at the ſame time inſiſting upon his privilege as cardinal; till ſir Walter coming into the room, he readily ſubmitted to him, as being ſufficiently authorized by his poſt of gentleman of the king's privy-chamber.

The cardinal, ſtill truſting to the repeated promiſes of Henry, ſet out with ſome degree of chearfulneſs with his keeper towards London, who had the king's expreſs command to allow him as much time as he ſhould demand. Upon the road ſir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower, met him, with a party of guards, and told him that he was ordered by Henry to attend him to London, where he was to take his trial. At the ſight of Kingſton, Wolſey gave himſelf up for loſt, nor could all the aſſurances of that gentleman, or the other royal officers, of the king's being favourably inclined towards him, gave him the leaſt comfort; he ſeemed now to abandon himſelf to deſpair. Cavendiſh will have it that he took poiſon; however that might be, it is certain that one day, as he ſat at dinner, in Sheffield caſtle, he was ſeized with an extraordinary coldneſs in his ſtomach; yet, ill as he was, he proceeded by ſmall journeys to Leiceſter abbey, where he expired of a violent dyſentery, on Tueſday the twenty-ninth of November, 1530†.

† Finding his end draw near, he admitted Kingſton into the bed-chamber, where he held with him his laſt converſation, which is too important not to be given in the very words of Cavendiſh, who took them from the cardinal's own mouth.

"Sir (ſaid Wolſey), I watch but God's pleaſure to render up my poor ſoul to him; I pray you, have me heartily commended unto his royal majeſty, and beſeech him, on my behalf, to call to his princely remembrance all matters that have been between us, from the beginning, and the progreſs; and eſpecially between good queen Catharine and him; then ſhall his grace's conſcience know whether I have offended him, or not. He is a prince of moſt royal carriage, and hath a princely heart;

Such was the fate of the wiſeſt and ableſt ſtateſman that ever directed the affairs of England; but however great his talents were, his addreſs was ſtill more wonderful, in managing, for twenty years together, ſuch a prince as Henry was; a province to which none of thoſe who ſucceeded him in power were equal. His low birth did not hinder his having a greatneſs of mind, and, as we have already ſeen, he formed noble deſigns for the encouragement of learning, and the reformation of the affairs of the kingdom. His adminiſtration was ſuch as raiſed his king and country to an envied pitch of greatneſs. With regard to foreign affairs, while he had the ſole adminiſtration, it was found, great, and ſucceſsful. With regard to domeſtic, his conduct was firm, but unpopular; this was owing to his too great obſequiouſneſs to the will of an imperious prince, who, ſeduced by the intrigues of an artful and beloved miſtreſs, ſacrificed this uſeful ſervant, in the moſt ungrateful manner, to the malice of his enemies; and when we conſider, that the following part of Henry's reign was much more unfortunate and criminal than that which was directed by Wolſey's counſels, we ſhall be apt to conclude, that if he deſerved not the great praiſes which his few friends have beſtowed upon him, neither did he merit the virulent reproaches with which his numerous enemies have loaded his memory. Certain it is, that almoſt all ranks and degrees of Henry's ſubjects had motives, either of intereſt or conſcience, for condemning Wolſey: the papiſts hated him for ſhaking the very foundations of that policy by which their church had ſo long become a mart of iniquity and a den of thieves: the reformed, or proteſtants, could not bear him, becauſe he was an enthuſiaſt for the abſurdities of the papal religion. But let not the reader imagine that we offer here any defence for the goodneſs of Wolſey's heart: it is but too true that his virtues were the reſult of the moſt dangerous vices, namely, an unbounded ambition and an inſupportable vanity, to gratify which he frequently exerciſed great acts of cruelty and injuſtice. Thus, by ſeeming to care only for himſelf while in power, he fell unlamented, and died deſpiſed; furniſhing a dreadful inſtance, that the boldeſt offender will, ſooner or later, find himſelf unable to elude the wholeſome laws which are the bulwarks of this happy nation, or to eſcape the puniſhment which they decree for thoſe who inſolently attempt to remove the palladium of Engliſh liberty! Before we diſmiſs this extraordinary ſubject from this part of our hiſtory, we ſhall, for the entertainment of our readers, give a brief account of his birth and ſurpriſing riſe, as we have them tranſmitted to us from the beſt authorities.

Thomas Wolſey was born in March, 1471. He was the ſon of a butcher at Ipſwich, in the county of Suffolk: as he gave very early indications of uncommon talents and addreſs, his parents taxed their ſubſtance to the higheſt to give him a liberal education; and he was ſent ſo young to Oxford, that he commenced bachelor of arts at fourteen years of age, from whence he was called the Boy-bachelor. Soon after he was elected fellow of Magdalen college, and, when maſter of arts, had the care of the ſchool adjoining to that college committed to him. Being charged with the education of the marquis of Dorſet's three ſons, his lordſhip preſented him to the rectory of Lymington, in Somerſetſhire, on the tenth of October, 1500. He had not long reſided at his living, before ſir Amias Powlet, a juſtice of peace, put him in the ſtocks for being drunk (as is ſaid), and raiſing diſturbance, at a fair in the neighbourhood. By the recommendation of ſir John Nanfan, he was made one of the king's chaplains. In 1506, he was inſtituted to the rectory of Bedgrave, in the dioceſe of Norwich; having then, beſides the rectory of Lymington, the vicarage of Lyde, in Kent*. Whilſt he was king's chaplain, he inſinuated himſelf into the favour of Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, and ſir Thomas Lovel, who recommended him to the king as a fit perſon to be employed in negociating the marriage between Henry VII. and Margaret, ducheſs of Savoy. He was diſpatched to the emperor her father, and returned with ſuch ſpeed, that the king ſeeing him, ſuppoſed he had not been gone. Having reported his embaſſy, he was made dean of Lincoln, February 8, 1508, and on the 20th of the ſame month, prebendary of Walton Brinhold, in that church. In theſe circumſtances he was when he was introduced at court by biſhop Fox, after Henry VII's death, where he ſoon found means to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of his ſon and ſucceſſor†.

It is now time to turn our eyes towards the continent, and remark the principal tranſactions there, during the courſe of this year, ſo far as they relate to this country.

The treaties of Barcelona and Cambray, already mentioned, having effected a peace between the king of France and the emperor, the latter took ſhipping at Barcelona, with nine thouſand men, and arrived at Genoa, where the peace of Cambray being publiſhed, the Venetians, the Florentines, and the dukes of Milan and Ferrara, finding themſelves abandoned by France, were glad to refer the diſcuſſion of their affairs to a conference between Charles and the pope, at Bologna, where all their different ambaſſadors attended. There the emperor decreed, that the Venetians ſhould reſtore Ravenna and Cervia to the pope, and to himſelf ſome places which they ſtill occupied in the kingdom of Naples; Francis Sforza was put in poſſeſſion of his duchy of Milan: and then repaired to Rome to receive the Imperial crown from the hands of the pope, and to kiſs the feet of him whom he had ſo lately detained a captive; and then, at the requeſt of his holineſs, he ordered his army to march againſt the Florentines, who continued to refuſe their obedience to the family of Medici; but, after a gallant defence, in which the emperor's general, the prince of Orange, was killed, they heart; but rather than he will miſs or want any part of his will, he will endanger the one half of his kingdom. I do aſſure you, I have often kneeled before him, ſometimes three hours together, to perſuade him from his will and appetite, but could not prevail: Mr. Kingſton, had I but ſerved God as diligently as I have ſerved the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs. But this is the juſt reward I muſt receive for my diligent pains and ſtudy, not regarding the ſervice of my God, but only to my prince: therefore let me adviſe you, if you be one of the privy-council, as by your wiſdom you are fit, take heed what you put in the king's head; for you can never put it out again." The reſt of this ſpeech earneſtly recommends to Henry the ſuppreſſion of Lutheraniſm, and all other hereſies: and in a few minutes after he expired.

were forced to ſubmit, and Charles eſtabliſhed Alexander de Medicis, his ſon-in-law, on the ſame footing which his anceſtors had gained, and rendered the ſovereign power hereditary in his family.

On the firſt of June, this year, Francis retrieved his two ſons, who were hoſtages in Spain, upon paying the emperor one million two hundred thouſand crowns in hand, and giving ſecurity for the payment of the reſt of the ſum; after that he married Eleanora, the emperor's ſiſter and queen dowager of Portugal, purſuant to the treaty of Cambray. Thus the king of France ſaw himſelf at length in profound tranquillity, though the late war had coſt him immenſe ſums, the loſs of Genoa and Milan, the ſovereignty of Flanders and Artois, a year's captivity, an infinite deal of vexation, and no ſmall portion of his honour and reputation.

As for the emperor, ſince he had made peace with France, and that Italy had in a manner ſubmitted to his yoke, he became maſter of Spain, Italy, and the Low Countries; his brother Ferdinand was actually king of Bohemia, and had been elected king Hungary. Poſſeſſed of theſe advantages, Charles began to form mighty projects, and flattered himſelf with the hopes of having it in his power to ſubdue the reſt of Europe*; and Henry received information from Crook, one of his agents at Venice, that the emperor was even then tampering with the Scots for invading England, and that he had reſolved to pay them a ſubſidy for that purpoſe.

By this time the Reformation had made a conſiderable progreſs in Germany, although Charles had expelled Luther and all his adherents from the empire, and Clement VII. had endeavoured to uſe rough meaſures to extirpate this hereſy, as it was called. This proceeding had raiſed ſuch an animoſity among the princes of the empire who favoured the reformed, that ſeemed to threaten a civil war; but Charles, thinking his late peace with France enabled him to command obedience, convoked a diet this year at Spires, where it was decreed, that no innovation ſhould be made in religion. This decree was conceived to derogate from that liberty of conſcience which former general aſſemblies had granted; and the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg; Erneſt and Francis, dukes of Lunenburg; Philip, landgrave of Heſſe; and Wolfgang, prince of Anhalt, with fourteen of the moſt conſiderable cities of the empire, oppoſed this new decree by a ſolemn proteſtation, with an appeal to a future general council: hence, from this time the Lutheran party came to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of Proteſtants. The pope, provoked at their preſumption, and dreading the thoughts of a general council, for fear of being depoſed, prevailed on Charles, in an interview with him at Bologna, to adopt his ſentiments, which were to make uſe of arms for ſuppreſſing the Proteſtants, alleging, that force was the only way of bringing back to the church perſons that could not be otherwiſe ſilenced; and the emperor concurring with him in opinion, ſummoned a diet of the empire to meet at Augſburg, on the eighth of April in the ſucceeding year, 1531, reſolving to carry every thing therein with the higheſt hand, and to compel the Proteſtants to ſubmit to the church of Rome, without waiting for the judgment of a council.

But, notwithſtanding that the emperor ſeemed ſo ready to pleaſe the pope in all ſuch requeſts as he thought might tend to his own intereſt, yet he, on other occaſions, ſenſibly mortified the pontiff, and in particular by obliging him to reſtore Modena and Reggio to the duke of Ferrara, which his holineſs pretended was contrary to the article of the treaty of Barcelona: beſides he now began to entertain a violent jealouſy of the houſe of Auſtria, inſomuch that we find him propoſing, in the month of September, to give Henry a diſpenſation for having two wives; but Henry, encouraged by the diſpoſition of his people, and the deciſion of all the learned bodies in Europe, in his favour, was determined to have every thing or nothing from the pope, who had no more power for granting a diſpenſation for living with two wives, than he had for diſpenſing with the king's marrying his brother's widow; and, in caſe of refuſal, to diſclaim all papal juriſdiction in the affair of the divorce, and abide by the determination of his own parliament and clergy.

For this purpoſe, on the ſixth of January, 1531, a new ſeſſion of parliament was held, after having undergone various prorogations, and ſir Thomas More, the chancellor, opened it with a ſpeech, wherein he ſet forth, "that the king's deſire of ſeeing the marriage annulled, did not proceed from carnal motives, as ſome malicious tongues had inſinuated, but aroſe purely from ſcruples of his own conſcience, and his zeal for the good of his kingdom, that the ſucceſſion to the throne might not be diſputed after his death:" then he produced a great number of books and treatiſes, compoſed by the moſt learned divines and caſuiſts in Europe, on the ſubject of the divorce, with extracts of ſeveral authors, both ancient and modern, and the deciſions of the univerſities of France, Italy, and England: thoſe were left on the table, for the peruſal of the members. And in the mean time the king communicated his deſign to the convocation of the clergy, who unanimouſly agreed that the marriage was contrary to the law of God†.

This inſtance of complaiſance, however, did not free them from a proſecution which Henry had determined to commence againſt them. Cardinal Wolſey had been found guilty of exerciſing the legatine power in England without a ſpecial licence from the king, and of diſpoſing in that capacity of ſeveral benefices, contrary to the ſtatutes of Proviſors and Præmunire, conſequently thoſe who owned his authority were guilty of the ſame crime. This was the caſe with the whole body of the clergy, who were accordingly charged with having violated the laws of the realm. This proſecution was certainly moſt infamous, if we conſider with what a plenitude of power the king had inveſted Wolſey; in vain did they plead, "that they ſuppoſed it agreeable to the king's will, who employed the cardinal all the time as his firſt miniſter, ſo that it was in vain for them to oppoſe his juriſdiction, inaſmuch as ſuch an attempt would have been unavoidably their ruin." They were told, that the laws being in force, they were to take notice of them at their peril, and ignorance was no excuſe." They were found guilty of the crime with which they were charged, and all their effects were forfeited, and their perſons put out of the king's protection.

However,

However, the king ſhewed himſelf ready, upon their petition, to accept of one hundred thouſand pounds from the province of Canterbury, and to grant them a pardon. As to the province of York, they compounded for nineteen thouſand pounds*. But the chief advantage which Henry received on this occaſion was with regard to his prerogative; for in the petition which the clergy preſented for their pardon, they unanimouſly ſtyled him Protector and Supreme Head of the Church and Clergy of England†. We ſhall ſee hereafter what uſe Henry made of his new title.

The whole of Henry's proceeding in this affair ſeems to have been dictated by a deſire of ſqueezing a large ſum of money from the clergy, as alſo to humble the pride of that body. He knew he was ſupported by the commons, who were ready to go all lengths to curb the eccleſiaſtics, nor did he apprehend being oppoſed by the temporal peers. The Proteſtant religion was at this time ſecretly favoured by many perſons in England, where the writings and ſermons of Wickliff and his diſciples had long ago began to diſpel the miſt of ignorance and ſuperſtition from the minds of the people; who, beſides, were oppreſſed by the pope's uſurpations, and ſcandalized at the lewd and immoral lives of the late pontiffs who had filled St. Peter's chair; ſo that they eagerly wiſhed for an opportunity to deliver themſelves from ſuch an intolerable and diſgraceful yoke: add to this, that Henry wiſely judged, that ſuch a ſhew of reſolution on his ſide would, if any thing could, bring the pope to do whatever he could deſire in his "weighty matter," by which name he affected to call the affair of his divorce.

There were few of the commons who had not, in ſome manner or another, maintained cauſes in the legatine court, and therefore they were as liable to the penalties of the ſtatutes of Præmunire, &c. as the clergy themſelves; and the ſpirit Henry had ſhewn againſt that body, made the members of the houſe of commons ſo apprehenſive for their own ſafety, that they petitioned Henry to be included in the pardon intended to be iſſued to the clergy, which requeſt he granted them§. This condeſcenſion had a very good effect in Henry's favour, for ſoon after this the parliament was prorogued¶; and the members, going to their ſeveral counties, filled the minds of the people againſt the pope, and with an high opinion of the king's clemency. Henry, on his part, as ſoon as the parliament broke up, cauſed the deciſions and writings in favour of the divorce to be printed and publiſhed, that his ſubjects might have time to conſider the caſe before the next ſeſſion.

The queen having, towards the latter end of the year, ſent a petition to the court of Rome, ſetting forth that Henry ſeemed reſolved to proceed to a ſecond marriage, Clement had publiſhed a brief, citing the king to appear at Rome, and another, dated the fifth of January this year, 1531, decreeing any ſuch marriage void, and its iſſue illegitimate; it likewiſe required the king to live with the queen as his wife, and pronounced the ſevereſt penalties againſt all who ſhould be aſſiſting or acceſſory to any ſecond marriage. When the news of this brief came to England it gave Henry prodigious diſquiet, notwithſtanding all the aſſurances he had of ſupport from his parliament and people; he therefore not only laid the deciſion of the univerſities before his parliament, in the manner already related, but alſo thought proper to conſult foreign lawyers upon the ſubject. The univerſity of Orleans, famous for its faculty of law, gave it as a deciſion, "that the citation of a king to Rome in a matrimonial cauſe, which ought generally to be examined and determined in the country of the parties abode, was a thing unſupported by any precedent, and therefore the ſaid citation, and all other proceſs carried on againſt the king on occaſion of his abſence, were null and invalid, and contrary to all the reaſons and method of law and equity‡." Henry, who had ſtill ſome religious qualms hanging about him, made uſe alſo of the good offices of the king of France, and even wrote himſelf to the pope, "to get the cauſe remitted to England, as the place where it had ariſen, and where, according to the canon of the primitive church, it ought to be tried‖." But the anſwer of the pope was calculated only to prevail on him to conſtitute a proxy, that the Roman conſiſtory might be in poſſeſſion of the cauſe, and promiſing him in that caſe to adminiſter ſpeedy and impartial juſtice. The king, knowing well the conſequences of ſuch a ſtep, would appoint no proxy to appear for him at Rome; nor would the pope conſent to have the cauſe, which he had evoked before himſelf and the college of cardinals, be examined by delegates in England, in which he was greatly upheld by the Imperial faction in the college.

While Henry was thus careful to ſatisfy all the world of the uprightneſs of his intention, and the reaſonableneſs of his conduct, he ordered a committee of his council to wait on queen Catherine with the determination of the univerſities on the matter of the divorce and citation, and to lay before her the conſequences of her obſtinacy, both as to the pope, to the kingdom, to herſelf, and to her poſterity, offering to refer the whole affair to the judgment of four ſpiritual and four temporal lords. Catherine ſtill ſtanding obſtinately to her appeal, and declining all juriſdiction but that of the pope, the king, who had hitherto in all reſpects (except in the point of abſtaining from her bed) treated her as his queen, and behaved towards her in the genteeleſt and kindeſt manner, ſo that there was no outward appearance of a diſagreement, reſolved now to proceed in another manner, being not only vexed at her obſtinacy, but highly reſenting the indignity ſhe had offered him by getting him cited to Rome, and therefore another meſſage was ſent her, importing, that his majeſty deſired to have no farther intercourſe with her, and that ſhe might chuſe any one of the royal manors, at a diſtance from the court, for the place of her reſidence. To this meſſage the queen anſwered with a noble ſpirit, "that ſhe ſhould, in obedience to his majeſty's orders, remove from his preſence; but that to what place ſoever ſhe was ſent, nothing could remove her from being the king's wife." She took her leave of the king at Windſor, on the fourteenth of July, after which it does not appear that Henry ever saw her: she retired first to More, then to East Hampstead, and afterwards to Ampthill.

What had lately passed in the parliament and convocation, and the near prospect of Anne Boleyn's being raised to the royal dignity, did not a little encourage the friends of the reformed religion. They began now to dispute openly about the most difficult and abstruse points of religion; but, by the indiscreet overflowing of their zeal, subjected themselves to some disagreeable checks. Henry, afraid of the consequences with which such a spirit, if too far indulged, might possibly be attended, resolved to convince his people, that, though he was inclined to shake off the papal yoke, he did not mean to violate the fundamental truths of Christianity, as held by the church, and therefore ordered the laws against heretics to be strictly put in execution; in consequence of which three Protestants, namely, Bilney, Bayfield, and Baynard (the two first ecclesiastics, and the other a lawyer) were condemned to the flames, and executed in Smithfield*.

The conferences between the emperor and the Protestant princes of Germany, at Augsburg, breaking up with increased animosities on both sides, the reformed princes and cities met, either personally or by their deputies, at Smalcald †, where they protested against the coronation of the emperor's brother Ferdinand of Austria, as king of the Romans, and wrote a letter to Henry, setting forth their grievances, and requesting his assistance, who answered them in such favourable terms, that, full of spirits, they prepared to take arms against the emperor; and the Swiss cantons, who had declared against the corruptions of the Romish church, offered to enter into the league, but were refused by the duke of Saxony, on account of some religious differences. Soon after, the emperor having raised a great army to take the field against the Turks, who, at the instigation of Francis (become jealous of Charles's increasing greatness), had invaded the dominions of the house of Austria, under their warlike emperor Solyman; the princes of the reformation, looking upon this army as designed against them, solicited both Henry and Francis for speedy succours: those two monarchs concluded an agreement with the princes of the league, and Francis persuaded Henry to assist them with fifty thousand crowns, remitted by the hands of the French ambassador at the English court. The resolution taken by the two kings to support the Protestants in Germany arose not from religious motives, but in order to oppose the growing power of the Austrian family. But it is now time to attend the affairs of England.

The parliament meeting, according to adjournment, in the month of January, 1532, the commons were almost unanimously inclined to redress the grievances the people had so long complained of in vain with respect to the papal power and ecclesiastical privileges. Accordingly, soon after their meeting, they presented an address to the king, intreating his majesty to agree to the reformation of several abuses which had crept into the immunities granted to the clergy, and of which they had compiled a whole volume, which was presented to the king by their speaker. Though nothing could be a more seasonable request to Henry, he decently dissembled his satisfaction, and said, "he would come to no resolution till he had heard both parties‡." By this answer he meant to shew the clergy how much they stood in need of the royal protection, hated as they were by the parliament, which were entirely at his devotion. Several acts were passed, which slightly touched upon some of the privileges of the clergy, which were all allowed of by Henry, that he might strengthen his own power against that formidable body, and strike the greater terror into the court of Rome. But no act made so great a noise as one brought into this parliament against any person paying of future annates to the pope. The act sets forth so fully the intolerable grievances of the subject on this head, that it claims a place here for the reader's information. Its substance is as follows:

"That the kingdom was impoverished by the great sums paid to the Roman pontiff: that, since the second year of the late reign, above one hundred and sixty thousand pounds have been sent to Rome, on account of annates or first-fruits, palls and bulls for bishoprics: that the annates had been originally designed as a contribution for supporting a war against the Infidels; but as they were not applied to that purpose, it was decreed, that they should not be paid for the future: that no more than five per cent. of the annual revenue should be given for the bulls of bishoprics; that, if the pope should refuse to grant them on these terms, the bishop elect should be presented by the king to the metropolitan of the province, in order to be consecrated; but should the metropolitan refuse consecration, on pretence of wanting palls and bulls, two prelates appointed by the king should perform the ceremony; and then the elect should be held as lawfully consecrated. Nevertheless, the parliament declared, that the king should be at liberty to annul or confirm this act within the limited time; and if, in that interval, he should compromise his difference with the court of Rome, it should obtain the force and authority of a law; but should the pope, on account of this act, pretend to disturb the kingdom with sentence of excommunication and interdict, these censures should be utterly disregarded: all ecclesiastics were forbid to receive or publish them; but were enjoined to celebrate divine service, as if they had never been issued‖."

But though the parliament shewed itself heartily disposed to promote the king's measures for humbling the court of Rome, and assisting him to extend his own power over the clergy of his kingdom, yet they would not suffer the least attempt to be made against any of those privileges and emoluments which they had gained from the weakening the feodal system in England, during the late reign.

* During this session of parliament, one Richard Rouse, a cook, on the sixteenth of February, poisoned some soup in the bishop of Rochester's kitchen, with which seventeen persons were mortally infected; one of the gentlemen died of it, and some poor people, that were charitably fed with the remainder, were also infected, one woman dying. The person was apprehended, and by act of parliament (22 Hen. VIII.) poisoning was declared treason, and Rouse was attainted and sentenced to be broiled to death, which was to be the punishment of poisoning for all times to come; (but was repealed 1 Ed. VI. and 1 Mariæ I.) The sentence was executed in Smithfield soon after, Burnet. Stow, p. 560. Hall, f. l. 199.

It

It was now grown a common practice for ſuch of the commons who held lands of the crown, and the great lords, to make, by will or deeds, ſuch ſettlements of their eſtates as deprived the king and the ſuperior barons of all aids and emoluments ariſing from thoſe dependencies: a bill therefore was brought into the houſe of lords this ſeſſion, and by them paſſed, for preventing ſuch practices; but being ſent down to the commons, they would neither agree to the bill, nor provide any expedient in favour of the crown. This gave the king great offence, and he expoſtulated with them in pretty harſh terms about their refuſal, ſaying, "that he had in that bill offered a great mitigation of what the law allowed him to claim; and that if they would not accept it, they ſhould feel all the rigour of the law." The commons, however, continued obſtinate, and the bill did not paſs: the difference between the king and the parliament aroſe ſo high, that the latter, with a view to mortify him, permitted one Temſe, a member, to make and ſpeak to a motion, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to the king, entreating him to take back his queen, and prevent all the inconveniencies which the illegitimation of the princeſs Mary muſt neceſſarily occaſion. Henry was greatly enraged at the preſumption of this commoner; but, as he was extremely cautious of giving the leaſt unneceſſary offence to the commons, we do not find that any cenſure was inflicted upon Temſe. An epidemical diſtemper breaking out in London at this time, the parliament was prorogued on the fourteenth of May to the February of the following year.

The proceedings of the Engliſh parliament, which were intimated by Henry's ambaſſadors, Dr. Edward Karne and Dr. Bonner, to his holineſs and the cardinals, threw the papal court into terrible alarms. The conclave was much divided in ſentiments; the Imperial party preſſed the pope to proceed againſt Henry with the utmoſt eccleſiaſtical rigour; but Clement thought it was his intereſt ſtill to temporize, or at leaſt to delay giving any definitive ſentence: accordingly he wrote a cajoling letter to Henry, aſſuring him that his holineſs was ſo much piqued with the emperor, and ſo entirely in the intereſt of Francis, Henry's ally, that Henry need lie under no apprehenſions of truſting the whole cauſe to his determination.

In the mean time, intelligence being received that the emperor had propoſed an interview with the pope, Henry and Francis were greatly alarmed thereat; the former, leſt Charles ſhould bring his holineſs to do ſomewhat prejudicial to his ſuit of divorce; the latter, leſt ſuch a conference might defeat the deſigns he had formed of wreſting the duchy of Milan from the Sforza family, and getting the pope to beſtow it upon his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, who in that caſe was to marry the pope's niece, Catherine de Medicis, afterwards ſo famous in hiſtory. It was therefore mutually agreed, that a new treaty ſhould be entered into between the courts of France and England. Accordingly, on the twenty-third of June this year, the following league was made, viz. "That the two kings ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other; the former with five thouſand archers, the latter with five hundred men at arms, in caſe the emperor invaded either of their territories by land; and with a fleet manned with fifteen thouſand men, in caſe he attacked them by ſea." This treaty was accompanied by a propoſal of an interview between Henry and Francis, to be held in October following, which was agreed to.

It being apparent to the whole nation, that Henry's intention was to marry Anne Boleyn, who was looked upon to be a Proteſtant; and either to force the pope into his meaſures, or elſe to ſeparate from his obedience; ſir Thomas More, the lord-chancellor, who, though an excellent miniſter, and a man of great learning, was a perfect enthuſiaſt in point of ſubmiſſion to the papal authority, diſliking the perſon and proceedings of Anne Boleyn, and being apprehenſive of the fatal conſequences that might attend a total rupture with the court of Rome, reſigned the great-ſeal, which was thereupon given by the king to ſir Thomas Audley, who was firſt conſtituted keeper of the great-ſeal; and, on the ſeventh of January following, declared lord-chancellor.

On the twenty-third of Auguſt died Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury; an event which gave Henry no ſmall ſatisfaction, as thereby he thought he might ſafely get the affair of his divorce determined in his own dominions: for though the deceaſed prelate was in his judgment againſt the marriage with Catherine, yet he was too much devoted to the ſee of Rome to do any act, or exert his own authority, in contempt of the papal power; and he had ſome time before his death, made a private proteſt againſt all that the parliament had done, ſo far as it might encroach upon the rights of the church, or be "to the prejudice of the pope, or the ſee of Rome*:" therefore it could not well be ſuppoſed that he would take upon him to determine a cauſe which the pope had evoked, and reſerved to his own cognizance. The king named for his ſucceſſor Dr. Thomas Cranmer, who was at this time employed in ſoliciting the learned men and bodies abroad, in Germany eſpecially, to favour the king's divorce, and was a perſon whom Henry had found, in ſentiments of religion and politics, to be according to his own heart.

On the eleventh of October, the king went over to Calais with a royal retinue, in order to have an interview with the French monarch between that place and Boulogne. On this occaſion he was accompanied by Anne Boleyn, whom he had lately created marchioneſs of Pembroke. The two princes entertained each other with great pomp and magnificence, but without tranſacting any buſineſs of importance, owing to the diſſimulation of Francis, who, indeed, promiſed to procure Henry ſatisfaction in the affair of the divorce, or to break with the pope, though at this very time he was engaged in a ſecret treaty with Clement, about the marriage of his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, and Catherine de Medicis, as already mentioned.

Henry returned to England on the fourteenth of November; and in the month of January in the following year, 1533, was privately married to Anne Boleyn, by Dr. Rowland Lee, afterwards biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry. The ceremony was performed in the preſence of Cranmer, now returned to England, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Anne's father (lately created earl of Wiltſhire), her mother and brothers.

The parliament meeting, agreeable to its prorogation, in the month of February, among other acts paſſed one againſt appeals to Rome in cauſes of matrimony, divorce, wills, rights of tythes, oblations, and obventions, declaring the ſame to be cauſes appropriated to the cognizance of the ſpiritual courts of this kingdom *. The preamble to this act, to be found in our ſtatute-books, ſufficiently ſhews the general ſenſe of the nation with regard to the pope's power.

All this while the convocation as well as the parliament was ſitting; and Cranmer, being inſtalled in his archiepiſcopal dignity on the thirtieth of March, he, on the third of April, took his ſeat in the upper houſe of convocation, when two queſtions were brought before it from the king, relating to his marriage with Catherine: "I. Whether or not the diſpenſation of pope Julius II. for the ſaid marriage was ſufficient to render it binding and valid? II. Whether or not the conſummation of Arthur's nuptials with that princeſs had been fully demonſtrated?"

There were ſeventy-five divines preſent in perſon, and one hundred and ninety-ſeven by proxy, in all two hundred and ſeventy-two; and after various arguments and debates, for ſeveral days, it was reſolved, by the ſuffrages of two hundred and fifty-three,

"I. That ſuch a marriage was contrary to the law of God, and indiſpenſible by the pope." There were five biſhops preſent at theſe debates, and five others appeared by their proxies; two of the former, viz. the biſhops of Rocheſter and Llandaff, with as many abbots, three priors, and twelve other divines, nineteen in all, diſſenting from the determination.

II. In regard to the ſecond queſtion, it was reſolved, "That by the evidences laid before the convocation, prince Arthur's conſummation was ſufficiently proved." At the canvaſſing this point there were preſent forty-four lawyers and canoniſts, three of which were biſhops: there were three others, who gave their proxies to Gardiner (lately made biſhop of Wincheſter); and of the whole number, amounting to forty-ſeven, only the biſhop of Bath and Wells, and five more diſſented, from the reſolution. The ſame anſwers were given by the convocation of York, only two diſſenting out of upwards of an hundred divines and canoniſts.

It was next reſolved at court, that Cranmer ſhould take upon him to pronounce the ſentence of divorce; a ſtep which was now become abſolutely neceſſary, as the king could no longer conceal his marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was now become pregnant. In the firſt place, however, the queen was once more applied to, to withdraw her appeal to the pope, and to ſubmit; but ſhe remained firm againſt both, and the marchioneſs of Pembroke was declared queen of England on the twelfth of April, being Eaſter-eve. Upon this, Cranmer, after making the proper citations to the queen, and going through a formal proceſs, pronounced a ſentence of divorce, on the twenty-third of May, which was intimated to the emperor by ſir Thomas Wyat, Henry's reſident at the Imperial court: queen Anne was ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter, on the firſt day of June; and it was ordered that Catherine, for the future, ſhould be diſtinguiſhed by no other title than that of princeſs dowager of Wales. However, Henry was perſuaded to yield a little to her Spaniſh pride, by conniving at thoſe about her, whom ſhe inſiſted ſhould continue to treat her in the quality of a queen.

In the mean time the news of the whole proceſs and the ſentence paſſed by the new archbiſhop of Canterbury, together with a copy of a book publiſhed by the king on this occaſion, in which he treated the papal authority pretty cavalierly, reached Rome, and ſo exaſperated Clement, that the Imperial faction found it no difficult matter to perſuade his holineſs to annul the archbiſhop's ſentence; and he threatened Henry with excommunication, in caſe the latter did not condeſcend to have the ſentence confirmed by the ſee of Rome by a certain day in September following, the pope not doubting but he ſhould be able to reclaim this refractory ſon of the church by the means of the king of France, with whom he was about to have an interview at Marſeilles on account of the marriage of Catherine de Medicis with the duke of Orleans.

Many arts were made uſe of, on this occaſion, by the court of France to ſoften Henry; but he was ſo very ſure of his parliament and clergy, that Langay, the French ambaſſador, found him extremely cold in the matter, and by no means diſpoſed to have any farther intercourſe with the pope: however, he was at length perſuaded to order the duke of Norfolk, the lord Rochford, brother to the new queen, and ſeveral other gentlemen of diſtinction, to accompany Francis to Marſeilles, to ſee whether there were any hopes of accommodating matters on an amicable footing: but the duke of Norfolk and the others, hearing of the proceedings of the conſiſtory of Rome, were recalled at their own requeſt; yet, after all, Francis prevailed upon Henry to ſend Gardiner, the new biſhop of Wincheſter, ſir Francis Bryan, a relation of the queen's, and ſir John Wallop, with Edmund Bonner, a court prieſt, to be witneſſes of what ſhould paſs at the interview.

The pope arrived at Marſeilles on the fourteenth of October, with his niece Catherine de Medicis, and was received by Francis and the duke of Orleans with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. They immediately fell upon buſineſs; the marri was celebrated, and an ample dowry (but all to be conquered by Francis) was given to the young bride.

It was at this interview that the French king prevailed with the pope to give Henry entire ſatisfaction, promiſing to exclude the cardinals of the emperor's faction, if the king of England would ſubmit the cauſe of the divorce to be reheard and judged by himſelf in conſiſtory; but Bonner, not being acquainted with this compromiſe, demanded an audience of the pope, and (agreeable to inſtructions he had received from Henry) acquainted his holineſs with Henry's appeal to the next general council from the ſentence given, or to be given, againſt him; and then, after he had been anſwered by Clement that ſuch an appeal was unlawful, he lodged the like appeal in the name of the archbiſhop of Canterbury from the ſentence which annulled his judgment for the divorce, which put the pope into ſuch a rage, that he even proceeded to threaten Bonner with a ſevere puniſhment for his inſolence. This happened on the ſeventh of November †.

Thus all hopes of reconciliation between Henry and the pope were broken off for the preſent, and Clement departed from Marſeilles on the twelfth of November; but as it was Francis's intereſt to pleaſe Henry and the pope alſo, he diſpatched John du Bellay, archbiſhop of Paris, to the court of London, who found means to perſuade Henry to agree, that if the pope would put off the execution of his ſentence until he had indifferent judges ſent, who might hear the buſineſs, he would on his part defer what he was inclined to do in relation to withdrawing his obedience from the Roman ſee. The archbiſhop upon this, though in the depth of a ſevere winter, ſet out for Rome, where he got the pope's conſent to try the cauſe at Cambray, by ſuch judges as the king of England ſhould have no reaſon to except againſt.

But when matters were brought to this criſis, the pope flew off, till he could have Henry's conceſſion, ſigned by his own hand, and fixed a day for the return of the courier, which proved the providential means to bring the arts and politics of men to nought; for the courier not returning preciſely within the limited time, the Imperial cardinals, notwithſtanding all the remonſtrances of the archbiſhop of Paris for a delay of ſix days longer, prevailed with the pope to precipitate a ſentence, by which Henry's marriage with Catherine was declared valid, he was commanded to live with her as his wife, and excommunication was pronounced againſt him if he refuſed. Within two days after this ſentence was fulminated, the courier arrived from England with full powers for the archbiſhop of Paris, declaring that Henry accepted the propoſed judgment, provided that the Imperialiſts and their faction, who were his declared enemies, did not interfere. But all was too late, and the archbiſhop of Paris, finding the pope immoveable, returned to France, the Engliſh ambaſſadors leaving Rome at the ſame time.

From a review of what happened between the time of the archbiſhop of Paris's ſetting out from England, and the time of fulminating the ſentence, it evidently appears that Henry never intended to part with his ſupremacy, and therefore he muſt be ſuppoſed to have acted in this caſe with great inſincerity, only to obtain the pope's conſent in the cauſe of the divorce, to quiet ſome people's conſciences, that he might get rid of Catherine with more grace, and then to drop him there, and to withdraw his obedience; for immediately on the departure of the archbiſhop of Paris, viz. on the ſecond of December, a council was called, in which ſeveral violent reſolutions were taken againſt the papal authority, at a time when Henry's cauſe was actually in ſubmiſſion before the pope, and before he could poſſibly know the iſſue of that negociation.

The parliament meeting on January 15, 1534, began the ſeſſion with an act annulling the ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt heretics: not that the parliament meant to exempt them from the penalty of the laws, for by the new act they were condemned to the flames; but, in order to abridge the power of the clergy, and hinder them from being ſole judges in ſuch caſes, it was decreed that heretics ſhould be tried according to the laws of the land, without any regard to the canon law.

By another ſtatute it was enacted, that no ſynod or convocation of the clergy ſhould be aſſembled without the king's permiſſion; that his majeſty ſhould nominate ſixteen perſons from the parliament, and as many from the clergy, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with power to aboliſh ſuch as were uſeleſs, and confirm thoſe that were neceſſary. An act of attainder was likewiſe paſſed againſt Elizabeth Barton, commonly called the Holy Maid of Kent, a native of the pariſh of Aldington, who was employed by certain eccleſiaſtics as a fit inſtrument to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom.

This woman had been long ſubject to hyſterical fits, during which her countenance and body underwent moſt violent contorſions, and ſhe frequently uttered many ſtrange and incoherent expreſſions, from whence the ignorant and credulous people were induced to believe that ſhe ſpoke by the inſpiration of Heaven: even ſir Thomas More and Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, were weak enough to look upon her as ſomething more than mortal. Finding, therefore, that ſhe gained credit every day, the papiſts put her upon ſpeaking and propheſying againſt the king's divorce, and his ſecond marriage, which ſhe did with great warmth; and at laſt ſhe became ſo bold as to pretend that God had revealed to her, "that if the king went on in his divorce, and took another wife, he ſhould not be king a month longer, and that he ſhould die a villain's death." It is no leſs true than extraordinary, that Fiſher and More, even after ſhe came thus to ſpeak treaſon, appear to have been weak enough to have talked to her, if not to have encouraged her; but More was ſoon convinced of the impoſture, and gave an early account of it to Thomas Cromwell, now one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. Henry at firſt neglected this woman; but finding that ſhe was upheld not only by the regular clergy but the pope's agents in England, he reſolved to proceed againſt her with the utmoſt ſeverity: accordingly the Maid and her accomplices were examined in the Star Chamber, where they confeſſed all the particulars of the impoſture; and appeared upon a ſcaffold in St. Paul's church, where the articles of their confeſſion were read in their hearing; from thence they were conveyed to the Tower, where they remained till the parliament met, which having conſidered the caſe, pronounced it a conſpiracy againſt the king's life and crown, and Elizabeth with her accomplices were attainted of high-treaſon. The biſhop of Rocheſter, Thomas Gold, Thomas Lawrence, Edward Thwaites, John Addiſon, and Thomas Abiſe were adjudged guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon, to forfeit their goods and chattels to the king, and to be impriſoned during his majeſty's pleaſure; and Elizabeth and her confederates were afterwards hung at Tyburn.

The parliament then proceeded to enact ſeveral laws for regulating affairs of an eccleſiaſtical nature. They confirmed the ſtatutes againſt annates; they decreed, "that for the future the pope ſhould have no ſhare in the election or confirmation of biſhops, † While theſe things were tranſacting, queen Anne was brought to bed of a daughter, on the ſeventh of September, afterwards the famous queen Elizabeth.

but that, when a ſee became vacant, the king ſhould ſend to the chapter a congé d'elire, or licence, to elect a new biſhop; and if the election ſhould not be made in twelve days after the date of the licence, the right of chuſing ſhould fall to the king: that the biſhop elect ſhould ſwear fealty to the king, who ſhould preſent him to the archbiſhop, for conſecration; and ſhould the elect, or the archbiſhop, refuſe to obey this order, they ſhould be liable to the penalties of the act of Præmunire: that no perſon ſhould preſume to apply to the biſhop of Rome for bulls, palls, or any other religious purpoſe: that Peter-pence, together with all procurations, delegations, bulls, and diſpenſations, iſſued by the court of Rome, ſhould be entirely aboliſhed: that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be empowered to grant ſuch diſpenſations as were conſiſtent with the law of God, provided that part of the money thence ariſing ſhould be paid into the king's Exchequer: that all religious houſes, whether exempted or non-exempted, ſhould be ſubject to the viſitation of the archbiſhop: that the king's marriage with Catherine, ſhould be deemed null and void; and that the ſucceſſion ſhould be ſettled upon the iſſue of his lawful wife Anne, whether male or female." The members having ſworn to maintain the ſucceſſion in this manner, the two houſes were, on the thirtieth of March, prorogued till the third of November following.

Thus ended this memorable parliament, and thus the total diſunion of the crown and people of England from the court, though not from the church, of Rome, was effected. Thoſe who pretended, that no great kingdom could break with the pope without manifeſt danger, now ſaw that a ſingle blow was ſufficient to overthrow this venerable coloſſus: in fact, the taxes which the court of Rome had ſo long impoſed on the Engliſh, were founded only on that people's willingneſs to be laid under contribution; but as ſoon as they reſolved to be no longer ſo, it was found, that a power founded only in form is nothing in itſelf.

After the ſeparation of the parliament, Henry ſent commiſſioners through the whole kingdom to adminiſter the oath of ſupremacy and allegiance to all his ſubjects, as alſo that concerning the ſucceſſion; Henry looking upon this oath as the teſt, not only of his ſubjects loyalty, but of their attachment to the parliamentary proceedings: it imported, "that they would be faithful to the king, queen, their ſucceſſion, and heirs and ſucceſſors; that they held the king to be ſupreme head of the Engliſh church, and the pope to be no more than any other biſhop; that they renounced all obedience to the pontiff of Rome; that they (ſuch of them as were of the clergy) would preach the pure doctrines of the holy Scripture; and that they would pray for the king as the head of the Engliſh church, then for the queen, her iſſue, and laſtly for the archbiſhop of Canterbury." Which oath was generally taken by the clergy as well as the laity, except John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſir Thomas More, late lord-chancellor, who would not ſubſcribe thereto, alleging, that they could not take ſuch oaths, without endangering their ſouls of eternal damnation; upon which they were both committed to the Tower of London. In the mean time Henry tried, by the means of the archbiſhop of York, Edward Lee, and the biſhop of Durham, Cuthbert Tunſtal, to perſuade Catherine once more to renounce the title of queen; to which ſhe, with an unbroken ſpirit, declared ſhe never would.

Charles V. Catherine's nephew, having undertaken to execute the pope's ſentence of depoſition againſt the king of England, Henry thought proper to endeavour to prevent his deſigns, or at leaſt to put himſelf in a poſture of defence againſt them. For this end he propoſed a new treaty with Francis, king of France; but as Francis always acted with him purely on a principle of ſelf intereſt, and being alſo unwilling to give any umbrage to the pope, whoſe relation he was now become, Henry was not able to bring him to a ſettled alliance that might render their union effectual for the common defence; on the contrary, Francis ſhuffled with him, and deceived him in an egregious manner, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

The king, though he had no reaſon to apprehend any danger from his own ſubjects, to whom the late acts were in general agreeable, ſtill thought it proper to provide againſt all events, and to fortify himſelf by foreign alliances. The emperor had threatened to ſtir up an invaſion from Scotland; therefore, to prevent any hoſtility from that quarter, Henry now made a peace with his nephew, James V. for their joint lives, and a year after the death of either. This peace, which was concluded at London on the eleventh of May this year, contained two articles never inſerted in any former treaty, and which aroſe from the preſent circumſtances of affairs: one was, that this treaty ſhould not derogate from the old leagues ſubſiſting between France and Scotland; the other, that it ſhould not be infringed by any ſentence or cenſure againſt either of the contracting parties, or his dominions. Henry alſo, on reſtoring the caſtle of Eddrington, which had been ſome time before ſurprized by the Engliſh, obtained liberty for Archibald, earl of Angus, his brother George and his uncle Archibald Douglas, with ſome other Scottiſh fugitives that had entered into his ſervice, to reſide in England, upon his undertaking that they ſhould make no hoſtile attempt upon Scotland *. Henry was ſo well pleaſed to have his nephew his friend and ally, that the lord William Howard was ſent to Scotland with the order of the Garter to James.

On the twenty-ſixth of September this year, pope Clement VII. died, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Farneſe, who was elected on the twelfth of October following, and aſſumed the name of Paul III. This event gave a great blow to the hopes and intereſts of Francis, it ruined all his mighty expectations of his new alliance with the houſe of Medicis, and obliged him to be more than ever attentive to his engagements with England. Henry was ſenſible of all this, and reſolved to avail himſelf of ſuch a juncture by getting Francis to guaranty the late act of ſucceſſion, which Francis did in a very ample manner, promiſing, "on the word and faith of a king, and under the forfeiture of his goods, and of all the goods of his ſubjects, in the form of a contract of guaranty, both for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, that he, at all times and in all places, particularly in all ſynods and general councils, and before all perſons, and againſt all men whatſoever, that ſhould oppoſe it, of what rank or condition ſoever they might be, he would, both by himſelf and by his ſubjects, maintain and defend it, and (if need were) juſtify it by a ſtrong hand, and with all his forces; nor would he ever, for the future, publicly or privately, directly or indirectly, go againſt it, or ſo much as attempt it, nor ſuffer it to be attempted by any other, as much as in him lay."

But the death of Clement VII. made no alteration in the meaſures taken by the court of England to ſhake off the papal yoke, eſpecially as it had now little to fear from the emperor, who began to find work enough in Germany; beſides, Henry had, by his negociations, ſecured moſt of the northern powers, who were in general inclined to the reformed religion. Paget was ſent to reſide with the princes of the reformation in Germany; and, about the latter end of the ſummer, ambaſſadors came from the Lubeckers, with offers of entering into an offenſive league againſt the pope, and bringing with them their confeſſion of faith, which they preſented to Henry.

The parliament meeting, according to prorogation, on the twenty-third of November, enacted ſeveral important laws to prevent all future connexion between the kingdom of England and the Roman pontiff. One of their firſt acts was to confirm the king's title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, and to entail the ſame on his ſucceſſors. They declared all thoſe who ſhould ſpeak, write, or imagine any thing prejudicial to the king or queen, guilty of high-treaſon, and debarred from all benefit of ſanctuaries. They compoſed a form of oath, to be taken by the whole nation, with regard to the ſucceſſion of the crown, and annulled all former oaths on the ſame ſubject †. They aſſigned to the king the annates or firſt-fruits (formerly paid to the pope), together with the tythes of all benefices. By another act proviſion was made for twenty-five ſuffragan biſhops, who had power given them to exerciſe ſuch juriſdiction as the biſhop of the dioceſe ſhould grant them ‡: and Henry, after paſſing a general pardon, put an end to the ſeſſion; but Fiſher and More, who had been previouſly convicted of miſpriſion of treaſon, were excepted out of the pardon. At the ſame time Henry iſſued a proclamation, ordering all the juſtices to inſpect the behaviour of the biſhops and clergy, particularly to obſerve whether they preached againſt the abuſes of the church of Rome, and in ſupport of the king's ſupremacy, and to give information againſt thoſe whom they ſhould deem cold and inſincere in the diſcharge of their duty. Another proclamation was alſo iſſued, ordering that the name of Pope ſhould be diſcontinued and be eraſed from all prayers, rubrics, canons, maſs-books, &c. All the prelates renounced obedience to the biſhop of Rome, and among the reſt Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, though in his heart he was ſtill bigotly addicted to all the abſurdities of the Romiſh religion, and a deadly enemy to all reformers.

By this time the reformation had taken deep root in England as well as in Germany, notwithſtanding the violent and cruel perſecution to which its profeſſors were ſubjected. The writings of Luther were generally read here, and even the New Teſtament was tranſlated into the Engliſh language by one Tindal, who afterwards retired into the Low Countries: however, to the eternal reproach of Henry and his reforming government, this book, as ſoon as it made its appearance, was condemned to the flames, as were ſeveral perſons who were ſo incautious as to declare their ſentiments too freely in point of religion. Theſe ſeverities, however, inſtead of ſuppreſſing, ſerved only to ſtrengthen the ſpirit of religious oppoſition, which was ſtill farther inflamed by the quarrel with the Roman pontiff.

Anne Boleyn, archbiſhop Cranmer, and ſecretary Cromwell were in their hearts ſtaunch friends to the reformation, and encouragers of its promoters; while, on the other hand, the duke of Norfolk, with Gardiner and Longland, biſhops of Wincheſter and Lincoln, and many other eccleſiaſtics who frequented the court, were ſtill for preſerving all the abſurdities of the Romiſh religion, and for keeping the flames of perſecution in full blaze againſt the reformers.

Henry himſelf, though he had renounced his ſubjection to the ſee of Rome, was in ſeveral reſpects a bigotted Catholic, and a ſtrict adherer to the real preſence in the ſacrament; beſides, he had written a book againſt Luther, who had anſwered him with great freedom, not to ſay ſcurrility. This had incenſed Henry beyond a poſſibility of reconciliation: in fine, Henry wanted to be the pope's rival, but without being either a Lutheran or a Sacramentarian; he ſtill preſerved the invocation of ſaints, but under certain reſtrictions; it was with him equally a crime to believe in the authority of the pope, and to be a Proteſtant: and we ſhall ſee, in the courſe of this reign, where he alike condemned to the flames thoſe who ſpoke in favour of the Roman pontiff, and thoſe who declared for the reformed religion in Germany. In particular, he now ordered the prior of the Carthuſian monks of the Charterhouſe, London, the prior of Hexham, Benaſe a monk of Sion college, and John Haile vicar of Iſleworth, together with three monks of the Charterhouſe, to be hanged and quar-

† The new oath was conceived in the following terms: "Ye ſhall ſwear to bear faith, truth, and obedience alone to the king's majeſty, and to the heirs of his body, of his moſt dear and entirely beloved lawful wife, queen Anne, begotten and to be begotten; and farther, to the heirs of the ſaid ſovereign lord, according to the limitation of the ſtatute made for ſurety of his ſucceſſion in the crown of this realm mentioned and contained, and not to any other within this realm, nor foreign authority or potentate: and in caſe any oath be made, or hath been made by you to any perſon or perſons, that then ye do repute the ſame as vain and annihilate; and that, to your common wit and uttermoſt of your power, without guile, fraud, or other undue means, ye ſhall obſerve, keep, maintain, and defend the ſaid act of ſucceſſion, and all the whole effects and contents thereof, and all other acts and ſtatutes made in confirmation or for execution of the ſame, or any thing therein contained: and this ye ſhall do againſt all manner of perſons, of what eſtate, dignity, degree, or condition ſoever they be; and in no wiſe to do or attempt, directly or indirectly, any thing or things, privily or apart, to the let, hindrance, damage, or derogation thereof, or of any part of the ſame, by any manner of means, or for any manner of pretence. So help you God, and all ſaints, and the holy evangeliſts."

‡ By this act the towns of Thetford, Ipſwich, Colcheſter, Dover, Guildford, Southampton, Taunton, Shafteſbury, Malton, Marlborough, Bedford, Leiceſter, Gloceſter, Shrewſbury, Briſtol, Penrith, Bridgewater, Nottingham, Grantham, Hull, Huntingdon, Cambridge, and the towns of Pereth and Berwick, St. German's, and the Iſle of Wight, were to be taken and accepted for ſees of biſhops ſuffragan to be made in England and Wales. See their commiſſion in biſhop Burnet's Collection, vol. i. n. 51.

tered at Tyburn, on the eighteenth of July this year, for refuſing to ſubmit to the new laws: and a little before, orders were given for burning twenty-ſeven Proteſtants, viz. John Frith, a man of great learning, Andrew Hewet, and nineteen men and ſix women, born in Holland, to convince the world that his ſeverity to the eccleſiaſtics was not actuated by any fondneſs he was charged with for the new religion.

At length this perſecution reached biſhop Fiſher and ſir Thomas More, who ſtill continued priſoners in the Tower, and who were now ſingled out for a terror to the boldeſt oppoſers of the king's meaſures: Henry was determined they ſhould renounce the pope, and acknowlege his marriage-act and ſucceſſion, as eſtabliſhed by parliament. Pope Paul III. who ſucceeded Clement VII. thought to ſave Fiſher's life by ſending him a cardinal's hat, while matters were preparing for his trial; but in this he only gave Henry the ſatisfaction of bringing a cardinal to the block; for Fiſher refuſing to take the oath of ſupremacy, a commiſſion was made out for trying him by his peers, for miſpriſion of treaſon in the caſe of the Maid of Kent, and alſo for denying the king's ſupremacy, and on the ſeventeenth of May he was tried before the lord-chancellor, the duke of Suffolk, with ſome other lords and all the judges, who found him guilty, and he received ſentence of death accordingly. He received the notice of his execution with great compoſure of mind in the morning before he was beheaded; and when he came to the block, after a ſhort prayer in favour of popery, and praying for the king, and that God would bleſs him with a good council, he calmly reſigned his neck to the executioner, on the twenty-ſecond of June, on Tower-hill. He had the character of a learned and devout man, but very weak and obſtinate, and much addicted to the ſuperſtitions of his education.

The ſame oath of ſupremacy, for the refuſing of which biſhop Fiſher loſt his head, being alſo tendered to ſir Thomas More, he refuſed to take it likewiſe, for which he was tried by the ſame court, and loſt his head on firſt day of July; though Henry reaped nothing but reproach and infamy from the death of a man who was univerſally eſteemed for his virtue, and admired for his wit and pleaſantry, which did not forſake him even in his laſt moments; and he died with an unconcern that in others would have appeared to be levity, but in him was nature.

Theſe executions were followed by freſh injunctions iſſued by Henry to all archbiſhops and biſhops, for enforcing the doctrine of the king's ſupremacy; a declaration was alſo ſent them by ſecretary Cromwell to the ſame effect, which they were ordered to read from their pulpits; and it does not appear that one prelate refuſed to comply with theſe orders, ſo much did they ſtand in awe of Henry's fiery and vindictive temper: and this ſeems to be the epocha from whence we may date Henry VIII's reſolution to govern by force and abſolute power.

At this very time ſir Gregory Caſſali was ſtill at the court of Rome as Henry's agent, and had frequent conferences with pope Paul about ſome expedient to heal the breach which Clement VII. had made with England by his too great precipitation; but news arriving that biſhop Fiſher and ſir Thomas More were executed for denying the king's ſupremacy, the pope broke off all intercourſe with Caſſali, and, by a thundering bull, paſſed eccleſiaſtical cenſures againſt the king of England, ſummoning him, and all his adherents, to appear at Rome within ninety days, to anſwer for their crimes; if they ſhould fail, he laid them under the ſentence of excommunication, deprived the king of his realm, ſubjected the kingdom to an interdict, declared Henry's iſſue by Anne Boleyn illegitimate, annulled all treaties which other powers had concluded with the king of England, beſtowed his kingdom on the firſt perſon who choſe to attempt the conqueſt of it, commanded the Engliſh nobility to take arms againſt him, abſolved all his ſubjects from their allegiance, forbad all Chriſtians to communicate with the Engliſh, and declared it lawful for any one to convert their effects to their own uſe *. This bull was paſſed on the thirtieth of Auguſt, this year; but it was not publiſhed at this time, the pope thinking it prudent to delay the publication, until it could be ſupported by the Imperial arms.

In the mean time the French king, in order to ſound the inclinations of Henry, ſent over Philip Chabot, admiral of France, to communicate ſome overtures of peace, which had been made by the emperor. That prince propoſed a marriage between the third daughter of Francis and Philip prince of Spain, and another match between the dauphin and the princeſs Mary, daughter of Henry and Catherine. Henry received this embaſſy with ſome degree of contempt: he ſaid, that the emperor's offer of the princeſs Mary was of itſelf ridiculous, ſince ſhe was not at his diſpoſal, and that he knew how to keep her from ever being ſo; and that as to ſome other propoſals of the emperor, concerning the duchy of Milan, it was very plain that Charles intended only to divide France and England, that he might the better anſwer his ends upon both: however, Henry propoſed, in his turn, that his new-born daughter Elizabeth ſhould be married to the duke of Angouleſme, third ſon to Francis, on condition that the French king, with the nobility, parliaments, and univerſities of France, ſhould engage to procure thoſe ſentences which had been fulminated by the biſhop of Rome, on account of the divorce, revoked. This propoſal was embraced by Francis; and accordingly, in May this year, the duke of Norfolk, the biſhop of Ely, ſir William Fitz Williams, and Dr. Fox, were ordered to treat concerning the marriage with the commiſſioners of Francis. But the latter demanding that Henry ſhould furniſh him with ſuccours for the war he had undertaken againſt Savoy, and releaſe him entirely from the perpetual penſion of one hundred thouſand crowns, which he had obliged himſelf by treaty to pay to the king of England, Henry judged from this demand, that Francis meant only to ſhuffle with him, and therefore declared, that ſo far from renouncing the penſion, he inſiſted upon the payment of the arrears within a limited time. This reply broke off the negociation: and while the emperor carried his arms into Africa, where he reſtored Muley Haſſein to his kingdom of Tunis, from which he had been expelled by the famous corſair Barbaroſſa, Francis attacked the duchy of Savoy, which he reduced in the very firſt campaign.

The

The bull lately ſigned by the pope was intended rather to terrify Henry, than to be put in force; however, it was ſo ordered as to be made known to all the courts of Europe: but it had the contrary effect, for, as ſoon as Henry was informed thereof, and that, amongſt other ſchemes, the pope intended to give England to ſome of the German popiſh princes, he reſolved to counterballance that project, and engaged Francis I. to concur with him in an embaſſy to the Proteſtant league of Smalcald: Henry ſent Edward Fox and Dr. Heath, to whom Francis joined William de Bellay, lord of Langey.

But theſe monarchs propoſed an union with the league only in a political view, to keep the emperor employed in that country by an inteſtine war, without any regard to the Proteſtant religion. The Proteſtant princes of Germany, on the other hand, were willing to live in all due ſubjection to the emperor, provided they could be ſecured in the free exerciſe of their religion; therefore, to cover their intentions, and to draw the Proteſtants into their intereſt, it was neceſſary for Henry and Francis to feign a conformity of ſentiments with them in religious natters, and a deſire to eſtabliſh the reformation in their kingdoms. Had theſe ſentiments been real, no doubt they would have been readily embraced; but the cruelty with which both kings treated the reformed in their reſpective dominions was a proof of their inſincerity, and therefore, before the princes of the league would proceed in any alliance with them, the duke of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe communicated certain propoſals to the Engliſh ambaſſadors, the purport of which appears from lord Herbert to have been as follows:

They demanded, "That Henry ſhould approve and embrace the Augſburg Confeſſion of Faith, and defend it with all his power in a free council; that he ſhould approve of no place for holding a council without their conſent; that if the pope ſhould call a council at his own pleaſure, Henry ſhould join with them in proteſting againſt it; that he ſhould accept of the title of Protector of the League; that he ſhould never return to the pope's obedience; that he ſhould not aſſiſt their enemies; and laſtly, that he ſhould pay one hundred thouſand crowns towards the defence of the league, and in caſe of a long war two hundred thouſand crowns, upon condition that what was remaining ſhould be reſtored when the war ſhould be at an end *."

How diſagreeable ſoever theſe articles were to Henry, the advantage he propoſed to himſelf by gaining the German Proteſtants to his intereſt, made him ſeem to approve of their propoſals in general; and, to gain their belief of his ſincerity, Fox had inſtructions to aſſure the princes, that if commiſſioners were ſent from them to Henry, there would be no manner of doubt of their perfectly agreeing in every thing. But the Germans were not to be ſo eaſily impoſed upon: they gave in a paper, by which they evidently ſhewed that Henry had proceeded no farther in the reformation than aboliſhing the pope's ſupremacy and ſome religious houſes; but that he ſtill retained all the other moſt material and groſs errors of the Romiſh church. Thus ſtood affairs at the cloſe of the year 1535.

On the twenty-ninth of January, 1536, the unhappy queen Catherine died at Kimbolton, in Huntingdonſhire, after having ſuffered a long ſeries of vexations. A little before ſhe expired, ſhe wrote a very affecting letter to the king, to whom ſhe gave the appellation of "her moſt dear lord, king, and huſband." Henry, it ſeems, was greatly touched at reading this letter, and even dropped ſome tears at the remembrance of a woman whoſe virtue deſerved a better fate. Queen Anne, however, did not behave with even due decorum on on this occaſion; ſhe rejoiced openly at the death of Catherine, and ſeemed to take pleaſure in communicating her ſatisfaction to the public, little thinking that her own fate was ſo near at hand. The remains of this unfortunate queen were depoſited in the abbey-church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an epiſcopal cathedral.

On the fourth of February, this year, the parliament ſat for the diſpatch of buſineſs. The greateſt matter which came under their conſideration at this time, was to effect an entire union between England and Wales. It appears from the lord Herbert, who has, on this head, introduced into his hiſtory a curious diſſertation, to which the reader is referred, that at that time, in ſeveral counties of Wales different forms of juſtice prevailed, and the laws were eluded by the greateſt criminals, if they had but the good fortune to eſcape out of one county into another: to remedy theſe and other flagrant abuſes, and to introduce an uniformity throughout all the country, the following act was paſſed.

"That albeit the dominion, principality, and country of Wales be as a member and part of the temporal crown of this realm, whereof therefore the king is head and ruler, yet, as it hath divers rights, uſages, laws, and cuſtoms, different from the laws and cuſtoms of this realm; and becauſe their language is different from that which is ſpoken here; and that many rude people hereupon have made diſtinction and diverſity between his highneſs's other ſubjects and them, to the cauſing much diſcord and ſedition; his highneſs therefore, out of his love and favour to his ſubjects of Wales, and for reducing them to his laws, doth, by advice and conſent of his parliament, ordain and enact, that Wales ſhould be united and incorporated henceforth to and within his realm of England; and that his ſubjects ſhould enjoy and inherit all and ſingular freedoms, liberties, rights, privileges, and laws, which his highneſs's ſubjects elſewhere enjoy and inherit: and therefore, that inheritances ſhould deſcend after the manner of England, without diviſion or partition, and not after any tenure or form of Welſh laws and cuſtoms. And foraſmuch as there are divers lordſhips-marchers within the ſaid country and dominion of Wales, being no parcel of any other ſhires, where the laws and one correction is uſed and had, and that in them and the counties adjoining, manifold murders, robberies, felonies, and the like, have been done, contrary to all law and juſtice, becauſe the offenders, making their refuge from one lordſhip-marcher to another, were continued without puniſhment and correction; therefore, it was enacted, that the ſaid lordſhips marchers ſhould be united, annexed, and joined to divers ſhires, ſpecified in the ſaid act."

And now Henry, who had been greatly affronted by the contumacious reports which the monkiſh

clergy had ſpread abroad with regard to his proceedings in the buſineſs of the reformation, reſolved to take ample vengeance upon them for the ſame. With this view, after having deliberated with his council, a general viſitation was ordered to be made of all the monaſteries, and ſtrict inqueſt to be taken of all their titles and revenues, and alſo of the morals of the friars and others, and the regulations obſerved in each order; and ſecretray Cromwell was, by a commiſſion under the king's own hand, created vicar-general and general viſitor of all the monaſteries and other privileged places. Cromwell, thus appointed, nominated for his ſubſtitutes to examine the monaſteries the doctors (in divinity) Leigh, Leighton, Patrick, and London, who drew up a ſet of heads of viſitation, which they well knew would bring in moſt of the houſes guilty. The viſitation, the particulars of which will more properly fall into the eccleſiaſtical part of our hiſtory, was accordingly performed with great rigour, and, if we may credit the reports of the viſitors themſelves, they diſcovered ſuch abominations and ſcenes of vice, debauchery, and impoſture, as were not only diſgraceful to religion, but even ſhocking to human nature.

The report of the viſitors being read in parliament, a bill for the demolition of all the leſſer monaſteries was brought in, and paſſed. We cannot know the general reaſon for this bill better than by its preamble, which ſets forth, "That ſmall religious houſes under the number of twelve perſons, had been long and notoriouſly guilty of vicious and abominable living, and did much conſume and waſte their churches, lands, and other things belonging to them; and that, for above two hundred years, there had been many viſitations for reforming theſe abuſes, but with no ſucceſs, their vicious living increaſing daily, ſo that, except ſmall houſes were diſſolved, and the religious put into greater monaſteries, there could no reformation be expected in that matter: whereupon the king, having received full information of theſe abuſes, both by his viſitors and other credible ways, and conſidering that there were divers great monaſteries, in which religion was well kept and obſerved, which had not the full number in them that they might and ought to receive, had made a full declaration of the premiſes in parliament, whereupon it was enacted, that all houſes which might ſpend yearly two hundred pounds, or within it, ſhould be ſuppreſſed, and their revenues converted to better uſes, and they compelled to reform themſelves."

Another act paſſed, by which all theſe houſes, churches, lands, and eſtates were given to the king, with thoſe of all houſes already diſſolved: and by theſe acts no fewer than three hundred and ſeventy-ſix abbeys fell to the crown. By another act, it was declared, that no tenths ſhould be exacted that year; and by another, a court of augmentation was erected, whereby order was taken concerning the religious houſes that were ſurrendered or ſuppreſſed, and how the king's revenue ſhould be increaſed thereby; and officers for this purpoſe were appointed.

But whatever Henry's pretence might be for ſetting on foot this ſcrutiny, it is certain that his principal motives were to wreak his vengeance upon the monks, whom he regarded as his mortal enemies, and to increaſe his revenues with the plunder of their houſes. Soon after the diſſolution of the abbeys the king put an end to this parliament (which had been the moſt compliant that England had ever ſeen), on the fourteenth of April, after ſitting ſix years.

The king's ſevere proceedings againſt the religious houſes regained him, in ſome meaſure, the confidence of the German Proteſtant princes; and they wrote to Henry in terms of great complaiſance from Smalcald, where they were now aſſembled to ſettle the famous Smalcaldic league for the preſervation of thoſe of the reformed perſuaſion. This produced an obliging meſſage from Henry, with ſome explanation with regard to their former propoſals; but ſtill the princes declined giving any umbrage to the emperor. This was not inſiſted on by Henry. Another anſwer was ſent by the princes, in which they promiſe to ſend an embaſſy into England; and ſome of their moſt learned men, among whom was the famous Melancthon, were nominated for that purpoſe: and there is the greateſt reaſon to believe, in the preſent ſituation of Henry's affairs, that this negociation would have ſucceeded to the advantage of the great work of reformation, had not the popiſh faction here found means to deprive the Proteſtants of the intereſt of queen Anne, whoſe death happened ſhortly after the arrival of theſe divines, which very much altered the face of affairs as well as the king's mind, in reſpect to the reformation, which ſhe openly countenanced, and which was in effect the cauſe of her deplorable fate.

Henry's affection, which had been increaſed by oppoſition during the proſecution of the divorce, was now cooled by ſatiety, and he no longer looked on his lovely conſort with the ſame fond regard as heretofore. It is true, ſhe wanted none of the agreeable qualities, and had many of the valuable kind: ſhe was lively, pleaſant, and gay in converſation; and, though ſtrictly virtuous in her conduct, ſhe indulged her humour rather too far; and, having been bred in the freedoms of the court of France, was not ſo attentive as ſhe ought to have been in her exalted and tickliſh ſituation, and either took or permitted liberties which gave offence to an impetuous huſband, who had pride enough to make him the moſt jealous of mortals, and the moſt furious in his jealouſy.

The Auſtrian party about court, all who diſliked the divorce from Catherine, and all that oppoſed the reformation, which ſhe was ſuppoſed to favour, were her enemies, and taking notice of every little indiſcretion ſhe was guilty of, improved it to raiſe in the king a ſuſpicion of her virtue. The viſcounteſs Rochford in particular, who was wife to the queen's brother, but who lived on bad terms with her huſband, and, as ſhe was a woman of the moſt abandoned character, paid no regard either to truth or humanity in the calumnies which ſhe invented, pretended that her own huſband carried on a criminal correſpondence with his ſiſter; and not only ſo, but ſhe inſiſted that ſhe had likewiſe granted favours to Henry Norris, groom of the ſtole, Weſton and Brereton, gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, together with one Mark Smeton, a muſician. This information rouſed all the rage in Henry's breaſt, who was alſo not a little chagrined at an accident which befel the queen ſome time before, of being brought to bed of a dead child.

Nothing however tranſpired till the firſt of May this year, when a tilting match was held at Greenwich, wich, in which the lord Rochford was chief challenger and Henry Norris the chief defendant. It is ſaid, that during the diverſions Henry obſerved the queen drop her handkerchief, which one of the ſuſpected perſons took up, and uſed it to wipe his face: to a mind prepared like Henry's, this accident, which though, in all probability, entirely caſual, was a demonſtration of his wife's infidelity: accordingly all on a ſudden the diverſions were broke up, and Henry, without taking any notice of the queen or her court, with no more than ſix perſons in his retinue, abruptly departed to his palace of Weſtminſter.

The queen following, was, upon her arrival, met by the duke of Norfolk, and ſome other lords of the council, who ſignified to her, that it was his majeſty's pleaſure ſhe ſhould be confined to her chamber. At the ſame time the lord Rochford and Norris were committed to the Tower, as were Brereton, Weſton, and Smeton. Next day, being the ſecond of May, the queen was conducted to the ſame priſon by the duke of Norfolk and other lords, who reſigned her into the cuſtody of ſir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower; and a commiſſion was made out for trying her on the twelfth of May in that place, the duke of Norfolk being appointed lord high-ſteward on that occaſion, with twenty-ſix other peers. The charges brought againſt her were of the moſt deteſtable nature, viz. "That ſhe had procured her brother, and the four other perſons in cuſtody, to lie with her, and that ſhe had made each of them believe that he had the preference above all mankind in her heart; and that ſhe had ſaid to each of them, that the king never had her heart." Smeton had, by fair promiſes, been brought to confeſs, that he had thrice carnal knowlege of her; but it was not thought proper to confront him with her; nor, indeed, could he be an evidence, as he had been condemned three days before to ſuffer, notwithſtanding his aſſurances of pardon upon confeſſion. The only thing that appeared in relation to her brother, the lord Rochford, was his laying his hand on the queen's bed while he whiſpered to her one day; an action done before company, and warranted from the near relationſhip between them. In ſhort, to the eternal infamy of her judges, ſhe was condemned without its being ever known upon what evidence her ſentence was grounded; and the nineteenth of May was the day appointed for her execution, which was that of being burnt or beheaded, at the king's pleaſure.

Henry, not ſatisfied with this act of ſeverity, would needs be divorced from her before her death, and archbiſhop Cranmer was ſent to the Tower, and received her confeſſion of precontract, or promiſe of marriage, between the lord Henry Piercy (now earl of Northumberland) and herſelf, before that ſhe had made with the king; upon which the archbiſhop pronounced, according to the rules of canon law, the ſentence of divorce. It was probably a tenderneſs for her daughter, the young Elizabeth, that engaged her to make this confeſſion, for the earl of Northumberland proteſted in the moſt ſolemn manner that no ſuch contract had ever paſſed between them. It was, however, expected that ſhe would have defended her innocency when about to die, but the ſame motives ſeem to have operated even then, as ſhe feared every thing for her daughter from the ſavage temper of the king, ſhould ſhe expoſe him too much; accordingly, when ſhe came on the ſcaffold, ſhe made no reflections on the hardſhips ſhe had ſuſtained, nor ſaid any thing touching the grounds on which ſentence had paſſed upon her; ſhe only deſired "that every body would judge the beſt," acknowleged her obligations to the king, prayed for him, and entreated the ſpectators to do the ſame for her, and then ſubmitting her neck to the fatal ſtroke, her head was ſevered from her body at one blow, by an executioner, who had been ſent for from Calais, on account of his remarkable dexterity in his bloody profeſſion.

The lord Rochford was tried and condemned at the ſame time with the queen his ſiſter, and, together with the four other gentlemen, ſuffered death three days before her, all of them, Smeton excepted, declaring at their deaths the queen's and their own innocence of the facts for which they ſuffered.

The very day after the queen's execution Henry was married to Jane Seymour, the reigning beauty of the court, daughter to ſir John Seymour, and one of the maids of honour to Anne, on whom the king had for ſome time caſt an amorous eye: eager as he was to gratify his brutal appetites, he totally forgot all regard to decency and decorum, and his cruel and barbarous heart, more worthy of an infernal fiend than a human creature, was not in the leaſt affected by the bloody cataſtrophe of a perſon who had ſo long been the object of his moſt tender affection.

In conſequence of the ſentence of divorce which Henry had procured from his late queen Anne before her death, the princeſs Elizabeth, his daughter by her, who was at this time about three years of age, and been ſtyled princeſs of Wales, was now diveſted of that title; and the princeſs Mary, his other daughter by Catherine, whom he had treated with great ſeverity on account of her attachment to her mother, and her refuſal to aſſent to the ſtatutes which had been lately enacted againſt the papal authority, was now perſuaded by the popiſh faction to attempt a reconciliation with the king at this juncture; accordingly ſhe ſubſcribed to the act of ſupremacy, the renunciation of the biſhop of Rome, and to the unlawfulneſs of her own mother's marriage, that ſhe might the more effectually remove the lady Elizabeth from the king's preſence and affections; but Henry, though he was reconciled to Mary, yet continued to educate the infant princeſs at court, with all the care and tenderneſs of a father.

On the eighth day of June a new parliament met at Weſtminſter, as did alſo the convocation, and both thoſe houſes confirmed the ſentence paſſed upon the late queen Anne; but, what is very remarkable in favour of the queen's innocency, the commons attainted the deceaſed for pride and the carnal deſires of her body, and for confederating in divers treaſons againſt the king's royal perſon, &c. The convocation alleged nothing againſt her but the pretended precontract with the earl of Northumberland when lord Piercy, though that nobleman had ſworn in the moſt ſolemn manner, that no ſuch engagement had ever exiſted.

The parliament alſo enacted a ſtatute, by which they repealed the former act of ſucceſſion, declaring the children of the king's two firſt marriages illegitimate, and adjudging the crown, after his death, to his iſſue by his preſent queen Jane, or any wife he might marry after her deceaſe; but at the ſame time they gave him full power to ſettle the mode of ſuch ſucceſſion either by will or letters patent under the great-ſeal, and pronounced all thoſe who maintained the validity of his two firſt marriages guilty of high-treaſon.

Then the king informed them of ſome advances made to him from pope Paul III. who on hearing of the execution of queen Anne, and death of queen Catherine, hoped he might bring Henry to a good agreement with him; but Henry declaring in parliament that his ſeparation from the biſhop of Rome was ſo fixed, and had proceeded upon ſuch ſolid grounds, that he never would liſten to any accommodation, the two houſes, ſervilely obſequious to the king's will, in order to convince his holineſs that all hopes of re-uniting the Engliſh church to his juriſdiction were vain and groundleſs, paſſed an act, ſubjecting to the penalty of Præmunire all thoſe who ſhould endeavour to reſtore the papal power in England; and all magiſtrates who ſhould neglect to put this law in execution were condemned to the ſame puniſhment: and by another act they annulled and aboliſhed all diſpenſations, exemptions, and privileges procured from the court of Rome, ſaving however to the archbiſhop of Canterbury the right of confirming what ſhould be deemed advantageous to the church and people.

By a third act it was prohibited any one to marry with the next degrees of royal blood, without permiſſion from the king. This act paſſed upon the following occaſion: the lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to Henry's ſiſter, the queen dowager of Scotland, by the earl of Angus, her ſecond huſband, was now at the Engliſh court, where ſhe was courted by the lord Thomas Howard, brother to the duke of Norfolk. This courtſhip, which had proceeded to the length of mutual promiſes, coming to Henry's ears, the lovers were committed to the Tower of London; and lord Thomas, upon circumſtances brought againſt him of aſpiring to the crown, was attainted of high-treaſon in parliament. The queen of Scotland hearing of her daughter's impriſonment, wrote ſtrongly in her favour to Henry, but without effect; nor was ſhe releaſed till after the death of lord Thomas, which happened in the Tower. A fourth law was enacted, that all encroachments of parliament upon the king's prerogative, before he ſhould have attained the age of twenty-four, might be annulled under the great-ſeal of England. Theſe were the moſt material acts for our purpoſe in this ſeſſion of parliament, which was finiſhed on the eighteenth day of July, and which one would be tempted to think had aſſembled for no other purpoſe than that of beſtowing upon Henry a more extenſive authority than any of his predeceſſors had ever enjoyed.

Neither was the convocation leſs compliant with the crown than the parliament had been; for, beſides ratifying the ſentence of divorce between the king and Anne Boleyn, they alſo gave their ſanction to a ſyſtem of religion which Henry, who differed from all his ſubjects in point of belief, had been at the pains to digeſt; the contents of which will fall more properly into another part of our hiſtory. Before the convocation broke up, the king acquainted them that he was ſummoned to a council, which was, by agreement between the pope and the emperor, to be held at Mantua. As a general council carried with it a popular and plauſible ſound, it was neceſſary to guard againſt its conſequences with reſpect to the ſteps which had been taken by Henry, who had reaſon to believe its members would be no way favourable to him: he was under ſome difficulty by the appeal he had made from the pope to a general council; but Cranmer, and ſome other prelates, made him eaſy on that head, and a decree paſſed in convocation, defining what a general council was, and ſhewing that no ſuch could be called by the authority of the pope, or in the preſent juncture of affairs; and that no juſtice was to be expected where the biſhop of Rome was to preſide. Strengthened by this opinion, Henry publiſhed a flaming proteſtation againſt the approaching council.

About this time Reginald Pole began to diſtinguiſh himſelf by his taſte and learning: he was ſon to Margaret, counteſs of Saliſbury, the daughter and heireſs of George, duke of Clarence, brother to Edward IV. and conſequently allied to the king, who determined to advance him to the higheſt dignities of the church, conferred upon him the deanry of Exeter, and ſent him to finiſh his ſtudies at the univerſity of Paris. He refuſed to concur with Henry's agents in procuring the deciſion of the French univerſities, in favour of the divorce, which he diſapproved. He afterwards returned to England, and agreed with the clergy in owning Henry ſupreme head of the church. Then he travelled into Italy, where he acquired a great character for his wit and eloquence; and Henry being informed that he openly condemned him for his ſeparation from the Apoſtolic ſee, and that he had publiſhed a book intituled De unione eccleſiaſtica (or, Concerning Eccleſiaſtical Union), in which he treated the king with great ſeverity, comparing him to Nebuchadnezzar, and even exhorting the emperor and other European princes to attack him, with all their forces, he reſolved, if poſſible, to get him in his power, and, diſſembling his reſentment, ſent to deſire him to come over to explain ſome paſſages in his book, which were ſomewhat dark and obſcure; but finding him upon his guard, he now ſtripped him of his dignities, and wreaked his revenge on Pole's family and relations. The pope, however, took care to reward his attachment to the ſee of Rome, by preſenting him with a cardinal's hat, which bound him cloſer than ever to the intereſt of his holineſs.

The ſuppreſſion of the ſmall monaſteries, though enacted in the firſt ſeſſion of parliament, did not take place till the month of Auguſt this year, when it occaſioned great clamours through the whole nation, as the viſitors executed their commiſſion with inhuman ſeverity, and were guilty of the groſſeſt embezzlements: and the pope having again excommunicated Henry, and declared him depoſed, put the kingdom under an interdict, and forbidden his ſubjects to obey him, the monks every where inſinuated into the minds of the country people, that it was their duty to take up arms againſt one who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. The people, who had ſucked in with their milk the principles that were now at once to be aboliſhed, eagerly liſtened to theſe inſinuations; and the popiſh emiſſaries had been ſo ſucceſsful, that in Lincolnſhire, about the end of September, upwards of twenty thouſand ſouls aſſembled under the command of one Mackerel, prior of Barlings, who took the name of Captain Cobler, and publiſhed their grievances by way of petition to the king, complaining of the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, the ſubverſion of their ancient faith, the embracing new doctrines, &c. The king anſwered this petition in an ample manifeſto, and ſent the duke of Suffolk, with a few troops, to reduce the mutineers to obedience, who upon promiſe of pardon diſperſed of themſelves; but their leader being taken, with ſome of the principal ringleaders, they were executed for treaſon and rebellion.

This ſucceſs was of the greateſt conſequence to the king's affairs, for at this time one Aſke, a gentleman of fortune in Yorkſhire, extremely well fitted to act at the head of a popular inſurrection, had drawn the people of that county together, and they were joined by a little army of outed monks, who carried before them a banner, on which a crucifix and the five wounds, with a chalice, were painted. The ſame device was worn upon their ſleeves, to animate them in favour of their endangered religion: they gave their march the title of the Pilgrimage of Grace, and all who joined them were obliged to take an oath, "that they entered into the Pilgrimage of Grace for the love of God, the preſervation of the king's perſon and iſſue, the purifying the nobility and driving away all baſe-born counſellors, and for no particular profit of their own, nor to do diſpleaſure to any, nor to kill any perſon for envy, but to take before them the croſs of Chriſt, his faith, the reſtitution of the church, and the ſuppreſſion of heretics and their opinions." Theſe ſpecious pretences ſo deluded the people, that the rebels were ſoon forty thouſand ſtrong; and meeting with no reſiſtance, they ſat ſuddenly down before Pontefract caſtle, which was looked upon as a place of ſtrength, and which was then held by the archbiſhop of York and Thomas lord Darcy, who quickly ſurrendered to them: they next made themſelves maſters of York and Hull; and Aſke, by perſuaſions and threats, obliged all the nobility of the county to join him, except Henry Clifford, earl of Cumberland, who held out his caſtle of Skipton againſt all the rebel forces, and ſir Ralph Ewer, who defended his caſtle of Scarborough till he was relieved, though himſelf and men had nothing to ſubſiſt on for three weeks but bread and water.

The government not being able to muſter above five thouſand men, and finding that the rebels were not to be amuſed, a proclamation was publiſhed, ordering all the nobility to meet the king at Northampton on the ſeventh of November; in the mean time his little army, under the command of the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Shrewſbury, and the marquis of Exeter, encamped at Doncaſter, muſt have been entirely routed by the rebels, who advanced to give them battle, had not the river Don, the only paſs by which they could advance to the town, happily been rendered impaſſable by a heavy rain. This lucky accident gave the duke of Norfolk an opportunity to propoſe a conference with the chiefs of the mutineers, when the latter gave in the following demands:

"That a general pardon be granted; a parliament to be held at York, and courts of juſtice to be held there; that none on the north ſide of Trent might be brought to London upon any law-ſuit; they deſired a repeal of ſome acts of parliament, thoſe for the laſt ſubſidy, for uſes, for making words miſpriſion of treaſon, and for the clergy's paying firſt-fruits and tenths to the king: they deſired the princeſs Mary might be reſtored to her right of ſucceſſion, the pope to his wonted juriſdiction, and the monks to their houſes again; that the Lutherans might be puniſhed; that Audley, the lord-chancellor, and Cromwell, the lord privy-ſeal, might be excluded from the next parliament; and Leigh and Leighton, who had viſited the monaſteries, might be impriſoned for bribery and extortion."

Though the king was highly exaſperated againſt the inſurgents, yet the accounts he daily received of their ſtrength obliged him, much againſt his will, to ſend down a general pardon, directed to the duke of Norfolk, but with orders not to publiſh it but in the laſt extremity. That very ſoon happened, for the rebels once more preparing to force the paſſage of the river, the duke was obliged to publiſh the pardon. This reſtored a ſhort tranquility; but the prieſts renewing their practices for diſturbing the public peace, and with too much ſucceſs, the duke of Norfolk and the earl of Shrewſbury had orders to continue in the North all the winter. The duke uſing his power with great rigour, by putting the martial law in full force againſt every one who would not take the oath of ſupremacy, thoſe proceedings gave riſe to a freſh rebellion. Two gentlemen, called Muſgrave and Treby, putting themſelves at the head of eight thouſand peaſants, made an attempt upon Carliſle, from which however they were repulſed, and afterwards entirely defeated by the duke of Norfolk. Muſgrave eſcaped, but Treby, with ſeventy of his followers, were taken and hanged upon the walls of Carliſle.

This happened in February, 1537, and the king now ordered to court ſuch of the heads of the former inſurrection whom he thought he had moſt reaſon to fear: Aſke readily obeyed, and at firſt was well received at court; but the lords Darcy, Huſſey, and other chiefs of the rebels, not following his example, were ſeized and ſent priſoners to London. The two noblemen were arraigned at Weſtminſter, found guilty, and beheaded on Tower-hill; thoſe of inferior degree were hanged at Tyburn and other places; Aſke himſelf, leaving the court ſhortly after without licence, was taken and hanged in chains at York, notwithſtanding the general pardon which had been granted.

Fortunately for Henry, James V. was in France during theſe rebellions, ſo that the inſurgents had no aſſiſtance from Scotland. James returned home with his young queen, Magdalen, daughter of Francis, whom he had lately eſpouſed, about the beginning of the year; and ſhe dying ſoon after her arrival in Scotland, cardinal Beaton and Robert Maxwell were ſent over to France, to treat of another marriage between James and Mary of Guiſe, the duke of Longueville's widow, which ſoon after took place.

Henry was now ſo fluſhed with ſlaughter by the frequent executions carried on by his order and under his eye, that he ſeemed to take a delight in ſhedding blood: he ordered Thomas Fitz Gerald, ſon of the late earl of Kildare, twice lord-deputy of Ireland, and five of his uncles, after a long confinement in the Tower for an inſurrection in Ireland, to be executed on the thirtieth of March, for a terror to that people, who he feared would riſe and join the emperor againſt his crown and authority in Ireland: but the earl of Kildare's youngeſt ſon, Gerald Fitz Gerald, had the good fortune to make his eſcape by a ſtratagem, and got over to France, and from thence to the Low Countries; but finding it unſafe to continue there, he went and offered his ſervice to cardinal Pole, who afterwards made uſe of him in his deſigns againſt his king and country.

for

The king's next care was ſo to ruin the affairs of the monks, who had been the principal promoters of the late diſturbances, that they might never more be able to give him trouble; and having employed ſecretary Cromwell to procure addreſſes from the two univerſities, ſetting forth, that the numbers of religious houſes ſtill remaining were unprofitable, nay pernicious, to the Chriſtian religion, as tending only to harbour lazy drones and ſwarms of impoſtors, he gave orders for a total ſuppreſſion of many of thoſe houſes, and to ſeize their revenues. The rich abbey of Furneſe, in Lincolnſhire, ſurrendered on the ninth of April; the abbey of Bermondſey, in Surry, on the firſt of June: and that of Biſham, in Berkſhire, on the fifth of July.

On the twelfth of October, this year, the queen was delivered of a young prince, at Hampton-court, to the inexpreſſible joy of all the nation, and of Henry in particular. The having a ſon and undoubted heir to all his dominions, was a bleſſing which had been the ſubject of his moſt ardent wiſhes; but his ſatisfaction on this occaſion received a conſiderable check by the death of the queen ſoon after her delivery: ſhe was the beſt beloved of all his wives, and highly celebrated for her humility, goodneſs, and affability. She was buried with great pomp at Windſor. Henry was ſo afflicted with the loſs of her, that, for ſome days after her death, he ſhut himſelf up from all company.

The new-born prince was baptized by the name of Edward; and, three days after, he was declared prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter. To diſtinguiſh this happy event the more, ſir Edward Seymour, brother to the queen, was created earl of Hertford and lord Beauchamp; ſir William Fitz Williams, lord high admiral of England, was created earl of Southampton: ſome months after, ſir William Paulet, treaſurer of the houſhold, was made lord St. John; and ſir John Ruſſel, comptroller, was created lord Ruſſel.

But the birth of a ſon and heir did not free Henry from the terrors of an invaſion which he ſaw threatening him from the emperor, who had concluded a truce with the king of France, that he might be more at liberty, with all the forces of Spain, Italy, Germany, and the Low Countries, to attack England. The king therefore came to a final reſolution of ſuppreſſing all the religious houſes in his dominions, conſidering them as ſeminaries for promoting diſaffection to his government, and the monks as ſubjects to the pope rather than to himſelf, devoted wholly to the intereſt of the ſee of Rome, and uſing all their endeavours to alienate the minds of the people from their lawful ſovereign, and ſeduce them to an implicit obedience to the papal authority, by continual pretences to falſe miracles, or other monaſtic jugglings; and at the ſame time were themſelves ready, on every occaſion, to promote and further the ſchemes of the pope and the emperor againſt his crown and dignity.

Fearful however, that this meaſure might occaſion ſome clamours in the nation, he prudently began with removing the prejudices of the people, by expoſing the enormities committed in thoſe receptacles of vice and debauchery, and to diſabuſe them with regard to the ſuppoſed ſanctity of relics, images, and all other trumpery of ſuperſtition: he ordered the commiſſioners to examine, and, if poſſible, diſcover the arts by which the mokns impoſed upon the ignorance of the vulgar. This ſecond viſitation produced a detection of an infinite number of holy cheats, and pretended relics, made uſe of to encourage ſuperſtition rather than devotion in the people, and to draw them into pilgrimages and offerings. The principal of theſe we have, to ſatisfy the curioſity of the reader, thrown into a note at the foot of the page*. The diſcoveries made on this occaſion raiſed a general indignation in all ranks, to find how they had been abuſed: they deteſted the authors of ſuch forgeries; the monaſteries grew infamous, and thus was the Engliſh ſuperſtition, in point of images and relics, extinguiſhed.

The multitude of thoſe impoſitions gave Henry, who wanted to have the great houſes diſſolved,

* With regard to the implements of idolatry and ſuperſtition, Reading ſeems to have been the grand repoſitory of the nation. There the viſitors found an angel with one wing, that brought over the head of the ſpear that pierced the ſide of Jeſus Chriſt, with ſuch a catalogue of other relics as filled up four ſheets of paper.

At St. Edmundſbury, they diſcovered ſome of the coals that roaſted St. Laurence; the parings of St. Edmund's toes; the girdle of the Virgin Mary, and ſome of her milk; the head of St. Urſula; the penknife and boots of St. Thomas a Becket; part of the ſame ſaint's ſhirt, much reverenced by big-bellied women; and certain relics to prevent a head-ach, and the generation of weeds among corn.

There were likewiſe diſcovered in the monaſteries, ſome impoſtures of a more artificial nature. At Hales, in the county of Glouceſter, had been ſhewn, for ſeveral ages, the blood of Chriſt, pretended to be brought from Jeruſalem; and it is natural to think, that this relic would be held in the higheſt eſtimation.

This relic was ſuppoſed to be attended with a very ſurpriſing circumſtance: the ſacred blood was not viſible to any one in mortal ſin, even when ſet before him; and, till he had performed good works ſufficient for his abſolution, it would not deign to diſcover itſelf to his longing eyes.

At the diſſolution of the monaſtery, the whole contrivance was diſcovered. Two of the monks, who were entruſted with the ſecret, had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week; they put it into a phial, one ſide of which was thin and tranſparent, and the other thick and obſcure. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were ſure to ſhew him the dark ſide of the phial, till maſſes and offerings had expiated his crimes; and then, finding his money, or patience, or faith, exhauſted, they bleſſed him with the happy ſight, by turning the bright ſide of the phial.

There was a cruciſix at Boxley in Kent, diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Rood of Grace, which had been long held in the higheſt veneration, becauſe it had been ſeen to bend and raiſe itſelf, ſhake the head, hands, and feet, roll the eyes, and move the lips. The puppet, being brought to London, was broke in pieces, in ſight of the people, at St. Paul's croſs, where with their own eyes, they beheld the ſprings and wheels by which it had been actuated.

A great wooden idol of Wales, called Darvel Gatheren, was brought up to London, and cut in pieces: and, by a cruel refinement of vengeance, it was employed as fuel to burn friar Forreſt, who was condemned for denying the ſupremacy, and ſome heretical opinions.

A finger of St. Andrew, covered with a thin plate of ſilver, had been pawned by the convent of Weſtacre, for a debt of forty pounds; but as the king's commiſſioners refuſed to redeem the pledge, the people made merry with the poor creditor, on account of his ſecurity.

vaſt advantages, as it is natural to think that the religious of monaſteries where they were carried on, would ſubmit to any thing rather than be expoſed, and might eaſily be brought to ſurrender their houſes, to avoid the puniſhment they deſerved. Such impurities and diſorders were found in many as would ſurpaſs credibility, if not unexceptionably atteſted; and ſome were ſo notoriouſly guilty, that they ſigned conceſſions of the diſſoluteneſs of their lives and converſation. A great number of monks, and even ſome abbots and friars, were found guilty of holding correſpondence with the rebels, and executed as traitors; and the reſt, as they had now no privileges to ſcreen them from the civil judicature, were glad to compound for their offences by a ſurrender of their monaſteries. On one or other of theſe accounts, no leſs than one hundred and fifty-nine monaſteries were reſigned in the courſe of the year 1538 into the king's hands; and the example continually gained ground, ſo that hardly a week paſſed without ſome new ſurrender.

Whilſt Henry was thus employed in rooting out ſuperſtition and burning images the moſt in repute for peculiar virtues and wonder working properties, he could not well overlook the moſt famous and reſpected of all the inſtruments of popiſh idolatry, the ſhrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Becket was indebted for his ſaintſhip to the vigorous efforts he had exerted in defence of the authority of the holy ſee, and therefore it may be readily conceived how obnoxious to Henry a ſaint of this character muſt appear, and how contrary to all his ſchemes of aboliſhing the power of the pontiff of Rome: he could not bear the thoughts that ſuch a furious and obſtinate rebel to his prince ſhould be held in ſuch veneration, and his tomb frequented by ſuch numerous pilgrimages, and enriched with ſuch ſuperb preſents. Proceſſes were in thoſe days carried on againſt the dead in the ſame manner as againſt the living: the like form was uſed towards Becket; his life and actions underwent a ſtrict examination, and were generally condemned; the miracles pretended to be wrought at his tomb were proved to be forgeries; his name was ordered to be eraſed from the calendar, the office for his feſtival expunged from the breviary, his bones to be burnt, and his aſhes diſperſed. At the ſame time the riches of his ſhrine, which were ineſtimable, were converted to the king's uſe: among other things there was a very fine diamond, which Lewis VII. of France, who made a pilgrimage to this ſaint's remains, had depoſited at his tomb, was by Henry's orders ſet in a ring, which he ever after wore on his thumb. Thus did Henry at once indulge his two darling paſſions, avarice and revenge, by enriching himſelf with the ſpoils, and uncanonizing a prelate whom the papal power had, for his inſolence to his king, raiſed to be a ſaint.

The news of theſe proceedings no ſooner reached Rome, than that city was filled with libels and ſatires againſt the perſon and conduct of Henry: he was repreſented as the moſt impious and ſacrilegious tyrant that ever diſgraced the royal title or dignity: he was compared to Belſhazzar, Nero, Domitian, Diocleſian, and in particular to Julian the Apoſtate, whom he was ſaid to reſemble in his learning and apoſtacy, though greatly inferior in point of morals.

In theſe invectives, which were handed about all over Europe, cardinal Pole's ſtyle was eaſily diſtinguiſhed. Henry, whoſe vanity and bloody diſpoſition increaſed every day, reſolved to avenge himſelf for theſe groſs inſults on all the friends of Pole in England, and the more eſpecially as the emiſſaries he kept at the court of Rome informed him, that all the intelligence from England was addreſſed to the cardinal. He ordered Courtney, marquis of Exeter (who was ſon to Catherine, daughter to Edward IV.), Pole, lord Montague, ſir Edward Neville, brother to lord Abergavenny, and ſir Geoffrey Pole, to be arreſted for correſponding with that prelate, who, being found guilty, were all beheaded except ſir Geoffrey Pole, who, having turned evidence againſt the reſt, had his pardon. Theſe were ſhocking ſeverities; but, indeed, if it was duly proved that the ſufferers held a correſpondence with Pole, Henry is not ſo blameable, ſince it is certain that at this time Pole was the pope's agent to ſtir up not only England, but all Europe, againſt Henry.

Pope Paul III. had hitherto ſuſpended the bull of excommunication, which he had formerly paſſed againſt Henry, in hopes of being one day able to accommodate his difference with that monarch; but finding that the late proceedings in England had ſhut the door againſt all reconciliation, he, on the ſeventeenth of December this year, publiſhed the bull with great ſolemnity, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring princes againſt the Engliſh monarch, and even offered his kingdom to James of Scotland, provided he was able and willing to ſubdue it: and his agents found means to affix this bull in ſeveral places, both in France, Scotland, and Ireland. Henry, unterrified by this mock thunder, reſolved to ſet his holineſs at defiance: with this view he exacted of all biſhops and abbots a new oath, by which they renounced the pope's authority: and a new tranſlation of the Bible, which had been undertaken at the inſtance of Cranmer and Cromwell (who thought nothing could ſo effectually root out papal ſuperſtition as a free toleration of the ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue), being completed, he ordered copies thereof to be immediately printed, and ſet up in every church, at the joint expence of the incumbent and pariſhioners; and at the ſame time Cromwell obtained the royal warrant, enjoining the clergy to read the Lord's Prayer, the Confeſſion of Faith, and the Ten Commandments in Engliſh: they were ordered to recommend good works, and to teach the people that relics, roſaries, and all other trumpery of the like nature, were unneceſſary to ſalvation. All the images, to which devotees were accuſtomed to make offerings, were removed; all the tapers were taken away out of the churches, except thoſe that burned before the images of Chriſt; and all the invocations of "Ora pro nobis" (Pray for us), added to the prayers addreſſed to ſaints, were entirely aboliſhed.

Much about the ſame time, viz. the beginning of the year 1539, the king having underſtood that there was a learned man, named Lambert, who denied the real preſence in the ſacrament, to which Henry was blindly devoted, notwithſtanding that it is, of all the abſurdities of the Romiſh church, the moſt abſurd and ridiculous; this vain monarch thought he had found a fine opportunity where he could at once exercise his supremacy and display his learning, resolved to have the glory of disputing with this reformer, who had appealed from a sentence given against him by archbishop Cranmer. Public notice was accordingly given, that the king designed to enter the lists against this school-master, for he was of no higher degree, and scaffolds were erected in Westminster-hall for the accommodation of the audience, without any regard had to the injustice of thus mixing the disputant and the judge. The end of this disputation was, that Henry gave his antagonist his choice, either to recant his opinion, or to be burned: Lambert nobly made choice of the latter, and the king had the mean cruelty to order him to be executed, which was inflicted upon him with the greatest rigour.

But a parliamentary sanction was now required, as well to confirm what had been done, as to establish future measures: accordingly, on the twenty-eighth of April, the parliament sat, whom Henry found still complying in every thing; and, among many remarkable statutes, it was enacted, "That the king, for the time being, with the advice of his council, or the more part of them, may set forth proclamations, under such penalties and pains as to him and them shall seem necessary, which shall be observed as though they were made by act of parliament: but this shall not be prejudicial to any person's inheritance, offices, liberties, goods, chattels, or life. And whosoever shall willingly offend any article contained in the said proclamation, shall pay such forfeiture, or be so long imprisoned, as shall be expressed in the said proclamation. And if any offending will depart the realm, to the intent he will not answer his said offence, he shall be adjudged a traitor."

By another act, the king was empowered to nominate such a number of bishops, sees for bishops, cathedral churches, and endow them with such possessions as he will. By another act the order of the house of lords was regulated: Cromwell, as king's vicegerent in ecclesiastical matters, was to have the precedency of both archbishops. It was likewise enacted, "That all leases made of manors belonging to monasteries dissolved, or to be dissolved, and assured to the king, should take effect; wherein is expressed, that the king should possess and enjoy to him, his heirs, and successors, for ever, all monasteries, abbeys, priories, nunneries, colleges, hospitals, houses of friars, or other religious and ecclesiastical houses and places, which, since the fourth of February, 27 Henry VIII. have been dissolved, suppressed, renounced, relinquished, forfeited, given up, or by any other means come to his highness; or which shall be dissolved, &c. as also all manors, lordships, lands, tenements, rights, liberties, &c. belonging to them; all which (except such as came by attainder or treason) should be under survey and governance of the king's court of augmentation of the revenues of the crown; other mens titles yet saved."

In this parliament a committee of religion was appointed, upon the lord-chancellor's motion, shewing it to be the king's desire to have all his subjects of one religion. The members of the committee were the lord vice gerent, Cromwell, the two archbishops, the bishops of Durham, Bath and Wells, Ely, Bangor, Carlisle, and Worcester. The archbishop of Canterbury, the bishops of Ely and Worcester, and Cromwell, were on one side; and the debates were so violent, that on the sixteenth of May, the duke of Norfolk told the lords, that the committee had made no progress, and that therefore he would take the liberty to offer to the house certain articles to be debated on, and, if approved, to pass into the form of a perpetual law. These articles were as follow.

"First, If any person, by word, writing, printing, cyphering, or any otherwise, do preach, teach, dispute, or hold opinion, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under form of bread and wine (after the consecration thereof), there is not present really the natural body and blood of our saviour Jesus Christ, conceived of the Virgin Mary; or that, after the said consecration, there remaineth any substance of bread and wine, or any other substance but the substance of Christ, God and man, or that in the flesh under form of bread, is not the very blood of Christ; or that the blood, under form of wine, is not the very flesh of Christ as well apart as though they were both together, or affirm the said sacrament to be of other substance than is aforesaid, or deprave the said blessed sacrament, then he shall be adjudged an heretic, and suffer death by burning, and shall forfeit to the kings all lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, and chattels, as in case of high-treason.

"Secondly, And if any person preach, in any sermon or collection openly made, or teach in any common school or congregation, or obstinately affirm or defend, that the communion of the blessed sacrament in both kinds is necessary for the health of man's soul, or ought, or should be administered in both kinds, or that it is necessary to be received by any person other than the priest, being at mass and consecrating the same:

"Thirdly, Or that any man, after the order of priesthood received, may marry, or contract matrimony:

"Fourthly, Or that any man or woman which advisedly hath vowed, or professed, or should avow or profess chastity or widowhood, may marry, or contract marriage:

"Fifthly, Or that private masses be not lawful, or not laudable, or should not be used, or be not agreeable to the laws of God:

"Sixthly, Or that auricular confession is not expedient and necessary to be used in the church of God; he shall be adjudged to suffer death, and forfeit lands and goods as a felon."

These articles, before they passed into the form of a law, admitted of great debates. The third and fourth pointed directly at Cranmer, who spoke greatly against all but the first, he being himself a Lutheran. As to the other articles, they were matter of private speculation, but against Cranmer's sense. They were, however, carried into a most bloody and detestable law, and Henry himself took great pains in drawing up and correcting them into the form we see them here. At the same time the chancellor moved for a bill to be brought in, for punishing such as disputed against those articles: the archbishop of York, the bishops of Durham and Winchester, with Dr. Tregonwell, a master in chancery, had the drawing up of this bill, which was more to Henry's liking than one which had been presented by the other party. On the seventh of June it was brought into the house, and had a first reading; on the ninth it was read a second time; time; on the tenth it was engroſſed, and read a third time. Biſhop Burnet, who was a great favourer of Cranmer, ſays, that when it paſſed the houſe of peers, Henry himſelf deſired Cranmer to leave the houſe, as he could not in conſcience vote for the bill, but that Cranmer replied "He could as little in conſcience vote againſt it," and therefore ſtaid for that purpoſe.

The title of this act was, "An act for aboliſhing diverſity of opinions in certain articles concerning the Chriſtian religion." It appears from the preamble to the act, in which the articles are rehearſed, that Henry himſelf was preſent at every day's debate, and made a great parade of his learning in the houſe of peers, ſo that the parliament gave him public thanks. After rehearſing the articles, which we have already ſeen, it is enacted, "that if any, after the twelfth of July, did ſpeak, preach, or write, againſt the firſt article, they were to be judged heretics, and to be burned, without any abjuration, and to forfeit their real and perſonal eſtates to the king: and thoſe who preached, or obſtinately diſputed againſt the other articles, were to be judged felons, and to ſuffer death as felons without benefit of the clergy: and thoſe who, either in word or writing, ſpoke againſt them, were to be priſoners during the king's pleaſure, and forfeit their goods and chattels to the king for the firſt time; and if they offend ſo the ſecond time, they were to ſuffer as felons. All the marriages of prieſts are declared void; and if any prieſt did ſtill keep any ſuch woman, whom he had ſo married, and lived familiarly with her as his wife, he was to be judged a felon: and if a prieſt lived carnally with any other woman, he was, upon the firſt conviction, to forfeit his benefices, goods, and chattels, and to be impriſoned during the king's pleaſure; and upon the ſecond conviction, to ſuffer as a felon. The women ſo offending were alſo to be puniſhed in the ſame manner as the prieſts. And thoſe who contemned, or abſtained from confeſſion, or the ſacrament, at the accuſtomed times, for the firſt offence were to forfeit their goods and chattels, and be impriſoned; and for the ſecond, were to be adjudged of felony. And for the execution of this act, commiſſions were to be iſſued out to all archbiſhops and biſhops, and the chancellors and commiſſaries, and ſuch others in the ſeveral ſhires, as the king ſhould name, to hold their ſeſſions quarterly, or oftener; and they were to proceed upon preſentments and by a jury. Thoſe commiſſioners were to ſwear, that they ſhould execute their commiſſion indifferently, without favour, affection, corruption, or malice: all eccleſiaſtical incumbents were to read this act in their churches once a quarter. And in the end a proviſo was added, concerning the vows of chaſtity, that they ſhould not oblige any, except ſuch as had taken them at or above the age of twenty-one years, or had not been compelled to take them."

Such were the deteſtable articles which opened in England the flood-gates of civil murder: and now the reader is to expect, during the remainder of this reign, to meet with barbarities committed under the forms of juſtice, as deteſtable as any to be met with in profane hiſtory, and under the moſt bloody tyrants. Cranmer alone had the good fortune to weather the ſtorm of Henry's indignation, for his oppoſition to the articles; but he thought proper to ſend his wife, whom he had married in Germany, back for ſome time to her own country. The counteſs of Saliſbury, cardinal Pole (her ſon), the marchioneſs of Exeter, ſir Adrian Forteſcue, and ſir Thomas Dingley, were attainted of treaſon, as accomplices with the late marquis of Exeter: the counteſs of Saliſbury, though ſeventy years of age, behaved with great ſpirit; but upon her trial a correſpondence between her and her ſon was proved, ſome of the pope's bulls were found in her houſe, and ſhe was convicted of not ſuffering any ſervant about her to comply with the alteration introduced by the king into religion. Forteſcue and Dingley were executed, as the counteſs was two years after; but the marchioneſs died a natural death, and the cardinal kept out of Henry's reach. It appears that Cromwell drove on thoſe proſecutions very furiouſly, and aſked the judges for their opinions, whether a man might be attainted in parliament without being brought to make an anſwer? The judges anſwered, "That the parliament being the ſupreme judicature, whatever it did was law, and could not be queſtioned:" by this anſwer aboliſhing that ſacred diſtinction between an abſolute and arbitrary power.

All the religious houſes throughout England, to the number of ſix hundred and forty-five, were by this time ſuppreſſed, either by ſurrender, purchaſe, or forfeiture, ninety colleges had been demoliſhed, two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy four chantries, and one hundred and ten hoſpitals*; but all this had been done without the authority of parliament, it was therefore neceſſary to have its concurrence and ſanction, which was eaſily obtained; and Henry having formed a ſcheme for erecting ſeveral new biſhoprics, and for endowing them with the lands of diſſolved monaſteries, an act paſſed for enabling him to execute this deſign. He propoſed to found ſixteen, but having diſpoſed too laviſhly of the lands deſtined at firſt for their endowment, he erected only ſix biſhoprics, viz. of Weſtminſter, Cheſter, Oxford, Briſtol, Gloceſter, and Peterborough. There were libraries well furniſhed with books in ſeveral of the abbeys, and, out of the great regard he had for learning, he employed the famous antiquary John Leland to collect all the moſt valuable manuſcripts and choiceſt monuments of antiquity that were left in thoſe houſes. He alſo propoſed ſeveral other noble foundations, partiularly of a college for the ſtudy of the civil law, the purity of the Latin and French languages, and the knowlege of foreign affairs, to ſerve as a ſeminary for miniſters of ſtate and ambaſſadors to foreign courts. There could not be a more favourable opportunity for effecting theſe uſeful ſchemes than what now offered, but Henry's own prodigality, and the rapaciouſneſs of his courtiers, prevented this and others of his beſt deſigns.

The parliament having thus ſervilely complied with all that Henry could aſk, and having ſat to the twenty eighth of June, was then prorogued to the third of November, afterwards to the fourteenth of January, and again to the twelfth of April, in the enſuing year, when it ſat again to do buſineſs; but in the interim there fell out ſeveral events which deſerve to be related.

* The yearly value of all the ſuppreſſed houſes amounted to one hundred and ſixty-one thouſand one hundred pounds, beſides the money which aroſe from the materials of the houſes, from plate, jewels, and church-ornaments.

As

As ſoon as the parliament broke up, the ſix bloody articles were vigorouſly executed; commiſſioners were appointed in every county to detect any who ſhould be hardy enough to diſobey them. Shaxton, biſhop of Saliſbury, and Latimer, biſhop of Worceſter, reſigned their ſees rather than ſubſcribe to them; but this expedient did not deliver them from the perſecution now raiſed againſt all recuſants: they were accuſed of having ſpoken againſt the articles, and therefore were immediately committed to the Tower, after they had reſigned their inſtruments into the king's hands: the ſtrong perſonal friendſhip which Henry had for Cranmer, preſerved that prelate from the ſame treatment, though he had not only openly oppoſed them in the houſe, but even ſpoke and wrote againſt them.

The king's will was now become the ſole meaſure of the law, becauſe both the proteſtant and popiſh party cultivated his favour with the moſt abject complaiſance: Bonner, lately made biſhop of London, though in ſecret a zealous partizan of the pope's power, managed his intereſt with ſuch dexterity, that he obtained letters patent adjudging to him the ſpiritualities as well as the temporalities of his biſhopric during the king's pleaſure: and Gardiner, a moſt bigotted ſon of the Romiſh church, maintained his influence by the moſt extravagant ſubmiſſion and profound diſſimulation.

On the other hand, Cranmer and Cromwell, alarmed at the bloody ſtatutes and ſeveral other proceedings of Henry, which ſeemed to denote his attachment to the catholic faith, and finding their credit begin to decline, thought there was no method ſo effectual to recover their influence as that of perſuading the king to eſpouſe another wife, upon whoſe protection they could depend. With this view they caſt their eyes upon Anne, daughter to the duke of Cleves, and younger ſiſter to the ducheſs of Saxony. Henry was ſo well pleaſed with this propoſal, when made to him, that he employed Cromwell to negociate the marriage: the famous Hans Holbein was ordered to draw the lady's picture, and did it ſo flatteringly, that Henry grew fond of her at diſtance; in ſhort, the negociation went ſo briſkly on that the match was concluded in a few weeks; and the old duke of Cleves dying in the mean while, a counter-marriage was propoſed between the princeſs Mary of England and the young duke of Cleves; but though this marriage did not take effect, the earl of Southampton (Fitz Williams) was ordered, in November, to go with a fleet of fifty ſhips to bring over the new queen, who about the end of December this year arrived in England.

While this matter was tranſacting, and ſome time before, Henry foreſeeing a rupture between the emperor and the Proteſtants of Germany, ſent new ambaſſadors to the league of Smalcald to encourage them in their oppoſition to the houſe of Auſtria, and to promiſe he would engage in their aſſociation; but they perceiving his only drift was to amuſe them and intimidate the emperor by means of a negociation with his enemies, they frankly gave the Engliſh monarch to underſtand that they would not unite with him on any other terms than that of his accepting the Augſburg Confeſſion of Faith. They ſaid, they had heard, with great mortification, of his perſecuting their brethren in his kingdom, and in particular complained of the law of the ſix articles, the injuſtice of which Melancthon explained to him in a ſubmiſſive letter. Henry was ſhocked at the freedom of their expoſtulation; and Gardiner, who dreaded, as a fatal blow to the catholic religion, an alliance between Henry and the proteſtant princes, by flattering his maſter's vanity effectually kept alive his reſentment.

Towards the end of this year the inhabitants of Ghent mutinied, and offered to acknowlege the French king for their ſovereign, if he would protect them from the reſentment of the emperor. But Francis rejected their propoſal, which he communicated to Charles, who had by this time amuſed him ſo effectually with the promiſe of reſtoring to him the duchy of Milan, that he ventured to paſs through his dominions on the faith of a ſimple ſafe-conduct, and even viſited him at Paris, where he was received with the ſame honours which the French paid to their own ſovereign.

It was at this very period that Anne of Cleves arrived in England; and the union of this princeſs with Henry would, in all probability, have totally fruſtrated all the attempts of Gardiner and the reſt of the popiſh party for the future, had ſhe anſwered the beauty and great character given of her by her friends; but when Henry, all impatience to ſee his conſort, of whom he had entertained ſo high an idea, beheld her on her arrival at Rocheſter, whither he went for that purpoſe, he was ſo diſappointed, that he is ſaid to have ſwore in a rage, "that they had brought over a Flanders mare to him." However groſs and indelicate his expreſſions might be, his behaviour was more decent, for next day he made her a private viſit. This lady is allowed on all hands to have poſſeſſed a great ſweetneſs of temper, but as her perſon was far from being delicate, as ſhe had a maſculine turn and floridneſs of features, could ſpeak nothing but German, which Henry did not underſtand, and was extremely defective in all the winning graces of behaviour and converſation, he conceived an incurable averſion for her, and even then would abruptly have broken off the match, had not his affairs at home required the friendſhip and alliance of the German princes, her relations; theſe conſiderations, which were urged very home by Cranmer and Cromwell, made him at length conſent to proceed in the marriage, but with ſo viſible a reluctance, as made Cromwell and all his party tremble.

On the ſixth of January, 1540, the marriage was celebrated, but it ſerved only to encreaſe Henry's diſlike into downright loathing: he told Cromwell next morning, that he ſuſpected the queen was no maid, and that he could never conquer his averſion to ſo diſagreeable a partner as ſhe was; and there the matter reſted for ſome time.

Henry ſtill continuing to be alarmed at the cloſe connection that appeared to ſubſiſt between the king of France and the emperor, immediately upon Charles's departure from the French court, ſent over the duke of Norfolk with very great propoſals to Francis, if he would break with the emperor: he offered him his aſſiſtance for recovering Milan, to diſcharge all the arrears of his penſion, and to enter into a ſtrict league with him, both againſt the pope and the houſe of Auſtria: but Francis, who ſtill flattered himſelf that Charles would perform his promiſes to him, rejected all the duke's propoſals. The French monarch, however, was the the dupe of the dependence he placed on the emperor, for that prince no ſooner got into his own dominions than he made ſeveral ſhuffling excuſes in relation to beſtowing on Francis the inveſtiture of Milan; and at laſt, having ſuppreſſed the inſurrection of Ghent, flatly denied his having made any ſuch promiſe.

The parliament meeting on the twelfth of April, Cromwell opened the ſeſſions with a ſpeech, in which he informed the two houſes, that the king, in order to terminate all diſputes about religion, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the conteſted articles, that a ſtandard of faith might be eſtabliſhed upon the word of God alone; and that after the truth ſhould be thus made known to his people, he was reſolved to puniſh with the utmoſt ſeverity all thoſe who ſhould preſume to prefer their own opinions to the eſtabliſhed articles of belief. Thoſe commiſſioners, being approved by the parliament, received orders to begin their enquiry without delay: and in the mean time the king created Cromwell earl of Eſſex, upon the death of Bourchier by a fall from his horſe, and all the eſtate of that ancient and noble family went along with the title *.

But he did not long enjoy theſe ſmiles of fortune and of his prince's favour; for on the parliament's breaking up, which was prorogued to the twenty-fifth of May, the duke of Norfolk, Gardiner, and the reſt of the popiſh party, reſolved to work his ruin, hoping that his fall would facilitate a reconciliation with the pope, which Cromwell always oppoſed. They did not, however, chuſe to make this attack abruptly, but contrived to throw Catherine Howard (daughter to the lord Edmund Howard, the duke's brother), a beautiful young lady, in the king's way, who was ſtill fretting at his diſappointment with Anne of Cleves, knowing very well, that if the young lady could gain his affections, there would be no hazard in the attempt upon the obnoxious miniſter. Gardiner, at once the prieſt and the pander, took upon him the management of this affair. Catherine was brought to court; the king liked her, and the biſhop made frequent entertainments at his own houſe for the royal lover and his miſtreſs; and Henry was ſo pleaſed with her company, that ſhe won his conſent to marry her.

This new affection in Henry conſequently raiſed the duke of Norfolk's and Gardiner's credit high in the cabinet; and the king, thinking himſelf in no neceſſity to continue his negociations with the German proteſtant powers, in which Cromwell ſerved him chiefly, grew more and more cool towards that miniſter, and ſeemed pleaſed to hear any thing to his diſadvantage: the duke and the biſhop, eagerly bent upon his deſtruction, let ſlip no opportunity of blackening him in Henry's opinion. They repreſented to him, that the kingdom in general was diſſatisfied with his miniſter, who, they believed, had abuſed his majeſty's confidence; that as theſe complaints and murmurings were chiefly about religion, under the direction of the vicegerent, it would be prudent to ſatisfy the people by examining his conduct ſtrictly, and even to ſacrifice him, in order to enſure tranquility. In ſhort, theſe and the like inſinuations had ſuch an effect on Henry, that he reſolved the ruin of this too faithful ſervant, that he might make a merit of offering a ſacrifice to the public reſentment. This reſolution, however, was kept ſo ſecret, that, unſuſpecting any thing, the deſtined victim came to the council-board on the thirteenth of June, where the duke of Norfolk, by Henry's order, arreſted him for high-treaſon; and he was ſent priſoner to the Tower, where he experienced the common fate of all degraded miniſters. He was no ſooner ſeized, but forſaken by all but his friend Cranmer, who alone ventured to write to the king in his favour, though to no purpoſe; for the unfortunate Cromwell, without being heard in his own defence, was, by a bill of attainder, found guilty of divers hereſies and treaſons, and condemned to ſuffer the pains of death, as the king ſhould think proper to direct.

The fall of Cromwell was immediately followed by the diſſolution of the marriage of Henry and his new wife; a diſſolution which he had almoſt from her firſt arrival wiſhed for, not only on account of his averſion to her perſon, but becauſe he was by this time become enamoured of Catherine Howard, as already mentioned. The whole houſe of lords, with a committee of the commons, waited upon the king with an addreſs, deſiring he would order trial to be made of the validity of his marriage; and Henry complying with their requeſt (which he himſelf, indeed, put them upon making), a commiſſion was granted for trying it in convocation. They forthwith proceeded to the examination of witneſſes, including the depoſitions of the king, the members of the privy-council, a declaration under the hand of Cromwell, ſigned in the Tower, the evidence of the earl of Southampton, ſir Anthony Denny, Dr. Chambers and Dr. Butts the queen's phyſicians, and ſome of the ladies of the bed-chamber. The ſubſtance of the whole amounted to theſe particulars: that there had been a precontract between the queen and the marquis of Lorraine; that it did not appear whether theſe eſpouſals were made by the parties themſelves, or in words of the preſent tenſe; that the king, having married her againſt his will, had not given a pure, inward, and complete conſent; and that he had never conſummated the marriage.

Theſe frivolous objections were ſtrongly inſiſted on by the popiſh party; and Cranmer, being influenced by the fear of irrecoverably loſing the king's favour, yielded his aſſent, ſo that the convocation unanimouſly adjudged the marriage null; and on the ninth day of July ſentence was given for its diſſolution. On the tenth this ſentence was notified to both houſes, by whom it was approved. Then the king ſent the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Southampton, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, to intimate the tranſaction to Anne of Cleves, who expreſſed no ſort of diſſatisfaction at the divorce. They told her, the king would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted ſiſter, and give her precedency before all the ladies of England, except his own wife and daughters; that an eſtate of three thouſand pounds per annum ſhould be allotted for her maintenance; and that ſhe might either live in England, or return to her own country. She choſe

* In this ſeſſion the order of the knights of St. John of Jeruſalem was ſuppreſſed, on account of their dependence upon the pope and the emperor, and all their effects in England and Ireland confiſcated for the uſe of the king, who allotted three thouſand pounds yearly for their maintenance. About this time alſo Henry put three hoſpitals, thoſe of St. George, St. Bartholomew, and St. Thomas, together with a new abbey on Tower-hill, into the hands of the city of London.

the former, and was even prevailed upon to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, the purport of which was, to acquaint him, that ſhe had been moſt tenderly and generouſly treated by the king, whom ſhe could not juſtly have as her huſband; and conjuring him not to ſuffer any thing that had happened to her, to break the good underſtanding that ſubſiſted between the two courts. Every thing being thus ſettled, a bill was brought the next day, being the twelfth of July, into parliament, where it paſſed both houſes, for annulling the king's marriage with the queen: by this act the marriage was declared void, and it was made high-treaſon to judge or believe otherwiſe *. And here we muſt obſerve, that no one could have had the impudence to make uſe of ſuch reaſons as Henry did to bring about the divorce, without being very ſure that thoſe to whom they were offered, would be mean enough to allow their validity. The bands of juſtice and ſhame had been long broken through, and both clergy and parliament made no ſcruple of complying with every thing he thought proper to enjoin.

The parliament then proceeded to paſs ſome other acts, viz. for the attainder of the lord Hungerford and ſeveral other perſons, accuſed of plotting againſt the government and being ſacramentarians; for the regulating ſanctuaries, and reducing their number; for repealing the penalty of death denounced by the ſtatute of the Six Articles againſt incontinent prieſts and their women; for confirming what ſhould be declared to be Chriſtian doctrine by the biſhops and divines, empowered by the king's commiſſion to draw up a book intituled the Erudition of a Chriſtian man; for erecting a court of wards, and another of the firſt-fruits and tenths; with others of too ſpecial a nature to have a place here.

But we cannot avoid taking particular notice of an act paſſed at this time, which declared that all marriages ſhould be firm and good, notwithſtanding any precontract, not actually carried into conſummation. This was a very extraordinary act at this time, after two of Henry's own marriages had been diſſolved under the pretence of an unconſummated contract, ſo that it obliquely condemned the proceedings in both divorces: but we are to remember, that he had a daughter living by Anne Boleyn, whoſe legitimacy this act juſtified. The ſame act mentions, "that all marriages ſhall be lawful when not within the degrees of kindred mentioned by the law of God." This, no doubt, was made with a view to make way for Henry's marriage with Catherine Howard, who was within the degree of relation prohibited by the canon-law, being couſin-german to Anne Boleyn. The laſt act of this parliament was a general free pardon of all hereſies, treaſons, felonies, and offences, but with ſome exceptions, of which number were Cromwell, the counteſs of Saliſbury, mother to cardinal Pole, and others then in priſon †.

As Cromwell's execution had been deferred, he was in ſome hopes of obtaining his pardon, and the more, as having written the king a very ſubmiſſive letter: his majeſty was ſo moved therewith, that he cauſed it to be thrice read over to him; but the ſolicitations of Norfolk and Gardiner, ſeconded by thoſe of Catherine Howard, who acted in their favour, rendered the endeavours of the priſoner or his friends fruitleſs: a miniſter in diſgrace finds few perſons generous enough to intercede in his behalf; Cranmer was the only one who diſcharged the part of a true friend. On this occaſion he wrote a very pathetic letter to Henry, interceding for the unhappy Cromwell, declaring his firm belief of his innocence from any diſloyal meaning, and even went ſo far as to wiſh that Henry might find another counſellor equal to him in capacity, diligence, and fidelity: but the fallen favourite's ruin being reſolved on, the king ſigned a warrant for beheading him on the twenty-eighth of July.

When he was brought to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, his regard for his ſon hindered him from expatiating upon his own innocence: he thanked God for bringing him to that death for his tranſgreſſions: he acknowleged his offences againſt God and his prince, who had raiſed him from a low degree; confeſſed that he had been ſeduced, but that now he died in the catholic faith: then he deſired the byſtanders to pray for the king, the prince, and for himſelf: and having ſpent a little time at his own private devotion, ſubmitted his neck to the executioner, who mangled him in a moſt ſhocking manner. However, the care he had taken in his laſt moments to ſay nothing that might offend the king, turned to the advantage of his ſon Gregory, who was, a few months afterwards, created a peer, by the title of lord Cromwell: the office of vicar-general died with Cromwell, no one deſiring a poſt ſo obnoxious to envy, and ſo fatal to the firſt poſſeſſor. It now remains to ſay ſomewhat concerning the riſe and character of this great miniſter.

Thomas Cromwell was born at Putney, in Surry, about five miles from London; his father was no better than a country blackſmith; but he being bleſſed with a ſprightly genius and a ready capacity to learn languages, acquired ſo great reputation in the art of war under the duke of Bourbon, whom he accompanied at the ſacking of Rome in 1527, and ſkill in the modern tongues, and intereſts of the ſtates through which he travelled, as, upon his return, recommended him to the favour and ſervice of cardinal Wolſey. He was retained in the cardinal's ſervice in quality of a ſolicitor, and diſcharged that office with ſo much integrity, reſolution, and gratitude to his patron, that, after the cardinal's diſgrace and death, the king, notwithſtanding he had oppoſed him, by defending his maſter in the houſe of commons againſt the articles of impeachment, eſteemed him a proper agent for himſelf in more important affairs, and voluntary retained him in his ſervice. Mr. Cromwell ſoon improved the royal favour to his own advantage, for the king, who took a pleaſure in raiſing men of low birth to great honours, being highly ſatisfied with the management of the affairs committed to him, declared him a privy-counſellor and maſter of the jewel-houſe, in 1531; and next year raiſed him to be clerk of the hanaper and chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1534, he was appointed principal ſecretary of ſtate and maſter of the Rolls; and in 1535, he was created viſitor general, to inſpect the eſtates and abuſes of the monks, friars, and nuns, in order to the ſuppreſſion of their houſes; he was afterwards nominated the king's vicar-general over all the ſpiritualities under his majeſty as ſupreme head of the church; in virtue of which commiſſion he had the ſuperintendency of all the biſhops and ſecular as well as regular clergy in the kingdom. On the ſecond of July, 1536, he was ſworn in lord-keeper of the privy-ſeal; and on the ninth of the ſame month was advanced to the dignity of a baron of England, with the ſtyle and title of lord Cromwell, baron of Oakham, in the county of Rutland. In 1537, he accepted of the office of chief-juſtice itinerant of all the foreſts beyond Trent; and the twenty-ſixth of Auguſt, in the ſame year, he was honoured with the Garter. In 1538 he obtained the conſtableſhip of Cariſbroke caſtle, in the Iſle of Wight, beſides many other grants from the crown, and a grant of the caſtle and lordſhip of Oakham. In 1540, on the ſeventeenth of April, he was created earl of Eſſex, and ſoon after he was made lord high-chamberlain of England.

Cromwell's chief fault was an exceſs of obſequiouſneſs to the king's pleaſure, the effect of an inordinate zeal for his maſter's ſervice: in other reſpects he is ſcarce ſufficiently to be admired for his prodigious parts, excellent judgment, infinite application to buſineſs, wonderful dexterity in managing affairs, great moderation in the exerciſe of his authority, calmneſs of temper in his dealings with all perſons, and under provocations ſufficient to ruffle the ſedateſt perſons, an uncommon generoſity and nobleneſs of mind, notwithſtanding the meanneſs of his extraction, and for an unexampled condecenſion in the height of his pomp, vouchſafing to take notice of his old acquaintance, and ſhew his gratitude for favours received.

Some few days after Cromwell's death, Henry gave a terrible inſtance of that cruelty which ſeemed to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul: papiſts and reformers were alike the objects of this infernal paſſion, and ſuffered in the ſame flames. Dr. Barnes, who had made a figure in an embaſſy to the German princes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming miniſter, and a favourite with the late queen Anne, and William Jerom, vicar of Stepney, who had been, unheard, attainted of hereſy by the parliament, and were now condemned to the ſtake; but when they came there, neither they nor the ſheriff knew for what they ſuffered. Along with them were executed Gregory Buttolph, Adam Damplip, Edmund Brinholme, and Clement Philpot (all bigotted papiſts), for denying the king's ſupremacy.

On the eighth of Auguſt Catherine Howard was declared queen of England, having been for ſome time privately married to Henry. By this marriage the popiſh intereſt was ſtrengthened, and that party made a ſtrong puſh at Cranmer; but Henry's affection for him was ſo unmoveable that the plot miſcarried: though it is highly probable, that, had not the queen's intereſt been broken by her incontinency, Cranmer would have followed Cromwell.

All this time Henry was intent upon the reformation he propoſed in religion; the commiſſioners appointed to draw up a declaration of the Chriſtian doctrine, under the title of the Neceſſary Erudition of a Chriſtian Man, preſented their book to the king, who ordered it to be immediately publiſhed, and it was, by the royal authority, recommended to all perſons as a rule for directing their belief and practice. Of the contents of this book, we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in another place.

About the end of this year there were ſome beginnings of a miſunderſtanding between Francis and Henry, which at length terminated in a war. Francis had ordered a fortreſs to be built at Ardres, and a bridge to be made over to the Engliſh pale. But the lord Maltravers, governor of Calais, not ſuffering this encroachment, ſent a detachment of his garriſon, and beat down the bridge. The French rebuilt it, and the Engliſh demoliſhed it a ſecond time: whereupon Francis ordering the marſhal de Biez to raiſe troops in Picardy in order to ſupport the operations of his people, Henry ſent a reinforcement to the garriſon of Calais, under the command of Henry Howard, earl of Surry, William Fitz Williams, earl of Southampton, and John, lord Ruſſel, who alſo took with them fifteen hundred workmen, to repair the walls and fortification of Guiſnes. But the two kings, willing to avoid a rupture on ſo ſlight an occaſion, it was agreed to name commiſſioners for ending all differences: the earl of Hertford and ſir Edward Karne were appointed by Henry; but, after repeated meetings with the French commiſſioners, neither party receiving any ſatisfaction, each provided for their defence in caſe of an attack.

Francis was much on the ſame terms with the emperor, who, after refuſing to perform his promiſe in regard to his giving up to Francis the Milaneſe, had offered his eldeſt daughter in marriage to the duke of Orleans, with Flanders to her fortune, with the title of king; but Francis, who followed his humour or reſentment rather than the maxims of good policy, was reſolved to accept of no equivalent for the Milaneſe, which he conſidered as his lawful inheritance: this revived the animoſity between thoſe princes to a higher degree than ever; and Francis ſoon had new provocation given him, for having ſent ambaſſadors to the courts of Conſtantinople and Venice, as they ſailed down the Po in a boat, they were aſſaſſinated by the orders of the marquis del Vaſco, governor of Milan. The French king complained loudly of this outrage, for which, however, Charles refuſed to give him ſatisfaction. A war now appeared unavoidable, and both ſides prepared for it, fortifying themſelves with new alliances; but Francis not being ready, and the emperor engaged in an expedition againſt Algiers, it did not break out for ſome time. Such was the general ſtate of things at the end of the year 1540.

But, before we proceed to the tranſactions which mark the ſucceeding year, it will be neceſſary to take notice, that the reformation intended in England, had, by Henry's orders, been carried over to Ireland, where it met with ſtrong oppoſition from the papiſts; but in a parliament held at Dublin, in December, 1537, under the lord Grey, who was appointed by Henry his lieutenant in that kingdom, the king's ſupremacy was there eſtabliſhed in the ſame manner as in England, and the biſhop of Rome's authority aboliſhed: but the efforts which the government made for this purpoſe were ſo generally diſguſtful to the people, that it appears, by a letter from Brown, archbiſhop of Dublin, to ſecretary Cromwell, that there was a very dangerous correſpondence carried on betwixt the native Iriſh and the Romiſh powers on the continent. This broke out, in the year 1539, into a general inſurrection, rection under O Neil, who profeſſed himſelf a champion for the old religion; but the deputy (lord Grey) being aſſiſted by ſome Engliſh forces, ſent from Cheſhire, defeated the rebels in a pitched battle, which reſtored the peace of the country for ſome time. The lord Grey's enemies, however, prevailed on Henry, this year (1540), to ſend him to the Tower, on a charge of malverſation and treaſonable correſpondence, and he ſuffered death in the beginning of the enſuing year.

We now return to the affairs of England, where Henry, being alarmed by frequent inſurrections from the popiſh faction, eſpecially in the North, reſolved to ſtrike a terror into their minds, by making them a bloody viſit in perſon: he accordingly, in the beginning of the year 1541, gave orders for a progreſs into Yorkſhire. But, before his ſetting out, the old counteſs of Saliſbury, then upwards of ſeventy, was, without the leaſt regard to her ſex, high rank, or years, brought to the ſcaffold, on the twenty-ſeventh of May, for holding a correſpondence with her ſon, cardinal Pole. The fate of this unhappy princeſs, who underwent her ſentence with unparalleled magnanimity, drew tears from every eye but thoſe of the obdurate Henry.

This execution, or rather barbarous murder being over, Henry ſet out on his progreſs for the North, where the terror of his preſence ſtruck all oppoſition dead at his feet. The people of Lincolnſhire, who had been lately unruly, ſought to appeaſe his anger by a ſum of money, which they offered as a propitiation for their miſdemeanors; and the Yorkſhiremen imitated their example: Henry accepted of the commutation, and, after a few executions of thoſe who had been moſt active in raiſing diſturbances, took the reſt into his favour. And now reflecting, that by his late proceedings he had expoſed himſelf to the reſentment of all the catholic princes of Europe, who would not fail to take the firſt opportunity of making him feel the effect of their vengeance, he reſolved, if poſſible, to ſtrengthen his alliance with his nephew, James V. of Scotland, that, in caſe of a rupture with any other potentate, he might at leaſt be ſecure from any attempts on his dominions from ſo near a neighbour.

With this view he ſent ſir Ralph Sadler to Edinburgh, to propoſe to James an interview at York; but cardinal Beaton, and the reſt of the Scottiſh prelates, took care to prevent a meeting, which they imagined would prove fatal to the clergy of Scotland: they were apprehenſive that Henry might, in a perſonal conference, prevail upon his nephew to take the ſame ſteps with himſelf, by ſeizing the monaſteries and other eccleſiaſtical emoluments into his own hands; and therefore they uſed not only all the credit which they had with their maſter, as being his miniſters, and employed by him in all his affairs, but alſo made him the largeſt promiſes, to divert him from entering into an engagement with Henry. James, tempted by the aſſurance of thirty thouſand crowns a year to be duly paid him by the clergy, who were ready in any difficulty to aſſiſt him with all their fortunes, and by the proſpect of upwards of one hundred thouſand crowns a year which they undertook to raiſe for him, by the forfeitures of heretics, refuſed to come to the interview, which was conſidered as a plain declaration of a hoſtile diſpoſition, and that he intended to break with his uncle. Henry, diſappointed, deluded, and full of reſentment, quitted York about the latter end of September, and, continuing his progreſs through ſeveral counties, returned to London, where he met with a cauſe of ſtill greater uneaſineſs.

Henry had left the lord-chancellor Audley and the earl of Hertford to manage his affairs in London during his progreſs. While he was at York, one Laſcelles gave the archbiſhop information, that the queen, in the former part of her life, had been little better than a common ſtrumpet: to confirm this, Laſcelles offered to produce the evidence of his ſiſter, who had been a ſervant in the old ducheſs of Norfolk's houſe, where the queen had been educated, and had continued a criminal intrigue with two ſervants at the ſame houſe, Derham and Mannock. Cranmer was naturally rouſed by this information, eſpecially as it regarded a perſon whom he knew to be the profeſſed foe to his principles and perſon; but the point was extremely delicate, and the ſmalleſt trip might ruin him; he therefore laid the matter before the lord-chancellor and the earl of Hertford, and they were of opinion that he ſhould acquaint the king with it. As the matter was of ſuch a delicate nature that he could not well expreſs it by word of mouth, he drew up the account in writing, and, on the ſecond of November, preſented it to his majeſty, the court being by this time returned to London.

Henry, who had pretended a wonderful ſagacity on this ſubject in the caſe of Anne of Cleves, had not diſcovered any want of virginity in Catherine Howard, and was ſtill ſo much in love with her, that he had even put up a prayer in his chapel, returning thanks to God for the felicity he enjoyed in the conjugal ſtate; and even ordered the biſhop of Lincoln, his confeſſor, to compoſe a form of thankſgiving for that purpoſe. No words can expreſs his ſurprize and trouble when he received the archbiſhop's relation of the queen's infamy, and was ſo fully convinced of his conſort's fidelity, that he at firſt gave no credit to the information, and ſaid to the lord privy-ſeal, the lord-admiral, ſir Anthony Brown, and ſir Thomas Wriotheſley, that he looked upon the whole to be a malicious forgery; but as he could not reſt till he knew the certainty of the matter, he would have it enquired into, with ſuch precautions as might preſerve the queen from any ſcandal if ſhe were innocent: it was therefore reſolved that the lord privy-ſeal ſhould examine Laſcelles, which he did, and found him ſteady in his information. The ſame nobleman next, by Henry's orders, found means to examine the ſiſter of Laſcelles, and arreſt Derham and Mannock. All this being done, the probability of the charge grew ſtronger every day; the woman confirmed her teſtimony by undeniable evidence and circumſtances: Derham confeſſed repeated acts of impurity with the queen before her marriage; Mannock did the ſame; and it was proved, that even ſince her marriage ſhe had paſſed a whole night in her bed-chamber with one Culpepper, to whom ſhe had made ſome preſents.

It was with an inconceivable grief, and ſuch an agonizing diſtraction of mind as, barring all utterance of ſpeech, found vent only in a torrent of tears, that Henry received the report of the examinations. Archbiſhop Cranmer, the lord-chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suſſex, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, being appointed to interrogate the queen on the ſubject, ſhe at firſt denied all; but finding them fully apprized of her practices, ſhe confeſſed the whole to the archbiſhop, and the confeſſion being put into writing, ſhe ſigned it with her own hand. The lady Rochford particularly, the ſame who had been ſo inſtrumental in the death of queen Anne Boleyn, was found to have been an inſtrument in the queen's abominable lewdneſs, and both of them were at the ſame time ſent to the Tower, and the reſt of their accomplices to different priſons. Agnes, the old ducheſs of Norfolk, was ſent to priſon as being privy to the queen's crimes; the counteſs of Bridgwater, the lord William Howard (then Henry's ambaſſador in France, but recalled on this occaſion) and his lady *, four other men, and five women, were all committed to priſon likewiſe; and it was reſolved to proceed againſt them for miſpriſion of treaſon.

interrogate

Any other perſon but Henry would have been weary of continually expoſing the real or pretended infamy of his family; but he, on the contrary, determined to make it as public as poſſible; and being ſenſible that the beſt and readieſt method to take vengeance on thoſe who had offended him, would be to convoke a parliament, the uſual inſtrument of his tyranny, orders were iſſued for it to aſſemble on the ſixteenth of January of the following year, 1542.

The parliament being ſat down, the lord-chancellor made a motion in the houſe of lords, to take into conſideration Henry's caſe through his queen's lewdneſs: this produced an act, in form of a petition, in which, after deſiring the king not to be grieved at this misfortune, they requeſted that the queen and her accomplices, with her procureſs the lady Rochford, might be attainted of high-treaſon; and that all thoſe who knew of the queen's vicious life before her marriage, and had concealed it, as the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk, and the other noble and common perſonages above-mentioned, who were already impriſoned, might be attainted of miſpriſion of treaſon.

It was alſo enacted, "That whoever ſhould know any thing of the incontinence of the queen (for the time being), ſhould reveal it with all poſſible ſpeed, under the pains of treaſon. And if the king, or his ſucceſſors, ſhould incline to marry any woman whom they took to be a pure and clean maid, if ſhe, not being ſo, did not declare the ſame to the king, it ſhould be high treaſon; and all who knew it, and did not reveal it, ſhould be guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon. And that if the queen, or the prince's wife, ſhould procure any perſon, by meſſages or words, to have criminal converſation with her, or any other by words or meſſages ſhould ſolicit them, they, their counſellors and abettors, ſhould be adjudged traitors."

In conſequence of this remarkable act, the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded on Tower-hill, on the twelfth of February, about ſeven months after ſhe had been married to the king. The queen confeſſed the miſconduct of her former life, but endeavoured to perſuade the world that ſhe had always been faithful ſince her marriage, with regard to the king. As for lady Rochford, every one looked upon her execution as a judgment of Heaven for her having been the principal inſtrument of the death of Anne Boleyn, her ſiſter-in-law, and of her own huſband; and this notorious inſtance of her profligate life tended much to clear their characters in the opinion of the world. As to the ducheſs dowager of Norfolk and the others attainted of miſpriſion of treaſon, the king was pleaſed to pardon them, and by degrees diſcharge them from their confinements. Derham was hanged; Mannock got off by giving up his eſtate, which was very conſiderable; and the other criminals were ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment.

Thoſe examples being made, the parliament proceeded to other regulations, which will be found under the head of Laws, at the end of this period. But the moſt diſtinguiſhed act of this parliament was that which paſſed on the twenty-third of January, declaring Henry to be King inſtead of Lord of Ireland; and the proclamation notifying this alteration of his ſtyle was read in the houſe of peers. This ſeems in its effects to have been a very politic ſtep; for whether the Iriſh chieftains had been much weakened before, or thought it more ſuitable to their notions of honour to yield obedience and own a ſubordination to the royal dignity, James, earl of Deſmond, coming over in the ſummer to England, made his ſubmiſſion; and his example was ſoon followed by the heads of ſeveral ſepts, or tribes, who were content to take titles of honour after the Engliſh manner. Thus William de Burgh, or Bourk, was created baron of Dunkellyn and earl of Clanricard; Mawer O Brien, earl of Thomond; and his ſon, Conat O Brien, lord of Ibrackain; Connac O Neil was made earl of Tyrone; and his ſon Matthew, lord of Dungannon.

This parliament, before it ſeparated, willing to approve itſelf as pliant to the king's will as we have ſhewn the laſt to have been, paſſed an act to annul all the local ſtatutes of colleges and hoſpitals, and to abſolve all the governors, preſidents, and fellows of them from their oath of obedience to the ſame, becauſe the king wanted to ſeize upon them, as he had done the abbeys: accordingly ſome of them were ſurrendered into his hands; but a more expeditious method was taken in the ſequel. The parliament, having now anſwered all the king's purpoſes, was prorogued on the firſt day of April to the third of November following.

* Rapin, by miſtake, ſuppoſes theſe to be her father and mother, whereas they were her uncle and aunt: her father was the lord Edmund Howard. As the family of the Howards ſpread themſelves into ſeveral branches, in order to prevent confuſion, it will be proper to inſert here a ſhort genealogical account of that family, which ſhall be carried on in due time. Sir Robert Howard (temp. Hen. VI.) married Margaret, daughter and coheir to Thomas de Mowbray, duke of Norfolk) by whom he had John, created duke of Norfolk the twenty-eighth of June, 1 Ric. III. (and ſlain afterwards, at Boſworth fight, who married firſt, Catherine, daughter of William, lord Molins; by whom he had Thomas, created earl of Surry 1 Rich. III. and reſtored to the ſame title 4 Hen. VII. and to that of duke of Norfolk 5 Hen. VIII. ſecondly, Margaret, daughter of ſir John Chedworth. The ſaid Thomas married firſt Elizabeth, daughter and ſole heir of ſir Frederick Tilney; by whom he had Thomas, the third duke of Norfolk; ſir Edward, knight of the Garter, and high admiral; and Edmund, father to this queen Catherine. His ſecond wife was Agnes, ſiſter and heir of ſir Philip Tilney; by whom he had William, created Baron of Effingham, the eleventh day of March, (1 Mary); and Thomas, who died in the Tower, 1527, where he was confined on account of Margaret Douglas, daughter of the queen of Scotland. Dugdale's Baron. vol. II. p. 265, 278.

During theſe tranſactions Henry was meditating vengeance on the king of Scotland for the affront which he had received from that monarch in the affair of the interview, and finding he was in a condition to make himſelf reſpected, by the ſubſidies and privileges granted in the laſt parliament, he reſolved to loſe no time to carry his deſigns into execution; but firſt of all he endeavoured to tie up the hands of the king of France, by propoſing the renewal of the treaty of perpetual peace with England, that Francis might not be able to aſſiſt the king of Scotland as uſual. For this purpoſe Paget, an able miniſter, was ſent over to the court of France with very flattering offers; but Francis ſoon dived into the deſign of this negociation, and, without mentioning the king of Scotland, whom he was reſolved not to abandon in time of need, embarraſſed Henry with a reciprocal demand of his aſſiſtance to recover the Milaneſe, purſuant to former treaties: to which Henry replied, that he was ready ſo to do whenſoever Francis ſhould fulfil his engagement of aboliſhing the papal authority in France. In ſhort, this embaſſy, inſtead of ſtrengthening former treaties, ſeemed only to open the breach; and, from the numerous altercations, it is plain there could be no friendſhip between the two courts. In the mean time the emperor, having loſt his fleet and army before Algiers, Francis reſolved to take advantage of his diſtreſs, and this year he invaded, by four different places, the territories of Charles; but the ſucceſs of the campaign fell far ſhort, upon the whole, of what he expected from it.

As for Henry, finding that the king of France was not to be lured over to his purpoſe, he reſolved to act of himſelf; and, concealing his real motives, which were to oblige Scotland to renounce the pope's authority, he revived the old pretenſions of the kings of England to the ſovereignty of Scotland; he alſo pretended a violation of the truce by king James's denial of ſome lands of ſmall value on the frontier, and his having given an aſylum to ſome Engliſh rebels. Theſe particulars were pompouſly ſet forth in a manifeſto, but not publiſhed till his army was juſt ready to enter Scotland, in order that he might take the Scots unprepared: however, James ſoon got notice of the levies making in England; and his reſentment againſt Henry's proceedings was kept alive and heightened by the French ambaſſador, who brought with him ſupplies of men and money, and was extremely laviſh in the promiſes he made in his maſter's name.

About the beginning of October, and not before, Henry having raiſed an army of thirty thouſand men, gave the command of them to the duke of Norfolk as his lieutenant-general, who rendezvouſed his forces at Newcaſtle. The earl of Southampton (Fitz Williams) was appointed to command the van; but he died at Newcaſtle, univerſally regretted for his great abilities as a ſtateſman, and his approved courage and ſkill as an admiral and general. On the twenty-firſt of October the Engliſh entered Scotland, when they were met by an herald from James, who expoſtulated upon the injuſtice of ſuch an invaſion, before any war was proclaimed; but the duke, regardleſs of theſe remonſtrances, ravaged all the country bordering on the Tweed, and retired to Berwick, on account of the ſeverity of the ſeaſon. George Gordon, earl of Huntley, had been ſent by James, with a body of ten thouſand men, to oppoſe theſe depredations; but he was ſo inferior in force to the Engliſh, that he was obliged to act upon the defenſive.

James in the mean time having levied an army of fifteen thouſand men, with a train of artillery, appointed the lord Maxwell, warden of the Weſt Marches of Scotland, his general, and determined to invade England on the weſtern ſide of the Solway Firth. Thither the Scottiſh monarch repaired in perſon; but he ſoon left the field, after having conferred the chief command upon his favourite, Oliver, lord Sinclair, an upſtart nobleman, who was mortally hated by all the old nobility, who, on this occaſion, choſe rather to ſacrifice their king, their country, and their own honour, than ſuffer the diſparagement offered to them in putting ſuch a perſon over their heads: in a word, when Sinclair read his commiſſion in the front of the army, the officers declared they would not ſerve under him, and the troops, following their example, threw down their arms, while all was uproar and confuſion through the ranks. All the Engliſh forces in a condition to oppoſe the Scottiſh army did not amount to above five hundred, then under ſir Thomas Wharton, the baſtard Dacres, and Muſgrave; but this handful was formed into a hovering party, to obſerve the motions of the Scots; and ſeeing them ſuddenly break their ranks, and fall into a general diſorder, they charged them with ſuch fury, that the Scots, having no one to head them, and thinking that the duke of Norfolk, with his whole army, was at hand, fell into an entire rout, while the Engliſh, improving the advantage the enemy's panic offered them, purſued with great ardour, and, with very little or no oppoſition, took the earls of Caſſils and Glencairn, the lords Maxwell, Fleming, Somerville, Gray, the general Sinclair, with about two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred common ſoldiers with all their baggage and artillery.

This rout, or rather defeat, happened at a place called Solway Moſs, near Carliſle. James was then at Caerlevaroc, where he received the mournful intelligence of the ſlaughter, captivity, and diſperſion of his army: this unexpected account ſo affected his ſpirits, that he betook himſelf to his bed. News being brought him, that his queen was delivered of a daughter, it increaſed his melancholy, which finiſhed his life on the fourteenth day of December, twenty-four days after the fatal field of Solway Moſs, leaving behind him his new-born daughter Mary, heireſs of the Scottiſh throne.

The death of king James, and the birth of a daughter, heireſs to a kingdom, whoſe friendſhip was of ſo much importance to England, gave a new turn to Henry's counſels: he wiſely forbore driving the Scots to deſpair, by taking any ſevere advantages of his late victory; on the contrary, he formed a ſcheme for uniting the two kingdoms by means of a match been Edward, prince of Wales, and the young queen of Scotland. With this view he ordered his miniſters to ſound the inclinations of the Scottiſh priſoners on the ſubject, and finding them well diſpoſed to encourage ſuch a project, he ſet them at liberty, on condition that they ſhould return to London, in caſe it could not be effected. Together with them, Henry ſent ſir Ralph Sadler, with private inſtructions for gaining over the government of Scotland in favour of the match; the earl of Angus and his brother alſo returned back to their their own country, after having lived as refugees at the Engliſh court.

The parliament of England meeting the twenty-ſecond of January, 1543, were ſo well pleaſed with the ſucceſs of the king's arms againſt the Scots, that they granted him a very conſiderable ſubſidy, as well for defraying his charges in the war as for his other occaſions Then they paſſed an act, permitting the nobility, gentry, and merchants to have Engliſh Bibles in their houſes, together with certain other religious books mentioned in the ſtatute, for the inſtruction of their families. This law, which was procured by the intereſt of Cranmer, contained a clauſe that mitigated the puniſhment of thoſe who ſhould be charged with hereſy: but the parliament impowered his majeſty to repeal or change this act as he ſhould find it expedient.

The behaviour of Francis to Henry's ambaſſadors had ſo diſſatisfied the latter, that, thinking himſelf ſure of Scotland, from the late victory and the meaſures he had taken upon the death of James, he determined to enter into a league with the emperor, the mortal enemy of France, that he might convince the French monarch how impoliticly he had acted in ſhewing ſo little regard to his offers. Accordingly, on the eleventh of February this year, a few days after the breaking up of the ſeſſion of parliament, a treaty was concluded at London: it contained a league for England, only with what Henry held in Picardy; and on the part of Charles, for the provinces of the Low Countries under his dominion *, without any mention of Spain or Germany. The league was to this effect:

"That the emperor and the king of England ſhould ſend ambaſſadors to the king of France, to declare to him, that by his ſolicitations only the Turks had inveſted Chriſtendom; that therefore the two confederate monarchs exhorted him to break his alliance with the Infidels, to hold them for enemies, and renounce his correſpondence with them; that they demanded, moreover, he ſhould ſatisfy the damages done to Chriſtendom by calling in thoſe cruel enemies; that he ſhould give over the war he had begun in ſeveral places, that the emperor might apply himſelf to the defence of Chriſtendom; that he ſhould cauſe the town of Muran, taken by the Turks, to be reſtored to king Ferdinand, and to the emperor Caſtro Novo, which they had beſieged with the aid of twelve French gallies; that he ſhould repair the loſſes the Germans had ſuſtained by the Turkiſh invaſion: laſtly, that he ſhould ſatisfy the king of England for whatever he owed him, and give him ſecurity for the payment of the hundred thouſand crowns."

After theſe preliminaries, the two confederate monarchs agreed, that they would not make peace or truce but upon theſe conditions: "that Francis ſhould pay the king of England whatever was due to him; and, for ſecurity of the annual penſion, ſurrender into his hands the earldom of Ponthieu, Montreuil, Ardres, and Terouenne, free from all homage; for which however Henry ſhould conſent that the yearly revenues thence ariſing ſhould be in lieu of the penſion: moreover, that Francis ſhould reſtore to the emperor the duchy of Burgundy.

"That if the king of France ſhould delay but ten days to accept theſe conditions, the two confederate monarchs ſhould proclaim war againſt him, with a declaration that they would never make peace till the king of England was in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Guienne, and the kingdom of France; and the emperor, of Abbeville, Amiens, Bray, Corbeil, Peronne, Ham, St. Quintin, and the whole duchy of Burgundy.

"Laſtly they agreed that each ſhould take the field, and invade France with twenty-five thouſand men, of whom five thouſand ſhould be cavalry: and alſo each of them ſhould fit out ſhips, with two or three thouſand armed men †."

One of Henry's chief views in this league with the emperor, was to carry his deſigns upon Scotland into execution; but there he found, much againſt his expectations, irreſiſtible obſtacles. The Scottiſh priſoners, upon their return home, found that unhappy country involved in the greateſt confuſion: the next heir to the crown (upon the untimely death of James V.) after young Mary, was James Hamilton, earl of Arran, a nobleman of a weak capacity and a peaceable diſpoſition; he was a friend to the reformed religion, but altogether unqualified for the management of public affairs; but the friends of the new religion, which were pretty numerous in Scotland, exhorted him to claim the regency by virtue of his proximity of blood; and, thus encouraged, he reſolved to demand it at the meeting of the next parliament.

But this was violently oppoſed by the popiſh faction under cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, a prieſt of unpopular manners and a perſecuting ſpirit; he had been dignified by the pope, to procure him greater reverence from the people and the greater ſway with his maſter, whom he kept firm to the ſee of Rome; he therefore naturally attached himſelf to the French intereſt, in oppoſition to the Engliſh, and was ſupported by the queen-mother, who was ſiſter to the duke of Guiſe, and a zealous papiſt. Beaton had, upon the death of James, publiſhed his will (which the Scots ſay was forged), by which that prince left the government to him, jointly with the earls of Argyll, Huntley, and Murray, during his daughter's minority; but the nation, not bearing to ſee a prieſt at the helm of affairs, on the meeting of their parliament, in the beginning of this year, choſe the earl of Arran ſole regent: and the will produced by Beaton was ſet aſide.

Sir Ralph Sadler, who had accompanied the captive noblemen from England, as Henry's envoy to the Scottiſh parliament, propoſed to that aſſembly the marriage between prince Edward and their young queen. This propoſal was ſo warmly ſupported by the Engliſh party in Scotland, that, after a long debate it was accepted, and the parliament appointed the earl of Angus, his brother ſir William Douglas, and ſome other perſons, to conduct the treaty of marriage and peace, which was concluded on the firſt day of July, importing, "that the young queen ſhould be brought into England, as ſoon as ſhe ſhould have attained the tenth year of her age; and that in the mean time the Scottiſh parliament ſhould ſend three hoſtages of diſtinction to reſide in London till the nuptials ſhould be completed: that the kingdom of Scotland ſhould be ſtill called by that name, and enjoy all its laws and lawful liberties, as they had been always juſtly and uninterruptedly maintained, obſerved, and approved of by the ſaid kingdom of Scotland: and laſtly, that the regent, the earl of Arran, ſhould be accountable to the prince of Wales for all his intromiſſions of the revenues of Scotland, after deducting the neceſſary expences for the queen's maintenance*.

But though Henry's party had thus carried it in the parliament of Scotland for a peace with England and the propoſed marriage, yet all their projects were rendered abortive by the intrigues of cardinal Beaton, who, by means of a large ſum of money which he received from the clergy, who apprehended their ſuperſtition was in danger, ſhould this event take place, gained over ſuch a number of partizans, that the people in general exclaimed againſt the treaty with England as a union which would be productive of their own ſlavery. The Engliſh ambaſſador was inſulted by the populace to the hazard of his life; and the regent had no longer any power to give him ſatisfaction, much leſs to ſend the hoſtages ſtipulated in the treaty. Sadler, foreſeeing the conſequence of theſe proceedings, ſummoned the priſoners to return to England according to their promiſe; but none of them had ſo much honour to perfom their engagements, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Caſſils, whoſe noble behaviour ſo pleaſed Henry, that he loaded him with preſents, and diſmiſſed him without ranſom; at the ſame time he was ſo highly incenſed at the perfidy of the other priſoners, the affront offered to his envoy, and the clamour raiſed by Beaton and his adherents againſt the Engliſh alliance, that he reſolved without delay to declare war againſt Scotland.

Mean while the queen dowager and the cardinal, to ſtrengthen their intereſt againſt the party of the Hamiltons, perſuaded Matthew Stuart, earl of Lenox to return from France, where he had reſided ſome time, aſſuring him that he ſhould eſpouſe the queen-dowager, and, in caſe of the infant Mary's death, be advanced to the throne in preference to Arran, whoſe legitimacy was liable to ſome objections. Tempted by this project, the earl of Lenox repaired to Scotland, and, on his arrival, conſented to the breaking off the match between the queen and the prince of Wales, and aſſembled a body of men, in order to wreſt the young queen from the hands of the regent, who, either unable or unwilling to contend with his enemies, propoſed an accommodation, which was effected. And now the queen and the cardinal, who had gained this important point, and had no farther occaſion for Lenox, wrote to the king of France to recall him into that kingdom; which coming to the earl's knowlege, as alſo that a conſpiracy was formed againſt his life, in caſe he ſhould continue his ſtay in Scotland, quitted the court ſuddenly, and withdrew to his caſtle of Dumbarton; and the following year he threw himſelf into the arms of the Engliſh.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, Henry, notwithſtanding the many misfortunes he had met with in his former marriages, ventured once more to enter into that ſtate by eſpouſing a ſixth wife, in the perſon of Catherine Parr, widow to Neville, lord Latimer, and daughter to ſir Thomas Parr, of Kendal. The marriage was conſummated on the twelfth of July. The new queen was a favourer of the reformed, but ſhe had the mortification to behold, a very few days after the celebration of her nuptials, a freſh proſecution commenced againſt her own party, three of whom, Anthony Perſonne, a prieſt, Robert Teſtwood, a ſinging-man, and Henry Fulmer, a taylor, at the inſtigation of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, were burned at Windſor, for reading the writings of the reformed; nor dared Catherine interceed for them. But while the bloody Gardiner, ſupported by his ſtill more bloody maſter, was thus perſecuting the reformers, his own German ſecretary was convicted of denying the king's ſupremacy, and executed. This ſeems to have been done with a view of Henry's continuing his character of impartial cruelty to proteſtants as well as papiſts. The reſt of this year was ſpent in immenſe preparations for the enſuing campaign; and we are told, that, upon this occaſion, caſt pieces of iron cannon and mortars were firſt made in England, at Buckſtead, in Suſſex, by Peter Baud, Ralph Hoge, and Peter Van Colen, Flemiſh artificers ‡. On the twenty-third of December, the king, to ſhew his great regard for the queen, who, by her extraordinary tenderneſs and ſubmiſſion to his will, daily gained upon his affections, created her brother, the lord Parr, earl of Eſſex; and her uncle, ſir William Parr, was made chamberlain of her houſhold, with the title of lord Parr of Horton.

While theſe things paſſed in England, the war between the emperor and the king of France was carrying on in ſeveral places. In the beginning of the ſpring of this year, Francis gained ſome advantages in the Low Countries, where he took Landrecy, Emery, Bapanume, Maubeuge, and Luxemburgh; but Charles arriving, about the end of the ſummer, with a ſtrong ſupply of Spaniſh troops, Francis, being inferior in numbers, was obliged to keep upon the defenſive. This gave the emperor an opportunity to inveſt Landrecy, of which, however, he was forced to raiſe the ſiege, upon Francis's finding means to throw in ſuccours; but he made himſelf amends by taking Cambray. At the ſame time Barbaroſſa, admiral of the Turks, coming to Marſeilles with an hundred and ten Turkiſh gallies, found there the count d'Enghien, of the houſe of Bourbon, with two-and-twenty French gallies, and they both ſailed together, and attacked Nice on the tenth of Auguſt, and on the twentieth became maſters of the town; but the caſtle made ſo brave a defence, that the Turkiſh admiral, finding he loſt both time and reputation before the place, retired and wintered in Provence, from whence he returned to Turky in the beginning of the following year †. As for Henry, during the whole campaign, he aſſiſted the emperor only with a ſmall body of troops, under the command of ſir John Wallop, who left Calais on the twenty-ſecond of July, and had the good fortune, after ravaging all the French lands through which they paſſed, to join the Imperial army while it lay, with Charles at its head, before Landrecy: but they both formed vaſt projects the next year, and it was reſolved that both

both together ſhould raiſe an army of ninety thouſand foot and twenty thouſand horſe; that Henry ſhould enter France by the way of Picardy, and Charles by that of Champagne; and that both armies ſhould join in a certain place and march directly to the gates of Paris: but the ſequel will ſhew us, that the emperor's views in this alliance were very different what he profeſſed, and that at the bottom he only wanted to make Henry his dupe.

The parliament meeting on the fourteenth of January, 1544, its firſt act was to regulate the different degrees of thoſe who, after the king's death, might lay claim to the ſucceſſion. And here it will be neceſſary to obſerve, that the negociation preceding the late treaty made with the emperor was attended with one difficulty: Charles demanded that Henry ſhould own his daughter Mary as his legitimate offſpring; and the king of England flatly refuſed to comply with his requeſt: nevertheleſs he promiſed to aſſign her a rank in the ſucceſſion according to the power beſtowed upon him in parliament, and at laſt Charles was ſatisfied with this verbal promiſe; and Henry being now deſirous to ſtrengthen the friendſhip which had been re-eſtabliſhed between him and the emperor, reſolved to perform this promiſe. His parliament, ſervilely compliant with his will, now paſſed an act to ſettle the ſucceſſion in the perſon of Edward, prince of Wales, and his iſſue; in default of whom the crown was to go to the lady Mary, but with certain conditions, to be limited by the king's letters patent, or by his laſt will in writing, ſealed with his own hand: upon failure of her and her iſſue, the crown was to deſcend to the lady Elizabeth and her iſſue, with the conditions aforeſaid. But the two ladies failing to perform the conditions, the ſucceſſion was ſettled upon ſuch perſon or perſons as the king ſhould appoint, by his letters patent, or his laſt will in writing: but in caſe the king left no ſuch conditions, the ladies were to enjoy the crown abſolutely. By the remaining part of this act, in caſe of the deceaſe of the king's three lawful iſſue, leaving no iſſue, Henry was empowered to diſpoſe of the crown by his will, ſigned with his own hand. Then follows a new oath againſt the biſhop of Rome's authority, with penalties annexed to all who ſhould refuſe to take it or endeavour to interrupt the act of ſucceſſion.

Another act of this parliament declared where, and before whom, all treaſon committed out of England ſhould be tried: that the following titles ſhould for ever be annexed to the imperial crown of England, viz. "king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith and church of England and alſo of Ireland, on earth the ſupreme head." It was likewiſe enacted, that nothing but the oath of twelve men, before authorized commiſſioners, could bring any perſon to his trial upon the offences comprehended in the ſtatute of the Six Articles; and that all ſuch preſentments ſhould be made within one year after the offence committed; that no perſon ſhould be impriſoned without ſuch indictments; and that all indictments againſt preachers, or readers, for ſuch offences from the pulpit, ſhould be within forty days. Thus the bloody ſtatute of the Six Articles was in ſome meaſure qualified as to its penalties. By another act, the king was remitted all ſums he had borrowed ſince the firſt of January, in the thirty-third year of his reign, by which all claims againſt him, through his iniquitous loans, was at one daſh ſtruck off. Another act provided excellently for the preſervation of woods, neceſſary for keeping up the royal navy of England.

The parliament roſe on the twenty-ninth of March, and ſoon after the king ſent an armament to invade Scotland. The fleet amounted to near two hundred ſhips, and had on board a body of ten thouſand men: Dudley, lord Liſle, commanded the navy; and the earl of Hertford conducted the land forces, as lieutenant-general, with the earl of Shrewſbury under him. The troops were diſembarked in the neighbourhood of Leith, and, after defeating a ſmall body which oppoſed them, they took that town, and then advanced to Edinburgh, the gates of which they ſoon forced, and the Engliſh firſt pillaged, and then ſet the town on fire, which continued burning three days. The regent earl of Arran, who had been entirely gained over by cardinal Beaton, was in no condition to reſiſt ſo ſtrong an army, and therefore retired with his forces to Stirling. The earl of Hertford directed his march eaſtward, and, being reinforced with ſix thouſand men, under the command of the lord Ewers, governor of Berwick, he ravaged the whole country, burned Haddington and Dunbar, and committed many outrages. All this time, Francis, who ought to have protected his allies the Scots, whom his intrigues had led into this war, ſent them only a few troops and a trifling ſum of money, under de Larges and de Broſſe, while the ſhips which carried them, with all their proviſions and ammunition, fell into the hands of the Engliſh, who, on the eighteenth of May, returned to England.

Henry ſhewed very little policy in this ſudden and violent invaſion, by which he inflamed the reſentment, without ſubduing the ſpirit, of the Scots; however, he put the beſt face he could on the diſappointment, for it can be called no other, which he met with in his expedition, and his next reſort was to keep the Scottiſh lords of his party firm to his intereſt. He had a fair opening for this by the application of the earl of Lenox, who was ſhut up in Dunbarton, but found means to ſend his brother, the biſhop of Caithneſs, with propoſals to Henry, at Carliſle. He accordingly met with the Engliſh commiſſioners, the lord Wharton and ſir Robert Bowes, and in a ſhort time it was agreed, "Firſt that the Scottiſh lords ſhould cauſe the pure word of God to be taught in their countries. Secondly, They ſhould continue the king's faithful friends. Thirdly, They ſhould take care that the queen be not ſecretly taken away. Fourthly, They ſhould aſſiſt the king to ſeize on ſome caſtles on the borders. Henry on his part promiſed to ſend armies to Scotland both by ſea and land, and to make the earl of Lenox, as ſoon as he could, governor of Scotland; and that he ſhould beſtow his niece, the lady Margaret Douglas, upon him. And for the performance of thoſe articles the biſhop of Caithneſs was left as hoſtage in England.

The earl of Lenox upon this agreement came to London, where it was confirmed on the twenty-ſixth of June, with theſe additional articles:

"Firſt, The earl of Lenox was to confirm the convention made at Carliſle, and to become Henry's ſervant againſt all who ſhould impugn his title or authority in Scotland, or elſewhere. Secondly, condly, To ſurrender into Henry's hands the caſtle of Dunbarton, with the Iſle of Bute; and to help him to win the caſtle of Roſs. Thirdly, That the earl ſhould aſſiſt Henry in becoming the protector of the kingdom of Scotland; that he ſhould take care that the Scottiſh queen ſhould not be carried out of Scotland; that he ſhould do his beſt to deliver her into Henry's hands; that Henry ſhould make him governor of Scotland; but that he ſhould call no parliament, or do any acts of government, without Henry's direction."

The earl of Lenox was immediately diſpatched to Dunbarton † with thirteen ſhips; and, in conſequence of the treaty with Henry, endeavoured to perſuade the governor to deliver the caſtle to the king of England; but he, preferring his duty to his affection for the earl, rejected all his advantageous offers; ſo that being obliged to withdraw, Lenox vented his rage on the iſles of Arran, Bute, and Kyntire; which hoſtilities were revenged by the Scottiſh miniſtry on the perſons and eſtates of the earl's friends, till a body of troops, ſent from Carliſle, marched to their relief; who, in their inroads, took Jedburgh, Kelſo, Coldingham, and ravaged without mercy the counties of Tiviot, Marche, and Lauderdale, compelling the inhabitants to ſwear allegiance to the king of England.

In the mean time the emperor called upon Henry to fulfil his engagements, in joining with him againſt France. On this occaſion, Henry, finding that the grants of the laſt parliament were not ſufficient for the expences of his intended expedition, took an impolitic method of increaſing his finances, by raiſing the value of gold from forty-five to forty-eight ſhillings the ounce, and ſilver from three ſhillings and nine pence to four ſhillings; and by coining baſe money, not intrinſically worth above half its nominal value, which, after paſſing current in his reign, was cried down by Edward VI. and finally called in by queen Elizabeth.

Henry now appointed the queen regent in his abſence, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with the earl of Hertford, were placed at the head of the council left to aſſiſt her, which was made up of Wriotheſley (lately made a baron, and, on the death of lord Audley) chancellor, Thirlby, biſhop of Weſtminſter, Peters, ſecretary of ſtate, and the queen's own uncle, lord Parr of Horton. Henry likewiſe provided for the peace of the ſeveral counties in his abſence, by appointing proper perſons to govern them.

Every thing being thus ſettled, Henry paſſed over to Calais on the eleventh of June, with thirty thouſand men, and attended by the flower of the Engliſh nobility*. Soon after his arrival he was joined by the count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thouſand infantry and four thouſand horſe, and the whole compoſed an army which nothing in that quarter was able to withſtand; the chief force of the French army was employed on the ſide of Champagne, reſiſting the progreſs of the Imperialiſts. It had been propoſed between the emperor and Henry, to join their forces together (which it was computed would amount to near one hundred thouſand men) and march up directly to Paris; and the king's council in this caſe had aviſed his landing in Normandy, a province rich, defenceleſs, and affording him an eaſy paſſage to that metropolis. This would have reduced France (as the cardinal du Bellay obſerves, who was in the ſcene of action) to the brink of ruin; but the emperor, after amuſing himſelf with taking Commercy and Luxemburg, formed the ſiege of Didier, inſtead of ſetting out on his march to join Henry. This opened Henry's eyes; he found that he had been deceived by the emperor, and therefore thought it was reaſonable that he ſhould take towns as well as Charles; and that the latter having failed in fulfilling his engagements, he would endeavour to indemnify himſelf by ſome uſeful conqueſt, therefore, inſtead of advancing directly to Paris, he inveſted the towns of Montreuil and Boulogne.

The duke of Norfolk commanded the forces before Montreuil, and the king in perſon headed thoſe before Boulogne: this laſt place was defended by Varvin, the governor, and held out till the fourteenth of September, when it ſurrendered, on the garriſon being allowed to march to Montreuil with its baggage. Monſtrueil ſtill held out againſt the duke of Norfolk.

During this ſiege the emperor had made himſelf maſter of Didier, after an obſtinate ſiege; and he afterwards ſurprized Eſpernay and Chateau Thierry: but the French army, under the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, being now increaſed to forty thouſand men, two thouſand gens d'armes, and as many light horſe, being poſted in his way to Paris, he was obliged to march towards Soiſſons. Finding it difficult, through a ſcarcity of proviſions, to keep his forces together, and impracticable, for want of ſtrong towns, to ſecure them to take winter quarters in the country, he hearkened to a treaty of peace propoſed by the king of France, who, knowing the extremities to which Boulogne and Montreuil were reduced, and fearing that the king of England would, after the reduction of thoſe places, advance with his army to join the emperor, was very eager to have it concluded. Charles on his part, in order to have a pretext to abandon his ally, diſpatched a meſſenger to the Engliſh camp before Boulogne to preſs Henry to perform his promiſe, and meet him with his army and proceed to Paris. Henry, who was by this time perfectly well acquainted with the perfidy of his ally, replied, that he was too far engaged in the ſiege of Boulogne to raiſe it with honour; and that the emperor himſelf had firſt violated the convention by forming ſieges.

This anſwer furniſhed Charles with the deſired pretext for concluding a peace with Francis, without including his ally of England. Accordingly a treaty was concluded between theſe two princes, at Creſpy, in the Laonnois, on the eighteenth of September, four days after the ſurrender of Boulogne. The principal conditions were, "That the duke of Orleans ſhould marry Mary of Auſtria, the emperor's eldeſt daughter, or the ſecond daughter of the king of the Romans; and that he ſhould have with her, as a fortune, the Milaneſe or the

In this diviſion marched the Welſh and Iriſh.

Low Countries, with the earldoms of Burgundy and Charolois, at the option of the emperor; but if he gave them Milan and Cremona until there was a ſon from the marriage: and then ſhould give them the Low Countries, Francis was, for himſelf and heirs, to renounce for ever all pretenſions upon the Milaneſe and Naples." Many other articles were likewiſe inſerted, material to the hiſtory of thoſe two princes, but not for ours, only that all their late conqueſts on either ſide were given up; and Francis promiſed to ſubmit to Charles the arbitration of his differences with the king of England.

The firſt effect which the treaty of Creſpy had, was the withdrawing, by orders from Charles, all the Imperial troops at the ſiege of Montreuil, under the count de Buren, which weakened the duke of Norfolk ſo much, that Henry ſent him orders to raiſe that ſiege entirely, and to join him. This was done on the twenty-fifth of September, after the duke had laid the adjacent country waſte. And Henry hearing that the dauphin was in full march with all his army, to give him battle, left a ſtrong garriſon in Boulogne, under the command of the lord-admiral Liſle, whom he made governor, and departed for England on the thirtieth of the ſame month, gaining a few days march upon the French, who, upon this diſappointment, exerted all their efforts to retake Boulogne before the breaches were repaired, but without ſucceſs. The public records inform us, that whilſt theſe hoſtilities were going forward, overtures were made for a treaty between France and England, and that the earl of Hertford and ſir William Paget met the French commiſſioners at Calais for that purpoſe; but the French inſiſting upon the reſtitution of Boulogne as an indiſpenſable preliminary, the conferences were broken off.

From theſe and other proceedings of the French court, Henry having great reaſon to imagine that Francis would attempt an invaſion of England next year, on his return home he put Graveſend, Tilbury, Portſmouth, Dover, and all other places on the ſea-coaſts liable to ſurprize from the French fleet, in a poſture of defence.

The king had been at a very great expence in his French expedition*, and the keeping of Boulogne being likely to coſt him a great deal more, to provide for this growing charge, and to repleniſh his exhauſted Exchequer, he had recourſe to the extraordinary way of a benevolence. The commiſſioners appointed to levy it in London, meeting in January, 1545, at Baynard's caſtle, found the affair liable to very great difficulties, ſome of the richeſt citizens abſolutely refuſing, and others excuſing themſelves on account of inability, through their not being paid for the corn with which they had ſupplied the army: in a word, there appeared a general reluctance among ſuch as were able to advance money; and one alderman Read, who ſhewed himſelf more refractory than the reſt, was, by a deteſtable ſtretch of arbitrary power, ſent to ſerve as a ſoldier in the Northern Marches. This ſeverity ſo intimidated the reſt of the recuſants, that they at length conſented to the royal demand. It appears from authentic accounts, that Henry on this occaſion raiſed upwards of ſeventy thouſand pounds, excluſive of the cities of London and York, and the counties of Northumberland, Weſtmoreland, and Durham.

Henry's ſuſpicion of a French invaſion was ſhewn this year to have been well founded; for Francis had employed all the laſt winter and great part of this ſpring in making preparations for the recovery of Boulogne, and a deſcent on the coaſt of England. He had fitted out one hundred and fifty large ſhips of war with ſixty of a ſmaller ſize, and brought twenty-five gallies from Marſeilles to Havre de Grace. This fleet he ſent, under the command of admiral Annebaut, to invade England; who, ſetting ſail in July, arrived, on the eighteenth of that month, off St. Helen's in the Iſle of Wight, and, after ſome ſkirmiſhes with a ſquadron of ſixty Engliſh veſſels that lay at Spithead, but whom he durſt not follow cloſe in ſhore, for want of pilots, landed on the iſland, which he cruelly ravaged; but his troops being repulſed by the militia of the country, they fled to their ſhips, which ſoon after ſet ſail for France, but were again driven upon the coaſt of England, where they were again encountered by the Engliſh fleet, now encreaſed to upwards of one hundred ſail; both ſides engaged with equal fury, but night parting them after they had fought two hours, the French got into Havre de Grace, and the Engliſh admiral (lord Liſle), ſteering towards Normandy, ravaged the coaſts of that province, and took a great number of the French ſhips.

In the mean time Francis was exerting all his efforts to diſtreſs, block up, and take Boulogne, and had fitted out this great naval armament principally with a view to ſhut up that port; but his ſchemes for that purpoſe, though ſupported by a land army of two hundred thouſand men, proved abortive; all that the French monarch could do, was to ravage the little territory of Oye, whence the garriſon of Calais uſed to have their forage and ſome cattle for their ſubſiſtence; and this done, he retired to Amiens, diſmiſſing his forces. The Engliſh, in this campaign acted only on the defenſive; ten thouſand lancequenets and four thouſand horſe, which had been levied in Germany, being hindered by Henry's good ally, the emperor, from paſſing through his territories. While the French were thus employed, the duke of Orleans died at Chateau Montier, to the unſpeakable regret of his father Francis, whoſe peace with the emperor in a great meaſure depended upon the life of that young prince.

Francis ſeeing all his meaſures had miſcarried, that his kingdom was exhauſted, and himſelf threatened with a new war by the emperor, as the conditions of the treaty of Creſpy were diſſolved by the death of the duke of Orleans, began to be very deſirous of reconciling himſelf to Henry: for this purpoſe he engaged the princes of the Smalcaldic league to offer themſelves as mediators. This interpoſition appeared the more natural, as they were menaced by the emperor, who had entered into a negociation with the Turks, and could not be ſuppoſed to find out a better expedient for their own ſafety than effecting a reconciliation between the kings of France and England, and ſoliciting the protection of theſe two princes. They accordingly offered their mediation, which was accepted with great ſeeming cordiality, and they mediated ſo earneſtly, that conferences for a peace between the two nations were appointed between Ardres and Guiſnes: but as Henry would neither admit the Scots, with whom he was at war, to be included in the treaty, nor conſent to the reſtitution of Boulogne, the conferences broke off without any effect; though Henry, in order to frighten Francis into a compliance, ſent the biſhops of Wincheſter and Weſtminſter as his ambaſſadors to Charles, to propoſe terms of reconciliation with him.

On the other hand, Francis, who thought that a diverſion in Scotland would be the the moſt likely means to work upon Henry, ſent the ſieur de Lorges, count de Montgommeri, over thither with five thouſand men, and ordered him to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to perſuade the Scots to make a powerful inroad on the frontiers of England. Montgommeri arriving in Scotland, joined his troops with thoſe of the regent, and both, making together fifteen thouſand men, advanced towards the Tweed. For ſome days ſeveral parties paſſed the river, and did ſome damage to the Engliſh; but the French general could never perſuade the Scots to venture over with the whole army; on the contrary, upon news that the earl of Hertford was advancing, at the head of twelve thouſand men, they haſtily retired, and preſently after diſbanded as uſual. This was all that paſſed in Scotland, worthy notice, during the campaign of 1545.

The Engliſh parliament meeting on the twenty-third of November, the convocation continued for two years the ſubſidy given the king of ſix ſhillings in the pound: at the ſame time the commons ſuppreſſed, by an act, all the colleges and hoſpitals, and gave their lands to the king: the motive, or rather pretence of this ſuppreſſion, was the abuſe of theſe foundations, but the parliament really deſigned it towards the defraying the expence of the wars with France and Scotland; but this not ſufficing, the commons raiſed him a a much larger ſum: and then, after paſſing ſeveral acts, which cannot have a place here, the parliament was prorogued, on Chriſtmas-eve, till the fourth of November in the year following. However, before the ſeſſion ended, the king came to the houſe in great ſolemnity, and, having ordered the attendance of the commons and both houſes of convocation, he addreſſed them in a ſpeech, which, for its curioſity we ſhall here inſert, as handed down to us by the lord Herbert, in his Complete Hiſtory.

"Although my chancellor, for the time being, hath, before this time, uſed very elegantly and ſubſtantially to make anſwer to ſuch orations as hath been ſet forth in the high court of parliament, yet is he not ſo able to open and ſet forth my mind and meaning, the ſecrets of my heart, in ſo plain and ample a manner as I myſelf am and can do; wherefore I, taking upon me to anſwer your eloquent oration, Mr. Speaker, ſay, that where you in the name of our well beloved commons have both praiſed and extolled me for the notable qualities that you have conceived to be in me, I moſt heartily thank you all, that you have put me in remembrance of my duty, which is to endeavour myſelf to obtain and get ſuch excellent qualities and neceſſary virtues, as a prince or governor ought to have, of which gifts I recognize myſelf both bare and barren; but of ſuch ſmall quantities as God hath endued me withal, I render to his goodneſs my moſt humble thanks, intending, with all my will and diligence, to get and acquire to me ſuch notable virtues and princely qualities as you have alleged to be incorporated in my perſon. Thoſe thanks for your loving admonition and good counſel firſt remembered, I eftſoons thank you again, becauſe that you, conſidering our great charge (not for our pleaſure, but for our defence; not for our gain, but to our great coſt) which we have lately ſuſtained, as well in defence againſt our and your enemies, as for the conqueſt of that fortreſs which was to this realm moſt diſpleaſant, and ſhall be (by God's grace) hereafter to our nation moſt profitable and pleaſant, have freely of your own mind granted to us a certain ſubſidy, here in an act ſpecified, which verily we take in good part, regarding more your kindneſs than the profit thereof; as he that ſetteth more by your loving hearts, than by your ſubſtance. Beſides, this hearty kindneſs, I cannot a little rejoice when I conſider the perfect truſt and confidence which you have put in me, as men having unfeigned belief in my good doing and juſt proceedings for you, without my deſire or requeſt, have committed to mine order and diſpoſition all chantries, colleges, hoſpitals, and other places, ſpecified in a certain act, firmly truſting that I will order them to the glory of God, and to the profit of the common wealth. Surely if I, contrary to your expectation, ſhould ſuffer the miniſters of the church to decay, or learning, which is ſo great a jewel, to be diminiſhed, or poor and miſerable people to be unrelieved, you might ſay that I, being put in ſo ſpecial a truſt as I am, in this caſe, were no truſty friend to you, nor charitable to mine, even as a Chriſtian; neither a lover of the public, nor yet one that feared God, to whom account muſt be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not, I pray you, but your expectation ſhall be ſerved more godly and goodly, than you will wiſh or deſire, as hereafter you ſhall plainly perceive. Now, ſith I ſince find ſuch ſucceſs in your part towards me, I cannot chuſe but love and favour you, affirming that no prince in the world favoureth his ſubjects more than I do, nor no ſubject or commons more love and obey their ſovereign lord than I perceive you do, for whoſe defence my treaſure, or (if neceſſity required) my perſon, ſhall not be unadventured. Yet although I wiſh you, and you wiſh me, to be in this perfect love and concord, this amity cannot continue except you, my lords temporal and my lords ſpiritual, and you my loving ſubjects, ſtudy and take pains to amend one thing, which ſurely is amiſs and out of order, to which I moſt heartily require you; which is, that charity and concord is not among you, but diſcord and diſſention beareth rule in every place. St. Paul ſaith to the Corinthians, in the thirteenth chapter "Charity is gentle, charity is not envious, charity is not proud," and ſo forth: in the ſame chapter behold then, what love and charity is amongſt you when one calleth another "heretic, anabaptiſt," and he calleth him again, "papiſt, hypocrite, phariſee." Be theſe tokens of charity amongſt you? Are theſe ſigns of fraternal love between you? No, no; I aſſure you, that this lack of charity among yourſelves will be the hindrance and aſſwaging of the fervent love betwixt us. As I ſaid before, except this wound be ſalved, and clearly made whole, I muſt judge the fault and occaſion of this diſcord to be partly by the negligence of you, the fathers and preachers of ſpirituality; for if I know a man that liveth in adultery, I muſt judge him a lecherous and carnal carnal perſon: if I ſee a man boaſt and brag himſelf, I cannot but deem him a proud man. I hear daily, that you, of the clergy, preach one againſt another, without charity or diſcretion; ſome be ſo ſtiff in their old mumpſimus; others be too buſy and curious in their new mumpſimus: thus all men almoſt be in variety and diſcord; a few or none preach truly and ſincerely the word of God, according as they ought to do. Shall I judge you charitable perſons, doing this? No, no; I cannot do ſo. Alas! how can the poor ſouls live in concord, when you preachers ſow among them, in your ſermons, debate and diſcord? Of you they look light, and you bring them to darkneſs. Amend theſe crimes, I exhort you, and ſet forth God's word, both by your preaching and good example given; or elſe I, whom God hath appointed his vicar and high miniſter here, will ſee theſe diviſions extinct, and theſe enormities corrected, according to my very duty, or elſe I am a very unprofitable ſervant and untrue officer. Although, I ſay, the ſpiritual men be in ſome fault, that charity is not kept amongſt them, yet the temporality be not clear and unſpotted of malice and envy: for you rail on biſhops, ſpeak ſlanderouſly of prieſts, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrary to good order and Chriſtian fraternity. If you know ſurely that a biſhop or preacher erreth, or teacheth perverſe doctrine, come and declare it to ſome of our council, or to us, to whom is committed by God the high authority to reform and order ſuch cauſes and behaviours, and be not judges of yourſelves, of your fantaſtical opinions and vain expoſitions. In ſuch light cauſes you may ſlightly err; and although you be permitted to read the holy ſcriptures, and to have the word of God in your mother-tongue, you muſt underſtand, that it is licenſed you ſo to do only to inform your own conſciences, and to inſtruct your children and families, and not to diſpute and make the ſcriptures a railing and taunting-ſtock againſt prieſts and preachers, as many light perſons do. I am very ſorry to know and hear how irreverently that moſt precious jewel, the word of God, is diſputed, rhimed, ſung and gangled in every alehouſe or tavern, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the ſame: and yet even I am as much ſorry that the readers of the ſame follow it in doing ſo faintly and ſo coldly: for this I am ſure, that charity was never ſo faint amongſt you, and virtuous and godly living was never leſs uſed, nor God himſelf among Chriſtians was never leſs reverenced, honoured, or ſerved. Therefore, as I ſaid before, be in charity one with another, like brothers; love, dread, and ſerve God, to which I, as your ſupreme head and ſovereign lord, exhort and require you; and then I doubt not but that love and league which I ſpake of at the beginning, ſhall never be broken or diſſolved betwixt us.

"To the making of the laws which you have now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in the making and farthering the ſame, or elſe your labour ſhall be in vain, and your commonwealth nothing relieved. And now, to your petition concerning our royal aſſent to be given to ſuch acts as have paſſed both houſes, they ſhall be read openly that you may hear them."

In the courſe of this year died Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who had always continued in the higheſt degree of favour with the king, and univerſally beloved and eſteemed by all ranks of people for his courteouſneſs and readineſs on all occaſions, to aſſiſt the diſtreſſed: he was, in his heart, a friend to the reformed, but did not chuſe to hazard his intereſt with the king by any unſeaſonable or violent interpoſition in their favour, though he let ſlip no opportunity of doing them ſervice, when he found the king in a favourable diſpoſition for ſuch a tentative. He died on the fourth of Auguſt, and lies buried in St. George's chapel, at Windſor, near the remains of Henry VI. He had four wives: his third was Mary, daughter to Henry VII. and widow of Lewis XII. of France; he had a ſon by her, who died before him, and two daughters: he had two other ſons by his laſt wife, who both died without iſſue.

The beginning of the campaign in the year 1546, was unfavourable for the Engliſh in France. The earl of Surry, who had been ſent to command in Boulogne, inſtead of the lord Liſle, met with a rude check in attempting to intercept a convoy of proviſions going to the fort of Outre Eau, which the French had built at the mouth of the port. This was followed by a more conſiderable defeat given the Engliſh, under the ſame general, by the marſhal de Biez, who, being attacked as he was conducting a much larger convoy, routed the earl, killing about eight hundred of his men, among whom was ſir Edward Poynings, and taking one hundred and twenty priſoners. The king, who did not like unfortunate generals, made William, lord Grey of Wilton, governor of Boulogne, and at the ſame time recalled the earl of Surry, and ſent over the earl of Hertford with a body of forces, to oppoſe the enemy, and provide for the ſecurity of the place, which he did by erecting forts at Ambleteuſe and Blackneſs, places that the French had intended to ſeize and fortify, in order to cut off the communication between Calais and Boulogne. But while the war ſeemed to be recommencing with greater fury than ever between France and England, the Proteſtant princes again endeavoured to get their mediation accepted, and met with all the ſucceſs they could wiſh.

Henry, whoſe animoſity againſt Francis was not violent or perſonal, had ſufficiently gratified his humour by the ſhort war he had carried on againſt him; and having reaſon to apprehend, from his great increaſe in corpulency, and viſible decay of ſtrength, that his end was not far off, he was deſirous of finiſhing a quarrel, which might prove dangerous to his kingdom during a minority: Francis likewiſe, on his part, was not averſe to an accommodation with England, becauſe, having now loſt his ſon, the duke of Orleans, he was afraid that Charles ſhould again attack him when he was unprovided either of men or money to make a ſuitable defence.

With ſuch circumſtances on both ſides the two princes readily liſtened to the propoſals of their friends, and agreed to treat at Campes, a place between Ardres and Guiſnes; the plenipotentiaries for Henry were the lord Liſle, ſir William Paget, and Dr. Hatton: thoſe for Francis were the admiral Annebault, and Mr. Raymond, firſt preſident of the parliament of Rouen. After ſeveral conferences, a treaty was concluded on the ſeventh of June, the purport of which was to the following effect:

"That the king of France ſhall pay regularly the penſion due by the treaty of Moore, the thirtieth of Auguſt, 1525, confirmed by ſeveral ſubſequent treaties; as alſo the penſion of ſalt, in a treaty of the twenty-fifth of April, 1527, valued afterwards at ten thouſand crowns a year. But as Henry pretends the ſaid penſion, given in lieu of the ſalt, is to be perpetual, and as Francis maintains on the contrary, that it is to ceaſe on Henry's death, it is agreed that if the diſpoſition ſhall be found to be perpetual, Francis ſhall pay it to Henry and his ſucceſſors for ever.

"Moreover, Francis ſhall pay to the king of England, on the feaſt of St. Michael, 1554, or within a fortnight after, the ſum of two millions of crowns de ſoleil, as well for the arrears of the penſion of the ten thouſand crowns, as for Henry's expence of the ſiege of Boulogne, undertaken ſolely to procure his money, in keeping and maintaining that place.

"As to the article of the five hundred thouſand crowns, which Henry preſented to Francis, on condition he punctually obſerved the treaties; as the two kings differ in point of fact, it is agreed the diſpute ſhall be decided by commiſſioners appointed on both ſides, within ſuch a time; or by four impartial lawyers, in caſe the commiſſioners end not the affair.

"It is farther agreed, that the king of England ſhall keep Boulogne, with its territories (the limits whereof are ſettled by the treaty), till he receive whatever is due to him.

"That when all the ſums ſhall be paid to Henry, Boulogne ſhall be reſtored to France; and nothing that is faſtened to the ground, ſhall be impaired or carried away.

"That, from the date hereof to the ſurrender of Boulogne, neither of the two princes ſhall raiſe any fort or new fortification within the territory of Boulogne; but thoſe already begun may be finiſhed."

The emperor was included by both parties in the peace: as for Scotland, Henry agreed it ſhould be included, on condition that the Scots gave him no cauſe to make war upon them; and in caſe they did, they were to be included no otherwiſe than according to the treaty of April 5, 1515.

The wax was hardly cold upon this treaty, when a new quarrel had like to have ariſen between the two kings; for the earl of Hertford, purſuant to the laſt article, going on to complete a fort which he had begun about three weeks before the treaty, the French ſet to work in erecting another fort, called Chaſtillon's Garden, at Portet, near the mouth of the harbour of Boulogne, on pretence that the marſhal de Biez had formerly began one there, by entrenching himſelf on the place; but the difference between a trench and a fortification was too well known to Henry for him to ſuffer this piece of chicanery, and the lord Grey demoliſhed it by his orders. The peace was hereupon proclaimed in London, on the thirteenth of June, though it was not ratified by the king of France till the firſt day of Auguſt, fifteen days after the term preſcribed for the ratification was expired.

Some time before the treaty was in agitation, the Proteſtants of Germany ſent Philip, brother of the elector Palatine, to demand ſuccours from Henry, and in particular to ſolicit a ſupply of one hundred thouſand crowns, for the defence of the league; but, inſtead of money, he ſent them ſeven propoſitions, containing the terms upon which he was willing to engage in a defenſive league with them. In the mean time the emperor and the pope formed an alliance for their deſtruction; his holineſs ſupplied him with money and a ſtrong body of troops, under the command of Octavian Farneſe. The Proteſtants armed in their own defence, under the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Heſſe; but neither ſide cared to hazard an engagement. At length the king of the Romans falling into the territories of the elector of Saxony, that prince was obliged to go to the relief of his own ſubjects; and the landgrave being weakened by his departure, retired into his own dominions, ſo that the emperor, being left maſter of the field, reduced Francfort, Ulm, and ſeveral other towns of the league.

While Henry, againſt all the maxims of right policy, continued an unconcerned ſpectator of Charles thus ſwallowing up the liberties of Germany, thoſe who favoured the reformation in Scotland, were perſecuted by that hot-headed zealot cardinal Beaton, who governed every thing with an uncontrouled ſway, though under the maſk of the regent's authority: ſeveral perſons were condemned to the flames for hereſy, and the cardinal is ſaid to have taken an inhuman pleaſure in being ſpectator of their ſufferings: but he did not long triumph in his cruelty, for he was himſelf this year aſſaſſinated by Norman Leſly, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Rothes, on account of ſome quarrel between them.

Nor were the Proteſtants leſs harraſſed in England, where daily perſecutions were carried on againſt them. This ſeverity was chiefly encouraged by Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, and the lord Rich, aſſiſted by Wriotheſley the chancellor; nor was the duke of Norfolk behind-hand in promoting the ſame cruel meaſures: and Henry's natural ferocity being increaſed by the anguiſh of an inveterate ulcer in one of his legs, he readily gave into all the ſchemes of bloodſhed and barbarity that Gardiner and his popiſh counſellors thought proper to inſpire him with. Among other perſons who ſuffered on account of their opinions, was Mrs. Anne Aſkew, or Aſcue, a gentlewoman of good birth and excellent parts, who was well known to many perſons at court: this lady, being convicted of denying the real preſence in the euchariſt, was condemned to the flames, and choſe to ſuffer death, rather than purchaſe pardon at the expence of abjuring her faith. Chancellor Wriotheſley, who was a zealous papiſt, imagining that her reſolution proceeded from the encouragement given her by perſons of diſtinction about the court, who were friends to the reformation, cauſed this poor woman to be put to the rack in priſon, though already under ſentence of death; and is even ſaid to have aſſiſted with his own hands in adminiſtering the torture, which was done in ſuch a mercileſs manner, that almoſt all her bones were diſlocated. This ſhe bore, however, with amazing fortitude; nor could they extort a ſyllable from her in accuſation of any one: at length ſhe was conveyed to the ſtake, where ſhe ſuffered with four men, condemned on the ſame account; Shaxton, biſhop of Saliſbury, who had been impriſoned for refuſing to conform to the Six Articles, but had ſaved his life by recanting, attending them to the place of execution, where he preached a ſermon, reproaching them in the harſheſt terms for their obſtinacy and hereſy.

Gardiner

Gardiner and the popiſh faction perceiving that the king was now more furiouſly than ever incenſed againſt the ſacramentarians, made another effort to deſtroy Cranmer, but ſtill without effect; for Henry, retaining his affection for the archbiſhop, preſerved his perſon from the plots of his enemies, and even obliged them to be outwardly reconciled to him; but they were very near wreaking their vengeance on a perſon of ſtill higher dignity.

The queen was then paſt the bloom of life, but continued ſtill agreeable; ſhe had lived with prudence, and free from envy; and in the main, her conduct was irreproachable. In her heart ſhe was a favourer of the reformed, but ſhe underſtood the king's humour ſo well, that ſhe never preſumed to ſtand up openly in their defence: this prudent conduct, and her extraordinary ſubmiſſion to Henry's will, had ſo greatly won upon his affections, that he even ſuffered her to have ſermons preached in her privy-chamber, before ſome of her ladies. The popiſh faction could not obſerve this without great regret, and they at laſt ventured to whiſper in the king's ears, that ſhe was the life of all the hereſy with which the land was peſtered. The king, at firſt, took no notice of theſe inſinuations, and even ſuffered her to diſpute with himſelf on ſome religious points, imagining that ſhe did it only for inſtruction. This liberty, however, being by cuſtom carried ſomewhat too far by the queen, Henry expreſſed his diſlike at her preſuming to differ in opinion from him, and ſhewed more coolneſs than uſual towards her; he even went ſo far as to diſcover his diſlike to Gardiner, who failed not to cheriſh his reſentment by aggravating the queen's known attachment to the Lutheran principles, and the pains ſhe took to inſtil her religion into the ladies of the court, who attended on her. This being alſo confirmed, and other accuſations of the like ſort laid againſt her by Wriotheſley, who had the bloody impudence to propoſe taking off the queen's head, as the only means to cruſh for ever thoſe of her ſect, Henry was at once ſo weak and inhuman as to ſubſcribe the articles urged againſt her, and upon which ſhe was to be tried for her life.

The two blood leeches, Gardiner and Wriotheſley, now exulted in the ſuppoſed ſucceſs of their ſchemes, and looked upon the queen's ruin as inevitable: but Heaven, who delights to turn the wiſdom of the wicked into folly, interpoſed to ſnatch the innocent victim from the toils of her enemies. The lord-chancellor dropping the copy of the articles, with Henry's ſubſcription to it, it fell into the queen's hands, who, upon ſeeing it, concluded her life loſt: however, being adviſed by one of her friends to go to the king and try to appeaſe him, ſhe took their advice, and, being a little recovered from her conſternation, ſhe went into the king's apartment, who received her with his cuſtomary kindneſs, and began with her, as uſual, upon the head of religion; but ſhe declined the ſubject, and expreſſed uncommon deference to his majeſty's opinion, to whoſe learning and judgment ſhe ſaid ſhe perfectly reſigned herſelf. "Not ſo, by St. Mary! (replied Henry, in ſome perturbation), you are become a doctor, Kate, to inſtruct us, as we take it, and not to be inſtructed or directed by us." The queen, feigning much ſurprize, anſwered very mildly, "that ſhe ſhould never have preſumed to argue with him upon any ſubject, except to amuſe the pain of his infirmities, or with a view to profit by his ſuperior erudition in theſe matters." "And is it even ſo, ſweetheart (replied Henry, kiſſing her with great tenderneſs), then we are friends again." He then diſmiſſed her, with very tender aſſurances of his inviolable love to her.

This reconciliation paſſed in the preſence only of a third perſon, the lady Herbert, the queen's ſiſter, ſo that Wriotheſley and Gardiner ſtill thought their work of death went ſmoothly on; but they were ſoon undeceived, to their no ſmall mortification; for on the morrow, which was the day appointed for carrying the queen to the Tower, the king, going to take the air in the garden, ſent for her; and ſoon after came in the chancellor, with forty of the guard, in order to arreſt her; but the king, taking him aſide, was obſerved to ſpeak to him in a very angry tone of voice, and even overheard to order him, with reviling language, out of his preſence. Upon the king's return to the queen, ſhe perceiving him in a rage with the chancellor, endeavoured to intercede for him; but ſhe received no other anſwer from Henry, than that ſhe little knew how ill he deſerved at her hands.

However liable Henry was to be wrought up to a fury by the artful ſuggeſtions of evil-intending perſons, to the prejudice of any one, he never liked the accuſers: this appeared ſtrongly in the preſent inſtance, for he took ſuch a diſlike to Gardiner, for the baſe part which he had acted with regard to the queen, that he could never after bear the ſight of him; and though the biſhop ſought by the vileſt adulation to reinſtate himſelf in his favour, he totally diſcarded him; and Henry at this time being to make his will, it was propoſed that Gardiner ſhould be one of the executors; but the king would not hear of it, ſaying "that he was ſo contentious and troubleſome a fellow, that he would be continually ſtirring up diſſention amongſt the other executors."

If the reformed were over-joyed at the diſgrace of their rancorous perſecutor Gardiner, they had ſtill greater cauſe to triumph in the downfal of the duke of Norfolk, a nobleman equally averſe to their religion, and, by his great credit and influence at court, capable of hurting them in a more effectual manner than even the biſhop. It is more than probable that Norfolk had a hand in the late attempt againſt the queen; at leaſt it is certain that he took the lead in all the deſigns formed againſt Cranmer, whom he had lately treated with the greateſt indignity at the council-board, for which he received a moſt ſevere reprimand from the king himſelf. Whether the part he had acted in theſe affairs contributed to his diſgrace, or whether Henry, who had lately began to diſcourage the popiſh party in his councils, and, finding his end aproaching, thought it unwiſe to leave them in a capacity of making head againſt the future government, the ruin of the duke of Norfolk and his ſon, the earl of Surry, ſeems about this time to have been concluded on.

The duke, though poſſeſſed of no great genius, had all the requiſites of a complete courtier, and had acquired no inconſiderable degree of military fame; long experience in buſineſs had rendered him wiſe and cautious; and he had ſerved the king with fidelity and ſucceſs. His ſon, the earl of Surry,

Surry, was a young gentleman of great courage, an aſpiring mind, quick parts, and uncommon learning for the age he lived in; but proud, ambitious, headſtrong, vindictive, raſh; capable of ſaying any thing in a paſſion, and of doing every thing to gratify his reſentment. He had been greatly incenſed at being recalled from the government of Boulogne, and at the earl of Hertford's being ſent to command the forces in that country; this had provoked him to ſay, that "within a little time they ſhould ſmart for it," and to uſe other expreſſions ſavouring of revenge, and ſhewing as well a diſlike of the king as a hatred of his counſellors.

The old duke, his father, to prevent the ill conſequences of his ſon's reſentment, and the ruin which the diſſention between him and the Seymour family might one day beget, as the earl of Hertford was likely, after the king's death, to be at the head of the adminiſtration, as guardian of the minor ſucceſſor, would fain have had the earl of Surry, then a widower, marry one of the earl of Hertford's daughters, to which the latter was not averſe; he likewiſe propoſed a match between his own daughter the ducheſs dowager of Richmond (relict of the duke of that name, the king's natural ſon), and ſir Thomas Seymour, brother to Hertford.

The high ſpirit of Surry would not brook this alliance, and the contemptuous manner in which he rejected it ſo exaſperated the Seymour family, that they inſinuated to Henry, that the earl entertained the ambitious hope of a marriage with the princeſs Mary, in which caſe the great intereſt the Howard family had, might endanger the government of young Edward: they even hinted, that he raiſed his aſpiring views to the crown, and that he actually bore the arms of Edward the Confeſſor, without any mark of difference or diminution. This was a matter which affected Henry in the moſt ſenſible part; and this conſideration, added to the ſentiments he already entertained, determined him to ſacrifice the Howards to his jealouſy; and the diviſion that prevailed in that illuſtrious family contributed greatly to facilitate his deſign.

There was a ſecret grudge ſubſiſting between the earl of Surry and his ſiſter, the ducheſs of Richmond: the earl had alſo had a diſpute with his father, and they were ſcarcely reconciled at this time. The duke of Norfolk had alſo a quarrel upon his hands with his own ducheſs, Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, late duke of Buckingham; and, by an effect of his free way of living, or her jealouſy, they had been parted for four years, and expreſſed their rancour againſt each other ſo openly as gave no ſmall ſcandal. On this occaſion, the ducheſs, eager to ſatisfy her revenge, informed againſt her huſband to the miniſtry, and diſcloſed all ſhe knew of his ſecrets or reſentments; and was joined in this perfidious part by Mrs. Holland, a woman whom the duke had kept for ſome years, but had lately turned off; though all their evidence amounted to ſcarcely the colour of an accuſation. That of the ducheſs conſiſted in little more than complaints of the duke's infidelity to her, and his uſing her ill. Mrs. Holland ſwore that the duke had, in confidence, told her that he was hated by the king's council, many of whom were upſtart noblemen; and, becauſe of his affection to the popiſh doctrines and ſacraments, that he even thought himſelf ſlighted by the king, who had not of late called him to the cabinet or privy-council: ſhe likewiſe ſaid, that the duke bore the arms of England, with a badge of labels of ſilver, which were appropriated to the prince of Wales.

The ducheſs of Richmond depoſed againſt her brother, the earl of Surry, that he had expreſſed an averſion to the earl of Hertford; and that he had ſaid, if the king died, the new men (meaning the council) ſhould ſmart for the affront they had put upon him, in ſending that nobleman to ſuperſede him in command. She, ſaid alſo, that her brother had diſſuaded her from reading the ſcriptures; and diſcloſed ſome other trifling indecencies of which he had been guilty. Upon theſe general accuſations the king ordered both father and ſon to be arreſted, which was accordingly done on the twelfth of December; the one was carried to the Tower by water and the other by land, without either knowing of the other's apprehenſion. After that, declaration was publicly made in the king's name, that all perſons who had any accuſation to prefer againſt the two impriſoned noblemen, ſhould be graciouſly heard; and that the royal pardon and protection ſhould be granted to any one concerned in any plot with them, who would come and make a diſcovery. Upon this ſir Richard Southwell, a member of the privy-council, declared that he had ſome matters of treaſon to diſcloſe againſt the earl of Surry; but the latter diſclaimed his charge, and offered to maintain his innocence againſt his accuſer in ſingle combat, which was denied him.

In the beginning of January, 1547, the unfortunate earl was brought to his trial, by a jury of commoners, picked by the court, and before the lord-chancellor, the lord-mayor, and other commiſſioners, at Guildhall in London; when, notwithſtanding a moſt ſpirited and eloquent defence made by the noble priſoner, the jury, being commanded rather than inſtructed, found him guilty of high-treaſon, and he received ſentence of death, which was executed by beheading him upon Tower-hill, on the nineteenth of January *.

The old duke preſaged his own fate in that of his ſon; and, by the advice of the few friends adverſity had left him, he endeavoured to appeaſe the king's reſentment by the moſt ſubmiſſive letters: but Henry's breaſt was inſenſible to all the emotions of pity; and neither the duke's ſubmiſſion, nor his innocence, could ſatisfy the tyrant, unleſs he ſhould own himſelf guilty, under his own hand. A com-

* Henry Howard (eldeſt ſon of Thomas, third duke of Norfolk, by Elizabeth, daughter of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham) died much pitied, being a man of great parts and high courage, with many other noble qualities. His ſentence was generally condemned as an act of high injuſtice and ſeverity, which loaded the Seymours with a popular odium they could never overcome. Sir Richard Southwell depoſing, that he knew certain things of the earl, which touched his fidelity to the king, the earl vehemently affirmed himſelf a true man, and offered to fight in his ſhirt with his accuſer. As to the uſing the arms of the Confeſſor, he ſaid he did it according to the opinion of the king's heralds. His ſiſter Mary, ducheſs of Richmond, being examined, confeſſed that the earl her brother ſhould ſay, "Theſe new men, (meaning the Seymours) loved no nobility; and if God called away the king, they ſhould ſmart for it;" with ſome other paſſionate words and circumſtantial ſpeeches little for his advantage. He was buried at Framlingham in the county of Suffolk. Herbert, p. 263, &c. Burnet, vol. i. p. 345, &c. Dugdale's Baron. vol. ii. p. 275.

mittee of council was ſent to examine him; and, after ſome conference, obtained from him, partly by threats and partly by promiſes of the royal clemency, a paper intituled his voluntary confeſſion, ſigned by his own hand, and containing the following articles: "I. That he had, at ſundry times, and to different perſons, diſcloſed the ſecrets of the king's council. II. That he had concealed his ſon's treaſon in uſing the arms (called Edward the Confeſſor's) appropriated to the king of England, and to which neither he nor his children, nor his anceſtors, had any title. And, III. That he had, ever ſince his father's death, borne in the firſt quarter of his arms the arms of England, with a difference of the labels of ſilver, being the proper arms of prince Edward, which was done to the prejudice and diſheriſon of the king and prince, and gave occaſion for diſturbing or interrupting the ſucceſſion to the crown, and deſtroying the prince's inheritance." This he acknowleged to be high-treaſon, and confeſſing he deſerved to be attainted for it, humbly threw himſelf upon the king's mercy.

The parliament, which was then ſitting, taking this paper into conſideration, and having been properly prepared for the bloody compliment they were to pay their inhuman maſter, paſſed a bill of attainder againſt the duke of Norfolk and his ſon, the earl of Surry, well knowing that the accuſation againſt the duke was too frivolous, and too ill ſupported, to bear his being brought to a public trial before his peers; and this act received the royal aſſent on the twenty-ſeventh of January, by the lord-chancellor and other commiſſioners appointed for that purpoſe by Henry, who was unable to ſtir abroad, and immediately thereupon a warrant was ordered for cutting off the duke's head: and this ſeems to have been the laſt act of Henry's life.

He had, ſo far back as the thirtieth of December, made his will; but before that time he was grown ſo unwieldy and diſeaſed that he could not write: ſir Anthony Denny, John Gates, and William Cheek, three of his domeſtics, were empowered to ſign all acts of government; as were a committee of council to put a ſtamp, imitating the king's hand-writing, and the royal ſignet, to all acts which required either. Thoſe circumſtances furniſhed matter to the advocates for the poſterity of his eldeſt ſiſter, Margaret, who apprehended they were unequally dealt by therein, to diſpute the validity of this will, denying that it was ever ſigned by Henry: and even ſo late as the reign of queen Anne, this diſpute was again revived, when a committee of the houſe of commons were appointed to ſearch for it, but the original was not to be found; they did indeed find, in the chapter-houſe of Weſtminſter, a roll conſiſting of ſeveral ſheets of paper tacked together with a braid of green and white ribbond, written in a mean and ſlovenly character, and pretended to be ſigned by king Henry's own hand on the top of the firſt and the end of the laſt page; but, upon comparing the ſame with his ſtamp and his uſual hand-writing, it agreed with neither, being fairer than ever he could write, and ſtiff like a counterfeit hand: and Maitland, ſecretary to Mary, queen of Scots, in a letter of his to Cecil, queen Elizabeth's ſecretary, inſiſted, "that as this will was not ſigned, but only ſtamped, and that not being according to the act of parliament, which in ſuch extraordinary things muſt be ſtrictly taken, the will was of no force." The objections of the Scottiſh writers have, indeed, been ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, and an attempt made to refute them by the late learned Mr. Horrabin, in his treatiſe of the Hereditary Right of the Crown of England. But, be this matter as it may, it was taken for granted that Henry had made his will, in which, according to the power given him by parliament, in the year 1543, he ſettled the ſucceſſion to the crown of England in the following manner.

"Firſt, upon the prince of Wales and his poſterity. Secondly, upon the children of his preſent queen, or thoſe of any future marriage he might make. Thirdly, upon the princeſs Mary and her iſſue, but with the expreſs condition, that ſhe ſhould marry with the conſent of the executors of his will and teſtament. Fourthly, upon the lady Elizabeth, with the ſame proviſo. Fifthly, upon the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his ſiſter the queen of France, by the duke of Suffolk. Sixthly, upon the lady Eleanor Brandon, youngeſt ſiſter to Frances. Laſtly, failing all thoſe, upon the next of kin." By other clauſes of his will he named ſixteen executors, who were as follow, viz. the archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord chancellor Wriotheſley, the earl of Hertford (young Edward's uncle), lord St. John, lord Ruſſel, lord viſcount Liſle, biſhop Tunſtal, ſir Anthony Brown, ſir Edward Montagu, juſtice Bromley, ſir William Paget, ſir Anthony Denny, ſir William Herbert, ſir Edward Wotton, and Dr. Wotton his brother. To the lords who were his executors he left five hundred marks each, and to the commoners three hundred; and ordered his executors to pay all his debts. He made the prince of Wales heir to all his moveables, but charged him to be ſubject to the advice of his council until he was eighteen years old. He left three thouſand pounds a year to each of his daughters, with ten thouſand pounds of addition, as their whole fortune, if the executors thought proper. To the queen he left three thouſand pounds in jewels or plate, with a thouſand pounds in money."

Henry perceiving that his diſſolution was faſt approaching, was abſolutely bent to ſend his noble priſoner, the duke of Norfolk, out of the world before him, and had for this purpoſe ſent to the lieutenant of the Tower to have the duke executed on Tower-hill, on the twenty-ninth of January; but, fortunately for that nobleman, Henry himſelf was called to anſwer for the wickedneſs of his paſt life the very night preceding.

The rapid approach of Henry's laſt moments was very viſible to all about him; but as, by an act paſſed in his reign, it had been declared high-treaſon to foretel the king's death, no one would run the riſk of acquainting him with his ſituation, not knowing but, in the violence of his paſſion, he might execute the law in all its rigour upon the author of ſuch friendly intelligence, eſpecially as he had ſo lately given an inſtance in his treatment of the Howard family, that his cruelty was not at an ebb with his life.

At length, however, ſir Anthony Denny ventured to diſcloſe to him the fatal ſecret, and exhorted him to prepare for that tranſition which was ſo near at hand, as his legs were already mortified; for which Henry, contrary to all expectation, thanked him, and deſired that Cranmer might be ſent for; but he was ſpeechleſs before the archbiſhop arrived. When that prelate beſought him to give ſome ſign of his truſt in God, through the merits of Chriſt, he ſqueezed his hand with great fervency, and immediately afterwards expired, in the fifty-fifth year and ſeventh month of his life, and the thirty-ſeventh year and tenth month of his reign, on the twenty-eighth of January, 1547, about two in the morning.

The conduct of Henry VIII. was ſo different and inconſiſtent with itſelf in the ſeveral periods of his life, that it is extremely difficult, if not impoſſible, to give a juſt deſcription of his character, which, as his hiſtorian, the lord Herbert, obſerves, may be beſt learned from his actions. While the natural modeſty of youth reſtrained the violence of his turbulent paſſions, Henry's government was the admiration of foreigners, and cauſed him to be almoſt adored by his own people: but in his more advanced years he became rapacious, arbitrary, froward, fretful, and ſo cruel that he ſeemed to delight in the blood of his ſubjects. The gratification of his own ſenſual and brutal appetites appears to have been the grand object of all his purſuits: to this he ſacrificed every obligation of juſtice, every dictate of conſcience, and every feeling of humanity: the cruel fate of the unhappy Anne Boleyn will fix an eternal mark of infamy on his character. Nevertheleſs, it muſt be owned, that, with all his vices, foibles, and imperfections, Henry had many great and agreeable qualities, both by nature and education: he had a deep judgment in all affairs to which he applied; he was not only liberal and indulgent to his family and court, but even to ſtrangers. He made choice of able and good men for the clergy, and of able counſellors for his ſtate affairs. It is full as undeniable (as ſir Thomas More obſerved) that he was ſuperior to all the princes his cotemporaries in knowlege and learning; that he was a great encourager of the ſciences, and literature; that his court was fuller of learned men than moſt univerſities, he making them his companions as well as counſellors, and advancing them to high dignities both in church and ſtate. He was particularly careful to give his children a taſte for learning; and by his example introduced a faſhion among the nobility, of educating theirs in the ſame manner. There were two fundamental defects in Henry's nature, to which all his faults in government may be aſcribed, theſe were pride and avarice; to the latter of theſe paſſions cardinal du Bellay, who knew him well, aſcribes the proſecution of Wolſey, in order to get poſſeſſion of that prelate's riches: as for the pride of his heart it was immeaſurable, and hence aroſe that exceſſive obſtinacy and wilfulneſs, which (as Wolſey with his dying breath told ſir William Kingſton) "would make him ſacrifice half his realm, rather than not have his will." After all, it muſt be owned, that this nation under him roſe to a very high pitch of honour and conſideration among its neighbours; and it is inconteſtable, that he was the firſt who delivered the Engliſh church from its ſlaviſh and diſgraceful ſubjection to the ſee of Rome; and by that ſtep laid the foundation of civil liberty: though in this work he ſeems to have been actuated rather by the impulſe of his vicious and unruly paſſions, than by the motives of conſcience or religion. We ſhall conclude this ſhort character of the eighth Henry with the following remark, that while his political abilities entitle him to the appellation of a Great Prince, his tyranny, cruelty, and oppreſſion ſeem to exclude him from the character of a Good Sovereign.

Henry was goodly in his appearance; his preſence had the ſtamp of majeſty: he poſſeſſed a ready wit, an eaſy and flowing eloquence, and an incomparable activity, grace, and dexterity, in thoſe military exerciſes and elegant diverſions which were the uſual entertainment of thoſe times

The following account of the ceremonies of Henry's interment cannot be diſpleaſing to the curious reader, as it will furniſh him an opportunity of drawing a compariſon between the ideas of magnificence in thoſe days, and the taſte which prevails in this enlightened age.

His body remaining privately in a chamber, was there cered and put in a coffin of lead, while a ſumptuous hearſe of virgins wax was prepared within the chapel at Whitehall, with ſix goodly pillars, weighing by eſtimation two thouſand pounds, under which hearſe was a canopy of rich cloth of gold, whoſe valences were half gold and half black ſilk, into which the corpſe was conveyed, covered with a pall of cloth of tiſſue; an altar being erected at the eaſt end, richly adorned with black velvet and eſcutcheons of the king's arms; the hearſe was railed about with timber, covered with black cloth, with which the chapel, cloiſter, hall, and chamber, were likewiſe hung. Within the rail were ſeats for the twelve lords mourners, to kneel or ſit; and here the corpſe remained from the ſecond of February to the fourteenth, ſerved with day and night-watches, a herald ſtanding at the weſt end of the hearſe, and deſiring the people to pray, ſaying, "You ſhall of your charity pray for the ſoul of the moſt famous prince, king Henry VIII. our late moſt gracious king and maſter."

On the fourteenth of February, about ten in the morning, the king's body ſet forward towards Windſor, in a ſtately chariot, his effigies lying on the coffin, with the true imperial crown on the head, and under it a night-cap of black ſattin ſet full of precious ſtones, and apparelled with robes of crimſon velvet, furred with minever powdered with ermin; the collar of the Garter, with the order of St. George, about the neck; a crimſon ſattin doublet, embroidered with gold; two bracelets of gold about the wriſts, ſet with ſtones and pearls; a fair armouring ſword by the ſide; the ſceptre in the right hand and the ball in the left; a pair of ſcarlet hoſe, crimſon velvet ſhoes, gloves on the hands, and ſeveral diamond rings on the fingers; drawn by eight horſes trapped with black, adorned with eſcutcheons and a ſhaffedon on their heads, on each of which rode a child of honour, carrying a bannerole of the king's arms. Thus, with an exceeding great train, of four miles in length, the body was conducted to Sion, where it was received at the door by the biſhops of London, Briſtol, and Gloceſter, who performed dirge that night, and next morning the corpſe, being brought into the church, was placed in a hearſe like that at Whitehall, but the effigies was conveyed into the veſtry.

The next morning, about ſix o'clock, after the third ſound of the trumpets, the whole company, the marquis of Dorſet being chief mourner, proceeded for Windſor, and brought the corpſe to the caſtle college gate about one of the clock; from which place to the weſt door of the church a large way was railed in on both ſides, and hung with black black cloth and eſcutcheons; the church and choir being likewiſe hung round with black; the biſhops of Wincheſter, London, and Ely, in their pontifical robes, with the ſub-dean of the king's chapel, and all the ſinging-men of the ſame, and the dean of Windſor, with all the canons and their whole choir, received the corpſe at the aforeſaid place, whence, after incenſing and ſuch like ceremonies, it was carried into the church, the ſinging-men of the king's chapel on the right hand, and thoſe of Windſor on the left, preceding it. Thus the effigies was firſt conveyed into the choir by divers knights and gentlemen, and then the coffin, by ſixteen yeomen, with black ſtaves in their hands, was brought into a hearſe made in the midſt of the choir, under which was provided a goodly vault to bury the corpſe in, over which was laid a grate, whereon ſtood the ſaid hearſe with the coffin and picture. The hearſe was like that at Whitehall, only it conſiſted of thirteen great pillars, and weighed, by eſtimation, four thouſand pounds, having about it the twelve banners of deſcents. Thus the uſual ceremonies being performed, the body remained there that night.

Wedneſday being the ſixteenth of February, about four o'clock began the Communion of the Trinity, performed by the ſub-dean of Windſor and the ſub-dean of the king's chapel, where, after an offering of gold by the chief mourner, of the knights of the Garter of St. George, and of the king's hatchments, banneroles, banners, and other trophies, as alſo of the king's hearſe, richly trapped, came four gentlemen uſhers, and took away the pall of cloth of tiſſue, the picture being conveyed away before by ſix knights into the veſtry; after which ſixteen ſtrong yeomen of the guards took the coffin, and with five ſtrong linen towels, which they had for their fees, put it into the vault, near unto the body of queen Jane Seymour, his third wife, the grate being firſt taken way: then the lord chamberlain, the lord great-maſter, the treaſurer, the comptroller, and the ſerjeant-porter, breaking their white ſtaves upon their heads in three parts, as did likewiſe all the gentlemen uſhers, threw them into the grave; when Garter, aſſiſted by the biſhops of Canterbury and Durham, declared the ſtate and the name of the moſt goodly prince their maſter, king Edward the ſixth. Thus the funeral ending, the trumpets ſounded in the rood loft, and the company departed.

Henry had iſſue as follows.

By his firſt wife, Catherine of Spain, he had a ſon named

Henry, born January 1, 1511, who died on the twenty-ſeventh of February following.

Another ſon, born the latter end of the year 1514, who died an infant. And a daughter, Mary, born February 11, 1516, who came, after her brother Edward's death, to be queen of England.

By the ſecond, Anne Boleyn, he had the famous queen Elizabeth. And

A male child, ſtill-born on January 19, 1539.

By the third, Jane Seymour, he had a ſon, named

Edward, who ſucceeded him immediately in the throne.

By his three laſt, Anne of Cleves, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr, he had had no iſſue.

By Elizabeth, daughter of John Blount, and widow of ſir Gilbert Taillebois, he had a natural ſon, named Henry Fitz Roy, who, not being yet ſeven years old, was, on the eighteenth of June, 1525, created knight of the Garter, earl of Nottingham, duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and made lieutenant of all the king's forces north of the Trent, and warden of the Marches of Scotland. On the twenty-ſixth of July next following, he was conſtituted admiral of England; and, about five years after, made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The handſomeneſs of his perſon, the quickneſs of his parts, his expertneſs in all kinds of military exerciſes, his excellent diſpoſition, and the rare endowments of his mind, gained him the character of the fineſt youth of the age, and raiſed the expectation of the world very high in his favour. Theſe accompliſhments, the honours he had received, and the extraordinary fondneſs which Henry always expreſſed for him, raiſed a notion that, in defect of legitimate male iſſue, he would have found a way to raiſe this natural ſon to the throne. But whatever deſigns he had for his advantage, they proved abortive by this youth's too early death, when he was about ſeventeen years old, and before he had conſummated his marriage with the lady Mary Howard. He died on the twenty-fourth of July, 1536, and was buried at Thetford, in Norfolk.

Remarkable Occurrences.

In his ninth year happened a ſweating ſickneſs, whereof infinite multitudes in many parts of England died, eſpecially in London; and was ſo violent, that in three, and ſometimes two hours, it took away mens lives, and ſpared neither rich nor poor; for in the king's court the lord Clinton, lord Grey of Wilton, and many knights, gentlemen, and officers died of it. It began in July, and continued to the midſt of December.

In his fifteenth year, after great rains and winds, there followed ſo ſevere a froſt, that many died for cold, and ſome loſt fingers, ſome toes, and many their nails.

About his fifteenth year, divers things were newly brought into England; whereupon this rhyme was made:

Turkeys, carps, hops, piccards, and beer,
Came into England all in one year.

In his nineteenth year, by extremity of rain in ſeed-time, there followed a great dearth of corn, which would have cauſed great calamity, but that it was relieved in London by merchants of the Steel-yard, out of Germany, and a thouſand quarters ſupplied out of the king's own proviſion.

In his twentieth year, in the end of May, began in London another ſweating ſickneſs, which afterwards infected all places of the realm, by reaſon whereof the term was adjourned, and the circuit of the aſſize alſo; many died in the court, as ſir Francis Poynes, ſir William Compton, knights, and William Carew, eſq. of the king's privy-council: the king himſelf, for a ſpace, removed almoſt every day, till he came to Tittinghanger, a place of the abbot of St. Alban's, where he, with the queen and a ſmall number, remained till the ſickneſs was paſſed.

In his thirtieth year, the manner of caſting pipes of lead for conveying water under ground without uſing of ſolder, was firſt invented by Robert Brocke, clerk, one of the king's chaplains: a profitable invention. Robert Cooper, goldſmith, was the firſt that made the inſtruments, and put this invention in practice.

In

In his three-and-thirtieth year, there was a great mortality in the realm; and withal ſo great a drought, that ſmall rivers were clean dried up; much cattle died for want of water, and the Thames was grown ſo ſhallow, that the ſalt-water flowed above London bridge, till the rain had increaſed the freſh water.

In his ſix-and-thirtieth year was a great plague in London; ſo as Michaelmas term was adjourned to St. Alban's, and there kept.

In his ſeven-and-thirtieth year, on Tueſday in Eaſter-week, William Foxley, pot-maker for the mint of the Tower of London, fell aſleep, and could not be waked, either by pinching, burning, or any other means, till the firſt day of the next term, which was full fourteen days: and when he awoke, was found in all points as if he had ſlept but one night, and lived in perfect health forty years after.

EDWARD VI. the third King of ENGLAND of the Houſe of TUDOR. A. D. 1547.

EDWARD VI. the only ſon of king Henry VIII. by his third wife, Jane Seymour, was, at the death of his father, only nine years and three months old, but a prince of moſt promiſing parts, as appears by the united teſtimony of all his hiſtorians, both cotemporary and others. When the eighth Henry reſigned his breath, Edward was with his ſiſter, the princeſs Elizabeth, at Hertford, whither Edward, earl of Hertford, and ſir Anthony Brown, knight, were ſent by the council to bring the young king to London: but they did not inform him of their meſſage till they had brought him as far as Enfield, where they notified to him his father's death, and paid their homage to him as their ſovereign. The next day, the thirty-firſt of January, they conducted him ſafe to London, and, having lodged him the Tower, the council repaired in a body to pay their reſpects to him, and proclaimed him king of England on the ſame day.

We have before ſhewn that Henry, by virtue of an act of parliament, had ſettled the ſucceſſion of this prince by will; he had alſo appointed him a privy-council, being the ſame perſons whom he had nominated the executors of his will: therefore, on the firſt of February, theſe counſellors met, opened the will, and found that the late king had nominated them regents of the kingdom and governors of his ſon, till he ſhould attain the age of eighteen years. Theſe were,

Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury.
The lord Wriotheſley, lord-chancellor.
The lord Ruſſel, privy-ſeal.
The earl of Hertford, lord high-chamberlain.
The viſcount Liſle, lord admiral.
Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham.
Sir Anthony Brown, maſter of the horſe.
Sir William Paget, ſecretary of ſtate.
Sir Edward North, chancellor of the court of augmentation.
Sir Edward Montagu, lord chief-juſtice of the Common pleas.
Judge Bromley, Sir Anthony Denny, Sir William Herbert, } chief gentlemen of the privy-chamber.
Sir Edward Wotton, treaſurer of Calais.
Dr. Wotton, his brother, dean of Canterbury and York.

Beſides theſe ſixteen, who were to exerciſe the ſovereign authority during the minority of the preſent king, Henry had nominated twelve other perſons to be as aſſiſtant counſellors to them, to be called in as need ſhould require. Theſe were Henry Fitz Allan, earl of Arundel.

William Parr, earl of Eſſex, brother to the queen dowager.
Sir William Petre, ſecretary of ſtate.
Sir Richard Rich, counſellor at law.
Sir John Baker.
Sir Ralph Sadler.
Sir Thomas Seymour, the king's uncle, and brother to the earl of Hertford.
Sir Richard Southwell.
Sir Edmund Peckham.
Sir Thomas Cheney, treaſurer of the houſhold.
Sir John Gage, comptroller.
Sir Anthony Wingfield, vice-chamberlain.

The executors having taken the proper oaths, notifications were made to all the courts of Europe concerning the new eſtabliſhment; and all the commiſſions to judges and juſtices under the great ſeal, were renewed. But no ſooner had the regents ſettled the form of government agreeable to Henry's laſt will, which was publicly read, but a change was propoſed: ſome of the regents obſerved, that it would be very troubleſome for the people, and particularly for foreign miniſters, to be forced to apply to ſixteen perſons of equal authority, and moved that one ſhould be choſen from amongſt them, to be head and preſident, with the title of Protector of the king's realm, and Governor of his perſon."

How reaſonable ſoever this change might appear to the majority, for the diſpatch of buſineſs, the lord-chancellor Wriotheſley, fearing, as in fact it happened, that the choice would fall upon the king's uncle, the earl of Hertford, who was not his friend, and that this would abſolutely deprive him of that ſway in the government, which otherwiſe he might have expected from his high office of chancellor, oppoſed this propoſal with all his might, declaring that the regents had no power to depart from the late king's will, authoriſed by act of parliament: but matters had been ſo well prepared before hand, that the chancellor's objections were over-ruled; it was reſolved to appoint a protector, and that the earl of Hertford ſhould be the perſon. He was accordingly declared, on the firſt of February, Governor of the king's perſon and Protector of all his realms; but, at the ſame time, he was bound down to act nothing without the conſent of the other other regents, ſo that, in fact, he had only pre-eminence without power. On the ſixth of the ſame month the new protector exerciſed the firſt act of his high authority, by knighting the young king, in the preſence of the lord-mayor of London and many other lords and gentlemen; then the king, riſing up under his canopy of ſtate, dubbed the lord-mayor (Henry Hobberthorn) knight; which appears to have been the firſt act of ſovereignty done by Edward VI.

The next thing which fell under the care of the regents and council was to make preparations for the funeral of the deceaſed king, and the coronation of his ſucceſſor. The firſt of theſe ceremonies was performed in the manner we have related at the end of the former reign, on the fifteenth of February; and two days after (on the ſeventeenth), the regency took an extraordinary ſtep, on pretence of fulfilling the intention of the late king, who had reſolved to make ſome promotions among his courtiers: evidence was examined touching Henry's deſign, and, in conſequence of their depoſitions, the following promotions were made, though with ſome little difference from Henry's intention:

The earl of Hertford was created duke of Somerſet, with the high offices of lord-treaſurer and earl-marſhal, vacant by the attainder of the duke of Norfolk, then under ſentence of death.

The earl of Eſſex, marquis of Northampton.

Dudley, viſcount Liſle, earl of Warwick.

The lord-chancellor Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton.

Sir Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley.

Sir Richard Rich, ſir William Willoughby, and ſir Edmund Sheffield, had the title of barons, by the names of their families *.

It had been at firſt reſolved, that the coronation ſhould have been performed on the nineteenth of February, and the marquis of Dorſet had commiſſion for being high-conſtable of England that day; but it was thought more proper to defer the ceremony till the twentieth, which was Shrove Sunday, and the lord Ruſſel was made lord-high-ſteward for the ſame day. Accordingly, the young king, being conducted in great ſtate from the Tower through the city of London, took up his lodgings in his palace of Weſtminſter on the nineteenth, and the day following was crowned with the royal diadem, anointed in a ſolemn manner, and conſecrated by Thomas Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, aſſiſted by other biſhops and all the chief nobility of the realm. There was a new form for the coronation of this king, which the curious reader may ſee in biſhop Burnet's Collections.

To grace this ceremony forty knights of the Bath were made †; and, on the Tueſday following, the king dubbed fifty knights of the carpet ‡. At the ſame time a free pardon was granted and proclaimed throughout all the king's dominions, out of which were excepted the duke of Norfolk, cardinal Pole, Edward Courtney, eldeſt ſon to the marquis of Exeter (lately beheaded), Mr. Throgmorton, and Dr. Richard Pates, or Pate, who, having been biſhop of Worceſter in the late king's reign, had, ſome years before, gone out of the kingdom to Rome, rather than acknowlege the king's ſupremacy over the church of England. It appears as if the council thought that the releaſe of theſe perſons would be too conſiderable an acceſſion to the Romiſh party, and check the ſchemes of reformation that had been already planned.

But now the ſecret enmity between the protector's family and the lord-chancellor Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton, broke out into a violent flame, which brought on the diſgrace of the latter, and in the end proved the ruin of the protector. Southampton was an obſtinate, reſtleſs, proud, man, impatient of the leaſt controul, and, from the time of Somerſet's elevation, had determined to make him as uneaſy as poſſible in his high ſtation by oppoſing all his meaſures; and, that he might give himſelf up entirely to the affairs of the cabinet, he, without any warrant from the king, lord-protector, or other of the regency, of his own authority ventured to put the great-ſeal in commiſſion, and appointed four lawyers, Southwell, Tregonel, Oliver, and Pallaſir, to execute, in his abſence, the office of high-chancellor of England. A meaſure ſo replete with arrogance and preſumption, could not fail of giving great umbrage to the government, who, influenced by the protector, gladly ſeized ſuch an opportunity of ruining Southampton. The judges being conſulted, declared, that the commiſſion he had granted was contrary to the laws of the land; and that the chancellor, for ſuch an unconſtitutional ſtep, ought not only to be deprived of the ſeals, but might likewiſe be ſubjected to the ſevereſt puniſhment: thereupon the council ſummoned him to attend, when his behaviour was ſo indecent and haughty, defending his own power, and calling theirs and the protector's in queſtion, that he provoked them to uſe him with greater ſeverity than they at firſt perhaps intended. Accordingly he was commanded to his own houſe, not to ſtir from thence till farther orders; and then the council came to this reſolution, to deprive him of the chancellorſhip, and to keep him under arreſt, to prevent his interfering in the regency, from which they did not presume to remove him, as he sat there by the same authority by which they themselves acted. The seals were given, on the seventh of March, to sir William Paulet, till another chancellor should be appointed. The earl of Southampton was not released from his confinement till the twenty-ninth of June following, when he entered into a recognizance of four thousand pounds to pay what fine they should be pleased to impose upon him.

* According to the evidence, Henry declared his intention to be that the earl of Hertford ſhould be made duke of Somerſet, earl-marſhal, and lord-treaſurer, two great offices vacant by the attainder of the duke of Norfolk; and his ſon to be earl of Wiltſhire, with eight hundred pounds a year of land, and three hundred a year out of the next biſhop's land that fell void; the earl of Eſſex to be marquis of Eſſex; the viſcount Liſle to be earl of Coventry; the lord Wriotheſley to be earl of Wincheſter; ſir Thomas Seymour, to be baron and lord-admiral; ſir Richard Rich, ſir John Leiger, ſir William Willoughby, ſir Edward Sheffield, and ſir Chriſtopher Danby, to be barons.

The protector, exulting in the downfal of a person from whom he naturally expected much opposition, now thought himself at full liberty to controul the councils of his sovereign, and aspired at nothing less than to engross the sole management of affairs into his own hands. With this view he resolved to get his powers put upon a broader foundation, and obtained from the young king a patent constituting him protector, with full regal power, and appointing him a council, composed of all the former executors, or regents, except Southampton; but he had also power given him of chusing any other counsellors at pleasure, and was at liberty to consult such only whom he should think proper. By this patent, which was passed on the thirteenth of March, Somerset made himself absolute master of the government, though in so doing he entailed upon himself the hatred and envy as well of the co-executors of the late king's will (which had in this case been manifestly infringed), as of many other noblemen.

The commotions and revolutions in the regency did not, however, so far engross their attention as to render them forgetful of the public weal, for we find in the records of state *, two new treaties concluded with France; one to renew the ancient alliances subsisting between the two crowns, and the other to explain the articles of peace which the late king Henry had made with Francis, relating to the bounds and territories of Boulogne, and the fortifications erecting by both parties in the neighbourhood of that place. Both these treaties were signed at London, on the eleventh of March; but Francis I. dying the thirty-first of the same month, prevented their being ratified: he was succeeded by his son the dauphin, who assumed the sceptre by the name of Henry II.

The death of Francis introduced a considerable alteration in the affairs of Europe, and a total one in those of France; for the new sovereign, ruled by the pernicious counsels of the cardinal of Lorraine and his brother, the duke of Guise, could not be prevailed upon to confirm the treaties with England; and the two brothers being zealous champions for the popish authority and religion, resolved at all events to prevent the projected marriage of Edward with Mary, queen of Scots, their niece: with this view they persuaded their master to recover Boulogne out of the hands of the English at any rate, to reject the treaties, and even to disown the ambassadors which had been sent by the deceased king Francis to London, to conclude them. In this state stood affairs at this time between England and France.

As to those of Germany, the Protestants, who had been ill used by the emperor in the last campaign, found themselves, by the death of Francis I. and Henry VIII. wholly deprived of the assistance which they expected from France and England: Henry II's ministers did not think proper that he should engage in a war with the emperor, to support a religion for which they had an implacable hatred; but, as policy seemed to require that some efforts should be made by France to oppose the progress of the Imperial arms, which had, during the last year's campaign, carried every thing before them, they intimated to Henry the expediency of first recovering Boulogne, after which it would be still time enough to protect Germany, in case the emperor grew too powerful there. Mean while, the princes of the Smalcaldic league having sent to Edward for aid, fifty thousand crowns were privately given them by the regency, as it was not thought prudent to offend the emperor just at this time.

In this condition stood matters at the commencement of the new government; and we cannot chuse a more proper place for introducing the reader to a knowlege of the characters and views of the several chief personages that had the management of affairs at home; the more especially as the history of this reign will be found not so much the history of the king himself, as of his governors and ministers.

We shall begin with Edward, duke of Somerset, the protector, whose character is thus collected by a late impartial writer. He was a person of very great virtues, eminent for his piety, courteous and affable in his greatness, sincere and candid in all his transactions, a patron of the poor and oppressed, but a better general than a counsellor: and though he was not without his faults, yet they were only such as human infirmity exposes most men to, when they are advanced to a high station. He had, indeed, a tincture of vanity, and a fondness for his own notions; and being a man of no extraordinary parts, was too much at the disposal of those, who by flatteries and submissions insinuated themselves into his esteem and confidence. He made likewise too great haste to raise a vast estate, to be altogether innocent. But, to balance these defects, he was never charged with personal vices, nor guilty of falsehood, of perverting justice, of cruelty, or of oppression.

Of a very different character was his brother, Thomas Seymour, lord Sudley; he was proud, haughty, and ambitious. Being uncle to the king, he could not bear the distinction made between him and the duke of Somerset by their royal nephew, thinking himself, by his birth and natural endowments, as worthy as his brother Edward, of having a share in the administration of the government, and finding himself excluded therefrom by the will of the deceased king, he immediately made his addresses to the princess Elizabeth, hoping by that means one day to compass the throne itself. However, his project being not like to succeed, he, for the present, fed his ambition by taking up with the relics of royalty, and married the queen dowager, before her royal consort had been dead a month, which he kept private till he found means, unknown to the protector, to procure a letter from the king, recommending him to the queen for an husband. Upon this the marriage was declared, without using any ceremony with his brother. From this event we may date the breach between the protector and admiral, which was never made up, though the protector, who was a man of great moderation, prevented the quarrel from breaking out: But the admiral, looking upon every promotion and act of power in his brother, to be a leſſening or eclipſing of his own birth and affinity to the crown, gave way to all the means that paſſion, envy, and malice, could invent, to ſupplant him; he joined the diſcontented and plotting nobles, and attempted to corrupt the king himſelf in prejudice to the duke.

Wriothesley, the earl of Southampton, ſeems to have been a man of parts; but he was too troubleſome to his equals, and too violent in his meaſures, to keep his footing in this government. The ſeverity, however, that it had ſhewn him did not diſcourage him from continuing his intrigues; and, perhaps, he was the author of that dark management which wrought the downfal of the protector-duke. But he was perſonally, and not undeſervedly, hated for the cruelty of his perſecutions when in power.

The character of Cranmer, archbiſhop of Canterbury, is ſufficiently known by what has been ſaid of him in the foregoing reign; we ſhall only add two things: the firſt, that he did not much love to meddle with ſtate-affairs, for which he was not very properly qualified by reaſon of certain maxims of candour and ſincerity, which he followed, and which were very oppoſite to thoſe generally obſerved in the government of ſtates. The ſecond thing concerning Cranmer, is that he was extremely zealous to promote the reformation. Since he was no longer reſtrained by ſuch a maſter as Henry, he was ſo far from concealing his opinions, that he even laboured with all his power to eſtabliſh them by public authority: he was the firſt mover of whatever was done with regard to the reformation. But his zeal was tempered with a maxim which he believed abſolutely neceſſary, namely, to proceed by degrees, and retrench firſt the groſs abuſes, that the people might be gradually accuſtomed to the changes before the tenets of greater conſequence were cruſhed.

John Dudley, earl of Warwick, was ſon of Edmund Dudley, who had ſuffered for oppreſſing the people in the beginning of the late reign: king Henry VIII. however, was pleaſed, after he had ſacrificed the father to the reſentment of the people, to dignify his ſon John with the title of lord Dudley; and after with that of viſcount Liſle. The young favourite improved this happy revolution of his affairs by a diligent obſervance of the king's pleaſure: he made a conſiderable figure in thoſe employments at court with which he was entruſted, to the king's ſatisfaction, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo remarkably by his bravery and conduct in the wars, that he was firſt made governor of Boulogne, and afterwards admiral of a fleet fitted out againſt France. He was, in a word, both a brave ſoldier and an artful courtier, but of very indifferent morals: he was blindly addicted to his pleaſures, and would ſometimes run into exceſſive debaucheries; nor was he very ſcrupulous with regard to honour and virtue, for as his ambition was boundleſs, he did not ſtick at the worſt of means to accompliſh his ends; from whence we may readily ſuppoſe that he was not very ſcrupulous in religious matters: while Henry VIII. reigned he kept ſtrictly the bounds preſcribed by that prince; and he no ſooner ſaw the majority in king Edward's council for the reformation, but he declared openly on their ſide, as the only way to pleaſe the king, and to advance his own fortune. But as his ſcheme to make religion only a means to raiſe himſelf, was eaſily diſcovered by the Proteſtant party, they never put any confidence in him, nor would conſent to his promotion to the chancery, as he expected, upon the diſgrace of Wriothesley; and therefore, from this diſappointment, we may date his diſguſt with the protector, and a reſolution to try to ruin him, as we ſhall find he effectually did, though he had attained by his means the titles of earl of Warwick and duke of Northumberland; and gained his daughter in marriage for his ſon viſcount Liſle. So implacable is hatred founded upon ambition, that neither the ties of gratitude, nor affinity, are able to reconcile it.

Theſe characters, properly conſidered, will furniſh the reader with a juſt idea of the ſeveral revolutions in the miniſtry during this ſhort reign; and for that reaſon we thought it neceſſary to introduce them. It may have been expected, that we ſhould have begun with the character of Edward himſelf; but the reader is to conſider, that he was at this time only nine years of age, and conſequently could not be ſaid to have any determinate character: he indeed, before his death, acquired a character; but this is not the proper place to treat of it: we ſhall therefore defer, to another opportunity, any farther account of the diſpoſition of Edward, and reſume the thread of our hiſtory.

Henry VIII. had, ſome time before his death, determined to force the Scots to give their young queen Mary in marriage to his young ſon Edward; and this match appearing moſt advantageous to the crown of England, Henry had, during his laſt illneſs, given poſitive directions to execute his project at all events; therefore the protector reſolved to put in force the dying injunctions of his royal maſter, and, if poſſible, to unite the two kingdoms by uniting the hands of their two youthful ſovereigns. Previous, however, to taking the neceſſary ſteps for that purpoſe, he thought it adviſeable to ſettle the internal government of the kingdom, and to put the reformation, for which he was a ſtaunch friend, upon ſuch a footing as might enable it to baffle the attacks of its open or concealed enemies.

In this he was not a little aſſiſted by the affection young Edward himſelf had to the reformed principles, and by the cool and politic councils of Cranmer. This prelate had, without being ſeen to ſtir in the matter, procured ſeveral of the beſt books written abroad againſt popery, to be tranſlated and publiſhed in England. The queen dowager, Catherine Parr, not only aſſiſted in publiſhing, but tranſlated great part of the Paraphraſe of Eraſmus upon the New Teſtament. Cranmer had likewiſe publiſhed a Catechiſm, which he tranſlated and improved from the Latin, and which was chiefly aimed againſt the aboliſhed worſhip: he alſo compoſed ſeveral Homilies, to be delivered by prieſts in the nature of ſermons. A book, of which the late king was the reputed author, concerning the true difference between the regal and the eccleſiaſtical powers, was tranſlated and publiſhed: at the ſame time an excellent treatiſe of reformation, by Herman, archbiſhop of Cologne, was rendered into Engliſh, and printed; part of the Engliſh ſervice for the Evening Prayer, was already, before any act of parliament paſſed for that purpoſe, openly performed in the king's chapel: the ſacrament had for ſome time been adminiſtered in both kinds, the doctrine of purgatory was exploded among the reformed, and the marriage of the clergy was allowed.

The chief oppoſers of the reformation were the princeſs Mary, Wriotheſley, earl of Southampton, Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, Bonner, biſhop of London, and Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, with ſome other of the biſhops, and many of the inferior clergy, conſiſting of the ſuppreſſed monks, who had been recommended to livings; theſe ſtuck out againſt every meaſure that did not ſquare exactly with the ſtate of things as they were left by king Henry VIII. and the hint was given to all the papiſts in the nation to purſue the ſame argument, in which they were warmly ſeconded by their leaders, who charged the protector with deſtroying the form of government and religion eſtabliſhed by Henry's will, from which alone all their authority was derived.

But all theſe remonſtrances and efforts produced no effect; an act of parliament had beſtowed a legiſlative power on the crown, and royal proclamations, even during a minority, poſſeſſed all the force and authority of laws: the protector availed himſelf of this ſtatute, and, the preſent juncture being ſo favourable for the reformation, he, and ſuch of the council as were of his ſentiments, reſolved to improve it. To that end they ordered a general viſitation of all the churches: the whole kingdom was divided into ſix circuits, each of which was aſſigned to a certain number of viſitors, who were partly laymen and partly eccleſiaſtics. The chief purport of their inſtructions was to aboliſh certain groſs abuſes that were introduced into divine ſervice, and particularly with regard to images; but at the ſame time they were directed to proceed with the greateſt delicacy and reſerve. With this viſitation commenced the execution of the deſign already formed of perfecting the reformation, which was properly but juſt begun in the former reign.

The protector now turned all his attention to the war with Scotland; and in proſecution of this plan aſſembled an army of eighteen thouſand men, and equipped a fleet of ſixty ſail, one half of which were ſhips of war, the other loaded with proviſions and ammunition; the command of the fleet he beſtowed upon lord Clinton, while himſelf, aſſiſted by the earl of Warwick, was to conduct the land forces. While this armament was getting ready, the French ambaſſador, by orders from his court, applied to the regency, deſiring them to conſent to a negociation, in order to compromiſe matters if poſſible without the effuſion of blood. The protector, who was deſirous of keeping fair with the French court, readily prevailed on the regents to comply with the ambaſſador's requeſt, and Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, and ſir Thomas Rowe, were appointed, on the part of England, to meet the Scottiſh commiſſioners at Newcaſtle, at which place conferences were opened on the fourth of Auguſt; but as Tonſtal and his collegue had orders to break up the congreſs immediately, if the Scottiſh ambaſſadors had no power to conſent to the marriage, and as they declared no ſuch powers were veſted in them, the negociation proved fruitleſs, and the protector-duke, with his army, entered Scotland, by the way of Berwick, on the ſecond of September.

The pretence for theſe hoſtile proceedings was to revenge ſome depredations committed by the Scottiſh borderers: but, beſides that the protector renewed the ancient claim of the ſuperiority of England, which was pompouſly aſſerted in a letter ſet forth by biſhop Tonſtal; and the protector himſelf iſſued a manifeſto, in which he enforced the neceſſity and expediency of a marriage being immediately concluded between the young queen of Scots and Edward, by a variety of arguments. Theſe were deduced from the ſituation of the two kingdoms, which nature, by cutting them from all communication with foreign ſtates, and ſurrounding them by the ocean, ſeemed to have deſigned for one empire; from the ſimilarity of the inhabitants in laws, language, manners, and cuſtoms, by which means they might the more eaſily be united into one people; the equality of the young king and queen in point of age and fortune; the imminent danger to which Scotland was perpetually expoſed from the hoſtile attempts of a richer and more powerful neighbour; the many and great advantages that muſt neceſſarily reſult to the natives of both countries from living in a ſtate of peace and ſecurity: and the protector added, that, beſides all theſe conſiderations, poſitive engagements had been made for concluding this alliance; and that the Scots were bound in honour to perform what their intereſt and ſafety ſo loudly demanded.

He ſoon found, however, that all theſe remonſtrances were rendered ineffectual by the arts and intrigues of the queen-dowager of Scotland, who was warmly attached to the intereſts of France and to the Roman catholic religion: and, much againſt his will, found nothing left but to compel the Scots by force of arms to ſubmit to a meaſure, which no motives of policy or prudence could induce them to embrace: accordingly, leaving Berwick, he continued his march towards Edinburgh, without meeting with any reſiſtance, except from ſome ſmall caſtles which were forced to ſurrender at diſcretion.

The earl of Arran, governor of Scotland, had collected the whole force of the kingdom, and his army, which was twice as numerous as that of the Engliſh, had taken poſt at Muſſelburgh, on a very advantageous ground, ſecured by the banks of the river Eſke, about ſix miles from Edinburgh. The Engliſh army lay at Preſton Pans. Several encounters happened while they were in this ſituation, and one in particular, in which the earl of Warwick was in great danger of being taken priſoner. It is not improbable that the Engliſh army, notwithſtanding all the precautions that had been taken, found itſelf greatly diſtreſſed in its late march; for we find that the protector-duke, on the approach of the Scottiſh army, ſent a letter to the earl of Arran, in which he aſſured that nobleman of his good intentions towards the kingdom and people of Scotland, and declared himſelf ready to return to England, and to pay all the damages they had ſuffered from his army, provided they would allow their infant queen to be educated in England, and to continue unbetrothed till ſhe ſhould come to years of diſcretion, and that then ſhe ſhould be left to her own liberty to make choice of a huſband. All theſe offers were rejected by the Scots, and ſeveral bravading meſſages came from their camp, which expoſed their inſolence rather than diſcovered their courage.

The protector-duke now reſolved upon a general engagement as ſoon as a proper opportunity ſhould offer for the ſame with a proſpect of advantage. The river Eſke ran between the two camps, and both armies continued inactive until the Engliſh ſhips arrived in the Firth of Forth, and lay ſo as to flank the Scots: the Engliſh then made a feint, as if they deſigned to take up a ground which commanded the enemy's camp; this had the deſired effect, for when the Scots ſaw the protector-duke alter his poſition, and advance towards the ſeaſhore, they made not the leaſt doubt that he intended to re-embark and make his eſcape on board his ſhips, which at that very time moved into the harbour of Muſſelburgh. Deluded by theſe appearances and their own vanity, orders were given for advancing to charge the flying foe, which they could not do without paſſing through a plain which lay before the Engliſh camp, and expoſe themſelves to all the fire as well from the ſhips in the harbour as the enemy's army.

The Scottiſh regent drew up his men in three bodies; the earl of Angus commanded the firſt line, which was formed of their beſt troops; the ſecond line was commanded by the earl of Arran himſelf; the third by the gallant George Gordon, earl of Huntley; and the earl of Argyll headed a body of Highland archers, who ſerved upon the flanks of the ſecond and third lines, and as a guard to their artillery.

The protector-duke was not a little delighted when he ſaw the Scots make their movement, which aſſured him a cheap and eaſy victory. He drew up his troops in two lines; the earl of Warwick commanded the firſt, the protector-duke the ſecond, and the lord Grey of Wilton commanded a reſerved body of cavalry, with orders to attack that flank of the enemy which was not expoſed to the fire from the Engliſh ſhipping. While the enemy were advancing on the plain, they received a full diſcharge from the cannon on board the ſhips in the harbour, which threw the Highland archers into ſuch confuſion, that the lord Grey could not reſiſt the tempting opportunity of attacking them before they could recover themſelves; but this diſobedience of orders had well nigh loſt the Engliſh the victory, for the Scots rallying behind a deep ſlough, and Grey attacking them there with his heavy-armed horſe, met a ſevere repulſe; he himſelf was dangerouſly wounded, lord Edward Seymour, ſon to the protector-duke, was unhorſed, the Engliſh ſtandard was narrowly ſaved from falling into the enemy's hands: but the earl of Warwick and the duke of Somerſet, being determined either to die or to conquer, advanced with ſo much ſpeed to the ſupport of the cavalry, that the latter formed again behind their infantry, and the battle became more obſtinate. The ill-armed Scots could not long ſuſtain the diſpute: the camp-artillery of the Engliſh, which was planted conveniently for the purpoſe on an eminence, played full upon their flank, while the ordnance from the ſhipping (anchored cloſe in ſhore) galled them on the other; and the lord Grey, eager to repair his error, charged them in front with his rallied horſe with ſo much reſolution, that their firſt line gave way. The Highland archers taking to flight, ſpread the alarm of a general rout through all the ranks, and rendered the whole one general ſcene of confuſion, terror, flight, and conſternation. The braveſt of the Scots were put to the ſword, and the rout and ſlaughter became ſo general, that, from the field of battle to Edinburgh (a ſpace of upwards of five miles) the whole ground was covered with the dead and dying. Never was victory more deciſive: according to the loweſt calculation, there fell in the fight above ten thouſand of the Scots, and about fifteen hundred ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The Scottiſh nobility behaved very gallantly, and many of them were either killed or taken priſoners. The loſs ſuſtained by the Engliſh was ſo inconſiderable as hardly to deſerve mention, it being aſſured that not above two hundred were ſlain in the action.

So dreadful a defeat, with other misfortunes that followed it, ſeemed to threaten Scotland with utter ruin. The regent retired to Edinburgh, and, after he had garriſoned the caſtle, ſhut himſelf and the queen up in Stirling, with the remains of his army. The protector marched directly to Leith, which he took without oppoſition; and entering Edinburgh, made an attack upon the caſtle; but being repulſed, to make amends for the diſappointment, he plundered the town, while the fleet, under lord Clinton, burned all the places on the ſea-coaſt, and took all the ſhipping of the Scots in the firth of Forth.

The duke of Somerſet, had he taken all the advantages his late victory gave him, muſt doubtleſs have forced the young queen out of the Scottiſh regent's hands, and compelled him to agree to any terms he might have thought proper to impoſe: but he was impatient to return to England, where he heard that ſome of the regency, and even his own brother, were forming cabals againſt his authority. Accordingly, after having given orders for fortifying the iſland of St. Columba, which, with the help of the Engliſh fleet, commanded the Forth and the caſtle of Broughty, which lay in the mouth of the Tay (the two chief rivers of Scotland), he departed for England on the eighteenth of September, taking his route through the counties of Marche and Tiviotdale: he left a garriſon in the caſtle of Hume, and made ſir Ralph Palmer governor of Roxburgh, which he ordered to be repaired; and, at his return to London, on the eighth of October, the mayor and aldermen went in their formalities to meet him in Finſbury Field*.

In the mean time the buſineſs of the reformation proceeded with great advances: nor were any of the prelates found hardy enough to obſtruct the commiſſion of viſitation iſſued by the crown, except the biſhops Gardiner and Bonner, who were thereupon committed to priſon: and though the princeſs Mary, on this occaſion, wrote to the protector, ſignifying her diſlike of all the changes which were making in religion, he replied, in very ſtrong terms, that he did not think himſelf obliged to conform to her ſentiments. About this time archbiſhop Cranmer, in the king's name, invited into England the famous Peter Martyr, a native of Florence; Ochinus, who was made a canon of Canterbury, with a diſpenſation of reſidence; Fagus, who was made Hebrew profeſſor at Cambridge, with a penſion of one hundred pounds per annum; Bucer, who was ſeated in the divinity-chair at Oxford, as Peter Martyr was at Cambridge, each with a penſion of one hundred pounds a year.

The protector was no ſooner arrived at London, than he found that his brother Thomas, who had been lately created by patent lord high-admiral of England, had not only caballed with his enemies, but had made vigorous efforts to ſupplant him in his high poſt, having gained ſuch an aſcendancy over Edward, that he had perſuaded him to write, with his own hand, a letter to the houſe of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of the king's perſon, a poſt to which he ſaid he was intitled by the former uſages of parliaments, as being uncle to the king. This pretenſion ſtruck at the root of all the protector's greatneſs, but ſtill he endeavoured to reclaim his brother by methods of gentleneſs and munificence; but finding him ſtill determined to puſh his point, the duke ſaw that nothing but a parliament could either ſave or ſerve him. Summons were therefore iſſued for holding a ſeſſion on the fourth of the following month.

In the mean time he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and that he propoſed to offer the ſame to the houſe at its meeting; whereupon ſeveral lords were ſent by the council to diſſuade the admiral from ſo groſs a proceeding: and when they returned with a report of his confirmed reſolution to carry the letter, they next day ſent an order to him to appear before them in council, which he at firſt refuſed to comply with, till they threatened to deprive him of all his offices, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the ſtatute which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe menaces brought him a little to conſider the danger he ſhould run by diſobeying the council, and at laſt to pretend a reconciliation with his brother, and ſubmiſſion to the regency; I ſay to pretend a reconciliation, for he never ceaſed privately to incenſe the king againſt the protector and his other miniſters, which was diligently obſerved by the ſpies ſet over him, and made the protector ever after look upon him as a very dangerous enemy.

The chancellorſhip being at this time vacant, ſince the diſgrace of Wriotheſley, a few days before the parliament met, the privy-counſellor lord Rich was made chancellor. He was grand-ſon to Richard Rich, a wealthy mercer, and ſheriff of London; this gentleman had been bred a lawyer, and, by his pliant temper, raiſed himſelf to the pinnacle of the law. On the third of November, the day before the meeting of the parliament, the council ordered the great-ſeal to be fixed to a patent, to warrant the protector "to ſit in parliament upon a ſtool under the cloth of ſtate, on the right hand of the throne, whether the king was preſent or not." The duke, by the ſame patent, was intitled "to all privileges and pre-eminences ever enjoyed by any former uncle, either by father's or mother's ſide, to a king of England, or by any protector of the kingdom during the minority, with a Non obſtante to all ſtatutes to the contrary*." Theſe honours were not ſo neceſſary as they were invidious, particularly to the old nobility, and created the duke a great many enemies, who ſcrupled not to take occaſion from hence to accuſe him of aſpiring too high, and of an intention to deſtroy the form of government eſtabliſhed by the late king.

But if Somerſet diſcovered his vanity and weakneſe in aſſuming ſo much ſtate and grandeur, he merits the higheſt praiſe on account of the laws enacted, through his influence, in the ſeſſion of parliament, which now met on the fourth of November, and by whom the rigour of former ſtatutes was greatly ſoftened, and ſome ſecurity given to the privileges of the people. The firſt act was to repeal all laws which extended the crime of treaſon beyond the ſtatute of 28 Edw. III. All laws paſſed during the late reign extending the crime of felony; all the former laws againſt Lollards, or heretics, together with the bloody ſtatute of the Six Articles; no perſon was to be accuſed of words but within a month after they were ſpoken. By theſe repeals ſome of the moſt ſevere laws that ever were enacted in England were annulled, and the people began to have the happy proſpect of enjoying ſome ſhare of civil and religious liberty. Hereſy, however, was ſtill a capital crime by the common law, and was liable to the penalty of burning; but there was no preciſe ſtandard by which that crime could be aſcertained, a circumſtance which might either be advantageous or prejudicial to the public ſecurity, according to the rigour or lenity of the judges.

The parliament alſo repealed that law, the deſtruction of all laws, by which the king's proclamation was made equal to a ſtatute; they likewiſe mitigated that other law, paſſed in the twenty-eighth of the late reign, by which the king was empowered to annul all laws enacted before he had attained his twenty-fourth year: at the ſame time they left him at liberty, after he ſhould come to the ſaid age, to annul them for the future by his letters patent; but he could not reverſe any effects which had already enſued from them.

There were likewiſe ſeveral laws enacted, which contributed greatly to promote the reformation; the cup was reſtored to the laity; private maſſes were aboliſhed; the king was inveſted with a power of creating biſhops, without any election of the chapter; and all proceſſes in the biſhops courts (thoſe of Canterbury excepted) were to be carried on in the king's name, and ſealed by his ſeal, as in courts of common law.

In this parliament a ſtatute was made againſt vagrants, by which it was enacted, "That any man or woman not being diſabled by age, accident, or ſickneſs, and not having lands or other means ſufficient to maintain them, that wandered up and down idly for three days together, without employment, ſuch perſons, being brought before two juſtices of the peace, were to be ſlaves two years to the perſon that brought them, and marked with the letter V."

It appears upon the face of this act, that it was chiefly levelled againſt the ouſted monks, and other religious perſons, who being deſtitute of all proviſions, except a ſmall ill-paid penſion, which ſome of them had, were obliged to go about the country for ſubſiſtance, and, it ſeems, gave the people unfavourable impreſſions of the reformation.

But the bill, which made the greateſt noiſe in this parliament, was that which gave chantries and colleges to the crown. The pretext for puſhing this bill, was to enable the king to pay part of his debts; the reaſon was, the hopes which the courtiers had, by ſales or gifts of them, to enlarge their own eſtates. Cranmer and ſeveral biſhops were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the impropriation of the tythes, and other methods of alienation were already too much reduced; he therefore ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the bill, and was joined by the biſhops of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Wincheſter, and Chicheſter: but it paſſed the houſe of peers; and, notwithſtanding ſome oppoſition, that of the commons likewiſe. An act had paſſed in the late reign, granting thoſe chantries to the crown; but, it ſeems, the commiſſioners entruſted with this act had neglected to take poſſeſſion of them, and therefore this new act became neceſſary. By this act no fewer than two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chantries and other religious foundations fell to the crown, with a few reſerves of penſions to be paid to the ouſted incumbents.

It was likewiſe decreed, that all who denied the ſupremacy of the king, or maintained that of the pope, ſhould, for their firſt offence, forfeit their goods and chattels, and be impriſoned during pleaſure; for the ſecond offence, ſhould be ſubject to Præmunire; and for the third offence, be attainted of high-treaſon.

The penalties of this laſt crime were denounced againſt all who ſhould endeavour, by writing, printing, or any overt-act or deed, to deprive the king of his eſtate or titles, particularly of his ſupremacy, or to beſtow them on any other, as well as againſt the heirs of the crown who ſhould attempt to uſurp upon one another, and to break the eſtabliſhed order of ſucceſſion.

The convocation aſſembled at the ſame time with the parliament; and as it appeared the freedom of their debates were greatly hampered by the rigour of the Six Articles, the king indulged them with a diſpenſation from that ſtatute, before it was annulled by parliament.

The lower houſe of convocation preſented a petition, deſiring that they might have the liberty of ſitting with the commons in parliament; or, if this privilege, which they pretended to claim by ancient right, was denied them, they required that no law concerning religion might be enacted in parliament without their conſent and approbation.

But the principles of that age were more favourble to the civil than the eccleſiaſtical power; and, though it is probable that the lower clergy had a right of ſending repreſentatives to the houſe of commons, yet that practice had been diſcontinued for above two centuries, and the preſent juncture was by no means a proper ſeaſon for endeavouring to revive it.

This parliament, having gone through its buſineſs, broke up on the twenty-fourth of December, after having granted the king a ſubſidy, and paſſed an act of grace, by which biſhop Gardiner and Bonner were diſcharged from the Fleet, none being excepted but ſuch priſoners as were confined in the Tower of London.

In the courſe of this year the face of affairs in Germany was entirely changed; the emperor defeated and took priſoner John Frederick, elector of Saxony, and declared his couſin Maurice elector, who at the ſame time took poſſeſſion of the electoral dominions. After this diſaſter, the landgrave of Heſſe, finding himſelf unable to maintain the war, made the beſt terms he could with the emperor, and came to him upon the faith of a ſafe-conduct, which expreſly ran, that he ſhould not be liable to any impriſonment; but, by a groſs fraud, inſtead of the German word einig, which ſignifies any, the word eunig, which ſignifies perpetual, was inſerted; by this baſe artifice he was detained a priſoner, to be releaſed at the emperor's pleaſure. The impriſonment of the two heads rendered the proteſtant party very weak, and the emperor's triumphant, who now made ſundry alterations, tending to deſtroy the reformation in Germany *.

In the beginning of the year 1548, the council made ſeveral alterations in the ceremonies of religion: it forbad the ſuperſtitious bleſſing of candles on the day of the Purification (February 2, thence called Candlemas-day), the bleſſing of aſhes on the firſt day of Lent (Aſh Wedneſday), and of palms on the Sunday next before Eaſter (or Palm Sunday); all Wakes and Plough-Monday days were forbidden, and ordered to be ſuppreſſed. A few days after, they approved of the people's zeal in pulling down images, and ordered that they ſhould be removed out of all churches. They alſo did what lay in their power to aboliſh auricular confeſſion, that badge of popiſh ſlavery which kept the deluded people in eternal ſubjection to the tricks and impoſitions of the prieſts. But theſe great points againſt popery were not carried without ſome oppoſition, though confirmed by the king's proclamation, in virtue of his ſupremacy: Gardiner, though ſo lately releaſed from confinement, once more attempted to obſtruct the great work of reformation, by publicly proteſting againſt all changes in religion during the king's minority. This drew upon him the reſentment of the adminiſtration a ſecond time, who ſent him to the Tower; and this act of ſeverity to their head intimidated the popiſh party to ſuch a degree, that they conformed to the new ordinances without heſitation.

The lord high-admiral Seymour had for ſome time continued pretty quiet; but now he returned to his former practices of caballing with the ſervants about the king's perſon. As the public had a very indifferent opinion of his morals, it was ſuſpected that the death of his wife (Catherine Parr, the queen-dowager), which happened about this time, in child-bed, was haſtened by his arts, that he might be at liberty to renew his addreſſes to the princeſs Elizabeth. It is certain that he was charged with this courtſhip before the council, and that it was afterwards made an article againſt him; nor did he deny it. But we are now to attend the affairs of Scotland.

Upon the return of the protector-duke laſt year from that country, he received a letter from the earl of Arran, in Stirling, begging he might be allowed to ſend commiſſioners to treat of an accommodation; on which Somerſet, who was very deſirous of terminating matters with the Scots in an amicable manner, named Berwick as the place of meeting, and inveſted the earl of Warwick with full powers to ſettle the preliminaries; but no com-
